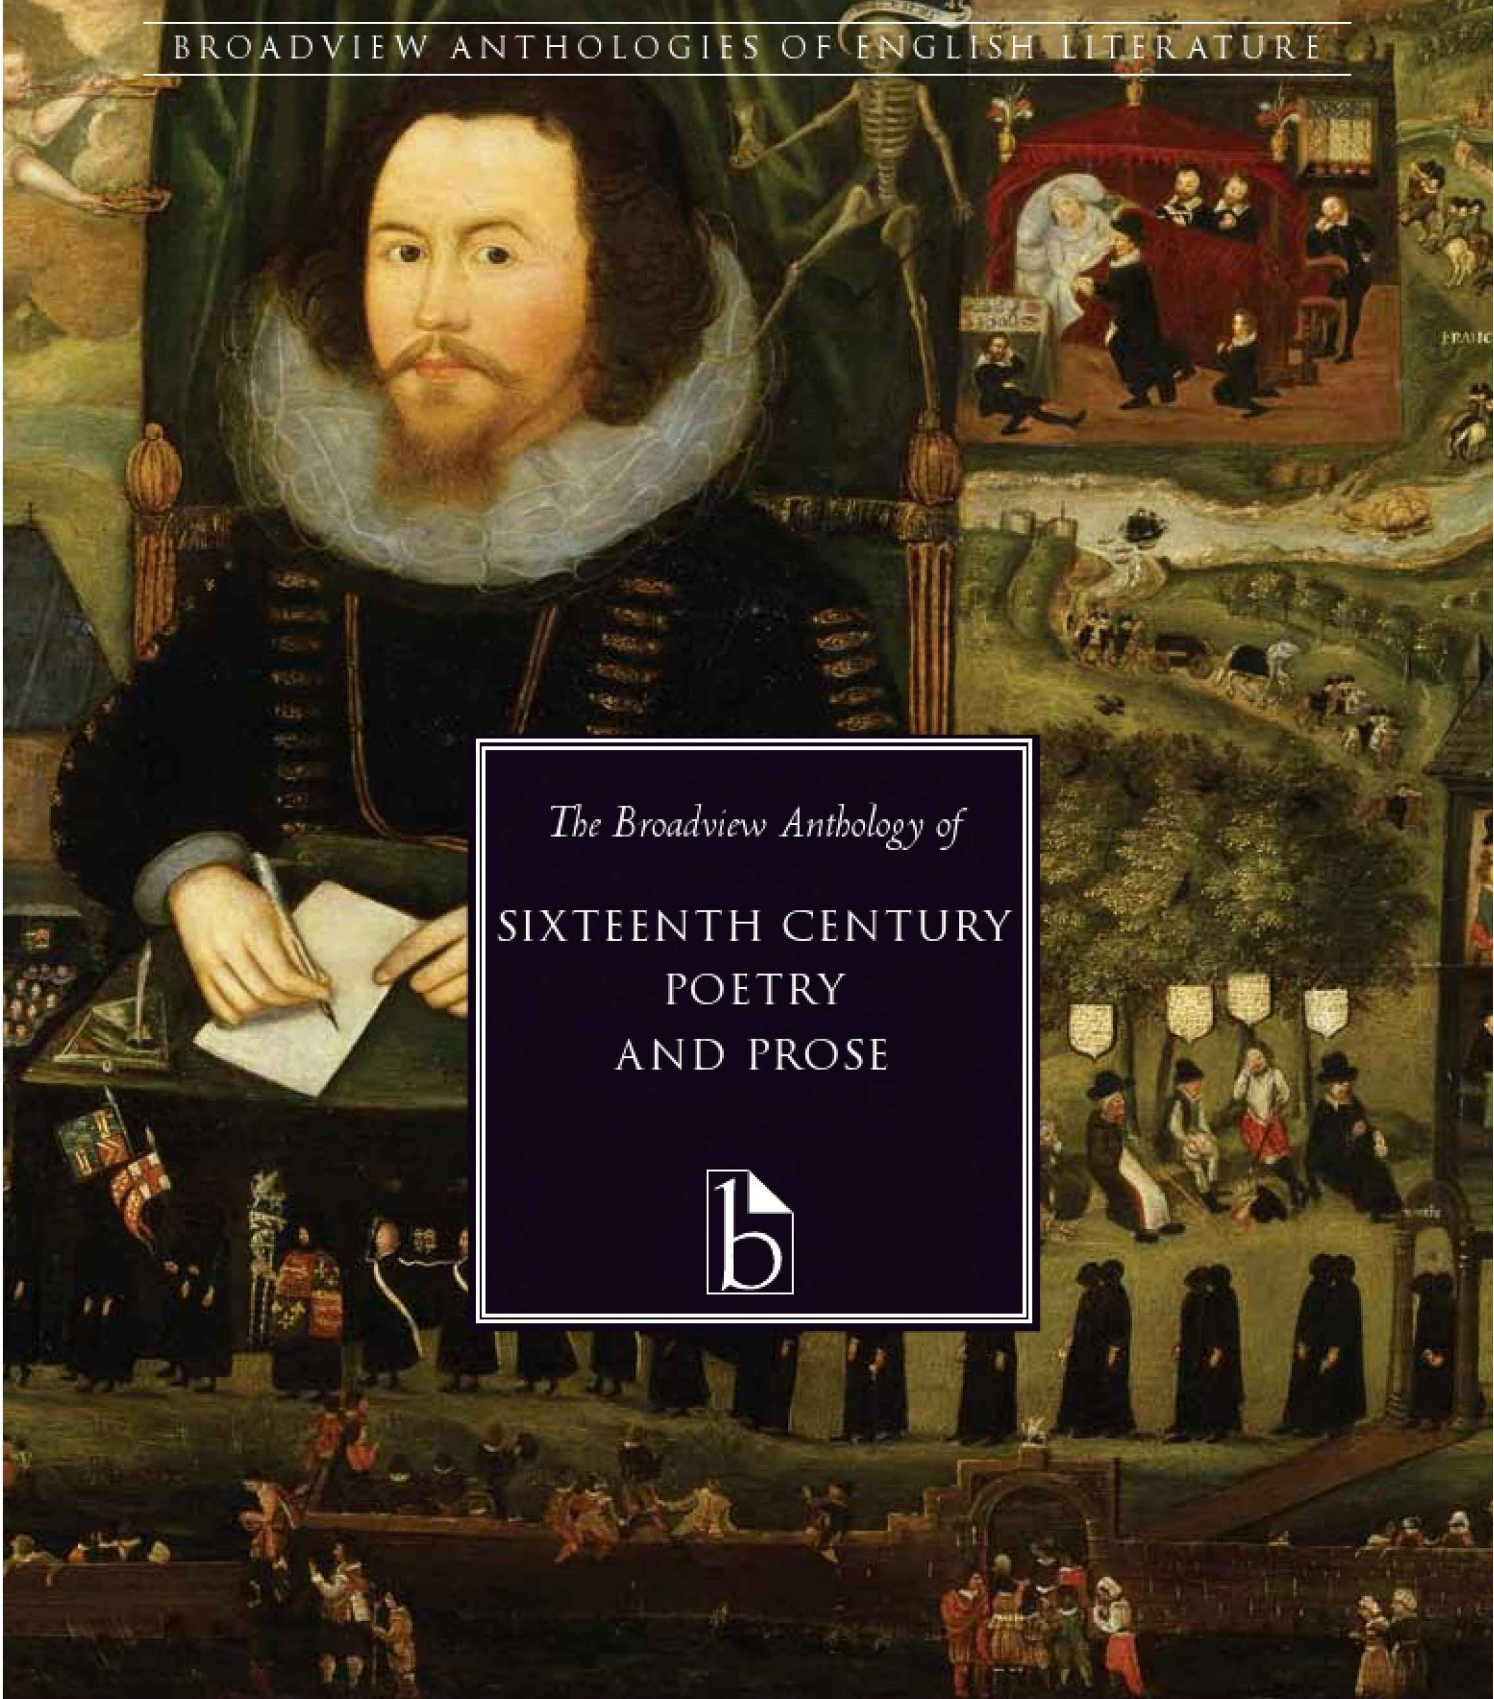
BROADVIEW ANTHOLOGIES OF ENGLISH LITERATURE



The Broadview Anthology of

SIXTEENTH CENTURY POETRY AND PROSE

EDITED BY MARIE LOUGHLIN, SANDRA J. BELL, & PATRICIA BRACE

The Broadview Anthology of

SIXTEENTH-CENTURY POETRY AND PROSE

The Broadview Anthology of

SIXTEENTH-CENTURY POETRY AND PROSE

EDITED BY

MARIE H. LOUGHLIN, SANDRA BELL, AND PATRICIA BRACE

broadview press

© 2012 Marie H. Loughlin, Sandra Bell, and Patricia Brace

All rights reserved. The use of any part of this publication reproduced, transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, or stored in a retrieval system, without prior written consent of the publisher—or in the case of photocopying, a licence from Access Copyright (Canadian Copyright Licensing Agency), One Yonge Street, Suite 1900, Toronto, Ontario M5E 1E5—is an infringement of the copyright law.

Library and Archives Canada Cataloguing in Publication

The Broadview anthology of sixteenth-century poetry and prose / edited by Marie H. Loughlin, Sandra Bell, and Patricia Brace.

(Broadview anthologies of English literature)
Includes bibliographical references and index.
ISBN 978-1-55111-162-9

1. English poetry—Early modern, 1500-1700. 2. English prose literature—Early modern, 1500-1700.
I. Loughlin, Marie Helena, 1962- II. Bell, Sandra J. (Sandra Jane), 1965- III. Brace, Patricia, 1964- IV. Title: Sixteenth-century poetry and prose. V. Series: Broadview anthologies of English literature.

PR1121.B764 2011 820.8'003 C2011-904142-1

Copy-edited by Jennie Rubio.

Broadview Press is an independent, international publishing house, incorporated in 1985.

We welcome comments and suggestions regarding any aspect of our publications—please feel free to contact us at the addresses below or at broadview@broadviewpress.com.

North America
Post Office Box 1243, Peterborough, Ontario, Canada K9J 7H5
2215 Kenmore Avenue, Buffalo, NY, USA 14207
Tel: (705) 743-8990; Fax: (705) 743-8353
email: customerservice@broadviewpress.com

UK, Europe, Central Asia, Middle East, Africa, India, and Southeast Asia
Eurospan Group, 3 Henrietta St., London WC2E 8LU, United Kingdom
Tel: 44 (0) 1767 604972; Fax: 44 (0) 1767 601640
email: eurospan@turpin-distribution.com

Australia and New Zealand
NewSouth Books
c/o TL Distribution, 15-23 Helles Ave., Moorebank, NSW, Australia 2170
Tel: (02) 8778 9999; Fax: (02) 8778 9944
email: orders@tldistribution.com.au

www.broadviewpress.com

Broadview Press acknowledges the financial support of the Government of Canada through the Canada Book Fund for our publishing activities.

Typesetting and assembly: True to Type Inc., Claremont, Canada.

PRINTED IN CANADA

Contents

Acknowledgements xxvii

Editorial Preface xxviii

Reference Works and Abbreviations xxx

John Skelton (c. 1460-1529) 1
from The Tunning of Elynour Rummyng (1521) 1

Sir Thomas More (1478-1535) 10
Utopia (Latin edition, 1516; English translation, 2nd corrected edition, 1556) 11
Thomas More to Peter Giles 11
The First Book of the Communication of Raphael Hythloday 13
The Second Book of the Communication of Raphael Hythloday 35
Of the Cities and Namely of Amaurot 38
Of the Magistrates 39
Of Sciences, Crafts, and Occupations 40
Of Their Living and Mutual Conversation Together 43
Of Their Journeying or Travelling Abroad 46
Of Bondmen, Sick Persons, Wedlock, and Divers Other Matters 58
Of Warfare 63
Of the Religions in Utopia 69

Margaret More Roper (1505-1544) 79
from A Devout Treatise upon the Pater Noster (1525) 80
Richard Hyrde unto [...] Frances S. 80
The Seventh Petition 84
Letter 85
Margaret Roper to Erasmus, 4 November 1529 85

William Roper (1495/1498-1578) 86
from The Life of Sir Thomas More (composed, c. 1535) 87

Juan Luis Vives (1492-1540) 96
from The Instruction of a Christian Woman (1529/30) 96
Unto [...] Queen Katherine 96
The Preface 98
Of Her First Exercise. The Third Chapter 100
Of the Learning of Maids. The Fourth Chapter 102
What Books to Be Read and What Not. The Fifth Chapter 106

HUGH LATIMER (c. 1485-1555) 111
Sermon on the Ploughers (1548) 113

SIR THOMAS ELYOT (c. 1490-1546) 129
from The Book Named the Governor (1531) 129
The Proem of Thomas Elyot Knight unto [...] King Henry the Eighth 129
The Signification of a Public Weal 130
That One Sovereign Governor Ought to Be in a Public Weal 132
At What Age a Tutor Should Be Provided and What Shall Appertain to His Office to Do 135
Wherefore in the Good Order of Dancing a Man and a Woman Danceth Together 136

ANNE ASKEW (c. 1521-1546) 138 from The First Examination of [...] Anne Askew (1546) 139 from The Latter Examination of [...] Anne Askew (1547) 151
The Censure or Judgement of John Bale thereupon 151
The Sum of My Examination 153
The Confession of Me Anne Askew 154
The Sum of the Condemnation of Me Anne Askew 155
My Letter Sent to the Lord Chancellor 156
My Faith Briefly Written to the King's Grace 156
The Effect of My Examination and Handling 156
Anne Askew's Answer unto John Lascelles's Letter 157
The Confession of Her Faith [...] Afore She Suffered 158
The Ballad Which Anne Askew Made and Sang 159

KATHERINE PARR, QUEEN OF ENGLAND (1512-1548) 161
from Prayers or Meditations (1545) 162
A Prayer for the King 163
A Prayer for Men to Say Entering into Battle 163
from The Lamentation of a Sinner (1547) 164
"Preface" by William Cecil 164
A Lamentation or Complaint of a Sinner 165
Letter to Mary, 20 September 1544 167

LADY ANNE COOKE BACON (c. 1528-1610) 169
from Sermons of Barnardine Ochine of Sena (1548) 171
The Interpreter to the Gentle Reader 171
How a Christian Ought to Make His Last Will and Testament 172
from Fourteen Sermons of Barnardine Ochine (1551) 174
To the Christian Reader 174
To the [...] Beloved Mother, the Lady. F. 174
Selected Letters 175
Letter to Lord Burghley [no date] 175
Lady Bacon to Anthony Bacon, 3 February 1592 177
Lady Bacon to Anthony Bacon, 29 May 1592 178
Lady Bacon to Anthony Bacon, 24 July 1592 178
Francis Allen about Lady Bacon, 17 August 1589 178

LADY JANE (OR JOANNA) LUMLEY (1537-1578) 180
from Jane Lumley's Commonplace Book: Dedicatory Letters and Translations from Euripides and Isocrates 181
Letter 1 (A New Year's letter to her father, Lord Arundel) [date unknown] 181 Letter 2 (To her father, Lord Arundel) [date unknown] 181 from The Tragedy of Euripides Called Iphigenia (c. 1554) 182

RICHARD TOTTEL (b. in or before 1528-d. 1593) 188
from Songs and Sonnets Written by the Right Honourable Lord Henry Howard Late Earl of Surrey, and Others (1557) 189
The Printer to the Reader 189
Henry Howard, earl of Surrey (1516/17-47) 189
Description of Spring, Wherein Each Thing Renews, Save Only the Lover ("The soote season, that bud and bloom forth brings") 189
Complaint of a Lover Rebuked ("Love that liveth and reigneth in my thought") 190
Description and Praise of His Love Geraldine ("From Tuscan came my lady's worthy race") 190
A Complaint by Night of the Lover Not Beloved ("Alas, so all things now do hold their peace") 190
How Each Thing, Save the Lover, in Spring Reviveth to Pleasure ("When Windsor walls sustained my wearied arm") 191
Vow to Love Faithfully Howsoever He Be Rewarded ("Set me whereas the sun doth parch the green") . . . 191
Prisoned in Windsor, He Recounteth His Pleasure There Passed ("So cruel prison how could betide, alas") 191
Complaint of the Absence of Her Lover Being upon the Sea ("O happy dames that may embrace") 192
The Means to Attain Happy Life ("Martial, the things that do attain") 193
Of the Same [Of the Death of Sir T.W.] ("W[yatt] resteth here that quick could never rest") 193
Sir Thomas Wyatt (c. 1503-42) 194
The Lover for Shamefastness Hideth His Desire within His Faithful Heart ("The long love that in my thought I harbour") 194
Description of the Contrarious Passions in a Lover ("I find no peace, and all my war is done") 194
The Lover Compareth His State to a Ship in Perilous Storm Tossed on the Sea ("My galley charged with forgetfulness") 194
The Lover Showeth How He Is Forsaken of Such as He Sometime Enjoyed ("They flee from me that sometime did me seek") 195
To His Love Whom He Had Kissed against Her Will ("Alas, madam, for stealing of a kiss") 195
The Lover Compareth His Heart to the Overcharged Gun ("The furious gun, in his most raging ire") 195
The Lover Complaineth the Unkindness of His Love ("My lute awake, perform the last") 195
How by a Kiss He Found Both His Life and Death ("Nature that gave the bee so feat a grace") 196
The Lover Laments the Death of His Love ("The pillar perished is whereto I lent") 196
That Pleasure Is Mixed with Every Pain ("Venomous thorns that are so sharp and keen") 196
Description of a Gun ("Vulcan begat me; Minerva me taught") 196
Wyatt Being in Prison, to Bryan ("Sighs are my food, my drink are my tears") 197
The Courtier's Life ("In court to serve, decked with fresh array") 197
Of the Courtier's Life Written to John Poins ("Mine own John Poins, since ye delight to know") 197
Uncertain Authors 199
Comparison of Life and Death ("The life is long that loathsomely doth last") 199
Upon Consideration of the State of This Life, He Wisheth Death ("The longer life, the more offence") . . 199
Of a New Married Student That Played Fast and Loose ("A student at his book so placed") 200
A Praise of Petrarch and of Laura His Lady ("O Petrarch, head and prince of poets all") 200

That Petrarch Cannot Be Passed, but Notwithstanding That Laura Is Far Surpassed ("With Petrarch to compare there may no wight") ... 200
The Lady Forsaken of Her Lover Prayeth His Return or the End of Her Own Life ("To love, alas, who would not fear") ... 200
N[icholas] G[rimald] (b. 1519/20-d. in or before 1562) ... 201
Description of Virtue ("What one art thou, thus in torn weed yclad?") ... 201
Praise of Measure-Keeping ("The ancient time commended, not for naught") ... 201

SIR THOMAS WYATT (c. 1503-1542) ... 203
The Long Love ("The long love that in my thought doth harbour") ... 203
They Flee from Me ("They flee from me that sometime did me seek") ... 203
Whoso List to Hunt ("Whoso list to hunt, I know where is an hind") ... 203
Blame Not My Lute ("Blame not my lute, for he must sound") ... 204

JOHN KNOX (c. 1514-1572) ... 205
from The First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women (1558) ... 205
The Preface ... 205
The First Blast, to Awake Women Degenerate ... 206

ANNE (VAUGHAN) LOCKE [LOK] (c. 1530-1590/1607) ... 210
from Sermons of John Calvin, Upon the Song that Hezekiah Made (1560) ... 211
To the [...] Lady Katharine, Duchess of Suffolk ... 211
A Meditation of a Penitent Sinner ... 214

JOHN FOXE (1516/1517-1587) ... 220
from Acts and Monuments of These Latter and Perilous Days (1563) ... 220
The Behaviour of Dr. Ridley and Master Latimer, at the Time of Their Death ... 220
A Lamentable Example of Cruelty Showed upon John Bolton ... 224

LADY JANE GREY (1537-1554) ... 226
Letter ... 227
Lady Jane Grey to Her Father, 9 February 1554 ... 227
From John Foxe, Acts and Monuments of These Latter and Perilous Days (1563) ... 228
The Communication Had Between the Lady Jane and Feckenham ... 229
A Letter Written by the Lady Jane [...] unto Her Sister Lady Katherine ... 232
A Certain Prayer of the Lady Jane in the Time of Her Trouble ... 233
Certain Pretty Verses Written by the Said Lady Jane with a Pin ... 234
"Do never think it strange" ... 234
"If God do help thee" ... 234

WILLIAM BALDWIN (d. in or before 1563) ... 235
from Beware the Cat (1570) ... 237
T.K. to the Reader ... 237
The Epistle Dedicatory ... 239
The Argument ... 240

The First Part of Master Streamer's Oration 242
The Second Part of Master Streamer's Oration 253
The Third Part of Master Streamer's Oration 261
An Exhortation 275
The Hymn 276
from A Mirror for Magistrates (1563) 277
A Mirror for Magistrates 277
To the Nobility and All Other in Office 277
A Brief Memorial of Sundry Unfortunate Englishmen 279
William Baldwin to the Reader 279
How King Richard II Was for His Evil Governance Deposed from His Seat, and Miserably Murdered in Prison 281
How Jack Cade Traitorously Rebelling against His King, Was for His Treasons and Cruel Doings Worthily Punished 284
The Second Part of the Mirror for Magistrates 288
William Baldwin to the Reader 288
The Induction 291
How Shore's Wife, Edward the Fourth's Concubine, Was by King Richard Despoiled of All Her Goods and Forced to Do Open Penance 299

MARY STUART, QUEEN OF SCOTS (1542-1587) 306
Sonnets to Bothwell (composed, c. 1566-67) 306
"O gods, have of me compassion" ("O Dieux ayez de moy compassion") 306
"In his hands and in his full power" ("Entre ses mains & en son plein pouvoir") 307
"And now she begins to see" ("Et maintenant elle commence à voir") 307
"You believe her (alas) I perceive it too well" ("Vous la croyez, las! trop je l'apperçoy") 307
Sonnet to Elizabeth (composed, c. 1567-68) 308

SIR THOMAS HOBY (1530-1566) 309
from The Book of the Courtier (1561) 309
The Printer to the Reader 309
To the Reader 310
To [...] the Lord Henry Hastings 310
The Second Book of the Courtier 315
The Third Book of the Courtier 319
The Fourth Book of the Courtier 323

ROGER ASCHAM (1514/1515-1568) 332
from The Schoolmaster (1570) 332
To [...] Sir William Cecil (by Margaret Ascham) 332
The First Book for the Youth 333

GEORGE GASCOIGNE (1534/1535?-1577) 339
from A Hundred Sundry Flowers (1573) 340
The Printer to the Reader 340

The Adventures of Master F.J. . . . 341
Gascoigne's Lullaby . . . 363
"The common speech is, spend and God will send" . . . 364
1 ("In haste post haste when first my wand'ring mind") . . . 366
2 ("Before mine eye to feed my greedy will") . . . 366
3 ("And every year a world my will did deem") . . . 366
4 ("To prink me up and make me higher placed") . . . 366
5 ("All were too little for the merchant's hand") . . . 367
6 ("For why? the gains doth seldom quit the charge") . . . 367
7 ("'No haste but good,' where wisdom makes the way") . . . 367
Gascoigne's Good Morrow . . . 368
Gascoigne's Good Night . . . 369
Gascoigne's Woodmanship . . . 370
from The Posies of George Gascoigne (1575) . . . 373
The Green Knight's Farewell to Fancy . . . 373
Appendix: The Retitled and Revised Introduction and Conclusion of The Adventures of Master F.J. . . . 375

ISABELLA WHITNEY (fl. 1566-1578) . . . 377
from A Sweet Nosegay, or Pleasant Posy (1573) . . . 378
To [...] George Mainwaring . . . 378
The Author to the Reader . . . 379
T.B. in Commendation of the Author . . . 382
A Sweet Nosegay, or Pleasant Posy . . . 383
The 97 ("Ask nothing of thy neighbour that") . . . 383
The 98 ("If that thou minded are to give") . . . 383
The 99 ("It glorious is to give all things") . . . 383
The 100 ("Whilst that thou hast free liberty") . . . 383
The 101 ("That lawyer, which is chose to plead") . . . 383
The 102 ("A little gold in law will make") . . . 383
The 103 ("Gold savours well, though it be got") . . . 383
The 104 ("Such poor folk as to law do go") . . . 383
The 105 ("A hasty tongue, which runs at large") . . . 383
The 106 ("Two eyes, two ears, and but one tongue") . . . 383
The 107 ("Keep well thy tongue and keep thy friend") . . . 383
The 108 ("Seek not each man to please, for that") . . . 384
The 109 ("Of wicked men to be dispraised") . . . 384
The 110 ("Whenas the wicked are in midst") . . . 384
A Sovereign Receipt . . . 384
A Farewell to the Reader . . . 384
Certain Familiar Epistles and Friendly Letters . . . 385
To Her Brother, G.W. . . . 385
To Her Brother, B.W. . . . 385
An Order Prescribed, by Is. W. to Two of Her Younger Sisters Serving in London . . . 386
To Her Sister Mistress A.B. . . . 387
A Careful Complaint by the Unfortunate Author . . . 388
An Answer to Comfort Her . . . 388

A Reply to the Same 389
The Author ... Maketh Her Will and Testament 390
The Lamentation of a Gentlewoman (1578) 395

ELIZABETH I, QUEEN OF ENGLAND (1533-1603) 399
Letter 399
To [...] Queen Katherine, 31 December 1544 399
Verse 400
Written on a Window Frame at Woodstock (composed, c. 1554-55) 400
Written in Her French Psalter (composed, 1565?) 400
The Doubt of Future Foes (composed, c. 1568-71/87?) 401
On Monsieur's Departure (composed, c. 1582) 401
When I Was Fair and Young (composed, c. 1580s) 402
Selected Speeches 402
To the Troops at Tilbury (delivered, 1588) 402
The Golden Speech (delivered, 30 November 1601) 403

JOHN DEE (1527-1609) 405
from General and Rare Memorials Pertaining to the Perfect Art of Navigation (1577) 406
from John Dee's Actions with Spirits (1581-83) 412
Mysteriorum Liber Primus. Mortlaci [The First Book of the Mysteries of Mortlake] (1581-82) 412
Ad Deum Omnipotentem [To the Almighty God] 412
Liber Mysteriorum Quintus [The Fifth Book of the Mysteries] (1583) 415
Maundy Thursday, after None. hor. 3 ½ 415
Aprilis 6. Saturday after none 418
Quinti Libri Mysteriorum. Appendix. 420
Aprilis 20 — Saturday 420
Aprilis 29 — Monday, a meridie [towards midday] 422

BARNABE GOOGE (1540-1594) 423
from Eclogues, Epitaphs, and Sonnets (1563) 424
To [...] Master William Lovelace 424
An Epitaph of the Death of Nicholas Grimald 425
To Doctor Bale 425
Of Edwards of the Chapel 425
To the Translation of Palingen 426
Of Money 426
Going towards Spain 426
Coming Homeward out of Spain 427
Appendix: From George Turberville's Epitaphs, Epigrams, Songs and Sonnets (1567) 427
To Master Googe's Fancy That Begins "Give money me, take friendship whoso list" 427

MARGARET TYLER (fl. 1558-1578) 428
from The Mirror of Princely Deeds and Knighthood (1578) 429
To [...] the Lord Thomas Howard 429
M.T. to the Reader 430

Chapter 38 432
Chapter 45 436

RICHARD ROGERS (1551-1618) 440
from The Diary of Richard Rogers (composed, c. 1586-90) 441

STEPHEN GOSSON (1554-1625) 446
from The School of Abuse (1579) 446
To the Reader 446
The School of Abuse 446
from Plays Confuted in Five Actions (1582) 449
To the [...] Gentlemen and Students of Both Universities, and the Inns of Court 449
The First Action 450
The Second Action 451
The Third Action 452
The Fourth Action 452
The Fifth Action 452

ANNE WHEATHILL (fl. 1584) 454
from A Handful of Wholesome (Though Homely) Herbs (1584) 455
To All Ladies, Gentlewomen, and Others 455
21. A Prayer of the Creation of Mankind, of the True Samaritan, and for Strength against Temptation 455
31. A Prayer that We May Hear the Word of God and Keep It 457

JOHN LYLY (1554-1606) 458
from Euphues: The Anatomy of Wit (1578; 2nd revised edition, 1579) 459
To [...] Sir William West 459
To the Gentlemen Readers 461
To My Very Good Friends, the Gentlemen Scholars of Oxford 462
Euphues 464

BARNABE RICHE (1542-1617) 486
from Barnabe Riche His Farewell to Military Profession (1581) 487
To the Right Courteous Gentlewomen, Both of England and Ireland 487
To the Noble Soldiers Both of England and Ireland 489
To the Readers in General 495
Of Apolonius and Silla 495
The Conclusion 508

RAPHAEL HOLINSHED (c. 1525-?1580) 513
from Chronicles: England, Scotland and Ireland (1587) 515
To the Readers Studious in Histories 515
Of Brute and His Descent 516
The First Chapter 516
The Third Chapter 516

The Fourth Chapter 517
Mary the Eldest Daughter of King Henry the Eighth 518
The Order of Arraignment of Sir Nicholas Throckmorton [...] 17 April 1554 518

WILLIAM HARRISON (1535-1593) 527
from An Historical Description of the Island of Britain (1587) 528
Book II: The Description of England 528
Chapter 3: Of Universities 528
Chapter 5: Of Degrees of People in the Commonwealth of England 529
Chapter 6: Of the Food and Diet of the English 533

POPULAR LITERATURE IN SIXTEENTH-CENTURY ENGLAND 537

PAMPHLETS OF MURDER AND MAYHEM 537
Arthur Golding (1535/1536-1606), The Murder of George Saunders (1573) 538
Anonymous, The Murder of John Brewen (1592) 549
Anonymous, The Examination, Confession, and Condemnation of Henry Robson (1598) 553

THE MONSTROUS CHILDREN BROADSIDES 556
The Much Horkesley Monster (1562) 557
The Chichester Monster (1562) 560
The Isle of Wight Monster (1564?) 563
The Ruffs Monster (1566) 565
The Maidstone Monster (1568) 568

WITCHCRAFT: LEGAL AND POPULAR DISCOURSES 571
An Act against Conjurations, Enchantments, and Witchcrafts (1563) 571
Anonymous, The Examination and Confession of Certain Witches at Chelmsford (1566) 573
Reginald Scott (d. 1599), from The Discovery of Witchcraft (1584) 577
Book XVI, Chapter VI 577
Book XVI, Chapter VII 578
James VI (1566-1625), from Daemonology (1597) 579
The Preface to the Reader 579
The Second Book. Chapter III 579
The Second Book. Chapter V 581

JESTBOOKS 583
from A Hundred Merry Tales (1526) 583
Tale 3 583
Tale 17 584
Tale 19 585
Tale 27 585
Tale 32 585
Tale 41 585

Tale 62 . . . 586
Tale 67 . . . 587
Tale 69 . . . 587
from Merry Tales, Witty Questions and Quick Answers (1567) . . . 588
Of Him that Rode Out of London and Had His Servant Following on Foot . . . 588
Of the Chaplain that Said Our Lady Matins Abed . . . 588
Of the Jealous Man . . . 588
Of King Louis of France and the Husbandman . . . 589
Of Another Pickthank and the Same King . . . 589
Of the Uplandish Man that Saw the King . . . 590 from Merry Tales Newly Imprinted and Made by Master Skelton, Poet Laureate (1567) . . . 590
How the Vintner's Wife Put Water into Skelton's Wine . . . 590 from The Mirror of Mirth (1583) . . . 591
To the Courteous and Gentle Readers . . . 591
Of the Three Sisters Newly Married . . . 592
Of a Certain Student in the Law . . . 594

JAMES VI, KING OF SCOTLAND (1566-1625) . . . 597
To the Queen (composed, c. 1589) . . . 597
from The Essays of a Prentice (1584) . . . 598
Sonnet 4 ("And grant I may so vively put in verse") . . . 598
Sonnet Deciphering the Perfect Poet . . . 598
A Short Treatise, Containing Some Rules and Cautels to Be Observed and Eschewed in Scottish Poetry . . . 598
Chapter VII . . . 598
from The True Law of Free Monarchies (1598) . . . 599
An Advertisement to the Reader . . . 599
The True Law of Free Monarchies . . . 599 from Basilikon Doron (1599, 1603) . . . 601
"God gives not kings the style of gods in vain" . . . 601
To the Reader . . . 601
Of a King's Christian Duty towards God . . . 601
Of a King's Duty in His Office . . . 602
Of a King's Behaviour in Indifferent Things . . . 603

ANNE CECIL DE VERE, COUNTESS OF OXFORD (1556-1588) . . . 605
Four Epitaphs (1584) . . . 605
1 ("Had with morning the gods left their wills undone") . . . 605
2 ("In doleful ways I spend the wealth of my time") . . . 606
3 ("The heavens, death, and life have conjured my ill") . . . 606
4 ("Idall for Adon nev'r shed so many tears") . . . 606
Others of the Four Last Lines, of Other That She Made Also . . . 607
"My son is gone, and with it death end my sorrow" . . . 607
An other . . . 607
"Amphiôn's wife was turned to rock. Oh" . . . 607

JANE ANGER (fl. 1588) 608
from Jane Anger, Her Protection for Women (1589) 608
To the Gentlewomen of England 608
To all Women in General, and Gentle Reader Whatsoever 608
A Protection for Women 609
A Sovereign Salve to Cure the Late Surfeiting Lover 614
Eiusdem ad Lectorem de Authore 615

ANNE DOWRICHE (before July 1560-after 1613) 616
from The French History (1589) 617
To [...] Her Loving Brother, Master Pearse Edgecombe 617
To the Reader 617
To the Reader that Is Friendly to Poetry 619
The Bloody Marriage, or Butcherly Murder of the Admiral of France 619

RICHARD HAKLUYT (?1552-1616) 639
from The Second Volume of the Principal Navigations, Voyages, Traffiques and Discoveries of the English Nation (1599) ... 640
The Voyage Made to Tripoli in Barbary, in the Year 1583 641 from The Third and Last Volume of the Voyages, Navigations, Traffiques, and Discoveries of the English Nation (1600) 645
The Second Voyage of Master Martin Frobisher, Made to the West and Northwest Regions in the Year 1577 646
The Voyage of Master Hore and Divers Other Gentlemen to Newfoundland and Cape Breton, in the Year 1536 649
A Report of the Voyage and Success Thereof, Attempted in the Year of Our Lord 1583 by Sir Humphrey Gilbert 652
The First Voyage Made to the Coasts of America ... Part of the Country Now Called Virginia, Anno 1584 .. 661

LADY ELIZABETH COOKE HOBY RUSSELL (1528-1609) 666
Selected Mortuary Verse 667
Verse on the Hoby Tombs at Bisham (composed, c. 1566) 667
Elizabethae in Obitum Katharinae Sororis Epicaedia 668
A Lamentation for the Death of Mrs. K. Killigrew (composed, c. 1583) 668 from A Way of Reconciliation of a Good and Learned Man (1605) 668
The Author to the Reader 668
To [...] Lady Anne Herbert 668

FULKE GREVILLE, FIRST BARON BROOKE OF BEAUCHAMPS COURT (1554-1628) 670 from Caelica, Containing CIX Sonnets (composed, c. 1577/80-1600?) 671
Sonnet XXII ("I with whose colours Myra dressed her head") 671
Sonnet LVI ("All my senses, like beacons' flame") 672
Sonnet LXXXVIII ("Man, dream no more of curious mysteries") 673
Sonnet XC ("The Turkish government allows no law") 673
Sonnet C ("In night when colours all to black are cast") 673
Sonnet CVIII ("What is the cause, why states, that war and win") 674
Sonnet CIX ("Sion lies waste, and thy Jerusalem") 674

SIR PHILIP SIDNEY (1554-1586) 676
from Astrophil and Stella (1591, 1598) 677
Sonnet 1 ("Loving in truth, and fain in verse my love to show") 677
Sonnet 5 ("It is most true, that eyes are formed to serve") 677
Sonnet 9 ("Queen Virtue's court, which some call Stella's face") 678
Sonnet 21 ("Your words, my friend, right healthful caustics, blame") 678
Sonnet 23 ("The curious wits, seeing dull pensiveness") 678
Sonnet 27 ("Because I oft, in dark abstracted guise") 679
Sonnet 47 ("What, have I thus betrayed my liberty?") 679
Sonnet 53 ("In martial sports I had my cunning tried") 679
Sonnet 63 ("O grammar rules, O now your virtues show") 680
Sonnet 71 ("Who will in fairest book of nature know") 680
Sonnet 81 ("O kiss, which dost those ruddy gems impart") 680
Sonnet 82 ("Nymph of the garden where all beauties be") 681
Sonnet 83 ("Good brother Philip, I have borne you long") 681
Sonnet 85 ("I see the house; my heart, thy self contain") 681
"Fourth Song" 682
"Eighth Song" 682
"Ninth Song" 684
Sonnet 87 ("When I was forced from Stella, ever dear") 685
Sonnet 93 ("O fate, O fault, O curse, child of my bliss") 685
Sonnet 98 ("Ah bed, the field where joy's peace some do see") 685
Sonnet 107 ("Stella, since thou so right a princess art") 686
Sonnet 108 ("When sorrow, using mine own fire's might") 686 from The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia (1593) 687
To [...] the Countess of Pembroke 687
To the Reader 688
Book 1 689
Book 3 700
from The Defence of Poesy (1595) 713
Appendix 1: Selected Correspondence between Sir Philip Sidney and Edmund Molyneux (1578-82) 739
Appendix 2: Selected Correspondence of Lady Mary Sidney to Edmund Molyneux (1578) 740

MARY SIDNEY HERBERT, COUNTESS OF PEMBROKE (1561-1621) 743
The Doleful Lay of Clorinda (1595) 745
Even Now that Care (1599) 746
To the Angel Spirit of the Most Excellent Sir Philip Sidney (composed, 1592) 748
Dialogue between Two Shepherds, Thenot and Piers, in Praise of Astraea (composed, c. 1599?) 749 from Psalms (completed by 1599) 750
Psalm 45: Eructavit cor meum 750
Psalm 49: Audite haec omnes 751
Psalm 51: Miserere mei Deus 752
Psalm 57: Miserere mei Deus 753
Psalm 58: Si vere utique 753
Psalm 72: Deus Judicium 754
Psalm 73: Quam bonus Israel 755

Psalm 82: Deus stetit. . . . 756
Psalm 100: Jubilate Deo . . . 757
Psalm 139: Domine probasti . . . 757

RICHARD BARNFIELD (1574-1620) . . . 759
from The Affectionate Shepherd (1594) . . . 760
To [...] the Lady Penelope Rich . . . 760
The Tears of an Affectionate Shepherd Sick for Love . . . 760
The Second Day's Lamentation of the Affectionate Shepherd . . . 766 from Cynthia. With Certain Sonnets (1595) . . . 772
To the Courteous Gentlemen Readers . . . 772
To His Mistress . . . 773
Sonnet 1 ("Sporting at fancy, setting light by love") . . . 773
Sonnet 6 ("Sweet coral lips, where nature's treasure lies") . . . 773
Sonnet 8 ("Sometimes I wish that I his pillow were") . . . 774
Sonnet 9 ("Diana [on a time] walking the wood") . . . 774
Sonnet 10 ("Thus was my love, thus was my Ganymed") . . . 774
Sonnet 11 ("Sighing and sadly sitting by my love") . . . 775
Sonnet 12 ("Some talk of Ganymede th'Idalian boy") . . . 775
Sonnet 14 ("Here; hold this glove [this milk-white cheveril glove]") . . . 775
Sonnet 16 ("Long have I longed to see my love again") . . . 776
Sonnet 17 ("Cherry-lipped Adonis in his snowy shape") . . . 776
Sonnet 20 ("But now my Muse toiled with continual care") . . . 776

EDMUND SPENSER (?1552-1599) . . . 777
from The Shepheardes Calender (1579) . . . 778
To His Booke . . . 778
To [...] Mayster Gabriell Harvey . . . 779
Januarye . . . 782
Aprill . . . 785
October . . . 791
November . . . 797
from Amoretti (1595) . . . 803
Sonnet 1 ("Happy ye leaves when as those lilly hands") . . . 803
Sonnet 3 ("The soverayne beauty which I doo admyre") . . . 804
Sonnet 6 ("Be nought dismayd that her unmoved mind") . . . 804
Sonnet 9 ("Long-while I sought to what I might compare") . . . 804
Sonnet 15 ("Ye tradefull Merchants that with weary toyle") . . . 804
Sonnet 16 ("One day as I unwarily did gaze") . . . 805
Sonnet 22 ("This holy season fit to fast and pray") . . . 805
Sonnet 26 ("Sweet is the Rose, but growes upon a brere") . . . 805
Sonnet 34 ("Lyke as a ship that through the Ocean wyde") . . . 805
Sonnet 37 ("What guyle is this, that those her golden tresses") . . . 805
Sonnet 54 ("Of this worlds Theatre in which we stay") . . . 806
Sonnet 56 ("Fayre ye be sure, but cruell and unkind") . . . 806
Sonnet 64 ("Comming to kisse her lyps, [such grace I found]") . . . 806

Sonnet 67 ("Lyke as a huntsman after weary chace") . . . 806
Sonnet 68 ("Most glorious Lord of lyfe that on this day") . . . 807
Sonnet 69 ("The famous warriors of the anticke world") . . . 807
Sonnet 70 ("Fresh spring the herald of loves mighty king") . . . 807
Sonnet 74 ("Most happy letters fram'd by skilfull trade") . . . 807
Sonnet 75 ("One day I wrote her name upon the strand") . . . 808
Sonnet 80 ("After so long a race as I have run") . . . 808
Sonnet 82 ("Joy of my life, full oft for loving you") . . . 808
Sonnet 89 ("Lyke as the Culver on the bared bough") . . . 808
Epithalamion (1595) . . . 808
from The Faerie Queene (1590, 1596) . . . 818
To [...] Sir Walter Raleigh . . . 818
The First Booke of the Faerie Queene . . . 821
Canto I . . . 822
Canto II . . . 832
Canto III . . . 839
Canto IIII . . . 847
Canto V . . . 855
Canto VI . . . 864
Canto VII . . . 872
Canto VIII . . . 881
Canto IX . . . 889
Canto X . . . 898
Canto XI . . . 910
Canto XII . . . 920

THOMAS NASHE (1567-?1601) . . . 927
from The Unfortunate Traveller (1594) . . . 927

LADY MARGARET HOBY (1571-1633) . . . 938
from The Diary of Lady Hoby (1599-1603) . . . 939

SAMUEL DANIEL (1562/1563-1619) . . . 945
from Delia (1592) . . . 945
To [...] the Lady Mary, Countess of Pembroke . . . 945
Sonnet VI ("Fair is my love, and cruel as sh'is fair") . . . 946
Sonnet IX ("If this be love, to draw a weary breath") . . . 946
Sonnet XV ("If that a loyal heart and faith unfeigned") . . . 946
Sonnet XVIII ("Restore thy tresses to the golden ore") . . . 946
Sonnet XXX ("I once may see when years shall wreck my wrong") . . . 947
Sonnet XXXV ("Thou canst not die whilst any zeal abound") . . . 947
Sonnet XLIX ("Unhappy pen and ill-accepted papers") . . . 947 from The Complaint of Rosamond (1592) . . . 948
To the Lady Lucy, Countess of Bedford (1603) . . . 958
To the Lady Anne Clifford (1603) . . . 959

A Panegyric Congratulatory to the King's Most Excellent Majesty (1603) 960 from A Defence of Rhyme (1603) 964
To William Herbert Earl of Pembroke 964

THOMAS LODGE (1558-1625) 969
from Rosalind (1590) 970
To [...] the Lord of Hunsdon 970
To the Gentlemen Readers 971
The Schedule Annexed to Euphues' Testament 972
Rosalind 972
from A Fig for Momus (1595) 991
To the Gentlemen Readers Whatsoever 991
To His Mistress A.L.: Epistle 3 992
Appendix: Physiology in Lodge's "To His Mistress A.L.: Epistle 3," lines 39-46 994

ROBERT GREENE (1558-1592) 996
from A Quip for an Upstart Courtier (1592) 997
To [...] Thomas Barnaby Esquire 997
To the Gentlemen Readers: Health 997
A Quip for an Upstart Courtier 998 from A Disputation between a He Cony-Catcher and a She Cony-Catcher (1592) 1011
To All Gentlemen, Merchants, Apprentices, and Country Farmers 1011
A Disputation between Laurence, a Foist and Fair Nan, a Traffic 1014
The Conversion of an English Courtesan 1020 from Greene's Groatsworth of Wit (1592) 1027
The Printer to the Gentle Readers 1027
To the Gentlemen Readers 1027
Greene's Groatsworth of Wit 1027
To Those Gentlemen His Quondam Acquaintance 1036
A Letter Written to His Wife 1039

WILLIAM KEMP (fl. 1585-1602) 1041
Kemp's Nine Days' Wonder (1600) 1042
To [...] Mistress Anne Fitton 1042
Kemp's Nine Days' Wonder 1043
The First Day's Journey 1043
The Second Day's Journey 1045
The Third Day's Journey 1046
The Fourth Day's Journey 1046
The Fifth Day's Journey 1047
The Sixth Day's Journey 1048
The Seventh Day's Journey 1049
The Eighth Day's Journey 1049
The Ninth Day's Journey 1051
Kemp's Humble Request to [...] Ballad-Makers and Their Coherents 1054

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE (1564-1616) 1058
Venus and Adonis (1593) 1059
To [...] Henry Wriothesley 1059
from Sonnets (1609) 1079
Sonnet 2 ("When forty winters shall besiege thy brow") 1079
Sonnet 3 ("Look in thy glass and tell the face thou viewest") 1079
Sonnet 4 ("Unthrifty loveliness, why dost thou spend") 1080
Sonnet 12 ("When I do count the clock that tells the time") 1080
Sonnet 17 ("Who will believe my verse in time to come") 1080
Sonnet 18 ("Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?") 1080
Sonnet 20 ("A woman's face with nature's own hand painted") 1081
Sonnet 23 ("As an unperfect actor on the stage") 1081
Sonnet 29 ("When in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes") 1081
Sonnet 30 ("When to the sessions of sweet silent thought") 1082
Sonnet 32 ("If thou survive my well-contented day") 1082
Sonnet 40 ("Take all my loves, my love, yea take them all") 1082
Sonnet 42 ("That thou hast her, it is not all my grief") 1082
Sonnet 44 ("If the dull substance of my flesh were thought") 1083
Sonnet 45 ("The other two, slight air and purging fire") 1083
Sonnet 55 ("Not marble nor the gilded monuments") 1083
Sonnet 71 ("No longer mourn for me when I am dead") 1083
Sonnet 73 ("That time of year thou mayst in me behold") 1083
Sonnet 76 ("Why is my verse so barren of new pride?") 1084
Sonnet 81 ("Or I shall live your epitaph to make") 1084
Sonnet 87 ("Farewell, thou art too dear for my possessing") 1084
Sonnet 89 ("Say that thou didst forsake me for some fault") 1084
Sonnet 90 ("Then hate me when thou wilt, if ever, now") 1085
Sonnet 91 ("Some glory in their birth, some in their skill") 1085
Sonnet 94 ("They that have pow'r to hurt, and will do none") 1085
Sonnet 99 ("The forward violet thus did I chide") 1085
Sonnet 102 ("My love is strengthened, though more weak in seeming") 1086
Sonnet 106 ("When in the chronicle of wasted time") 1086
Sonnet 116 ("Let me not to the marriage of true minds") 1086
Sonnet 128 ("How oft when thou, my music, music play'st") 1086
Sonnet 129 ("Th'expense of spirit in a waste of shame") 1087
Sonnet 130 ("My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun") 1087
Sonnet 135 ("Whoever hath her wish, thou hast thy Will") 1087
Sonnet 138 ("When my love swears that she is made of truth") 1087
Sonnet 143 ("Lo as a careful housewife runs to catch") 1088
Sonnet 144 ("Two loves I have of comfort and despair") 1088
Sonnet 145 ("Those lips that Love's own hand did make") 1088
Sonnet 146 ("Poor soul, the centre of my sinful earth") 1088
Sonnet 147 ("My love is as a fever, longing still") 1089
Sonnet 151 ("Love is too young to know what conscience is") 1089
Sonnet 154 ("The little love-god, lying once asleep") 1089

MICHAEL DRAYTON (1563-1631) 1090
from The Shepherds' Garland (1593) 1090
The Third Eclogue 1090
from Idea's Mirror (1594) 1093
"My heart imprisoned in a hopeless isle" 1093
"Some wits there be which like my method well" 1094
"Why do I speak of joy or write of love" 1094
"My heart the anvil where my thoughts do beat" 1094
"When first I ended, then I first began" 1094
from England's Heroical Epistles (1597) 1095
The Lady Jane Gray, to the Lord Gilford Dudley 1095
The Lord Gilford Dudley to the Lady Jane Gray 1098

ROBERT SOUTHWELL (1561-1595) 1101
The Author to His Loving Cousin (1595) 1101
from Saint Peter's Complaint (1595) 1102
From Fortune's Reach (1595) 1105
Christ's Bloody Sweat (1595) 1106
The Prodigal Child's Soul Wrack (1595) 1106 from The Sequence on the Virgin Mary and Christ (1595) 1107
vi. The Nativity of Christ 1107
The Burning Babe (1602) 1108
Decease Release: Dum morior orior [date unknown] 1108

SIR WALTER RALEGH (OR RALEIGH) (1554-1618) 1110
A Vision upon this Conceit of "The Faerie Queene" ("Methought I saw the grave, where Laura lay") (1590) 1111
The Lie ("Go, soul, the body's guest") (composed, c. 1590/92?) 1111
The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd ("If all the world and love were young") (1600) 1113
Sir Walter Ralegh to His Son ("Three things there be that prosper up apace") (circulated, c. 1625-60) 1113 from The Ocean to Cynthia (composed, 1582-83) 1114 Nature that Washed Her Hands in Milk (composed, c. 1603-18?; circulated, c. 1625-60) 1119
from The Discovery of Guiana (1596) 1120
To [...] Charles Howard [...] And [...] Sir Robert Cecil 1120
To the Reader 1122
The Discovery of Guiana 1126

SIR JOHN DAVIES (1569-1626) 1137
from Epigrams and Elegies (1595?) 1138
Ad Musam (Epigram 1) 1138
In Rufum (Epigram 3) 1138
In Titum (Epigram 6) 1139
In Severum (Epigram 13) 1139
In Gerontem (Epigram 20) 1139
In Ciprium (Epigram 22) 1140
In Haywodum (Epigram 29) 1140
In Dacum (Epigram 30) 1140

Of Tobacco (Epigram 36) 1141
In Philonem (Epigram 38) 1142
Meditations of a Gull (Epigram 47) 1142
Ad Musam (Epigram 48) 1143
Ignoto 1143
"I love thee not for sacred chastity" 1143
"Faith (wench) I cannot court thy sprightly eyes" 1144
"Sweet wench, I love thee, yet I will not sue" 1144 from Gulling Sonnets (composed, c. 1594-1604) 1144
To His Good Friend, Sir Anthony Cooke 1144
Sonnet 2 ("As when the bright cerulean firmament") 1145
Sonnet 3 ("What eagle can behold her sunbright eye") 1145
Sonnet 6 ("The sacred Muse that first made love divine") 1145
Sonnet 8 ("My case is this: I love Zepheria bright") 1145 from Nosce Teipsum (1599) 1146
To My Most Gracious Dread Sovereign 1146
Of Human Knowledge 1147
from Hymns of Astraea (1599) 1151
Hymn I. Of Astraea 1151
Hymn II. To Astraea 1151
Hymn XV. Of Her Wit 1151
Hymn XVI. Of Her Will 1152
Hymn XX. Of the Passions of Her Heart 1152
Hymn XXIII. Of Her Justice 1152
Hymn XXIV. Of Her Magnanimity 1153
Hymn XXVI. To Envy 1153

FRANCIS BACON, VISCOUNT ST ALBAN (1561-1626) 1154
Letter to Lord Burghley (1592?) 1155
from Essays (1597) 1156
The Epistle Dedicatory to Master Anthony Bacon 1156
Of Studies 1157
Of Discourse 1157
Of Ceremonies and Respects 1158
Of Followers and Friends 1159
Of Suits 1160
Of Negotiating 1161

GEORGE CHAPMAN (1559/1560-1634) 1163
from Ovid's Banquet of Sense (1595) 1164
To [...] Master Matthew Royden 1164
I.D. of the Middle Temple ("Only that eye which for true love doth weep") 1165
Another ("Since Ovid [love's first gentle master] died") 1166
Ovid's Banquet of Sense 1166
The Argument 1166

Narratio 1167
De Guiana, Carmen Epicum (1596) 1184
from Achilles' Shield (1598) 1188
To the Understander 1188
Book 18 of Homer's Iliad 1190
Appendix: Corinna's Garden—Ovid's Banquet of Sense, Stanzas 9-10 1192

JOHN DONNE (1572-1631) 1194
Song ("Go and catch a falling star") 1196
The Bait 1196
Woman's Constancy 1197
The Flea 1197
The Relic 1198
Satire I 1198
Satire III 1200
Elegy 1: Jealousy 1202
Elegy 8: The Comparison 1202
Elegy 19: To His Mistress Going to Bed 1203
The Storm 1204
The Calm 1205
To Sir Henry Wotton ("Sir, more than kisses, letters mingle souls") 1206
Sappho to Philaenis 1208

JOHN MARSTON (1576-1634) 1209
from The Scourge of Villainy (1599) 1209
Satyre X: Humours 1209
To Him that Hath Perused Me 1212

CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE (1564-1593) 1213
Hero and Leander (1598) 1213

JOHN STOW (1524/1525-1605) 1226
from A Survey of London (1598) 1228
To [...] the Lord Mayor of the City of London 1228
The Antiquity of London 1228
Houses of Students of the Common Law 1231
Of Orders and Customs 1232
Honour of Citizens and Worthiness of Men in the Same 1234
The Singularities of the City of London 1235

THOMAS DELONEY (d. in or before 1600) 1238
The Queen's Visiting of the Camp at Tilsbury (1588) 1239
from Thomas of Reading (?1598-?1600) 1242
Chapter 1 1243
Chapter 4 1245

Chapters 6-8. . . . 1247
Chapter 11 1258
Chapters 13-15. . . . 1263

THOMAS CAMPION (1567-1620) 1270
from A Book of Ayres (1601). . . . 1271
Song III ("I care not for these ladies") 1271
Song V ("My love hath vowed he will forsake me"). . . . 1272
Song VI ("When to her lute Corinna sings") 1272
Song VIII ("It fell on a summer's day") 1272
from Observations in the Art of English Poesy (1602). . . . 1273
To [...] the Lord Buckhurst. . . . 1273
The First Chapter, Entreating of Numbers in General 1273
The Second Chapter, Declaring the Unaptness of Rhyme in Poesy. . . . 1274

ELIZABETH GRYMESTON (b. in or before 1563-d. 1601/1604) 1277 from Miscellanea. Meditations. Memoratives (1604). . . . 1278
The Epistle: To Her Loving Son, Bernye Grymeston 1278
Chapter I: A Short Line How to Level Your Life. . . . 1281
Chapter III: A Pathetical Speech of the Person of Dives in the Torments of Hell 1281
Chapter V: A Sinner's Glass 1284
Chapter XIII: Evening Meditation. . . . 1285

Additional Online Texts

SIMON FISH (d. 1531)
A Supplication for the Beggars (1529)

JOHN BALE (1495-1563)
The Laborious Journey and Search of John Leland, for England's Antiquities (1549)
The Epistle Dedicatory
John Bale to the Reader

Certain Sermons or Homilies (1547)
An Exhortation Concerning Good Order and Obedience to Rulers and Magistrates

WILLIAM BALDWIN (d. in or before 1563)
from A Mirror for Magistrates (1563)
The Second Part of the Mirror for Magistrates
How Collingbourne Was Cruelly Executed

ARTHUR GOLDING (1535/1536-1606)
from Ovid's Metamorphosis (1567)
To [...] Robert Earl of Leicester
To the Reader
Book 10 of Ovid's Metamorphosis

JOHN DEE (1527-1609)
from "The Mathematical Preface to Euclid's Elements of Geometry" (1570)

POPULAR LITERATURE IN SIXTEENTH-CENTURY ENGLAND

Pamphlets of Murder and Mayhem
Anonymous, Sundry Strange and Inhuman Murders, Lately Committed (1591)
A Declaration of the Monstrous Cruelty of a Father That Hired One to Murder Three of His Own Children
A True Discourse of a Cruel and Inhuman Murder, Committed upon Master Padge of Plymouth
Other Strange Things Seen at That Time

Broadsides and Ballads
A New Ballad of the Strange and Most Cruel Whips (1588)
A Ditty Delightful of Mother Watkins Ale (c. 1590)
Luke Hutton's Lamentation (1598)

GEORGE GASCOIGNE (1534/1535?-1577)
from The Posies of George Gascoigne (1575)
Certain Notes of Instruction Concerning the Making of Verse or Rhyme in English

WILLIAM HARRISON (1535-1593)
from An Historical Description of the Island of Britain (1587)
Chapter 12: Of the Manner of Building and Furniture of Our Houses
Chapter 20: Of Gardens and Orchards

EDMUND SPENSER (?1552-1599)
from The Faerie Queene (1590, 1596)
Book II
Canto XII
Book III
Canto VI
from A View of the Present State of Ireland (1596; published 1809)

THOMAS LODGE (1558-1625)
from Scylla's Metamorphosis (1589) from Robin the Devil [The Famous, True, and Historical Life of Robert, Second Duke of Normandy] (1591)
from The Life and Death of William Longbeard (1593)

SIR WALTER RALEGH (OR RALEIGH) (1554-1618)
from A Report of the Truth of the Fight ... Betwixt the Revenge ... and an Armada of the King of Spain ("The Last Fight of the Revenge") (1591)

SIR JOHN DAVIES (1569-1626)
from Orchestra or, a Poem of Dancing (1596)

GEORGE CHAPMAN (1559/1560-1634)
from Ovid's Banquet of Sense (1595)
A Coronet for His Mistress Philosophy

THOMAS DELONEY (d. in or before 1600)
from Jack of Newbury (1596-97; 1st extant print edition, 1619)

JOHN FLORIO (1553-1625) AND MICHEL DE MONTAIGNE (1533-1592)
from The Essays or Moral, Politic and Military Discourses of Lord Michel de Montaigne (1603)
To the Courteous Reader
The Author to the Reader
Of the Cannibals
Appendix: Florio's Contribution to English Vocabulary

Suggested Reading

ONLINE RESOURCES: ADDITIONAL TEXTS AND SUGGESTED READING 1287

INDEX OF AUTHORS, TITLES, AND FIRST LINES 1289

Acknowledgements

The editors would like to thank their families and friends for putting up with a project that must have seemed to them at times interminable. Our professional debts are many, and we would like to thank the following: M.J.B. Allen, Jason Cawley, Matthew Cornfield, Anthony Grafton, Elizabeth Hanson, Grant Heckman, Ian Lancashire, Hugh Leonard, Murray Littlejohn, Mike Long, Clare Loughlin-Chow, Oliver Lovesey, Janet MacArthur, Carrie McClary, Kenneth Philips, Michael Treschow, Robert Vermaat, Christopher Whitby, and David Wykes. At Broadview, special thanks to Don LePan, Julia Gaunce, and Marjorie Mather. For formatting, proofreading, and wrestling with marginalia, the editors would like to acknowledge the attentive and extraordinary work of Kathryn Brownsey, Susan Chamberlain, Tara Trueman, and Jennie Rubio, as well as Averil Bibby, Kim Dressler, Kelly Doyle, Bram Mathew, Olena Guseva, and Stephanie Peters. Many thanks are due as well to typesetter Peter Greenhill and his team at True to Type for their numerous hours of hard work that have helped make the volume come together. Thanks to the many students of our sixteenth-century literature courses, who coped with early versions of these entries and offered valuable advice.

Editorial Preface

The following principles and concerns have guided us in the presentation and annotation of these sixteenth-century texts:

1) We have sought to make available not only extensive selections from the works of canonical writers, but also substantial extracts from writers who have either been neglected in earlier anthologies or who have only relatively recently come to the attention of scholars and teachers.

These largely neglected writers include primarily (though not exclusively) authors of popular prose and fiction, such as Thomas Deloney, Thomas Lodge, George Gascoigne, Barnabe Riche, Robert Greene, William Baldwin, and Thomas Nashe. Given the difficulties of incorporating substantial pieces of prose and fiction into even relatively expansive anthologies such as this one, it is not surprising that many such collections have long presented, and thus readers still perceive, that early modern writing is mainly comprised of courtly poetry. To provide balance, this anthology includes a range of writing, such as (for example) selections from popular romances, merchant fiction, sensation pamphlets, religious satires, sermons, ballads, jest books, martyrdom accounts, and educational treatises. We have tried to make the selections from these texts substantial enough to address a wide variety of thematic, political, social, stylistic, and generic issues. Two pages of William Baldwin's Beware the Cat or Hugh Latimer's "Sermon on the Ploughers" may be enough to examine some aspects of style, but it is nowhere near enough to permit a thorough analysis or real appreciation of the period's prose.

Moreover, twentieth-century critics have also rediscovered a range of writers whose gender, choice of subject matter and genre, or methods of disseminating their texts have until recently excluded them from the traditional canon of early modern literature. In particular, women writers have benefitted from the desire to uncover the literature of the 'other Renaissance,' those works whose perceived lack of literary value has long excluded them from the anthology and the classroom. We have tried to provide selections from a wide range of women's writing, from the religious translations and original religious writings of Margaret More Roper, Katherine Parr, and Anne Locke to the autobiographical writings of Anne Askew, Lady Jane Grey, and Lady Margaret Hoby to the richly-varied poetic productions of Mary Sidney Herbert, Mary Stuart (Queen of Scots), Elizabeth I, Isabella Whitney, Anne Dowriche, and Anne Cecil de Vere. We have also aimed at providing selections from a wide variety of the period's works in translation, as well as popular tracts and ballads.

2) We have sought to balance the need for readable, accessible texts with the goal of preserving some of the essential "strangeness" of these works. We have modernized the spelling, capitalization, and punctuation of our selections, except where the individual editor felt that such modernization would interfere (in the case of verse) with basic aspects like rhyme, metre, alliteration, or visual puns. Some sixteenth-century works are rarely if ever modernized, and these writers remain in their original spelling and punctuation here. Spenser's emphasis on his deliberate use of older and sometimes archaic English words and spelling, for example, means that his work cannot be modernized without losing much of its essential and original import; for reasons relating more to the difficulty of maintaining original scansion and rhyme, John Skelton's works likewise usually remain in their original spelling and punctuation, although here we have partially modernized spelling while being careful to avoid any changes that might interfere with the technical aspects of the verse. While selections from the various manuscripts included here have been modernized, many selections also include an example of some unmodernized text. It should be noted that one result of this decision is to 'smooth out' the differences between manuscript and print, as well as inadvertently to cast the period's poetry as somehow more archaic than its prose. However, our key objective remained the accessibility of sixteenth-century writing to modern-day readers, and in general this objective took priority over other concerns.

3) Our desire to make these texts accessible to contemporary readers also led us to our final editorial principle: when in doubt, annotate. The generous annotations result from our shared perception as teachers of early modern literature that certain kinds of information are enormously helpful to readers. These include:

a) notes that define words, concepts, and customs that are now obsolete. We have also concentrated on defining those words still in use in modern English whose meanings have shifted dramatically. For example, the word 'inconvenience' today means "the quality or state of being annoying or troublesome" (OED); in the sixteenth century it usually meant a far more serious harm or injury. We have also annotated certain words, phrases, and proverbs which some may feel are still part of a common English idiom. This decision was fuelled by our joint experience that even relatively recent British idioms and diction are no longer the primary and common linguistic milieu of an increasingly Americanized and multicultural readership.

b) notes that offer explanations of the basic religious, cultural, historical, and social realities informing various selections. Some of these notes are fairly extensive, as in the case of Hugh Latimer, whose "Sermon on the Ploughers" requires background information on topics such as Purgatory, the Rosary, and church statuary. This information is found on the same page as the selection itself rather than at the end, in an appendix.

4) We have largely worked from early editions. The date following each work in the Table of Contents indicates its first print edition, unless otherwise noted. For example, sometimes composition dates are given instead, particularly for manuscript material that did not make its way into print in the sixteenth century, or perhaps has never been published. Each entry includes information about the selections' copy-texts, and the date at the end of each text is (once again) the date of its first print edition, unless otherwise noted.

Reference Works and Abbreviations

This anthology draws on a variety of key reference works. Abbreviations for frequently used works are noted below. Unless otherwise noted, definitions come from The Oxford English Dictionary (print and online versions); biographical data from The Oxford Dictionary of National Biography (print and online versions); and biblical quotations from The New Oxford Annotated Bible with the Apocrypha (Revised Standard Version) and the Authorized Version of the Bible (King James Version [1611]).

While we have generally avoided other kinds of abbreviations, we include below an explanation of those few we have employed.

Reference Works

Brewer's Dict. Phrase and Fable	Brewer's Dictionary of Phrase and Fable. Millenium Edition. Rev. ed. by Adrian Room. London, 2000.
Catholic Encycl.	Catholic Encyclopedia. Online at <http://www.newadvent.org>.
Classical Dict.	Classical Dictionary. John Lemprière. 1788. London, 1994.
Dict. Ancient Hist.	Penguin Dictionary of Ancient History. Ed. Graham Speake. London, 1994.
Dict. Astronomy	Oxford Dictionary of Astronomy. Ed. I. Ridpath. Oxford, 2007. Oxford Reference Online. <http://www.oxfordreference.com>.
Dict. British Social Hist.	Dictionary of British Social History. L.W. Cowrie. London, 1999.
Dict. Christian Church	The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church. 2nd ed. Ed. F.L. Cross and E.A. Livingstone. Oxford, 1983.
Dict. Gods and Mortals	Gods and Mortals in Classical Mythology: A Dictionary. Ed. M. Grant. Dorset, 1985.
Dict. History 1485-1789	Penguin Dictionary of English and European History, 1485-1789. E.N. Williams. Harmondsworth, 1984.
Dict. Middle Ages	Dictionary of the Middle Ages. Gen. Ed. Joseph R. Strayer. 14 vols. New York, 1982-1989.
Dict. Saints	Oxford Dictionary of Saints. 3rd ed. D.H. Farmer. Oxford, 1992.
Dict. Slang	A Dictionary of Slang and Unconventional English. 8th ed. Eric Partridge. Ed. Paul Beale. New York, 2000.
DLB 132	Sixteenth-Century British Nondramatic Writers. 1st series. Ed. D.A. Richardson. Dictionary of Literary Biography. Vol. 132. Detroit, 1993.

DLB 136	Sixteenth-Century British Nondramatic Writers. 2nd series. Ed. D.A. Richardson. Dictionary of Literary Biography. Vol. 136. Detroit, 1994.
DLB 167	Sixteenth-Century British Nondramatic Writers. 3rd series. Ed. D.A. Richardson. Dictionary of Literary Biography. Vol. 167. Detroit, 1996.
DLB 170	The British Literary Book Trade, 1475-1700. Dictionary of Literary Biography. Vol. 170. Detroit, 1996.
DLB 172	Sixteenth-Century British Nondramatic Writers. 4th series. Ed. D.A. Richardson. Dictionary of Literary Biography. Vol. 172. Detroit, 1996.
DNB	The Dictionary of National Biography. Ed. L. Stephen and S. Lee. Oxford, 1885-1900.
DNB online	The Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. 2nd ed. Ed. H.C.G. Matthew and B. Harrison. Oxford, 2004. Online at <http://www.oxforddnb.com>.
Elizabethan Stage	The Elizabethan Stage. E.K. Chambers. 4 vols. Oxford, 1923.
Encycl. Poetry and Poetics	Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics. Ed. A. Preminger. Princeton, NJ, 1974.
Encycl. Renaissance	Encyclopedia of the Renaissance. Gen. Ed. Paul F. Grendler. 6 vols. New York, 1999.
Encycl. Scotland	Collins Encyclopaedia of Scotland. Ed. John Keay and Julia Keay. London, 1994.
Erasmus, Adages	The Collected Works of Erasmus: Adages. Ed. M.M. Philips. Toronto, 1982.
Hamilton	Faerie Queene. Edmund Spenser. Ed. A.C. Hamilton. Longman, 1977.
Hist. Atlas	Muir's Historical Atlas: Medieval and Modern. Ed. R.F. Treharne and H. Fullard. New York, 1964.
Hist. Dict. Spanish Empire	Historical Dictionary of the Spanish Empire, 1402-1975. Gen. Ed. J.S. Olson. New York, 1992.
Hist. Dict. Tudor England	An Historical Dictionary of Tudor England, 1485-1603. Ed. R.H. Fritze. New York, 1991.
Laertius	Diogenes Laertius. Lives of the Eminent Philosophers. Trans. and Ed. R.D. Hicks. 2 vols. London, 1942.
Metamorphoses	Metamorphoses. Ovid. Trans. M.M. Innes. London, 1955.
OCD	Oxford Classical Dictionary. 3rd ed. Ed. S. Hornblower and A. Spaworth. Oxford, 1996.
OED	The Oxford English Dictionary. 2nd ed. Ed. J.A. Simpson and E.S.C. Weiner. 20 vols. Oxford, 1989.

OED online	The Oxford English Dictionary Online. 2nd ed. Oxford, 1989. Online at <http://www.dictionaryoed.com>.
Pliny, Natural History	The History of the World. Commonly Called The Natural History of C. Plinius Secundus. Pliny the Elder. 2 vols. Trans. Philemon Holland. London, 1601.
Plutarch, Fall	Fall of the Roman Republic: Six Lives by Plutarch. Trans. R. Warner. London, 1972.
Plutarch, Lives	Lives of the Noble Grecians and Romans by Plutarch of Chaeronea. 2 vols. Trans. Sir Thomas North. 1579. New York, 1941.
Plutarch, Nine Lives	The Age of Alexander: Nine Greek Lives by Plutarch. Trans. and Ed. I. Scott-Kilvert. London, 1973.
Reuter	Proverbs, Proverbial Sentences, and Phrases in Thomas Deloney's Works. Comp. and Ed. O.R. Reuter. Helsinki, 1986.
Shakespeare's England	Shakespeare's England. Ed. W.A. Raleigh. 2 vols. Oxford, 1916.
Spenser Encycl.	The Spenser Encyclopedia. Ed. A.C. Hamilton. Toronto, 1997.
STC	A Short-Title Catalogue of Books Printed in England, Scotland, and Ireland [...] 1547-1640. 2nd ed. Ed. W.A. Jackson, F.S. Ferguson, and K.F. Pantzer. 2 vols. London, 1986.
Survey London	A Survey of London. John Stowe. 1603. Ed. C.L. Kingsford. 2 vols. Oxford, 1908.
Tilley	A Dictionary of the Proverbs in England in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries: A Collection of the Proverbs Found in the English Literature and Dictionaries of the Period. Comp. and Ed. M.P. Tilley. Ann Arbor, 1966.
Tilley, Eliz. Prov.	Elizabethan Proverb Lore in Lyly's Euphues and Pettie's Petite Pallace. Comp. and Ed. M.P. Tilley. New York, 1926.
Topographical Dict.	A Topographical Dictionary to the Works of Shakespeare and his Fellow Dramatists. E.H. Sugden. 1925. Hildesheim, 1969.
Tudor England	Tudor England. J. Guy. Oxford, 1990.
Who's Who	The Penguin Who's Who in the Ancient World. B. Radice. London, 1973.
Yale	The Yale Edition of the Shorter Poems of Edmund Spenser. Ed. W. Oram et al. New Haven, 1989.

Other Abbreviations

<>	Occasionally, early modern texts have their own marginal notes. We have included these, prefacing them with this symbol <> to differentiate them from our own notes. If a note can be confidently attributed to the writer of the text, we do so. For example, Richard Rogers's manuscript diary has his own marginal annotations which we have indicated by [Rogers's note]. For a text like William Harrison's Historical Description of the Island of Britain, it is more difficult to ascribe the marginal annotations to the writer, and so the note reads instead [Description's note].
BCE	"before the common era" (the equivalent of BC: "Before Christ").
CE	"common era" (the equivalent of AD: "Anno Domini" [the year of Our Lord]).
MS or ms	manuscript.

John Skelton

c. 1460-1529

Skelton is considered the first major Tudor poet. He was court poet for Henry VII and tutor to the young Prince Henry, and retained his position as court poet when the prince became Henry VIII in 1509. Skelton also had the patronage of the Howards, a powerful Catholic family. In 1498 he became a priest in the Roman Catholic church. He wrote some religious verse, and religion influences much of his other writing, which includes occasional court poems, didactic poems, political satire, and one extant play, an allegorical morality play entitled Magnificence (c. 1530). The Tunning of Elynour Rummyng (1521) is, as the colophon or final inscription states, a general satire on dissolute women; it is also, as Arthur F. Kinney argues in the Dictionary of Literary Biography, a parody of the Mass and other religious ceremonies and figures, as well as a criticism of despotism. The poem may be based on an actual woman, Alianora Romyng, an ale-wife at the Running Horse in Leatherhead, Surrey, who was fined for overcharging for her brew. Written in a style referred to as "Skeltonic verse," with dimetric and trimetric phrasings, it is based on non-metrical plainsong, and is divided into seven "passus" or cantos. Skelton was a popular writer; between 1545 and 1563 there were 21 editions of his work, and Elynour Rummyng was reprinted throughout the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. In Elizabeth I's reign, however, the Protestant readership depicted Skelton mainly as a scurrilous Catholic poet, perhaps because of poems such as Elynour Rummyng, and made him the foolish protagonist of such jest books as The Merry Tales of Skelton.

EDITION: Here after foloweth certayne bokes, com[m]pyled by mayster Skelton, Poet Laureat whose names here after shall appere. Speke parrot. The deth of the noble prince Kynge Edwarde the fourth. A treatyse of the Scottes. Ware the hawke. The tunnying of Elynour Rummynge. London: By Richard Lant, for Henry Tab, [1545?]. STC 22598.

from The Tunning of Elynour Rummyng[1]

Tell you I chyll[2]
If that ye will
A while be still
Of a comely gyll[3]
That dwelt on a hill
But she is not gryll[4]
For she is somewhat sage
And well worn in age
For her visage
It would assuage
A mannes[5] courage.
Her lothely leer[6]
Is nothing clear
But ugly of cheer
Droupy and drowsy
Scurvy and lowsy[7]
Her face all bowsy[8]
Comely crinkled
Wondersly[9] wrinkled
Like a roast pigges ear
Bristled with here.[10]
Her lewd lippes twain

[1] The spelling in this poem has been partially modernized. Any modernization which could interfere with the dimeter/trimeter phrasings or the rhymes was avoided, and punctuation was kept to a minimum. All quotations marks have been added. Plurals and possessives maintain their extended spellings; Tunning Tunning is the art of brewing; a tun is the name of the vessel in which beer is fermented and kept.

[2] chyll will.

[3] gyll wench.

[4] gryll ill-willed, harmful.

[5] mannes man's.

[6] lothely leer loathsome appearance.

[7] lowsy lousy: full of lice, filthy.

[8] bowsy boozy, showing the effects of hard drinking.

[9] Wondersly wondrously.

[10] here hair.

They slaver, men sayne,[1]
Like a ropy rayne[2]
A gummy glare
She is ugly fair
Her nose some dele[3] hooked
And camously[4] crooked
Never stopping
But ever dropping
Her skin loose and slack
Grained like a sack
With a crooked back
Her eyen gowndy[5]
Are full unsoundy
For they are bleered[6]
And she gray heared[7]
Jawed like a jetty[8]
A man would have pity
To see how she is gummed
Fingered and thumbed
Gently jointed
Greased and anointed
Up to the knuckles
The bones her huckles[9]
Like as they were with buckles[10]
Together made fast
Her youth is far past
Footed like a plane[11]
Legges like a crane
And yet she will jet[12]
Like a jolly fet
In her furred flocket[13]
And gray russet rocket[14]
With simper the cocket[15]
Her huke of Lincoln green[16]
It had been hers, I ween[17]
More than forty year
And so it doth appear
For the green bare thredes[18]
Look like sere weeds[19]
Withered like hay
The wool worn away
And yet I dare say
She thinketh herself gay
Upon the holy day
When she doth her array
And girdeth in her getes[20]
Stitched and pranked with pletes[21]
Her kyrtle Bristow red[22]
With clothes upon her head
That they wey a sow of lead[23]
Writhen in a wonder wise[24]
After the Sarazin's guise[25]
With a whim wham[26]
Knit with a trim tram[27]
Upon her brain pan[28]
Like an Egyptian
Capped about
When she goeth out
Herself for to shew[29]

---

1 slaver slobber; sayne say.
2 ropy rayne glutinous or stringy rain, or perhaps rein.
3 some dele somewhat.
4 camously low and curved, pug-nosed.
5 eyen gowndy eyes gummy.
6 bleered dimmed, blurred with running.
7 heared haired.
8 jetty a projection.
9 huckles hips or haunches.
10 with buckles These lines give the sense that her bones are buckled, bent, perhaps arthritic.
11 plane a tool used to smooth wood; her feet are broad and hard.
12 jet move quickly.
13 fet fat; flocket a loose garment with long sleeves.
14 russet gray or reddish brown coarse wool; rocket cloak, outer garment.
15 simper the cocket an affected, coquettish air or smile.
16 huke cloak with a hood; Lincoln green a bright green cloth made in Lincoln.
17 ween suppose or think.
18 thredes threads.
19 sere withered; weeds clothing or garments, but with a play on unwanted plants.
20 girdeth in her getes wraps herself in a type of dress or gown.
21 pranked with pletes folded or adorned with pleats.
22 kyrtle woman's petticoat or gown; Bristow red a dye made in Bristol.
23 wey a sow of lead are as heavy as a lead ingot.
24 Writhen in wonder wise twisted in a wondrous fashion.
25 After the Sarazin's guise in the fashion of a Saracen, a general term for an Arab, and therefore a non-Christian or heathen.
26 whim wham a fanciful object.
27 trim tram ornament of little value, trinket.
28 brain pan skull, head.
29 shew show.

She driveth down the dew
With a pair of heels
As broad as two wheels.[1]
She hobbles as she goes
With her blanket hose[2]
Over the fallow
Her shoon smeared with tallow[3]
Greased upon dirt
That baudeth her skirt[4]

Primus passus.[5]

And this comely dame
I understand her name
Is Elynour Rummyng
At home in her wonnyng[6]
And as men say
She dwelt in Sothray[7]
In a certain stead
By side Lederhede[8]
She is a tonnishe gib[9]
The devil and she be sib.[10]
But to make up my tale
She breweth noppy[11] ale
And maketh thereof port sale[12]
To travellers, to tinkers
To sweaters, to swinkers[13]
And all good ale drinkers
That will nothing spare
But drink till they stare
And bring them self bare
With "Now away the mare[14]
And let us slay care"
As wise as a hare.
Come who so will
To Elynour on the hill
With "Fill the cup, fill"
And sit there by still Early and late
Thither cometh Kate
Cisly and Sare[15]
With their legges bare
And also their feet
Hardely full unswete[16]
With their heels dagged[17]
Their kyrtles all to jagged
Their smocks all to ragged
With titters and tatters
Bring dishes and platters
With all their might running
To Elynour Rummyng
To have of her tunning.
She leaneth[18] them of the same
And thus beginneth the game.
Some wenches come unlaced
Some huswives come unbraced
With their naked pappes[19]
That flippes and flappes
It wigges and it wagges
Like tawny saffron[20] bagges
A sort of foul drabbes[21]
All scurvy with scabbes
Some be fly bitten
Some skewed[22] as a kitten
Some with a shoe clout[23]

---

1 The idea is that she leaves a trail in the dewy grass as wide as two cart wheels.
2 blanket hose leggings made of woollen cloth.
3 shoon shoes; tallow animal fat.
4 baudeth dirties, perhaps with a pun on bawd or pimp.
5 A passus is a canto. There are seven in total.
6 wonnyng dwelling.
7 Sothray Surrey.
8 Lederhede Leatherhead.
9 tonnishe corpulent, perhaps a play on "fashionable," most certainly a play on "tunning"; gib a term of reproach, especially for an old woman. It is also associated with the personality of a cat.
10 sib related.
11 noppy strong, intoxicating.
12 port sale usually sale by auction; Elynour gets the highest price she can.
13 swinkers labourers.
14 away the mare away melancholy.
15 Cisly and Sare Cecily and Sarah; the names are all of women.
16 unswete unsuited or bare, or perhaps "un-sweet."
17 dagged cut or wet.
18 leaneth gives or lends.
19 pappes breasts.
20 tawny brown, yellow, or orange coloured; their skin is also saffron yellow.
21 drabbes dirty woman or prostitute.
22 skewed irregularly marked in colour.
23 clout cloth.

Bind their heads about
Some have no hair lace
Their locks about their face
Their tresses untrussed
All full of unlust[1]
Some look strawry[2]
Some cawry mawry[3]
Full untidy tegges[4]
Like rotten egges.
Such a lewd sort
To Elynour resort
From tide to tide
Abide abide
And to you shall be told
How her ale is sold
To mawte[5] and to mold.

Secundus passus

Some have no money
That thither commy[6]
For their ale to pay
That is a shrewd array.[7]
Elynour sweared "Nay
You shall not bear away
My ale for nought
By him that me bought"
With "hey, dogge, hey
Have these dogges away,"
With "get me a staffe
The swine eat my draffe[8]
Strike the hogges with a club
They have drunk up my swilling tub
For be there never so much prese[9]
These swine go to the high dese.[10]
The sow with her pigges
The boar his tail wrigges[11]
His rump also he frigges[12]
Against the high bench"
With "Fo, there is a stench
Gather up thou wench
Seest thou not what is fall
Take up dirt and all
And bear out of the hall
God give it ill preving[13]
Cleanly as evil cheving."[14]
But let us turn plain,
There we left again
For as ill a patch as that.
The hens run in the mashfat[15]
For they go to roost
Straight over the ale joust[16]
And dung when it comes
In the ale tunnes
Then Elynour taketh
The mashe bowl and shaketh
The hennes dung away
And skimmeth it into a tray
Where as[17] the yeast is
With her maungy[18] fists
And sometimes she blens[19]
The dung of her hens
And the ale together
And sayeth "Gossip come hither
This ale shall be thicker
And flower[20] the more quicker
For I may tell you

---

1 unlust unpleasantness.
2 strawry like straw.
3 cawry mawry coarse, rough material.
4 tegges sheep in their second year, before their first shearing; the reference again is to the untidiness of their hair.
5 mawte malt; Scattergood quotes R.S. Kinsman: "Eleanor's mash is green and still needs to 'malt' … and may even mold from the careless and hasty treatment of the grain" (John Scattergood, Skelton, the Complete English Poems [New York, 1983], p. 450, n159).
6 commy come.
7 array condition, plight.
8 draffe dregs, grains of malt after brewing.
9 prese crowd.
10 high dese the high dais, or high table at a feast. It can also refer to the raised floor on which the pulpit or communion table stands.
11 wrigges wriggles.
12 frigges rubs in a sexual manner.
13 preving proving or trial.
14 evil cheving ill fortune.
15 mashfat mashing vat: mash is the malt mixed with hot water to form vort (unfermented beer).
16 joust A joust or just is a large pot with handles used to hold beer or wine.
17 Where as where.
18 maungy having the mange, a dirty, scabby condition of the skin.
19 blens blends.
20 flower scum formed in fermentation.

I learned it of a Jew
When I began to brew
And I have found it trew[1]
Drink now while it is new
And ye may it brook.[2]
It shall make you look Younger than ye be
Years two or three
For ye may prove it by me."
"Behold" she said "and see
How bright I am of ble[3]
I am not cast away
That can my husband say
When we kiss and play
In lust and in liking
He calleth me his whiting[4]
His mulling and his myting
His nobbes and his conny
His sweeting and his honny
With 'Bass,[5] my pretty bonny
You are worth good and monny.'[6]
This make I my falyre fonny[7]
Till that he dream and dronny[8]
For after all our sport
Then will he rout and snort.[9]
Then sweetly together we lie
As two pigs in a sty."
To cease me seemeth best
And of this tale to rest
And for to leave this letter
Because it is no better
And because it is no swetter[10]
We will no farther rhyme
Of it at this time
But we will turn plain
Where we left again.

Tertius passus.

Instead of coin and money
Some bring her a conny
And some a pot with honey
Some a salt, and some a spoon
Some their hose, some their shoon
Some ran a good trot
With a skillet or a pot
Some fill their pot full
Of good Lemster wool.[11]
An huswife of trust
When she is a thrust[12]
Such a web can spin
Her thrift is full thin.[13]
Some go straight thither
Be it slaty or slyder[14]
They hold the high way[15]
They care not what men say.
Be that as be may
Some loath to be espied
Some start in at the back side
Over the hedge and pale[16]
And all for the good ale.
Some run till they sweat
Bring with them malt or wheat
And Dame Elynour entreat
To byrle[17] them of the best.
Then cometh another guest
She sweared by the rood[18] of rest
Her lippes are so dry
Without drink she must die:
"Therefore fill it by and by

---

[1] trew true.
[2] it brook profit by it; also the sense of endure it, stomach it.
[3] ble colour, complexion.
[4] whiting small fish. This and the terms in the following two lines are all terms of endearment; mulling darling; myting dear, little thing; conny "cony" or rabbit.
[5] bass perhaps kiss, from "baiser."
[6] monny money or many.
[7] make I my falyre fonny I make my fellow foolish, infatuated.
[8] dronny gets sluggish.
[9] rout snore.
[10] swetter sweeter.
[11] Lemster wool a notably fine wool.
[12] a thrust a thirst, thirsty.
[13] An huswife … full thin The idea of the sentence is that when a housewife is thirsty, thrift will not stop her.
[14] slaty stony; slyder slippery, refers to loose stones on a hill.
[15] They hold the high way The women walk boldly along the main roads.
[16] pale fence.
[17] byrle to draw or pour out drink.
[18] rood cross.

And have here a peck of rye."
Anon cometh another
As dry as the other
And with her doth bring
Meal, salt, or other thing
Her hervest[1] girdle, her wedding ring
To pay for her scot[2]
As cometh to her lot
Some bringeth her husbandes hood
Because the ale is good
Another brought her his cap
To offer to the ale tap
With flax and with towe[3]
And some brought sour dough
With "hey" and with "ho,
Sit we down a row
And drink till we blow
And pipe tirly-tirlow."[4]
Some laid to pledge
Their hatchet and their wedge[5]
Their hekell and their rele[6]
Their rock, their spinning wheel
And some went so narrow
They laid to pledge their wharrow[7]
Their ribskin and their spindle[8]
Their needle and their thimble.
Here was scant thrift
When they made such shift.
Their thirst was so great
They asked never for meat
But, "Drink still drink
And let the cat wink
Let us wash our gommes
From the dry crommes."

[1] hervest either harvest or harnessed.
[2] scot her share in the entertainment.
[3] towe the fibre of flax prepared for spinning.
[4] tirly-tirlow a whirling musical sound.
[5] wedge shape of instruments used to split or separate objects; here it might refer to an instrument related to cloth making or sewing, as are many of the objects in the list.
[6] hekell instrument used for combing flax; rele instrument on which thread is wound.
[7] wharrow grooved pulley in the spinning wheel.
[8] ribskin leather apron worn when "ribbing" or rubbing flax with a flat tool; spindle instrument around which thread is wound when spinning by hand.

Quartus passus

Some for very need
Lay down a skein of threde[9]
And some a skein of yarn
Some brought from the barn
Both beanes and pease
Small chaffer[10] doth ease
Sometime, now and than,
Another there was that ran
With a good brassepan[11]
Her colour was full wan
She ran in all the haste
Unbraced and unlaced
Tawny, swart and sallow[12]
Like a cake of tallow
I swear by all hallow[13]
It was a stale to take
The devil in a brake.[14]
And then came halting Joan
And brought a gam-bone
Of bacon that was resty[15]
But Lord as she was testy
Angry as a waspy
She began to yawn and gaspy
And bad Elynour go bet
And fill in good met
It was deer that was far fet.[16]
Another brought a spyck[17]
Of a bacon flick[18]
Her tongue was very quick
But she spake somewhat thick.
Her fellow did stammer and stut

[9] skein of threde bundle of thread.
[10] chaffer merchandise.
[11] brassepan brass pan.
[12] swart swarthy; sallow yellowish-brown, though some editions say "swallow," which may also allude to drinking.
[13] all hallow everything holy.
[14] It was a stale … a brake It was a trap to allure the Devil from the thicket; it was tempting to the devil.
[15] resty rancid.
[16] And bad … far fet She bid Elynour do better and supply good meat, such as deer.
[17] spyck fat meat; lard.
[18] bacon flick side of bacon.

But she was a foul slut
For her mouth foamed
And her belly groaned.
Joan said she had eaten a fyest[1]
"By Christ" said she "thou liest
I have as sweet a breath
As thou with shameful death"
Then Elynour said, "Ye callettes[2]
I shall break your palettes
Without ye now cease."
And so was made the drunken peace
Then thither came drunken Ales[3]
And she was full of tales
Of tidings in Wales
And of Saint James in Gales[4]
And of the Portingales
With "Lo, gossip, I wis
Thus and thus it is
There hath been great warre
Between Temple Barre
And the Cross in Cheap
And there came an heap
Of mill stones in a rout."[5]
She speaketh thus in her snout
Snivelling in her nose
As though she had the pose[6]
"Lo, here is an old tippet[7]
And ye will give me a sippet
Of your stale ale
God send you good sale."
And as she was drinking
She fell in a winking[8]

[1] fyest fart, foul smell.
[2] callettes A calet is a strumpet or a scold.
[3] Ales Alice, with an obvious pun in her name.
[4] Saint James in Gales the shrine of St. James, in Galicia, a place of pilgrimage.
[5] And of the Portingales … in a rout Scattergood provides this explanation for these lines: "Probably a reference to the Evil May Day uprising of 1517 when a London mob attacked foreigners in the city whom they blamed for the depressed state of the economy. The Portuguese ambassador and his attendants had arrived in London on the day the trouble started" (p. 451, notes 355-62). Cheap and Temple Bar are places in London.
[6] pose a cold in the head.
[7] tippet a type of cape.
[8] winking doze.

With a barley-hood[9]
She pissed where she stood
Then began she to weep
And forthwith fell on sleep[10]
Elynour took her up
And blessed her with a cup
Of new ale in corns[11]
Ales found therein no thorns
But supped it up at ones[12]
She found therein no bones.[13]

Quintus passus.

[...]

Then Margery Milk-Duck
Her kyrtle she did up tuck
An inch above her knee
Her legges that ye might see
But they were sturdy and stubbled
Mighty pestles and clubbed
As fair and as white
As the foot of a kite.[14]
She was somewhat foul
Crook necked like an owl
And yet she brought her fees
A cantell[15] of Essex cheese
Was well a foot thick
Full of maggots quick
It was huge and great
And mighty strong meat
For the devil to eat
It was tart and punyete.[16]
Another sort of sluts
Some brought walnuts
Some apples, some pears

[9] barley-hood fit of drunkenness.
[10] on sleep asleep.
[11] new ale in corns ale as drawn off the malt.
[12] ones once.
[13] She found … bones a play on the proverb "To find no bones in something" or to find nothing wrong or unusual.
[14] kite bird of prey.
[15] cantell slice or section.
[16] punyete pungent.

Some brought their clipping shears
Some brought this and that
Some brought I wot ne're what
Some brought their husbandes hat
Some puddings and links
Some tripes that stinks
But of all this throng
One came them among
She seemed half a leach
And began to preach
Of the Tuesday in the week
When the mare doth keke[1]
Of the virtue of an unset leke[2]
Of her husbandes breke[3]
With the feathers of a quail
She could to burdeou[4] sail
And with good ale barm[5]
She could make a charm
To help with all a stitch[6]
She seemed to be a witch.

[...][7]

But sir among all
That sat in that hall
There was a prick me dainty[8]
Sat like a sainty
And began to painty[9]
As though she would fainty
She made it as coy
As a lege de moy[10]
She was not half so wise
As she was peevish nice
She said never a word

But rose from the board
And called for our dame
Elynour by name.
We supposed I wis
That she rose to piss
But the very ground
Was for to compound
With Elynour in the spence[11]
To pay for her expense.
"I have no penny nor groat[12]
To pay" said she, "God wot
For washing of my throat
But my beads of amber.[13]
Bear them to your chamber."
Then Elynour did them hide
Within her beddes side.
But some then sat right sad
That nothing had
There of their awn[14]
Neither gelt[15] nor pawn.
Such were there many
That had not a penny
But when they should walk
Were fain with a chalk
To score on the balke
Or score on the tail.[16]
God give it ill hail,[17]
For my fingers itch
I have written too mych[18]
Of this mad mumming[19]
Of Elynour Rummyng
Thus endeth the gest[20]
Of this worthy fest.

---

1 keke kick.
2 unset leke a young leek not transplanted.
3 breke breeches.
4 burdeou presumably Bordeaux.
5 barm froth.
6 stitch This could be either a sewing stitch (since there are so many references to sewing and cloth making) or a painful pinch or "stitch in the side."
7 The sixth canto and first part of the seventh canto are deleted.
8 prick me dainty a finicky, affected dresser.
9 painty pant.
10 lege de moy the name of a dance.
11 spence room where liquor is kept.
12 groat equal to four pennies.
13 beads of amber her rosary.
14 awn own.
15 gelt money.
16 when they should walk ... on the tail When they left, they recorded their expense by making a mark on a wooden beam or on a pole.
17 ill hail bad luck.
18 mych much.
19 mumming an entertainment in which one disguised oneself; "to make a mumming" of something is to treat it lightly or with contempt.
20 gest exploits; time allotted; perhaps also a reference to "jest."

Quod Skelton Laureat.

Laureati Skeltonidis in despectu malignantium distichon

Quamvis insanis quamvis marcescis inanis
Invide cantamus hec loca plena jocis
Bien men souvient
Omnes feminas que vel nimis bibule sunt vel que sordida labe squaloris aut qua spurca feditatis macula aut verbosa loquacitate notantur poeta invitat ad audiendum hunc libellum &
Ebria squalida sordida femina prodiga verbis
Huc currat properet veniat sua gesta libellus
Iste volutabit pean sua plectra sonando
Materiam risus cantabit carmine rauco.[1]

—1521

[1] The Latin colophon appears in all the complete early editions by different printers, and appears to be written by Skelton. It is translated as follows in Scattergood's edition:
"A couplet in contempt of the wicked by Skelton the laureate poet. Jealous man, however mad you are and however you waste away in your vanity, we sing; these places are full of jests. I recall it well. All women who are either very fond of drinking, or who bear the dirty stain of filth, or who have the sordid blemish of squalor, or who are marked out by garrulous loquacity, the poet invites to listen to this little satire. Drunken, filthy, sordid, gossiping woman, let her run here, let her hasten, let her come; this little satire will willingly record her deeds: Apollo, sounding his lyre, will sing them of laughter in a hoarse song" (452).

Sir Thomas More

1478-1535

Sir Thomas More was a well-respected humanist, scholar, and lawyer who filled a number of prominent positions in the Court of Henry VIII. After many years of successful service in England and as a foreign ambassador, he became lord chancellor in 1529, the most senior judicial position in the realm. However, More's political career came to an unhappy end over Henry's desire to divorce his first wife Katherine, who had not yet provided a male heir. More, as a matter of conscience, refused to swear allegiance to the Act of Succession—an act which acknowledged Henry's marriage to Anne Boleyn and made it a treasonable offence to openly criticize it. For this failure of support, More was imprisoned, convicted of treason, and executed in July 1535.

More's most famous work, Utopia, was first published in Latin in 1516 and enjoyed many subsequent publications, in Latin and many other languages. As the extended title indicates, Utopia is part of a long tradition of discussions of the "best state of a public weal." Book One contains a discussion between the traveller Raphael Hythloday and the character "More" on the necessity of learned counsellors at Court, a discussion firmly grounded in the ancient dialogue over the superiority of either the contemplative or active life. Hythloday supports the separate life of learning and philosophical study, while "More" reminds him of the scholar's obligations to the community. This discussion reflects directly on More's own life and death.

If Book One debates the possibility of an ideal society, Book Two provides a possible example, with an extended description of the island of Utopia, its geography, institutions, and society. This description participates in a number of ancient debates on the best pattern for a commonwealth, drawing on Plato's Republic for its view of communal property and his Laws for its recognition of the need for a system of law and government, as well as Aristotle and Cicero for their views on the necessity of private property. The opinions of these ancient authors are also used in the discussions about rhetoric as essential to social and political life, or as a tool used mainly to mislead the listeners.

Utopia is a complex and ambiguous text. It participates in a number of genres—travelogue and travel fiction, satire, philosophical dialogue, and political tract—and presents itself as a history, a true account of a real place, and an actual occurrence. More had recently been to Antwerp as an ambassador; real people and historical events are mentioned in the text. In fact the original Latin publication included a letter from the real Peter Giles, implying that he was present at the discussion with "More" and Hythloday. On the one hand, the text is a serious discussion of serious issues, and yet there are many puns and jokes which undermine this seriousness. It is often difficult to determine whether More aligned himself with Hythloday or "More" on different issues. At the end of Book Two, "More" hints at a future discussion, but this is one that would need to be continued by his readers rather than himself.

Ralph Robynson first translated Utopia in 1551 in an edition which included a prefatory letter from More to Giles, as well as Robynson's dedicatory letter to William Cecil; however, it excluded Giles's and Erasmus's marginal comments, a number of attached letters, and the various engravings of the early Latin editions. Robynson's 1556 edition made corrections to the text and included the marginalia and—because of the changing political situation—dropped the letter to Cecil in favour of a letter to the reader. The version here uses Robynson's 1556 translation of More's text, the main translation available to English readers until the twentieth century, and includes More's letter to Giles, but excludes Giles's and Erasmus's marginal comments to give modern readers a sense of how an English-literate audience would have first encountered this work.

EDITION: A frutefull, pleasaunt, & wittie worke, of the best state of a publique weale, and of the new yle, called Utopia. London: By [Richard Tottel for] Abraham Vele, [1556]. STC 18095/18095.5.

Utopia

Thomas More to Peter Giles, sends greeting.

I am almost ashamed, right well-beloved Peter Giles, to send unto you this book of the Utopian commonwealth well-nigh after a year's space, which I am sure you looked for within a month and a half. And no marvel. For you knew well enough that I was already disburdened of all the labour and study belonging to the invention in this work, and that I had no need at all to trouble my brains about the disposition or conveyance of the matter, and therefore had herein nothing else to do, but only to rehearse those things which you and I together heard Master Raphael[1] tell and declare. Wherefore there was no cause why I should study to set forth the matter with eloquence: forasmuch as his talk could not be fine and eloquent, being first not studied for, but sudden and unpremeditated, and then, as you know, of[2] a man better seen in the Greek language than in the Latin tongue. And my writing, the nigher it should approach to his homely, plain, and simple speech, so much the nigher should it go to the truth, which is the only mark whereunto I do and ought to direct all my travail and study herein. I grant and confess, friend Peter, myself discharged of so much labour, having all these things ready done to my hand that almost there was nothing left for me to do. Else either the invention or the disposition of this matter might have required of a wit neither base, neither at all unlearned, both some time and leisure and also some study. But if it were requisite and necessary that the matter should also have been written eloquently and not alone truly, of a surety that thing could I have performed by no time nor study. But now seeing all these cares, stays and lets were taken away, wherein else so much labour and study should have been employed, and that there remained no other thing for me to do but only to write plainly the matter as I heard it spoken, that indeed was a thing light and easy to be done. Howbeit, to the dispatching of this so little business my other cares and troubles did leave almost less than no leisure. Whiles I do daily bestow my time about law matters, some to plead, some to hear, some as an arbitrator with mine award to determine, some as an umpire or a judge with my sentence finally to discuss; whiles I go one way to see and visit my friend, another way about mine own private affairs; whiles I spend almost all the day abroad among others, and the residue at home among mine own, I leave to myself, I mean to my book, no time. For when I am come home, I must common[3] with my wife, chat with my children, and talk with my servants, all the which things I reckon and account among business, forasmuch as they must of necessity be done, and done must they needs be unless a man will be stranger in his own house. And in any wise, a man must so fashion and order his conditions and so appoint and dispose himself that he be merry, jocund, and pleasant among them whom either nature has provided or chance has made or he himself has chosen to be the fellows and companions of his life, so that with too much gentle behaviour and familiarity, he do not mar them and, by too much sufferance of his servants, make them his masters. Among these things now rehearsed steals away the day, the month, the year. When do I write then? And all this while have I spoken no word of sleep, neither yet of meat,[4] which among a great number does waste no less time than does sleep, wherein almost half the lifetime of man creeps away. I therefore do win and get only that time which I steal from sleep and meat, which time, because it is very little, and yet somewhat it is, therefore have I once at the last, though it be long first, finished Utopia and have sent it to you, friend Peter, to read and peruse to the intent that if anything have escaped me, you might put me in remembrance of it. For though in this behalf I do not greatly mis-

[1] Master Raphael Raphael Hythloday. The archangel Raphael is traditionally a guide and healer. The name Hythloday is a Greek compound meaning an "expert in nonsense," or perhaps a "nonsense peddler."

[2] of by.

[3] common commune, communicate.

[4] meat more generally, "food."

trust myself (which would God I were somewhat in wit and learning, as I am not all of the worst and dullest memory), yet have I not so great trust and confidence in it that I think nothing could fall out of my mind. For John Clement,[1] my boy, who as you know was there present with us, whom I suffer to be away from no talk wherein may be any profit or goodness (for out of this young bladed and new-shot-up corn, which has already begun to spring up both in Latin and Greek learning, I look for plentiful increase at length of goodly ripe grain), he, I say, has brought me into a great doubt. For whereas Hythloday (unless my memory fail me) said that the bridge of Amaurot,[2] which goes over the river of Anyder,[3] is five hundred paces, that is to say half a mile in length, my John says that two hundred of those paces must be plucked away, for that the river contains there not above three hundred paces in breadth. I pray you heartily call the matter to your remembrance, for if you agree with him, I also will say as you say and confess myself deceived. But if you cannot remember the thing, then surely I will write as I have done and as mine own remembrance serves me. For as I will take good heed that there be in my book nothing false, so if there be anything doubtful, I will rather tell a lie than make a lie, because I had rather be good than wily. Howbeit, this matter may easily be remedied if you will take the pains to ask the question of Raphael himself by word of mouth, if he be now with you, or else by your letters, which you must needs do for another doubt also that has chanced, through whose fault I cannot tell, whether through mine or yours or Raphael's. For neither we remembered to inquire of him nor he to tell us in what part of the new world Utopia is situate[d]. The which thing I had rather have spent no small sum of money than that it should thus have escaped us, as well for that I am ashamed to be ignorant in what sea that island stands whereof I write so long a treatise, as also because there be with us certain men, and especially one virtuous and godly man, and a professor of divinity, who is exceeding[ly] desirous to go unto Utopia, not for a vain and curious desire to see news, but to the intent he may further and increase our religion, which is there already luckily begun. And that he may the better accomplish and perform this his good intent, he is minded to procure that he may be sent thither by the high bishop, yea, and that he himself may be made bishop of Utopia, being nothing scrupulous herein, that he must obtain this bishopric with suit. For he counts that a godly suit which proceeds not of the desire of honour or lucre, but only of a godly zeal. Wherefore I most earnestly desire you, friend Peter, to talk with Hythloday, if you can, face to face, or else to write your letters to him, and so to work in this matter that in this my book there may neither anything be found which is untrue, neither anything be lacking which is true. And I think verily it shall be well done that you show unto him the book itself, for if I have missed or failed in any point, or if any fault have escaped me, no man can so well correct and amend it as he can, and yet that can he not do unless he peruse and read over my book written. Moreover, by this means shall you perceive whether he be well willing and content that I should undertake to put this work in writing. For if he be minded to publish and put forth his own labours and travails himself, perchance he would be loath, and so would I also, that in publishing the Utopian weal public[4] I should prevent him and take from him the flower and grace of the novelty of this his history. Howbeit, to say the very truth, I am not yet fully determined with myself whether I will put forth my book or no. For the natures of men be so diverse, the fantasies of some so wayward, their minds so unkind, their judgements so corrupt, that they which lead a merry and a jocund life, following their own sensual pleasures and carnal lusts, may seem to be in a much better state or case than they that vex and unquiet them-

[1] John Clement one of the first students of St. Paul's, the humanist grammar school founded by John Colet about 1509. Clement had joined More's household as a servant and pupil by 1514.

[2] Amaurot from Greek, "made dark or dim."

[3] Anyder from Greek, "waterless."

[4] weal public commonwealth.

selves with cares and study for the putting forth and publishing of some thing that may be either profit or pleasure to others, which others nevertheless will disdainfully, scornfully, and unkindly accept the same. The most part of all be unlearned, and a great number have learning in contempt. The rude and barbarous allow nothing but that which is very barbarous indeed. If it be one that has a little smack of learning, he rejects as homely gear and common ware whatsoever is not stuffed full of old moth-eaten terms and that be worn out of use. Some there be that have pleasures only in old rusty antiquities, and some only in their own doings. One is so sour, so crabbed, and so unpleasant that he can away with no mirth nor sport. Another is so narrow between the shoulders that he can bear no jests nor taunts. Some silly poor souls be so afraid that at every snappish word their nose shall be bitten off that they stand in no less dread of every quick and sharp word than he that is bitten of a mad dog fears water. Some be so mutable and wavering that every hour they be in a new mind, saying one thing sitting and another thing standing. Another sort sit upon their ale benches, and there among their cups they give judgement of the wits of writers, and with great authority they condemn, even as pleases them, every writer according to his writing, in most spiteful manner mocking, louting, and flouting them, being themselves in the mean season safe and, as says the proverb, out of all danger of gunshot. For why they be so smug and smooth that they have not so much as one hair of an honest man whereby one may take hold of them. There be, moreover, some so unkind and ungentle that though they take great pleasure and delectation in the work, yet for all that they cannot find in their hearts to love the author thereof, nor to afford him a good word, being much like uncourteous, unthankful, and churlish guests which, when they have with good and dainty meats well filled their bellies, depart home, giving no thanks to the feast-maker. Go your ways now and make a costly feast at your own charges for guests so dainty-mouthed, so diverse in taste, and, besides that, of so unkind and unthankful natures. But nevertheless (friend Peter) do, I pray you, with Hythloday as I willed you before. And as for this matter I shall be at my liberty afterwards to take new advisement. Howbeit, seeing I have taken great pains and labour in writing the matter, if it may stand with his mind and pleasure, I will, as touching the edition or publishing of the book, follow the counsel and advice of my friends, and specially yours. Thus fare you well right heartily beloved friend Peter, with your gentle wife, and love me as you have ever done, for I love you better than ever I did.

THE FIRST BOOK OF THE COMMUNICATION OF RAPHAEL HYTHLODAY CONCERNING THE BEST STATE OF A COMMONWEALTH.

The most victorious and triumphant king of England, Henry the Eighth of that name, in all royal virtues a prince most peerless, had of late in controversy with Charles, the right high and mighty king of Castile,[1] weighty matters and of great importance. For the debatement and final determination whereof, the King's Majesty sent me ambassador into Flanders, joined in commission with Cuthbert Tunstall,[2] a man doubtless out of comparison and whom the King's Majesty of late, to the great rejoicing of all men, did prefer to the office of master of the Rolls.[3] But of this man's praises I will say nothing, not because I do fear that small credence shall be given to the testimony that comes out of a friend's mouth, but because his virtue of learning be greater and of more excellency than that I am able to praise them, and also in all places so famous and so perfectly well known that they need not, nor ought not, of me to be praised, unless I would seem to show and set forth the brightness of the sun with a candle, as the proverb says.

[1] in controversy … king of Castile Prince Charles (b. 1500) soon to be king of Castile and then king of Spain. In 1519, he became the Holy Roman Emperor. The "controversy" was mainly about trade between the countries.

[2] Cuthbert Tunstall (1474-1559), a noted humanist.

[3] master of the Rolls a judge of the Court of Appeal and a member of the Judicial Committee, who has charge of the rolls, patents, and grants that pass the Great Seal, and of all the records of the Court of Chancery.

There met us at Bruges (for thus it was before agreed) they whom their Prince had for that matter appointed commissioners, excellent men all. The chief and the head of them was the Margrave[1] (as they call him) of Bruges, a right honourable man, but the wisest and the best spoken of them was George Temsice,[2] provost of Cassel, a man not only by learning but also by nature of singular eloquence, and in the laws profoundly learned, but in reasoning and debating of matters, what by his natural wit and what by daily exercise, surely he had few fellows. After that we had once or twice met, and upon certain points or articles could not fully and thoroughly agree, they for a certain space took their leave of us and departed to Brussels, there to know their Prince's pleasure.

I in the meantime (for so my business lay) went straight thence to Antwerp. While I was there abiding, often times among others, but which to me was more welcome than any other did visit me one Peter Giles, a citizen of Antwerp, a man there in his country of honest reputation and also preferred to high promotions, worthy truly of the highest. For it is hard to say whether the young man be in learning or in honesty more excellent, for he is both of wonderful virtuous conditions and also singularly well learned, and towards all sorts of people exceeding gentle, but towards his friends so kind-hearted, so loving, so faithful, so trusty, and of so earnest affection that it were very hard in any place to find a man that with him in all points of friendship may be compared. No man can be more lowly or courteous; no man uses less simulation or dissimulation; in no man is more prudent simplicity. Besides this, he is in his talk and communication so merry and pleasant, yea, and that without harm, that through his gentle entertainment and his sweet and delectable communication, in me was greatly abated and diminished the fervent desire that I had to see my native country, my wife and my children, whom then I did much long and covet to see, because that at that time I had been more than four months from them. Upon a certain day when I had heard the divine service in Our Lady's Church,[3] which is the fairest, the most gorgeous and curious church of building in all the city, and also most frequented of people, and, the service being done, was ready to go home to my lodging, I chanced to espy this foresaid Peter talking with a certain stranger, a man well stricken in age, with a black sunburned face, a long beard, and a cloak cast homely about his shoulders, whom by his favour and apparel forthwith I judged to be a mariner. But the said Peter seeing me, came unto me and saluted me. And as I was about to answer him, "See you this man," said he (and therewith he pointed to the man that I saw him talking with before), "I was minded," said he, "to bring him straight home to you."

"He should have been very welcome to me," said I, "for your sake."

"Nay," said he, "for his own sake if you knew him, for there is no man this day living that can tell you of so many strange and unknown peoples and countries as this man can. And I know well that you be very desirous to hear of such news."

"Then I conjectured not far amiss," said I, "for even at the first sight I judged him to be a mariner."

"Nay," said he, "there ye were greatly deceived. He has sailed, indeed, not as the mariner Palinurus, but as the expert and prudent Prince Ulysses. Yea, rather as the ancient and sage philosopher Plato.[4] For this same Raphael Hythloday (for this is his name) is very well learned in the Latin tongue, but profound and excellent in the Greek language, wherein he ever bestowed more study than in the Latin because he had given himself

[1] Margrave governor.

[2] George Temsice Georges de Themsecke (d. 1536), the chief magistrate of Cassel.

[3] Our Lady's Church Notre Dame.

[4] the mariner Palinurus … philosopher Plato Palinurus, Aeneas's pilot, slept at the helm and fell overboard; Ulysses, the hero of Homer's The Odyssey, is both widely travelled and more careful than Palinurus; according to Diogenes Laertius, Plato travelled widely around the Mediterranean.

wholly to the study of philosophy. Whereof he knew that there is nothing extant in Latin that is to any purpose, saving a few of Seneca's and Cicero's doings. His patrimony that he was born unto he left to his brethren (for he is a Portugal born), and for the desire that he had to see and know the far countries of the world, he joined himself in company with Amerigo Vespucci,[1] and in the three last voyages of those four that be now in print and abroad in every man's hands, he continued still in his company, saving that in the last voyage he came not home again with him. For he made such means and shift, what by entreatance and what by importune suit, that he got license of Master Amerigo (though it were sore against his will) to be one of the twenty-four which in the end of the last voyage were left in the country of Gulike.[2] He was therefore left behind for his mind's sake, as one that took more thought and care for travelling[3] than dying, having customably in his mouth these sayings: he that has no grave is covered with the sky;[4] and the way to Heaven out of all places is of like length and distance.[5] Which fantasy of his (if God had not been his better friend) he had surely bought full dear. But after the departing of Master Vespucci, when he had travelled through and about many countries with five of his companions, Gulikians, at the last by marvellous chance he arrived in Taprobane, from whence he went to Calicut,[6] where he chanced to find certain of his country ships, wherein he returned again into his country, nothing less than looked for."

All this, when Peter had told me, I thanked him for his gentle kindness that he had vouchsafed to bring me to the speech of that man whose communication he thought should be to me pleasant and acceptable. And therewith I turned me to Raphael. And when we had hailed each other and had spoken these common words that be customably spoken at the first meeting and acquaintance of strangers, we went thence to my house and there in my garden upon a bench covered with green torves,[7] we sat down talking together. There he told us how that after the departing of Vespucci, he and his fellows that tarried behind in Gulike began by little and little, through fair and gentle speech, to win the love and favour of the people of that country, insomuch that, within short space, they did dwell amongst them not only harmless,[8] but also occupying[9] with them very familiarly. He told us also that they were in high reputation and favour with a certain great man (whose name and country is now quite out of my remembrance) which of his mere liberality did bear the costs and charges of him and his five companions. And besides that gave them a trusty guide to conduct them in their journey (which by water was in boats and by land in wagons) and to bring them to other princes with very friendly commendations. Thus after many days' journeys, he said, they found towns and cities and weal publics full of people governed by good and wholesome laws. For under the line equinoctial,[10] and on both sides of the same as far as the sun does extend his course, lies (said he) great and wide deserts and wildernesses, parched, burned, and dried up with continual and intolerable heat. All things be hideous, terrible, loathsome, and unpleasant to behold: all things out of fashion and comeliness,[11] inhabited with wild beasts and serpents, or, at the leastwise, with people that be no less savage, wild and noisome than the very beasts themselves be. But a little farther beyond that all things begin by little and little to wax pleasant: the

---

[1] Amerigo Vespucci (1451-1512), a Florentine explorer after whom the Americas are named. He travelled to the Americas under the employ of the King of Portugal and wrote two Latin accounts of his voyages.

[2] This appears to be a fictional place invented by Robynson.

[3] travelling "travail" in the original can mean either "travelling" or "work."

[4] he that has no grave is covered with the sky from Lucan's Pharsalia.

[5] the way to Heaven … length and distance from Cicero's Tusculan Disputations.

[6] Taprobane … Calicut Taprobane is present day Sri Lanka; Calicut is present day Calcutta.

[7] torves turfs (of grass).

[8] harmless free from harm.

[9] occupying living, working.

[10] line equinoctial equator.

[11] fashion shape; comeliness pleasing appearance.

air soft, temperate, and gentle; the ground covered with green grass; less wildness in the beasts. At the last shall you come again to people, cities, and towns wherein is continual intercourse and occupying of merchandise and chaffer,[1] not only among themselves and with their borderers, but also with merchants of far countries, both by land and water. "There I had occasion," said he, "to go to many countries on every side, for there was no ship ready to any voyage or journey, but I and my fellows were into it very gladly received." The ships that they found first were made plain, flat and broad in the bottom, trow-wise.[2] The sails were made of great rushes, or of wickers, and in some places of leather. Afterward, they found ships with ridged keels and sails of canvas, yea, and shortly after, having all things like ours. The shipmen also very expert and cunning, both in the sea and in the weather. But he said that he found great favour and friendship among them for teaching them the feat and the use of the lodestone,[3] which to them before that time was unknown, and therefore they were wont to be very timorous and fearful upon the sea, nor to venture upon it but only in the summertime. But now they have such a confidence in that stone that they fear not stormy winter, in so doing farther from care than danger; insomuch that it is greatly to be doubted lest that thing, through their own foolish hardiness, shall turn them to evil and harm, which at the first was supposed should be to them good and commodious.

But what he told us that he saw in every country where he came, it were very long to declare; neither it is my purpose at this time to make rehearsal thereof. But peradventure[4] in another place I will speak of it, chiefly such things as shall be profitable to be known, as in special be those decrees and ordinances that he marked to be well and wittily provided and enacted among such peoples as do live together in a civil policy and good order. For of such things did we busily inquire and demand of him, and he likewise very willingly told us of the same. But as for monsters, because they be no news, of them we were nothing inquisitive, for nothing is more easy to be found than be barking Scyllas, ravening Celaenos, and Laestrygons,[5] devourers of people, and such like great and incredible monsters. But to find citizens ruled by good and wholesome laws, that is an exceeding rare and hard thing. But as he marked many fond and foolish laws in those newfound lands, so he rehearsed divers[6] acts and constitutions whereby these our cities, nations, countries, and kingdoms may take example to amend their faults, enormities, and errors, whereof in another place (as I said) I will entreat.

Now at this time I am determined to rehearse only that he told us of the manners, customs, laws, and ordinances of the Utopians. But first I will repeat our former communication by the occasion, and (as I might say) the drift whereof he was brought into the mention of that weal public.

For when Raphael had very prudently touched divers things that be amiss—some here and some there, yea, very many on both parts—and again had spoken of such wise laws and prudent decrees as be established and used, both here among us and also there among them, as a man so perfect and expert in the laws and customs of every several country, as though into what place soever he came guestwise, there he had led all his life. Then Peter much marvelling at the man, "Surely Master Raphael," said he, "I wonder greatly why you get you not into some king's court. For I am sure there is no prince living that would not be very glad of you as a man not only able highly to delight him with your profound learning, and this your knowledge of countries and peoples, but also

[1] continual intercourse ... and chaffer continual communication or dealings and the business of trade or bargaining.

[2] trow-wise A trow is a flat-bottomed boat.

[3] lodestone magnetic compass.

[4] peradventure perhaps.

[5] barking Scyllas, ravening Celaenos, and Laestrygons monsters from Homer's The Odyssey and Virgil's Aeneid. Scylla is a sea monster; Celaenos is the leader of the Harpies, a race of monstrous bird-women; Laestrygons are cannibals.

[6] divers various, diverse.

meet to instruct him with examples and help him with counsel. And thus doing, you shall bring yourself in a very good case,[1] and also be of ability to help all your friends and kinfolk."

"As concerning my friends and kinfolk," said he, "I pass not greatly for them,[2] for I think I have sufficiently done my part towards them already. For these things that other men do not depart from until they be old and sick, yea, which they be then very loath to leave when they can no longer keep, those very same things did I, being not only lusty[3] and in good health, but also in the flower of my youth, divide among my friends and kinfolk. Which I think with this my liberality ought to hold them contented and not to require nor to look that besides this, I should for their sakes give myself in bondage unto kings."

"Nay, God forbid that," said Peter, "it is not my mind that you should be in bondage to kings, but as a retainer to them at your pleasure, which surely I think is the nighest[4] way that you can devise how to bestow your time fruitfully, not only for the private commodity[5] of your friends and for the general profit of all sorts of people, but also for the advancement of yourself to a much wealthier state and condition than you be now in."

"To a wealthier condition," said Raphael, "by that means that my mind stands clean against? Now I live at liberty after my own mind and pleasure, which I think very few of these great states and peers of realms can say. Yea, and there be enough of them that sue for great men's friendships, and therefore think it no great hurt if they have not me, nor three or four such other as I am."

"Well, I perceive plainly, friend Raphael," said I, "that you be desirous neither of riches nor of power. And truly I have in no less reverence and estimation a man of your mind than any of them all that be so high in power and authority. But you shall do as it becomes you, yea, and according to this wisdom, to this high and free courage of yours, if you can find in your heart so to appoint and dispose yourself that you may apply your wit and diligence to the profit of the weal public, though it be somewhat to your own pain and hindrance. And this shall you never so well do, nor with so great profit perform, as if you be of some great prince's council and put into his head (as I doubt not but you will) honest opinions and virtuous persuasions. For from the prince, as from a perpetual wellspring, comes among the people the flood of all that is good or evil. But in you is so perfect learning, that without any experience—and again so great experience, that without any learning—you may well be any king's counsellor."

"You be twice deceived, Master More," said he, "first in me and again in the thing itself. For neither is in me the ability that you force upon me, and if it were never so much, yet in disquieting mine own quietness I should nothing further the weal public. For, first of all, the most part of all princes have more delight in warlike matters and feats of chivalry (the knowledge whereof I neither have nor desire) than in the good feats of peace, and employ much more study how by right or by wrong to enlarge their dominions than how well and peaceably to rule and govern that they have already. Moreover, they that be counsellors to kings, every one of them either is of himself so wise indeed that he needs not, or else he thinks himself so wise that he will not allow another man's counsel, saving that they do shamefully and flatteringly give assent to the fond and foolish sayings of certain great men, whose favours, because they be in high authority with their prince, by assentation[6] and flattery they labour to obtain. And verily it is naturally given to all men to esteem their own inventions best. So both the raven and the ape think their own young ones fairest. Then if a man in such a company, where some disdain and have despite at[7] other men's inventions, and some count their own best, if among such men (I say) a man should bring forth anything that he has

---

1 case position or circumstance.

2 I pass not greatly for them i.e., I am not greatly concerned about them.

3 lusty healthy, strong.

4 nighest nearest.

5 commodity advantage, benefit.

6 assentation servile expression or act of assent.

7 have despite at have contempt or disdain for.

read done in times past, or that he has seen done in other places, there the hearers fare as though the whole estimation of their wisdom were in jeopardy to be overthrown, and that ever after they should be counted for very dizzards,[1] unless they could in other men's inventions pick out matter to reprehend and find fault at. If all other poor helps fail, then this is their extreme refuge: 'These things' (say they) 'pleased our forefathers and ancestors. Would God we could be so wise as they were.' And, as though they had wittily concluded the matter and with this answer stopped every man's mouth, they sit down again. As who should say it were a very dangerous matter if a man in any point should be found wiser than his forefathers were.

"And yet be we content to suffer the best and wittiest of their decrees to lie unexecuted. But if in anything a better order might have been taken than by them was, there we take fast hold, finding therein many faults. Many times have I chanced upon such proud, lewd, overthwart and wayward judgements, yea, and once in England."

"I pray you, sir," said I, "have you been in our country?"

"Yea, forsooth," said he, "and there I tarried for the space of four or five months together, not long after the insurrection that the western Englishmen made against their King, which by their own miserable and pitiful slaughter was suppressed and ended.[2] In the mean season, I was much bound and beholding to the right reverend father, John Morton,[3] archbishop and cardinal of Canterbury, and at that time also lord chancellor of England: a man, Master Peter (for Master More knows already that I will say), not more honourable for his authority than for his prudence and virtue. He was of a mean stature and, though stricken in age, yet bore he his body upright. In his face did shine such an amiable reverence as was pleasant to behold, gentle in communication, yet earnest and sage. He had great delight many times with rough speech to his suitors to prove, but without harm, what prompt wit and what bold spirit were in every man. In the which, as in a virtue much agreeing with his nature, so that therewith were not joined impudency, he took great delectation. And the same person, as apt and meet to have an administration in the weal public, he did lovingly embrace. In his speech he was fine, eloquent, and pithy; in the law he had profound knowledge; in wit he was incomparable; and in memory wonderful excellent. These qualities, which in him were by nature singular, he by learning and use had made perfect. The King put much trust in his counsel; the weal public also in a manner leaned unto him when I was there. For even in the chief of his youth he was taken from school into the Court, and there passed all his time in much trouble and business, being continually tumbled and tossed in the waves of divers misfortunes and adversities. And so by many and great dangers he learned the experience of the world, which so being learned cannot easily be forgotten.

"It chanced on a certain day, when I sat at his table, there was also a certain layman cunning in the laws of your realm, who, I cannot tell whereof taking occasion, began diligently and earnestly to praise that strait and rigorous justice which at that time was there executed upon felons, who, as he said, were for the most part twenty hanged together upon one gallows. And seeing so few escaped punishment, he said he could not choose but greatly wonder and marvel how and by what evil luck it should so come to pass that thieves nevertheless were in every place so rife and so rank. 'Nay, sir,' said I (for I durst boldly speak my mind before the Cardinal), 'marvel nothing hereat, for this punishment of thieves passeth the limits of justice and is also very hurtful to the weal public, for it is too extreme and cruel a punishment for theft, and yet not sufficient to refrain and withhold men from theft. For simple theft is not so great an offence that it ought to be to punished with death. Neither there is any punishment so

[1] dizzards fools.

[2] the insurrection … ended the Cornish Rising of 1497. In response to Henry VII's huge taxation, many men marched on London, but were slaughtered at the Battle of Blackheath.

[3] John Morton (1420?-1500); as a youth, More served in Morton's household.

horrible that it can keep them from stealing which have no other craft whereby to get their living. Therefore, in this point, not you only, but also the most part of the world be like evil schoolmasters which be readier to beat than to teach their scholars. For great and horrible punishments be appointed for thieves, whereas much rather provision should have been made that there were some means whereby they might get their living so that no man should be driven to this extreme necessity, first to steal and then to die.' 'Yes,' said he, 'this matter is well enough provided for already. There be handicrafts, there is husbandry to get their living by, if they would not willingly be naught.' 'Nay,' said I, 'you shall not escape so, for first of all, I will speak nothing of them that come home out of the wars maimed and lame, as not long ago out of Blackheath field and, a little before that, out of the wars in France. Such, I say, as put their lives in jeopardy for the weal public's or the King's sake, and by reason of weakness and lameness be not able to occupy their old crafts, and be too aged to learn new. Of them I will speak nothing, for as much as wars have their ordinary recourse. But let us consider those things that chance daily before our eyes. First there is a great number of gentlemen which cannot be content to live idle themselves, like dors,[1] of that which other[s] have laboured for: their tenants I mean, whom they poll and shave[2] to the quick by raising their rents (for this only point of frugality do they use, men else through their lavish and prodigal[3] spending, able to bring themselves to very beggary). These gentlemen, I say, do not only live in idleness themselves, but also carry about with them at their tails a great flock or train of idle and loitering serving men, which never learned any craft whereby to get their livings. These men, as soon as their master is dead, or be sick themselves, be incontinent[4] thrust out of doors. For gentlemen had rather keep idle persons than sick men, and many times the dead man's heir is not able to maintain so great a house, and keep so many servingmen as his father did. Then in the mean season,[5] they that be thus destitute of service either starve for hunger or manfully play the thieves. For what would you have them do? When they have wandered abroad for so long until they have worn threadbare their apparel and also appaired[6] their health, then gentlemen, because of their pale and sickly faces and patched coats, will not take them into service. And husbandmen[7] dare not set them to work, knowing well enough that he is nothing meet[8] to do true and faithful service to a[9] poor man with a spade and a mattock[10] for small wages and hard fare which, being daintily and tenderly pampered up in idleness and pleasure, was wont with a sword and a buckler[11] by his side to jet through the street with a bragging look, and to think himself too good to be any man's mate.' 'Nay, by Saint Mary, sir,' said the lawyer, 'not so. For this kind of men must we make the most of. For in them, as men of stouter stomachs, bolder spirits, and manlier courages than handicraftsmen and ploughmen be, does consist the whole power, strength, and puissance[12] of our army when we must fight in battle.' 'Forsooth, sir, as well you might say,' said I, 'that for war's sake you must cherish thieves. For surely you shall never lack thieves while you have them. No, nor thieves be not the most false and faint-hearted soldiers, nor soldiers be not the cowardliest thieves, so well these two crafts agree together. But this fault, though it be much used among you, yet is it not peculiar to you only, but common also almost to all nations. Yet France, besides this, is troubled and infected with a much sorer plague. The whole realm is filled and besieged with hired soldiers in peacetime (if that be peace) which be

1 dors drones, lazy idlers, fools.
2 poll and shave to cut short (i.e., to plunder or fleece).
3 prodigal reckless.
4 incontinent immediately.
5 in the mean season meanwhile.
6 appaired impaired, injured.
7 husbandmen farmers, heads of the household.
8 nothing meet not fit.
9 to a in comparison to a.
10 mattock an agricultural tool with a pick on one side and a flat blade on the other.
11 buckler shield.
12 puissance strength.

brought in under the same colour and pretence that has persuaded you to keep these idle servingmen. For these wisefools and very archdolts thought the wealth of the whole country herein to consist, if there were ever in a readiness a strong and a sure garrison, especially of old practiced soldiers, for they put no trust at all in men unexercised.[1] And therefore they must be forced to seek for war, to the end they may ever have practiced soldiers and cunning manslayers, lest that (as it is prettily said of Sallust)[2] their hands and their minds, through idleness or lack of exercise, should wax dull. But how pernicious and pestilent a thing it is to maintain such beasts, the Frenchmen, by their own harms, have learned, and the examples of the Romans, Carthaginians, Syrians, and of many other countries do manifestly declare. For not only the Empire, but also the fields and cities of all these by diverse occasions have been overrun and destroyed of their own armies beforehand had in a readiness.[3] Now how unnecessary a thing this is hereby it may appear, that the French soldiers, which from their youth have been practiced and inured in feats of arms, do not crack[4] nor advance themselves to have very often got the upper hand and mastery of your new-made and unpracticed soldiers. But in this point I will not use many words, lest perchance I may seem to flatter you. No, nor those same handicraft men of yours in cities, nor yet the rude and uplandish[5] ploughmen of the country, are not supposed to be greatly afraid of your gentlemen's idle servingmen, unless it be such as be not of body or stature correspondent to their strength and courage, or else whose bold stomachs be discouraged through poverty. Thus you may see that it is not to be feared lest they should be effeminated,[6] if they were brought up in good crafts and laboursome works whereby to get their livings, whose stout and sturdy bodies (for gentlemen vouchsafe to corrupt and spill[7] none but picked and chosen men) now either by reason of rest and idleness be brought to weakness, or else by too easy and womanly exercises be made feeble and unable to endure hardness. Truly, howsoever the case stands, this me thinks is nothing available[8] to the weal public, for war's sake, which you never have, but when you will yourselves to keep and maintain an innumerable flock of that sort of men that be so troublesome and noyous[9] in peace, whereof you ought to have a thousand times more regard than of war.

"'But yet this is not only the necessary cause of stealing. There is another which, as I suppose, is proper and peculiar to you Englishmen alone.' 'What is that?' said the Cardinal. 'Forsooth, my lord,' said I, 'your sheep that were wont to be so meek and tame and so small eaters, now, as I hear say, [are] become so great devourers and so wild that they eat up and swallow down the very men themselves. They consume, destroy, and devour whole fields, houses, and cities. For look in what parts of the realm does grow the finest and therefore dearest wool, there noblemen and gentlemen, yea, and certain abbots, holy men no doubt, not contenting themselves with the yearly revenues and profits that were wont to grow to their forefathers and predecessors of their lands, nor being content that they live in rest and pleasure nothing profiting, yea, much annoying the weal public, leave no ground for tillage. They enclose all into pastures;[10] they throw down houses; they pluck down towns and leave nothing standing, but only the church to be made a sheep house. And as though you lost no small quantity of ground by forests, chases,[11] launds, and parks, those good holy men turn all dwelling places and all glebe land[12] into desolation and wilderness. Therefore, that 1 unexercised untrained.

---

2 Sallust Sallust (86-34 BCE) was a Roman historian.

3 of their own armies beforehand had in a readiness i.e., by their own ready or standing armies.

4 crack boast.

5 uplandish rustic, uncultivated, wild.

6 effeminated made feminine.

7 spill destroy.

8 available advantageous, useful.

9 noyous annoying.

10 They enclose all into pastures The practice of enclosure—enclosing and fencing in common land for the benefit of private landlords—meant the dislocation and poverty of many rural people.

11 chases hunting grounds.

12 glebe land cultivated fields.

one covetous and unsatiable cormorant[1] and very plague of his native country may compass about and enclose many thousand acres of ground together within one pale or hedge, the husbandmen be thrust out of their own, or else either by covin[2] and fraud, or by violent oppression, they be put besides it, or by wrongs and injuries they be so wearied that they be compelled to sell all. By one means therefore or by other, either by hook or crook they must needs depart away poor, silly,[3] wretched souls: men, women, husbands, wives, fatherless children, widows, woeful mothers with their young babes, and their whole household small in substance and much in number, as husbandry requires many hands. Away they trudge, I say, out of their known and accustomed houses, finding no place to rest in. All their household stuff, which is very little worth though it might well abide the sale, yet being suddenly thrust out, they be constrained to sell it for a thing of naught. And when they have wandered abroad till that be spent, what can they then else do but steal, and then justly pardy[4] be hanged, or else go about to begging? And yet then also they be cast in prison as vagabonds, because they go about and work not, whom no man will set to work, though they never so willingly proffer themselves thereto. For one shepherd or herdsman is enough to eat up that ground with cattle, to the occupying whereof about husbandry many hands were requisite. And this is also the cause why victuals be now in many places dearer. Yea, besides this the price of wool is so risen that poor folks which were wont to work it and make cloth thereof be now able to buy none at all. And by this means very many be forced to forsake work and to give themselves to idleness. For after that so much ground was enclosed for pasture, an infinite multitude of sheep died of the rot, such vengeance God took of their inordinate and unsatiable covetousness, sending among the sheep that pestiferous murrain,[5] which much more justly should have fallen on the sheep-masters' own heads. And though the number of sheep increase never so fast, yet the price falls not one mite,[6] because there be so few sellers. For they be almost all come into a few rich men's hands, whom no need forces to sell before they lust,[7] and they lust not before they may sell as dear as they lust. Now the same cause brings in like dearth of the other kinds of cattle, yea, and that so much the more because that, after farms plucked down and husbandry decayed, there is no man that passes for the breeding[8] of young steer. For these rich men bring not up the young ones of great cattle as they do lambs. But first they buy them abroad very cheap and afterward, when they be fatted in their pastures, they sell them again exceeding dear. And therefore (as I suppose) the whole incommodity hereof is not yet felt, for yet they make dearth only in those places where they sell. But when they shall fetch them away from thence where they be bred faster than they can be brought up, then shall there also be felt great dearth, store beginning there to fail where the ware is bought. Thus the unreasonable covetousness of a few has turned that thing to the utter undoing of your island, in the which thing the chief felicity of your realm did consist. For this great dearth of victuals causes men to keep as little houses and as small hospitality as they possibly may, and to put away their servants: whither, I pray you, but to begging or else (which these gentle bloods and stout stomachs will sooner set their minds unto) to stealing? Now to amend[9] the matter, to this wretched beggary and miserable poverty is joined great wantonness, importunate superfluity,[10] and excessive riot. For not only gentlemen's servants, but also handicraft men, yea, and almost the ploughmen of the

[1] cormorant a large and voracious seabird; a symbol of greed.

[2] covin deceit, conspiracy.

[3] silly helpless, simple.

[4] pardy from the French, "par dieu," meaning "by God."

[5] murrain disease or plague.

[6] mite tiny fragment; a mite was the lowest denomination of English money of account.

[7] lust desire, choose.

[8] no man that passes for the breeding i.e., no man cares to breed; "steer" might be "store" here, meaning, "breeding stock."

[9] amend improve (an ironic statement).

[10] importunate superfluity troublesome abundance.

country, with all other sorts of people, use much strange and proud newfangledness in their apparel and too much prodigal riot and sumptuous fare at their table. Now bawds, queans,[1] whores, harlots, strumpets, brothel houses, stews,[2] and yet another stews, wine taverns, ale houses, and tippling houses, with so many naughty, lewd, and unlawful games, as dice, cards, tables,[3] tennis, bowls, quoits,[4] do not all these send the haunters of them straight to stealing when their money is gone? Cast out these pernicious abominations, make a law that they which plucked down farms and towns of husbandry shall re-edify them, or else yield and up-render[5] the possession thereof to such as will go to the cost of building them anew. Suffer not these rich men to buy up all, to engross,[6] and forestall, and with their monopoly to keep the market alone as please them. Let not so many be brought up in idleness; let husbandry and tillage be restored; let cloth-working be renewed that there may be honest labours for this idle sort to pass their time in profitably, which hitherto either poverty has caused to be thieves, or else now be either vagabonds or idle servingmen and shortly will be thieves. Doubtless, unless you find a remedy for these enormities, you shall in vain advance yourselves of executing justice upon felons, for this justice is more beautiful in appearance and more flourishing to the show than either just or profitable. For by suffering your youth wantonly and viciously to be brought up, and to be infected even from their tender age by little and little with vice, then, a[7] God's name, to be punished when they commit the same faults after being come to man's state which from their youth they were ever like to do: in this point, I pray you, what other thing do you than make thieves and then punish them?'

"Now as I was thus speaking, the lawyer began to make himself ready to answer and was determined with himself to use the common fashion and trade of disputers, which be more diligent in rehearsing than answering, as thinking the memory worthy of the chief praise. 'Indeed sir,' said he, 'you have said well, being but a stranger, and one that might rather hear something of these matters than have any exact or perfect knowledge of the same, as I will incontinent by open proof make manifest and plain. For first I will rehearse in order all that you have said; then I will declare wherein you be deceived through lack of knowledge in all our fashions, manners and customs; and last of all I will answer your arguments and confute them every one. First, therefore, I will begin where I promised. Four things you seemed to me—' 'Hold your peace,' said the Cardinal, 'for it appears that you will make no short answer which make such a beginning. Wherefore, at this time you shall not take the pains to make your answer, but keep it to your next meeting, which I would be right glad that it might be even tomorrow next, unless either you or Master Raphael have any earnest let.[8] But now, Master Raphael, I would very gladly hear of you why you think theft not worthy to be punished with death, or what other punishment you can devise more expedient to the weal public, for I am sure you are not of that mind that you would have theft escape unpunished. For if now the extreme punishment of death cannot cause them to leave stealing, then if ruffians and robbers should be sure of their lives, what violence, what fear were able to hold their hands from robbing which would take the mitigation of the punishment as a very provocation to the mischief?'

"'Surely, my lord,' said I, 'I think it not right nor justice that the loss of the money should cause the loss of man's life. For my opinion is that all the goods in the world are not able to countervail man's life. But if they would thus say that the breaking of justice and the transgression of the laws is recompensed with this punishment, and

[1] queans prostitutes.
[2] stews brothels (associated with bath houses).
[3] tables gaming tables, especially backgammon.
[4] quoits an iron or rope ring, thrown at a stick (similar to horseshoes).
[5] up-render surrender.
[6] engross to buy up wholesale.
[7] a in.
[8] earnest let serious hindrance or impediment.

not the loss of the money, then why may not this extreme and rigorous justice well be called plain injury? For so cruel governance, so strait[1] rules and unmerciful laws be not allowable that if a small offence be committed, by and by the sword should be drawn. Nor so stoical ordinances are to be born withal as to count all offenses of such equality[2] that the killing of a man or the taking of his money from him were both a matter, and the one no more heinous offence than the other, between the which two, if we have any respect to equity, no similitude or equality consists. God commands us that we shall not kill. And be we then so hasty to kill a man for taking a little money? And if any man would understand killing by this commandment of God to be forbidden after no larger wise than man's constitutions define[3] killing to be lawful, then why may it not likewise by man's constitutions be determined after what sort whoredom, fornication, and perjury may be lawful? For whereas by the permission of God no man has power to kill neither himself nor any other man, then if a law made by the consent of men concerning slaughter of men ought to be of such strength, force, and virtue, that they—which contrary to the commandment of God have killed those whom this constitution of man commanded to be killed—be clean quit and exempt out of the bonds and danger of God's commandment, shall it not then by this reason follow that the power of God's commandment shall extend no further than man's law does define and permit? And so shall it come to pass that in like manner man's constitutions in all things shall determine how far the observation of all God's commandments shall extend. To be short, Moses' law, though it were ungentle and sharp, as a law that was given to bondmen, yea, and them very obstinate, stubborn, and stiff-necked, yet it punished theft by the purse and not with death.[4] And let us not think that God, in the new law of clemency and mercy under the which he rules us with fatherly gentleness as his dear children, has given us greater scope and license to the execution of cruelty one upon another. Now you have heard the reasons whereby I am persuaded that this punishment is unlawful. Furthermore, I think there is nobody that knows not how unreasonable, yea, how pernicious a thing it is to the weal public that a thief and an homicide or murderer should suffer equal and like punishment. For the thief, seeing that man that is condemned for theft in no less jeopardy nor judged to no less punishment than him that is convicted of manslaughter, through this cogitation[5] only he is strongly and forcibly provoked and in a manner constrained to kill him whom else he would have but robbed. For the murder being once done, he is in less fear and in more hope that the deed shall not be bewrayed[6] or known, seeing the party is now dead and rid out of the way which only might have uttered and disclosed it. But if he chance to be taken and descrived,[7] yet he is in no more danger and jeopardy than if he had committed but single felony. Therefore while we go about with such cruelty to make thieves afraid, we provoke them to kill good men.

"'Now as touching this question what punishment were more commodious and better, that truly in my judgement is easier to be found than what punishment might be worse. For why should we doubt that to be a good and a profitable way for the punishment of offenders which we know did in times past so long please the Romans, men in the administration of a weal public most expert, politic, and cunning? Such as among them were convicted of great and heinous trespasses, them they condemned into stone quarries, and into mines to dig metal, there to be kept in chains all the days of their life. But as concerning this matter, I allow the ordinance of no nation so well as that which I saw, while I travelled abroad about [1] strait strict.

[2] stoical ordinances … such equality The Stoic assertion that all crimes were equal was mocked by Cicero.

[3] after no larger wise than man's constitutions define i.e., after no better manner or understanding than humankind's laws.

[4] Moses' law … not with death See the opening verses of Exodus 22.

[5] cogitation thought, consideration.

[6] bewrayed betrayed, exposed.

[7] descrived discovered.

the world, used in Persia among the people that commonly be called the Polylerites,[1] whose land is both large and ample and also well and wittily governed, and the people in all conditions free and ruled by their own laws, saving that they pay a yearly tribute to the great king of Persia. But because they be far from the sea, compassed and enclosed almost round about with high mountains, and do content themselves with the fruits of their own land, which is of itself very fertile and fruitful, for this cause neither they go to other countries nor other come to them. And according to the old custom of the land, they desire not to enlarge the bounds of their dominions, and those that they have by reason of the high hills be easily defended, and the tribute which they pay to their chief lord and king sets them quiet and free from warfare. Thus their life is commodious rather than gallant,[2] and may better be called happy or wealthy than notable or famous. For they be not known as much as by name, I suppose, saving only to their next neighbours and borders. They that in this land be attainted[3] and convicted of felony make restitution of that which they stole to the right owner and not (as they do in other lands) to the king, whom they think to have no more right to the thief-stolen thing than the thief himself has. But if the thing be lost or made away, then the value of it is paid of the goods of such offenders, which else remain all whole to their wives and children. And they themselves be condemned to be common labourers and, unless the theft be very heinous, they be neither locked in prison nor fettered in gyves,[4] but be untied and go at large, labouring in the common works. They that refuse labour or go slowly and slackly to their work be not only tied in chains, but also pricked forward with stripes.[5] But being diligent about their work, they live without check or rebuke. Every night they be called in by name and be locked in their chambers. Beside their daily labour, their life is nothing hard or incommodious. Their fare is indifferent good, borne at the charges of the weal public because they be common servants to the commonwealth. But their charges in all places of the land is not borne alike, for in some parts that which is bestowed upon them is gathered of alms.[6] And though that way be uncertain, yet the people be so full of mercy and pity that none is found more profitable or plentiful. In some places certain lands be appointed hereunto of the revenues whereof they be maintained, and in some places every man gives a certain tribute for the same use and purpose. Again in some parts of the land these servingmen (for so be these damned persons called) do no common work, but as every private man needs labourers, so he comes into the market place and there hires some of them for meat and drink and a certain limited wages by the day, somewhat cheaper than he should hire a free man. It is also lawful for them to chastise the sloth of these serving men with stripes. By this means they never lack work and, besides the gaining of their meat and drink, every one of them brings daily something into the common treasury. All and every one of them be apparelled in one colour. Their heads be not polled or shaven, but rounded a little above the ears, and the tip of the one ear is cut off. Every one of them may take meat and drink of their friends, and also a coat of their own colour, but to receive money is death, as well to the giver as to the receiver. And no less jeopardy it is for a free man to receive money of a servingman for any manner of cause, and likewise for servingmen to touch weapons. The servingmen of every several shire be distinct and known from other by their several and distinct badges, which to cast away is death, as it is also to be seen out of the precinct of their own shire or to talk with a servingman of another shire. And it is no less danger to them for to intend to run away than to do it indeed. Yea and to conceal such an enterprise in a

---

1 Polylerites a fictional people; the name comes from the Greek, "much nonsense."

2 commodious rather than gallant convenient, serviceable rather than showy.

3 attainted accused.

4 gyves shackles.

5 stripes lashes (of the whip).

6 gathered of alms a gift of charity.

servingman it is death, in a free man servitude. Of the contrary part, to him that opens[1] and utters such counsels be decreed large gifts: to a free man a great sum of money, to a servingman freedom, and to them both forgiveness and pardon of that they were of counsel in that pretence. So that it can never be so good for them to go forward in their evil purpose as by repentance to turn back. This is the law and order in this behalf, as I have showed you. Wherein what humanity is used, how far it is from cruelty, and how commodious it is, you do plainly perceive. Forasmuch as the end of their wrath and punishment intends nothing else but the destruction of vices and saving of men, with so using and ordering them that they cannot choose but be good, and what harm soever they did before, in the residue of their life to make amends for the same. Moreover it is so little feared that they should turn again to their vicious conditions that wayfaring[2] men will for their safeguard choose them to their guides before any other, in every shire changing and taking new. For if they would commit robbery, they have nothing about them meet for that purpose. They may touch no weapons; money found about them should betray the robbery. They should be no sooner taken with the manner, but forthwith they should be punished. Neither they can have any hope at all to escape away by flying, for how should a man that in no part of his apparel is like other men fly privily[3] and unknown, unless he would run away naked? Howbeit, so also flying he should be descrived by the rounding of his head and his ear mark. But it is a thing to be doubted that they will lay their heads together and conspire against the weal public. No, no, I warrant you. For the servingmen of one shire alone could never hope to bring to pass such an enterprise without soliciting, enticing, and alluring the servingmen of many other shires to take their parts, which thing is to them so impossible that they may not as much as speak or talk together or salute one another. No, it is not to be thought that they would make their own countrymen and companions of their counsel[4] in such a matter, which they know well should be jeopardy to the counsellor thereof and great commodity and goodness to the opener and detector of the same. Whereas on the other part, there is none of them all hopeless or in despair to recover again his former state of freedom by humble obedience, by patient suffering, and by giving good tokens[5] and likelihood of himself that he will ever after that live like a true and an honest man. For every year divers of them be restored to their freedom through the commendation of their patience.'

"When I had thus spoken, saying moreover that I could see no cause why this order might not be had in England with much more profit than the justice which the lawyer so highly praised, 'Nay,' said the lawyer, 'this could never be so established in England but that it must needs bring the weal public into great jeopardy and hazard.' And as he was thus saying, he shook his head and made a wry mouth and so he held his peace. And all that were there present with one assent agreed to his saying. 'Well,' said the Cardinal, 'yet it were hard to judge without a proof whether this order would do well here or not. But when the sentence of death is given, if then the king should command execution to be deferred and spared, and would prove this order and fashion, taking away the privileges of all sanctuaries, if then the proof should declare the thing to be good and profitable, then it were well done that it were established, else the condemned and reprieved persons may as well and as justly be put to death after this proof as when they were first cast. Neither any jeopardy can in the mean space grow hereof. Yea, and me thinks that these vagabonds may very well be ordered after the same fashion, against whom we have hitherto made so many laws and so little prevailed.' When the Cardinal had thus said, then every man gave great praise to my sayings, which a little before [1] opens announces.

[2] wayfaring travelling.
[3] privily privately.
[4] make their own … counsel i.e., make their opinions or advice known to their countrymen.
[5] tokens signs.

they had disallowed. But most of all was esteemed that which was spoken of vagabonds, because it was the Cardinal's own addition. I cannot tell whether it were best to rehearse the communication that followed, for it was not very sad.[1] But yet you shall hear it, for there was no evil in it, and partly it pertained to the matter before said.

"There chanced to stand by a certain jesting parasite,[2] or scoffer, which would seem to resemble and counterfeit the fool. But he did in such wise counterfeit that he was almost the very same indeed that he laboured to represent; he so studied with words and sayings brought forth so out of time and place to make sport and move laughter that he himself was oftener laughed at than his jests were. Yet the foolish fellow brought out now and then such indifferent and reasonable stuff that he made the proverb true which says, he that shoots oft at the last shall hit the mark. So that when one of the company said that through my communication a good order was found for thieves, and that the Cardinal also had well provided for vagabonds, so that only remained some good provision to be made for them that through sickness and age were fallen into poverty and were become so impotent and unwieldy that they were not able to work for their living, 'Tush,' said he, 'let me alone with them. You shall see me do well enough with them. For I had rather than any good, that this kind of people were driven somewhere out of my sight, they have so sore troubled me many times and often, when they have with their lamentable tears begged money of me, and yet they could never to my mind so tune their song that thereby they never got of me one farthing. For ever more the one of these two chanced: either that I would not, or else that I could not, because I had it not. Therefore now they be waxed[3] wise. For when they see me go by, because they will not leese their labour,[4] they let me pass and say not one word to me. So they look for nothing of me, no in good sooth, no more than if I were a priest or a monk. But I will make a law that all these beggars shall be distributed and bestowed into houses of religion. The men shall be made lay brethren, as they call them, and the women nuns.' Hereat the Cardinal smiled and allowed it in jest, yea, and all the residue in good earnest. But a certain friar graduate in divinity[5] took such pleasure and delight in this jest of priests and monks that he also, being else a man of grisly[6] and stern gravity, began merrily and wantonly to jest and taunt. 'Nay,' said he, 'you shall not so be rid and dispatched of beggars unless you make some provision also for us friars.' 'Why,' said the jester, 'that is done already, for my lord himself set a very good order for you when he decreed that vagabonds should be kept straight and set to work, for you be the greatest and veriest vagabonds that be.' This jest also, when they saw the Cardinal not disprove it, every man took it gladly, saving only the friar, for he (and that no marvel) being thus touched on the quick and hit on the gall,[7] so fret, so fumed, and chafed at it, and was in such a rage that he could not refrain himself from chiding, scolding, railing, and reviling. He called the fellow ribald, villain, javel,[8] backbiter, slanderer, and the child of perdition, citing therewith terrible threatenings out of Holy Scripture. Then the jesting scoffer began to play the scoffer indeed, and verily he was good at it, for he could play a part in that play, no man better. 'Patient yourself, good master friar,' said he, 'and be not angry, for scripture says, in your patience you shall save your souls.'[9] Then the friar (for I will rehearse his own very words), 'No gallow's wretch, I am not angry,' said he, 'or at the least wise, I do not sin, for the psalmist says, be you angry, and sin not.'[10] Then the Cardinal spoke gently to the friar and

1 sad serious.

2 parasite one who lives off others.

3 waxed grown.

4 leese their labour lose or waste their time.

5 graduate in divinity being a university graduate in theology.

6 grisly grim, gray.

7 touched on the quick and hit on the gall touched on a sensitive or sore point; irritated.

8 javel worthless fellow.

9 in your patience … souls Luke 21:19.

10 be you angry, and sin not Psalm 4:4.

desired him to quiet himself. 'No my lord,' said he, 'I speak not but of a good zeal as I ought, for holy men had a good zeal. Wherefore it is said, the zeal of thy house has eaten me.[1] And it is sung in the church, The scorners of Elisha, while he went up into the house of God, felt the zeal of the bald,[2] as peradventure this scorning villain ribald shall feel.' 'You do it,' said the Cardinal, 'perchance of a good mind and affection, but me thinks you should do—I cannot tell whether more holily, certes[3] more wisely—if you would not set your wit to a fool's wit and with a fool take in hand a foolish contention.' 'No, forsooth, my lord,' said he, 'I should not do more wisely. For Solomon the wise says, Answer a fool accordingly to his folly,[4] like as I do now, and do show him the pit that he shall fall into if he take not heed. For if many scorners of Elisha, which was but one bald man, felt the zeal of the bald, how much more shall one scorner of many friars feel, among whom be many bald men? And we have also the pope's bulls, whereby all that mock and scorn us be excommunicated, suspended, and accursed.' The Cardinal, seeing that no end would be made, sent away the jester by a privy beck[5] and turned the communication to another matter. Shortly after, when he was risen from the table, he went to hear his suitors and so dismissed us.

"Look, Master More, with how long and tedious a tale I have kept you, which surely I would have been ashamed to have done but that you so earnestly desired me and did after such a sort give ear unto it as though you would not that any parcel of that communication should be left out. Which, though I have done somewhat briefly, yet could I not choose but rehearse it for the judgement of them which, when they had improved and disallowed my sayings, yet incontinent, hearing the Cardinal allow them, did themselves also approve the same: so impudently flattering him that they were nothing ashamed to admit, yea, almost in good earnest, his jester's foolish inventions, because that he himself by smiling at them did seem not to disprove them. So that hereby you may right well perceive how little the courtiers would regard and esteem me and my sayings."

"I ensure you, Master Raphael," said I, "I took great delectation in hearing you. All things that you said were spoken so wittily and so pleasantly. And me thought myself to be in the meantime not only at home in my country, but also through the pleasant remembrance of the Cardinal, in whose house I was brought up of a child, to wax a child again. And, friend Raphael, though I did bear very great love towards you before, yet seeing you do so earnestly favour this man, you will not believe how much my love towards you is now increased. But yet, all this notwithstanding, I can by no means change my mind, but that I must needs believe that you, if you be disposed and can find in your heart to follow some prince's court, shall with your good counsels greatly help and further the commonwealth. Wherefore there is nothing more appertaining to your duty, that is to say to the duty of a good man. For whereas your Plato judges that weal publics shall by this means attain perfect felicity, either if philosophers be kings, or else if kings give themselves to the study of philosophy,[6] how far, I pray you, shall commonwealths then be from this felicity if philosophers will vouchsafe to entrust kings with their good counsel?"

"They be not so unkind," said he, "but they would gladly do it; yea, many have done it already in books that they have put forth, if kings and princes would be willing and ready to follow good counsel. But Plato doubtless did well foresee, unless kings themselves would apply their minds to the study of philosophy, that else they would never thoroughly allow the counsel of philosophers, being themselves before, even from their

---

[1] the zeal of thy house has eaten me Psalm 69:9.

[2] The scorners … of the bald See 2 Kings 2:23-4. Elisha curses children who are mocking his baldness, and two she-bears tear apart forty-two of the boys.

[3] certes certainly.

[4] Answer a fool according to his folly Proverbs 26:5; but see 26:4: "Answer not a fool according to his folly, lest you be like him."

[5] beck gesture.

[6] your Plato judges … study of philosophy in Plato's Republic.

tender age, infected and corrupt with perverse and evil opinions. Which thing Plato himself proved true in King Dionysius.[1] If I should propose to any king wholesome decrees, doing my endeavour to pluck out of his mind the pernicious original causes of vice and naughtiness, think you not that I should forthwith either be driven away or else made a laughingstock? Well suppose I were with the French King[2] and there sitting in his counsel while in the most secret consultation, the King himself there being present in his own person, they beat their brains and searched the very bottoms of their wits to discuss by what craft and means the king may still keep Milan and draw to him again fugitive Naples; and then how to conquer the Venetians, and how to bring under his jurisdiction all Italy; then how to win the dominion of Flanders, Brabant, and of all Burgundy,[3] with divers other lands whose kingdoms he has long ago in mind and purpose invaded. Here, while one counsels to conclude a league of peace with the Venetians, so long to endure as shall be thought meet and expedient for their purpose, and to make them also of their counsel, yea, and besides that to give them part of the prey, which afterward, when they have brought their purpose about after their own minds, they may require and claim again, another thinks best to hire the Germans. Another would have the favour of the Swissers[4] won with money. Another's advice is to appease the puissant power of the Emperor's Majesty with gold, as with a most pleasant and acceptable sacrifice. Whilst another gives counsel to make peace with the King of Aragon and to restore unto him his own kingdom of Navarre as a full assurance of peace. Another comes in with his five eggs[5] and advises to hook in the King of Castile with some hope of affinity or alliance and to bring to their part certain peers of his court for great pensions. Whilst they all stay at the chiefest doubt of all, what to do in the meantime with England, and yet agree all in this to make peace with the Englishmen and with most sure and strong bands to bind that weak and feeble friendship so that they must be called friends and had in suspicion as enemies. And that therefore the Scots must be had in a readiness, as it were in a standing, ready at all occasions, in aunters the Englishmen should stir never so little, incontinent to set upon them.[6] And moreover privily and secretly (for openly it may not be done by the truce that is taken), privily, therefore, I say to make much of some peer of England that is banished his country, which must claim title to the crown of his realm and affirm himself just inheritor thereof, that by this subtle means they may hold to them the King, in whom else they have but small trust and affiance.[7] Here, I say, where so great and high matters be in consultation, where so many noble and wise men counsel their King only to war, here if I, silly man, should rise up and will them to turn over the leaf and learn a new lesson, saying that my counsel is not to meddle with Italy, but to tarry still at home, and that the kingdom of France alone is almost greater than that it may well be governed of one man, so that the King should not need to study how to get more. And then should propose unto them the decrees of the people that be called the Achorians,[8] which be situate over against the island of Utopia on the southeast side. These Achorians once made war in their King's quarrel for to get him another kingdom which he laid claim unto and advanced himself right inheritance to the crown thereof by the title of an old

[1] Plato himself … Dionysius Plato could not turn Dionysius, the younger from his tyrannous ways.

[2] the French king In 1515, this was Francis I, but on Hythloday's visit, it would have been either Charles VIII or Louis XII. All were imperialists, and Hythloday's subsequent discourse touches on France's imperialist policies.

[3] areas of Belgium, the Netherlands, and France.

[4] Swissers The Swiss were considered the best mercenary soldiers.

[5] with his five eggs a saying which means "to break in with an idle or foolish story."

[6] in aunters … set upon them "in aunters" means "in case"; this refers to the Scots as the traditional enemies of England and allies of France.

[7] affiance confidence.

[8] Achorians from Greek, "people without a place or country."

alliance. At the last when they had gotten it and saw that they had even as much vexation and trouble in keeping it as they had in getting it, and that either their new-conquered subjects by sundry occasions were making daily insurrections to rebel against them or else that other countries were continually with divers inroads and foragings invading them, so that they were ever fighting either for them or against them and never could break up their camps; seeing themselves in the mean season palled[1] and impoverished, their money carried out of the realm, their own men killed to maintain the glory of another nation when they had no war, peace nothing better than war by reason that their people in war had so inured themselves to corrupt and wicked manners that they had taken a delight and pleasure in robbing and stealing, that through manslaughter they had gathered[2] boldness to mischief, that their laws were had in contempt, and nothing set by or regarded, that their King being troubled with the charge and governance of two kingdoms could not nor was not able perfectly to discharge his office towards them both; seeing again that all these evils and troubles were endless, at the last laid their heads together and like faithful and loving subjects gave to their King free choice and liberty to keep still the one of these two kingdoms whether he would, alleging that he was not able to keep both and that they were more than might well be governed of half a king, forasmuch as no man would be content to take him for his muleteer,[3] that keeps another man's mules besides his. So this good Prince was constrained to be content with his old kingdom and to give over the new to one of his friends, who shortly after was violently driven out. Furthermore, if I should declare unto them that all this busy preparence to[4] war, whereby so many nations for his sake should be brought into a troublesome hurly-burly when all his coffers[5] were emptied, his treasures wasted, and his people destroyed, should at the length through some mischance be in vain and to none effect, and that, therefore, it were best for him to content himself with his own kingdom of France as his forefathers and predecessors did before him, to make much of it, to enrich it, and to make it as flourishing as he could, to endeavour himself to love his subjects and again to be beloved of them, willingly to live with them, peaceably to govern them, and with other kingdoms not to meddle, saying that which he has already is even enough for him, yea, and more than he can well turn him to, this mine advice, Master More, how think you it would be heard and taken?"

"So God help me not very thankfully," said I.

"Well let us proceed then," said he. "Suppose that some king and his council were together whetting their wits and devising what subtle craft they might invent to enrich the king with great treasures of money. First one counsels to raise and enhance the valuation of money when the king must pay any, and again to call down[6] the value of coin to less [than] it is worth when he must receive or gather any, for thus great sums shall be paid with a little money and where little is due much shall be received. Another counsels to feign war that, when under this colour and pretence the king has gathered great abundance of money, he may, when it shall please him, make peace with great solemnity and holy ceremonies to blind the eyes of the poor commonality, as taking pity and compassion forsooth upon man's blood like a loving and a merciful prince. Another puts the king in remembrance of certain old and moth-eaten laws that of long time have not been put in execution, which because no man can remember that they were made, every man has transgressed. The fines of these laws he counsels the king to require, for there is no way so profitable, nor more honourable, as that which has a hue and colour of justice. Another advises him to forbid many things under great penalties and fines, especially such things as is for the people's profit not be used, and

[1] palled enfeebled; this word might be "pilled" (robbed).
[2] gathered joined.
[3] muleteer mule-driver.
[4] preparence to preparation for.
[5] coffers treasuries.
[6] call down lower.

afterward to dispense for money with them, which by this prohibition sustain loss and damage, for by this means the favour of the people is won and profit rises two ways: first by taking forfeits[1] of them whom covetousness of gains has brought in danger of this statute, and also by selling privileges and licenses, which the better that the prince is, forsooth, the dearer he sells them, as one that is loath to grant to any private person anything that is against the profit of his people, and therefore may sell none but at an exceeding dear price. Another gives the king counsel to endanger unto[2] his grace the judges of the realm, that he may have them ever on his side and that they may in every matter dispute and reason for the king's right. Yea, and further to call them into his palace and to require them there to argue and discuss his matters in his own presence. So there shall be no matter of his so openly wrong and unjust wherein one or other of them, either because he will have something to allege and object or that he is ashamed to say that which is said already, or else to pick a thank[3] with his prince, will not find some hole open to set a snare in wherewith to take the contrary part in a trip. Thus whilst the judges cannot agree amongst themselves, reasoning and arguing of that which is plain enough and bringing the manifest truth in doubt, in the mean season the king may take a fit occasion to understand the law as shall most make for his advantage, whereunto all other for shame or for fear will agree. Then the judges may be bold to pronounce on the king's side, for he that gives sentence for the king cannot be without a good excuse. For it shall be sufficient for him to have equity on his part, or the bare words of the law, or a writhen and wrested[4] understanding of the same (or else, which with good and just judges is of greater force than all laws be) the king's indisputable prerogative. To conclude, all the counsellors agree and consent together with the rich Crassus that no abundance of gold can be sufficient for a prince which must keep and maintain an army;[5] furthermore, that a king, though he would, can do nothing unjustly, for all that all men have, yea, also the men themselves be all his, and that every man has so much of his own as the king's gentleness has not taken from him. And that it shall be most for the king's advantage that his subjects have very little or nothing in their possession as whose safeguard does herein consist, that his people do not wax wanton and wealthy through riches and liberty, because where these things be, there men be not wont patiently to obey hard, unjust, and unlawful commandments. Whereas on the other part, need and poverty do hold down and keep under stout courages and make them patient perforce, taking from them bold and rebelling stomachs. Here again if I should rise up and boldly affirm that all these counsels be to the king dishonour and reproach, whose honour and safety is more and rather supported and upholden by the wealth and riches of his people than by his own treasures, and if I should declare that the commonality chooses their king for their own sake and not for his sake, to the intent that through his labour and study they might all live wealthily, safe from wrongs and injuries, and that therefore the king ought to take more care for the wealth of his people than for his own wealth, even as the office and duty of a shepherd is, in that he is a shepherd, to feed his sheep rather than himself.

"For as touching this, that they think the defence and maintenance of peace to consist in the poverty of the people, the thing itself shows that they be far out of the way.[6] For where shall a man find more wrangling, quarrelling, brawling, and chiding than among beggars? Who be more desirous of new mutations and alterations than they that be not content with the present state of their life? Or finally who be bolder stomached to bring all in a hurly-burly (thereby trusting to get some windfall) than they that have now nothing to lose? And if any [1] forfeits fines.

[2] to endanger unto to subject to the absolute control of.

[3] pick a thank curry favour.

[4] writhen and wrested twisted, distorted.

[5] the rich Crassus … maintain an army Crassus, Pompey, and Caesar formed the First Triumvirate (60 BCE).

[6] they be far out of the way i.e., they misunderstand the situation.

king were so smally regarded and so lightly esteemed, yea, so behated[1] of his subjects that other ways he could not keep them in awe, but only by open wrongs, by polling and shaving, and by bringing them to beggary, surely it were better for him to forsake his kingdom than to hold it by this means, whereby though the name of king be kept, yet the majesty is lost. For it is against the dignity of a king to have rule over beggars, but rather over rich and wealthy men. Of this mind was the hardy and courageous Fabricius, when he said that he had rather be a ruler of rich men than be rich himself.[2] And, verily, one man to live in pleasure and wealth whiles all other weep and smart for it, that is the part not of a king but of a jailor. To be short, as he is a foolish physician that cannot cure his patient's disease unless he cast him in another sickness, so he that cannot amend the lives of his subjects but by taking from them the wealth and commodity of life, he must needs grant that he knows not the feat how to govern men. But let him rather amend his own life, renounce unhonest pleasures, and forsake pride, for these be the chief vices that cause him to run in the contempt or hatred of his people. Let him live of his own, hurting no man. Let him do cost[3] not above his power. Let him restrain wickedness. Let him prevent vices and take away the occasions of offences by well ordering his subjects and not by suffering wickedness to increase afterward to be punished. Let him not be too hasty in calling again laws which a custom has abrogated, specially such as has been long forgotten and never lacked nor needed. And let him never under the cloak and pretence of transgression take such fines and forfeits as no judge will suffer a private person to take as unjust and full of guile.

"Here if I should bring forth before them the law of the Macarians,[4] which be not far distant from Utopia, whose king, the day of his coronation, is bound by a solemn oath that he shall never at any time have in his treasure above a thousand pounds of gold or silver. They say a very good king, which took more care for the wealth and commodity of his country than for the enriching of himself, made this law to be a stop and a bar to kings from heaping and hoarding up so much money as might impoverish their people. For he foresaw that this sum of treasure would suffice to support the king in battle against his own people, if they should chance to rebel, and also to maintain his wars against the invasions of his foreign enemies. Again he perceived the same stock of money to be too little and insufficient to encourage and enable him wrongfully to take away other men's goods, which was the chief cause why the law was made. Another cause was this: he thought that by this provision his people should not lack money wherewith to maintain their daily occupying and chaffer. And seeing the king could not choose but lay out and bestow all that came in above the prescript[5] sum of his stock, he thought he would seek no occasions to do his subjects injury. Such a king shall be feared of evil men and loved of good men. These, and such other informations, if I should use among men wholly inclined and given to the contrary part, how deaf hearers think you should I have?"

"Deaf hearers, doubtless," said I, "and in good faith no marvel. And to be plain with you, truly I cannot allow that such communication shall be used or such counsel given as you be sure shall never be regarded nor received. For how can so strange informations be profitable or how can they be beaten into their heads, whose minds be already prevented with clean contrary persuasions? This school philosophy[6] is not unpleasant among friends in familiar communication, but in the councils of kings, where great matters be

---

1 behated hated.

2 Fabricius ... rich himself See Plutarch's Moralia. Gaius Fabricius Luscinus participated in the wars against Pyrrhus, king of Epirus. Plutarch states that Fabricius's colleague, M. Curius Dentatus, actually made this remark.

3 do cost expend.

4 Macarians from Greek, "happy" or "blessed."

5 prescript prescribed, fixed.

6 school philosophy scholastic philosophy; theoretical or intellectual rather than practical or specific. This is a common humanist complaint about scholasticism.

debated and reasoned with great authority, these things have no place."

"That is it which I meant," said he, "when I said philosophy had no place among kings."

"Indeed," said I, "this school philosophy has not, which thinks all things meet for every place. But there is another philosophy more civil which knows, as ye would say, her own stage, and thereafter ordering and behaving herself in the play that she has in hand, plays her part accordingly with comeliness, uttering nothing out of due order and fashion. And this is the philosophy that you must use. Or else, whiles a comedy of Plautus is playing and the vile bondmen scoffing and trifling among themselves, if you should suddenly come upon the stage in a philosopher's apparel and rehearse out of Octavia the place wherein Seneca disputes with Nero,[1] had it not been better for you to have played the dumb person than by rehearsing that which served neither for the time nor place to have made such a tragical comedy or gallimaufry?[2] For by bringing in other stuff that nothing appertains to the present matter, you must needs mar and pervert the play that is in hand, though the stuff that you bring be much better. What part soever you have taken upon you, play that as well as you can and make the best of it, and do not, therefore, disturb and bring out of order the whole matter because that another which is merrier and better comes to your remembrance. So the case stands in a commonwealth, and so it is in the consultations of kings and princes. If evil opinions and naughty[3] persuasions cannot be utterly and quite plucked out of their hearts, if you cannot even as you would remedy vices which use and custom has confirmed, yet for this cause you must not leave and forsake the commonwealth; you must not forsake the ship in a tempest because you cannot rule and keep down the winds. No, nor you must not labour to drive into their heads new and strange informations which you know well shall be nothing regarded with them that be of clean contrary minds. But you must with a crafty wile and a subtle train study and endeavour yourself, as much as in you lies, to handle the matter wittily and handsomely for the purpose, and that which you cannot turn to good, so to order it that it be not very bad. For it is not possible for all things to be well unless all men were good, which I think will not be yet these good many years."

"By this means," said he, "nothing else will be brought to pass, but while that I go about to remedy the madness of others, I should be even as mad as they. For if I would speak things that be true I must needs speak such things, but as for to speak false things, whether that be a philosopher's part or no I cannot tell; truly it is not my part. Howbeit, this communication of mine, though peradventure it may seem unpleasant to them, yet can I not see why it should seem strange or foolishly newfangled. If so be that I should speak those things that Plato feigns in his weal public,[4] or that the Utopians do in theirs, these things though they were (as they be indeed) better, yet they might seem spoken out of place. Forasmuch as here amongst us every man has his possessions several to himself, and there all things be common. But what was in my communication contained that might not and ought not in any place to be spoken? Saving that to them which have thoroughly decreed and determined with themselves to run headlong the contrary way it cannot be acceptable and pleasant, because it calls them back and shows them the jeopardies. Verily, if all things that evil and vicious manners have caused to seem inconvenient and naught should be refused as things unmeet and reproachful, then we must among Christian people wink at the most part of all those things which Christ taught us, and so straitly forbade them to be winked at, that those things also which He whispered in the ears of His disciples He commanded to be proclaimed in [1] whiles a comedy of Plautus … Nero This passage comments on the importance of decorum. Plautus's comedies often involve "low" humour and characters, and would be unsuitable to mix with the serious tragedy Octavia.

[2] gallimaufry confused jumble.

[3] naughty wicked.

[4] feigns in his weal public invents or represents in his Republic.

open houses. And yet the most part of them is more dissident[1] from the manners of the world nowadays than my communication was. But preachers, sly and wily men, following your counsel (as I suppose) because they saw men evil willing[2] to frame their manners to Christ's rule, they have wrested and wried his doctrine and, like a rule of lead,[3] have applied it to men's manners that by some means at the least way they might agree together. Whereby I cannot see what good they have done, but that men may more sickerly[4] be evil. And I truly should prevail even as little in kings' councils, for either I must say otherways than they say, and then I were as good to say nothing, or else I must say the same that they say, and (as Mitio says in Terence)[5] help to further their madness. For that crafty wile and subtle train[6] of yours, I cannot perceive to what purpose it serves, wherewith you would have me to study and endeavour myself, if all things cannot be made good, yet to handle them wittily and handsomely for the purpose, that as far forth as is possible they may not be very evil, for there is no place to dissemble in nor to wink in.[7] Naughty counsels must be openly allowed and very pestilent decrees must be approved. He shall be counted worse than a spy, yea, almost as evil as a traitor that with a faint heart does praise evil and noisome[8] decrees. Moreover a man can have no occasion to do good, chancing into the company of them which will sooner pervert a good man than be made good themselves, through whose evil company he shall be marred, or else, if he remain good and innocent, yet the wickedness and folly of others shall be imputed to him and laid in his neck.[9] So that it is impossible with that crafty wile and subtle train to turn anything to better. Wherefore Plato by a goodly similitude declares why wise men refrain to meddle in the commonwealth, for when they see the people swarm into the streets and daily wet to the skin with rain, and yet cannot persuade them to go out of the rain and to take their houses, knowing well that if they should go out to them, they should nothing prevail nor win ought by it, but with them be wet also in the rain, they do keep themselves within their houses, being content that they be safe themselves seeing they cannot remedy the folly of the people.[10] Howbeit doubtless, Master More (to speak truly as my mind gives me), where possessions be private, where money bears all the stroke,[11] it is hard and almost impossible that there the weal public may justly be governed and prosperously flourish. Unless you think thus that justice is there executed where all things come into the hands of evil men, or that prosperity there flourishes where all is divided among a few, which few nevertheless do not lead their lives very wealthily,[12] and the residue live miserably, wretchedly and beggarly. Wherefore when I consider with myself and weigh in my mind the wise and godly ordinances of the Utopians, among whom with very few laws all things be so well and wealthily ordered that virtue is had in price and estimation, and yet, all things being there common, every man has abundance of everything. Again, on the other part, when I compare with them so many nations ever making new laws, yet none of them all well and sufficiently furnished with laws; where every man calls that [which] he has gotten his own proper and private goods; where so many new laws daily made be not sufficient for every man to enjoy, defend, and know from another man's that which he calls his own; which thing the infinite controversies in the law, daily rising, never to be ended, plainly declare to be true. These things (I say) when I consider with myself, I hold well with Plato and do nothing

---

1 dissident different.

2 evil willing not very willing.

3 like a rule of lead A measuring rod of lead was flexible.

4 sickerly surely, certainly.

5 as Mitio says in Terence Mitio (or Micio) is a character in Terence's comedy Adelphi (or The Brothers).

6 train scheme.

7 to wink in to pretend ignorance.

8 noisome harmful.

9 laid in his neck imputed or charged to him.

10 Plato by a goodly similitude … the people See Plato's Republic.

11 bears all the stroke rules, has authority.

12 wealthily including the meaning "happily" or "well."

marvel that he would make no laws for them that refused those laws whereby all men should have and enjoy equal portions of wealth and commodities. For the wise man did easily foresee this to be the one and only way to the wealth of a commonalty, if equality of all things should be brought in and established, which I think is not possible to be observed where every man's goods be proper and peculiar to himself. For where every man under certain titles and pretences draws and plucks to himself as much as he can so that a few divide among themselves all the whole riches, be there never so much abundance and store, there to the residue is left lack[1] and poverty. And for the most part it chances that this latter sort is more worthy to enjoy that state of wealth than the other be, because the rich men be covetous, crafty and unprofitable.[2] On the other part, the poor be lowly, simple, and by their daily labour more profitable to the commonwealth than to themselves. Thus I do fully persuade myself that no equal and just distribution of things can be made, nor that perfect wealth shall ever be among men, unless this propriety[3] be exiled and banished. For so long as it shall continue, so long shall remain among the most and best part of men the heavy and inevitable burden of poverty and wretchedness which, as I grant that it may be somewhat eased, so I utterly deny that it can wholly be taken away. For if there were a statute made that no man should possess above a certain measure of ground and that no man should have in his stock above a prescript and appointed sum of money, if it were by certain laws decreed that neither the king should be of too great power, neither the people too haughty and wealthy, and that offices should not be obtained by inordinate suit or by bribes and gifts, that they should neither be bought nor sold, nor that it should be needful for the officers to be at any cost or charge in their offices—for so occasion is given to them by fraud and ravin[4] to gather up their money again, and by reason of gifts and bribes the offices be given to rich men which should rather have been executed of[5] wise men—by such laws, I say, like as sick bodies that be desperate and past cure be wont with continual good cherishing to be kept and botched up[6] for a time, so these evils also might be lightened and mitigated. But that they may be perfectly cured and brought to a good and upright state, it is not to be hoped for whiles every man is master of his own to himself. Yea, and while you go about to do your cure of one part, you shall make bigger the sore of another part; so the help of one causes another's harm, forasmuch as nothing can be given to any one unless it be taken from another."

"But I am of a contrary opinion," said I, "for methinks that men shall never there live wealthily where all things be common. For how can there be abundance of goods, or of anything, where every man withdraws his hand from labour? Whom the regard of his own gains drives not to work, but the hope that he has in other men's travails[7] makes him slothful. Then when they be pricked with poverty and yet no man can by any law or right defend that for his own which he has gotten with the labour of his own hands, shall not there of necessity be continual sedition and bloodshed? Specially the authority and reverence of magistrates being taken away, which, what place it may have with such men among whom is no difference, I cannot devise."[8]

"I marvel not," said he, "that you be of this opinion. For you conceive in your mind either none at all or else a very false image and similitude of this thing. But if you had been with me in Utopia and had presently seen their fashions and laws, as I did, which lived there five years and more, and would never have come thence[9] but only to make that new land known here, then doubtless you would grant that you never saw people well ordered, but only there."

---

1 lack want.
2 unprofitable i.e., to the commonwealth.
3 propriety property, ownership.
4 ravin rapine or theft.
5 executed of performed by.
6 botched up patched, mended.
7 travails labours.
8 devise imagine, guess.
9 come thence come from there.

"Surely," said Master Peter, "it shall be hard for you to make me believe that there is better order in that new land than is here in these countries that we know. For good wits be as well here as there, and I think our commonwealths be ancienter than theirs, wherein long use and experience have found out many things commodious for man's life, besides that many things here among us have been found by chance which no wit could ever have devised."

"As touching the ancientness," said he, "of commonwealths, then you might better judge if you had read the histories and chronicles of that land, which, if we may believe, cities were there before men were here. Now what thing soever hitherto by wit has been devised or found by chance, that might be as well there as here. But I think, verily, though it were so that we did pass them in wit, yet in study, in travail, and in labboursome endeavour they far pass us. For (as their chronicles testify) before our arrival there, they never heard anything of us, whom they call the ultra-equinoctials,[1] saving that once about 1200 years ago a certain ship was lost by the isle of Utopia which was driven thither by tempest. Certain Romans and Egyptians were cast on land, which after that never went thence. Mark now what profit they took of this one occasion through diligence and earnest travail. There was no craft nor science within the empire of Rome whereof any profit could rise, but they either learned it of these strangers, or else of them taking occasion to search for it, found it out. So great profit was it to them that ever[2] any went thither from hence. But if any like chance before this has brought any man from thence hither, that is as quite out of remembrance as this also perchance in time to come shall be forgotten that ever I was there. And like as they quickly, almost at the first meeting, made their own whatsoever is among us wealthily devised, so I suppose it would be long before we would receive anything that among them is better instituted than among us. And this I suppose is the chief cause why their commonwealths be wiselier governed and do flourish in more wealth than ours, though we neither in wit nor riches be their inferiors."

"Therefore, gentle Master Raphael," said I, "I pray you and beseech you, describe unto us the island. And study not to be short, but declare largely in order their grounds, their rivers, their cities, their people, their manners, their ordinances, their laws, and, to be short, all things that you shall think us desirous to know. And you shall think us desirous to know whatsoever we know not yet."

"There is nothing," said he, "that I will do gladlier, for all these things I have fresh in mind. But the matter requires leisure."

"Let us go in therefore," said I, "to dinner. Afterward we will bestow the time at our pleasure."

"Content," said he, "be it."

So we went in and dined. When dinner was done, we came into the same place again and sat us down upon the same bench, commanding our servants that no man should trouble us. Then I and Master Peter Giles desired Master Raphael to perform his promise. He, therefore, seeing us desirous and willing to hearken to him, when he had sat still and paused a little while, musing and bethinking himself, thus he began to speak.

THE SECOND BOOK OF THE COMMUNICATION OF RAPHAEL HYTHLODAY, CONCERNING THE BEST STATE OF A COMMONWEALTH, CONTAINING THE DESCRIPTION OF UTOPIA, WITH A LARGE DECLARATION OF THE POLITIC GOVERNMENT AND OF ALL THE GOOD LAWS AND ORDERS OF THE SAME ISLAND.

The island of Utopia contains in breadth in the middle part of it (for there it is broadest) two hundred miles, which breadth continues through the most part of the land, saving that by little and little it comes in and waxes narrower towards both the ends, which fetching about a circuit or compass of five hundred miles, do fashion the whole island like to the new moon. Between these two corners the sea runs in, dividing them asunder by the distance of eleven miles or thereabouts, and there surmounts into a large and wide sea, which by reason that the land on every side compasses it about and shelters it from the winds, is not rough nor mounts not with great waves, but almost flows quietly, not much unlike a great standing pool, and makes well-nigh all the space within the belly of the land in manner of a haven, and to the great commodity of the inhabitants receives in ships towards every part of the land. The forefronts or frontiers of the two corners, what with fords and shelves[1] and what with rocks, be very jeopardous and dangerous. In the middle distance between them both stands up above the water a great rock, which therefore is nothing perilous because it is in sight. Upon the top of this rock is a fair and a strong tower built, which they hold with a garrison of men. Other rocks there be lying hid under the water, which therefore be dangerous. The channels be known only to themselves, and therefore it seldom chances that any stranger, unless he be guided by an Utopian, can come into this haven, insomuch that they themselves could scarcely enter without jeopardy, but that their way is directed and ruled by certain landmarks standing on the shore. By turning, translating,[2] and removing these marks into other places, they may destroy their enemies' navies, be they never so many. The outside or utter[3] circuit of the land is also full of havens, but the landing is so surely fenced, what by nature and what by workmanship of man's hand, that a few defenders may drive back many armies. Howbeit, as they say and as the fashion of the place itself does partly show, it was not ever compassed about with the sea. But King Utopus,[4] whose name as conqueror the island bears (for before his time it was called Abraxa),[5] which also brought the rude and wild people to that excellent perfection in all good fashions, humanity, and civil gentleness wherein they now go beyond all the people of the world, even at his first arriving and entering upon the land, forthwith obtaining the victory, caused fifteen miles space of uplandish[6] ground where the sea had no passage to be cut and dug up, and so brought the sea round about the land. He set to this work not only the inhabitants of the island (because they should not think it done in contumely[7] and despite) but also all his own soldiers. Thus the work being divided into so great a number of workmen was with exceeding marvellous speed dispatched, insomuch that the borderers, which at the first began to mock and to jest at this vain enterprise, then turned their derision to marvel at the success and to fear. There be in the island fifty-four large and fair cities or shire towns[8] agreeing all together in one tongue, in like manners, institutions, and laws. They be all set and situate alike and in all points fashioned alike, as far forth as the place or plot suffers.

[1] ultra-equinoctials beyond the equator.

[2] that ever whenever.

Of these cities, they that be nighest[9] together be twenty-four miles asunder. Again there is none of them distant from the next above one day's journey afoot. There comes yearly to Amaurot[10] out of every city three old men, wise and well experienced, there to entreat and debate of the common matters of the land. For this city (because it stands just in the midst of the island and is therefore most meet for the ambassadors of all parts of the realm) is taken for the chief and

[1] fords areas of shallow water; shelves ledges of rock.

[2] translating transferring, moving from place to place.

[3] utter outer.

[4] King Utopus The original Latin does not give Utopus the title of a king; he is referred to only by his name.

[5] Abraxa from Greek Abraxas, a name associated with the highest of the 365 heavens by the Gnostic Basilides (2nd century CE). The meaning of the name is unknown, though Gnostics consider the repetition of it as a type of charm.

[6] uplandish high or hilly.

[7] contumely reproach.

[8] fifty-four large and fair cities or shire towns including London, there were fifty-four counties in England. There are many parallels between the two countries.

[9] nighest nearest.

[10] Amaurot from Greek, "made dark or dim."

head city. The precincts and bounds of the shires be so commodiously appointed out and set forth for the cities that none of them all has of any side less than twenty miles of ground, and of some side also much more, as of that part where the cities be of farther distance asunder. None of the cities desire to enlarge the bounds and limits of their shires, for they count themselves rather the good husbands than the owners of their lands.

They have in the country, in all parts of the shire, houses or farms built, well appointed and furnished with all sorts of instruments and tools belonging to husbandry. These houses be inhabited of the citizens which come thither to dwell by course. No household or farm in the country has fewer than forty persons, men and women, besides two bondmen, which be all under the rule and order of the good man and the good wife of the house, being both very sage, discrete, and ancient[1] persons. And every thirty farms or families have one head ruler which is called a philarch,[2] being as it were a head bailiff.[3] Out of every one of these families or farms come every year into the city twenty persons which have continued two years before in the country. In their place so many fresh be sent thither out of the city who, of them that have been there a year already and be therefore expert and cunning[4] in husbandry, shall be instructed and taught. And they the next year shall teach other[s]. This order is used for fear that either scarceness of victuals or some other like incommodity should chance through lack of knowledge, if they should be altogether new and fresh and inexpert in husbandry. This manner and fashion of yearly changing and renewing the occupiers of husbandry, though it be solemn and customably used to the intent that no man shall be constrained against his will to continue long in that hard and sharp kind of life, yet many of them have such a pleasure and delight in husbandry that they obtain a longer space of years. These husbandmen plough and till the ground and breed up cattle and provide and make ready wood which they carry to the city either by land or by water, as they may most conveniently. They bring up a great multitude of pullen[5] and that by a marvellous policy, for the hens do not sit upon the eggs, but by keeping them in a certain equal heat they bring life into them and hatch them. The chickens, as soon as they be come out of the shell, follow men and women instead of the hens. They bring up very few horses, nor none but very fierce ones, and that for none other use or purpose but only to exercise their youth in riding and feats of arms. For oxen be put to all the labour of ploughing and drawing, which they grant to be not so good as horses at a sudden brunt and (as we say) at a dead lift,[6] but yet they hold opinion that oxen will abide and suffer much more labour, pain, and hardness than horses will. And they think that oxen be not in danger and subject unto so many diseases, and that they be kept and maintained with much less cost and charge, and finally that they be good meat when they be past labour. They sow corn[7] only for bread, for their drink is either wine made of grapes, or else of apples or pears, or else it is clear water, and many times mead made of honey or liquorice sodden[8] in water, for thereof they have great store. And though they know certainly (for they know it perfectly indeed) how much victuals the city with the whole country or shire round about it does spend, yet they sow much more corn and breed up much more cattle than serve for their own use, parting the overplus among their borderers. Whatsoever necessary things be lacking in the country, all such stuff they fetch out of the city, where without any exchange they easily obtain it of the magistrates of the city, for every month many of them go into the city on the holy day. When their harvest day draws near and is at hand,

[1] ancient older.

[2] philarch from Greek, "head of a tribe."

[3] bailiff This is Robynson's explanation of philarch. A bailiff is a person charged with public administration and authority, a chief officer.

[4] cunning knowledgeable, learned.

[5] pullen poultry.

[6] brunt movement; a dead lift pulling an extremely heavy weight.

[7] corn more generally, "grain."

[8] sodden soaked.

then the philarchs, which be the head officers and bailiffs of husbandry, send word to the magistrates of the city what number of harvest men is needful to be sent to them out of the city. The which company of harvest men being ready at the day appointed, almost in one fair day dispatches all the harvest work.

Of the Cities and Namely of Amaurot.

As for their cities, who so knows one of them knows them all, they be all so like one to another as far forth as the nature of the place permits. I will describe therefore to you one or other of them, for it skills[1] not greatly which, but which rather than Amaurot? Of them all this is the worthiest and of most dignity, for the residue knowledge it[2] for the head city because there is the council house. Nor to me any of them all is better beloved, as wherein I lived five whole years together. The city of Amaurot stands upon the side of a low hill in fashion almost four square, for the breadth of it begins a little beneath the top of the hill and still continues by the space of two miles until it comes to the river of Anyder.[3] The length of it, which lies by the river's side, is somewhat more. The river of Anyder rises four and twenty miles above Amaurot out of a little spring, but being increased by other small rivers and brooks that run into it, and among other two somewhat big ones, before the city it is half a mile broad, and farther broader, and forty miles beyond the city it falls into the ocean sea. By all that space that lies between the sea and the city, and certain miles also above the city, the water ebbs and flows six hours together with a swift tide. When the sea flows in, for the length of thirty miles it fills all the Anyder with salt water, and drives back the fresh water of the river, and somewhat further it changes the sweetness of the fresh water with saltness. But a little beyond that the river waxes sweet and runs forby[4] the city fresh and pleasant, and when the sea ebbs and goes back again, the fresh water follows it almost even to the very fall into the sea. There goes a bridge over the river made not of piles[5] or of timber, but of stonework with gorgeous and substantial arches at that part of the city that is farthest from the sea, to the intent that ships may pass along forby all the side of the city without let.[6] They have also another river which indeed is not very great, but it runs gently and pleasantly, for it rises even out of the same hill that the city stands upon and runs down a slope through the midst of the city into Anyder. And because it rises a little without[7] the city, the Amaurotians have enclosed the head spring of it with strong fences and bulwarks and so have joined it to the city. This is done to the intent that the water should not be stopped nor turned away or poisoned if their enemies should chance to come upon them. From thence the water is derived and conveyed down in canals of brick diverse ways into the lower parts of the city. Where that cannot be done by reason that the place will not suffer it, there they gather the rain water in great cisterns, which do them as good service. The city is compassed about with a high and thick stone wall full of turrets and bulwarks. A dry ditch, but deep and broad and overgrown with bushes, briers, and thorns, goes about three sides or quarters of the city. To the fourth side the river itself serves for a ditch.

The streets be appointed and set forth very commodious and handsome, both for carriage and also against the winds. The houses be of fair and gorgeous building, and on the street side they stand joined together in a long row through the whole street without any partition or separation. The streets be twenty feet broad. On the backside of the houses through the whole length of the street lie large gardens enclosed round about with the back part of the streets. Every house has two

1 skills matters

2 residue knowledge it i.e., other cities acknowledge it.

3 Anyder from Greek, "waterless."

4 forby hard by, near.

5 piles posts.

6 let hindrance.

7 without outside.

doors, one into the street and a postern door on the backside into the garden. These doors be made with two leaves, never locked nor bolted, so easy to be opened that they will follow the least drawing of a finger and shut again alone. Who so will may go in, for there is nothing within the houses that is private or any man's own. And every tenth year they change their houses by lot.[1]

They set great store by their gardens. In them they have vineyards, all manner of fruit, herbs, and flowers, so pleasant, so well furnished, and so finely kept that I never saw thing more fruitful nor better trimmed in any place. Their study and diligence herein comes not only of pleasure, but also of a certain strife and contention that is between street and street concerning the trimming, husbanding, and furnishing of their gardens, every man for his own part. And, verily, you shall not lightly find in all the city anything that is more commodious, either for the profit of the citizens or for pleasure. And, therefore, it may seem that the first founder of the city minded nothing so much as these gardens, for they say that King Utopus himself, even at the first beginning, appointed and drew forth the platform[2] of the city into this fashion and figure that it has now, but the gallant garnishing and the beautiful setting forth of it, whereunto he saw that one man's age would not suffice, that he left to his posterity. For their chronicles, which they keep written with all diligent circumspection, containing the history of 1760 years, even from the first conquest of the island, record and witness that the houses in the beginning were very low and like homely cottages or poor shepherd houses, made at all adventures[3] of every rude piece of timber that came first to hand, with mud walls and ridged roofs thatched over with straw. But now the houses be curiously built after a gorgeous and gallant sort, with three stories one over another. The outsides of the walls be made either of hard flint or of plaster or else of brick, and the inner sides be well strengthened with timber work. The roofs be plain and flat, covered with a certain kind of plaster that is of no cost, and yet so tempered that no fire can hurt or perish it and withstands the violence of the weather better than any lead. They keep the wind out of their windows with glass, for it is there much used, and some here also with fine linen cloth dipped in oil or amber, and that for two commodities, for by this means more light comes in and the wind is better kept out.

Of the Magistrates

Every thirty families or farms choose them yearly an officer, which in their old language is called the syphogrant, and by a newer name the philarch. Every ten syphogrants with all their thirty families be under an officer which was once called the tranibore,[4] now the chief philarch. Moreover, as concerning the election of the prince, all the syphogrants, which be in number two hundred, first be sworn to choose him whom they think most meet and expedient. Then by a secret election they name prince one of those four whom the people before named unto them, for out of the four quarters of the city there be four chosen, out of every quarter one to stand for the election, which be put up to the council. The prince's office continues all his lifetime, unless he be deposed or put down for suspicion of tyranny. They choose the tranibores yearly, but lightly they change them not. All the other officers be but for one year. The tranibores every third day and sometimes, if need be, oftener, come into the council house with the prince. Their council is concerning the commonwealth. If there be any controversies among the commoners, which be very few, they dispatch and end them by-and-by.[5] They take ever two syphogrants to them in counsel, and every day a new [1] lot the casting or drawing of lots; a lottery.

[2] platform plan, map.

[3] at all adventures at random.

[4] the syphogrant ... the tranibore The two names may have Greek roots, though their meanings are uncertain. Syphogrant perhaps means "wise old man," though it might also allude to "old man of the sty"; tranibore perhaps means "devourer."

[5] by-and-by immediately; in order.

couple.[1] And it is provided that nothing touching the commonwealth shall be confirmed and ratified unless it have been reasoned of and debated three days in the council before it be decreed. It is death to have any consultation for the commonwealth out of the council or the place of the common election. This statute, they say, was made to the intent that the prince and tranibores might not easily conspire together to oppress the people by tyranny and to change the state of the weal public. Therefore, matters of great weight and importance be brought to the election house of the syphogrants, which open the matter to their families. And afterward, when they have consulted among themselves, they show their devise[2] to the council. Sometimes the matter is brought before the council of the whole island. Furthermore, this custom also the council uses: to dispute or reason of no matter the same day that it is first proposed or put forth, but to defer it to the next sitting of the council, because that no man when he has rashly there spoken that comes to his tongue's end shall then afterward rather study for reasons wherewith to defend and maintain his first foolish sentence than for the commodity of the commonwealth, as one rather willing the harm or hindrance of the weal public than any loss or diminution of his own estimation, and as one that would be ashamed (which is a very foolish shame) to be counted anything at the first overseen in the matter, who at the first ought to have spoken rather wisely than hastily or rashly.

Of Sciences, Crafts, and Occupations

Husbandry is a science common to them all in general, both men and women, wherein they be all expert and cunning. In this they be all instructed even from their youth, partly in their schools with traditions and precepts, and partly in the country nigh the city, brought up as it were in playing, not only beholding the use of it, but by occasion of exercising their bodies practising it also. Besides husbandry, which (as I said) is common to them all, every one of them learns one or other several and particular science as his own proper craft. That is most commonly either clothworking in wool or flax, or masonry, or the smith's craft or the carpenter's science, for there is none other occupation that any number to speak of do use there. For their garments, which throughout all the island be of one fashion (saving that there is a difference between the man's garment and the woman's, between the married and the unmarried), and this one continues for evermore unchanged, seemly and comely to the eye, no let to the moving and wielding[3] of the body, also fit both for winter and summer, as for these garments (I say) every family makes their own. But of the other foresaid crafts every man learns one, and not only the men, but also the women. But the women, as the weaker sort, be put to the easier crafts, as to work wool and flax. The more laboursome sciences be committed to the men. For the most part every man is brought up in his father's craft, for most commonly they be naturally thereto bent and inclined. But if a man's mind stand to any other, he is by adoption put into a family of that occupation which he does most fantasy,[4] whom not only his father but also the magistrates do diligently look to that he be put to a discreet and an honest householder. Yea, and if any person when he has learned one craft be desirous to learn also another, he is likewise suffered[5] and permitted.

When he has learned both, he occupies whether he will, unless the city have more need of the one than of the other. The chief and almost the only office of the syphogrants is to see and take heed that no man sit idle, but that every one apply his own craft with earnest diligence, and yet for all that not to be wearied from early in the morning to late in the evening with continual work, like labouring and toiling beasts.

For this is worse than the miserable and wretched condition of bondmen, which nevertheless is [1] They take … new couple i.e., two new syphogrants come each day.

[2] devise i.e., what they have devised.

[3] wielding controlling, moving.

[4] fantasy fancy, desire.

[5] suffered allowed.

almost everywhere the life of workmen and artificers, saving in Utopia. For they, dividing the day and the night into twenty-four just[1] hours, appoint and assign only six of these hours to work before noon, upon the which they go straight to dinner and, after dinner, when they have rested two hours, then they work three hours and upon that they go to supper. About eight of the clock in the evening (counting one of the clock a[s] the first hour after noon) they go to bed; eight hours they give to sleep. All the void[2] time that is between the hours of work, sleep, and meat, that they be suffered to bestow every man as he likes best himself, not to the intent that they should misspend this time in riot or slothfulness, but being then licensed from the labour of their own occupations, to bestow the time well and thriftily upon some other science as shall please them. For it is a solemn custom there to have lectures daily early in the morning, where to be present they only be constrained that be namely chosen and appointed to learning. Howbeit, a great multitude of every sort of people, both men and women, go to hear lectures, some one and some another, as every man's nature is inclined. Yet, this notwithstanding, if any man had rather bestow this time upon his own occupation (as it chances in many whose minds rise not in the contemplation of any science liberal),[3] he is not letted[4] nor prohibited, but is also praised and commended as profitable to the commonwealth. After supper they bestow one hour in play: in summer in their gardens, in winter in their common halls where they dine and sup. There they exercise themselves in music or else in honest and wholesome communication. Diceplay and such other foolish and pernicious games they know not, but they use two games not much unlike the chess. The one is the battle of numbers, wherein one number steals away another. The other is wherein vices fight with virtues, as it were in battle array or a set field, in the which game is very properly showed both the strife and discord that vices have among themselves, and again their unity and concord against virtues; and also what vices be repugnant to what virtues; with what power and strength they assail them openly; by what wiles and subtlety they assault them secretly; with what help and aid the virtues resist and overcome the puissance of the vices; by what craft they frustrate their purposes; and finally by what sleight or means the one gets the victory. But here, lest you be deceived, one thing you must look more narrowly upon. For seeing they bestow but six hours in work,[5] perchance you may think that the lack of some necessary things hereof may ensue. But this is nothing so. For that small time is not only enough but also too much for the store and abundance of all things that be requisite either for the necessity or commodity of life. The which thing you also shall perceive if you weigh and consider with yourselves how great a part of the people in other countries live idle. First, almost all women, which be the half of the whole number, or else, if the women be somewhere occupied, there most commonly in their stead the men be idle. Besides this, how great and how idle a company is there of priests and religious men, as they call them? Put thereto all rich men, especially all landed men, which commonly be called gentlemen and noblemen. Take into this number also their servants: I mean all that flock of stout bragging rush-bucklers.[6] Join to them also sturdy and valiant beggars, cloaking their idle life under the colour of some disease or sickness, and truly you shall find them much fewer than you thought, by whose labour all these things are wrought that in men's affairs are now daily used and frequented.

Now consider with yourself, of these few that do work, how few be occupied in necessary works, for where money bears all the swing,[7] there many vain and superfluous occupations must needs be

---

1 just equal.

2 void unoccupied.

3 science liberal liberal knowledge, liberal arts.

4 letted hindered.

5 six hours in work This total appears also in the Latin original; however, earlier it is stated that the Utopians work nine hours: six before the midday meal and three after.

6 rush-bucklers swashbucklers.

7 swing sway.

used to serve only for riotous superfluity and unhonest pleasure. For the same multitude that now is occupied in work, if they were divided into so few occupations as the necessary use of nature requires, in so great plenty of things as then of necessity would ensue, doubtless the prices would be too little for the artificers[1] to maintain their livings. But if all these that be now busied about unprofitable occupations, with all the whole flock of them that live idly and slothfully, which consume and waste every one of them more of these things that come by other men's labour than two of the workmen themselves do, if all these (I say) were set to profitable occupations, you easily perceive how little time would be enough, yea, and too much to store us with all things that may be requisite either for necessity or for commodity, yea, or for pleasure, so that the same pleasure be true and natural. And this in Utopia the thing itself makes manifest and plain, for there in all the city, with the whole country or shire adjoining to it, scarcely five hundred persons of all the whole number of men and women that be neither too old nor too weak to work, be licensed and discharged from labour. Among them be the syphogrants (who though they be by the laws exempt and privileged from labour), yet they exempt not themselves, to the intent that they may the rather by their example provoke others to work. The same vacation from labour do they also enjoy, to whom the people, persuaded by the commendation of the priests and secret election of the syphogrants, have given a perpetual license from labour to learning. But if any one of them prove not according to the expectation and hope of him conceived, he is forthwith plucked back to the company of artificers. And, contrariwise, often it chances that a handicraftsman does so earnestly bestow his vacant and spare hours in learning and through diligence so profits therein that he is taken from his handy occupation and promoted to the company of the learned. Out of this order of the learned be chosen ambassadors, priests, tranibores, and finally the prince himself, whom they in their old tongue call Barzanes, and by a newer name, Adamus.[2] The residue of the people being neither idle nor yet occupied about unprofitable exercises, it may be easily judged in how few hours how much good work by them may be done and dispatched towards those things that I have spoken of. This commodity they have also above other, that in the most part of necessary occupations they need not so much work as other nations do. For first of all the building or repairing of houses asks everywhere so many men's continual labour, because that the unthrifty heir suffers[3] the houses that his father built in continuance of time to fall in decay. So that which he might have upholden[4] with little cost, his successor is constrained to build it again anew to his great charge. Yea, many times also the house that stood one man in[5] much money, another is of so nice[6] and so delicate a mind that he sets nothing by it, and it being neglected and therefore shortly falling into ruin, he builds up another in another place with no less cost and charge. But among the Utopians, where all things be set in a good order and the commonwealth in a goodstay,[7] it very seldom chances that they choose a new plot to build a house upon, and they do not only find speedy and quick remedies for present faults, but also prevent them that be like to fall. And by this means their houses continue and last very long with little labour and small reparations, insomuch that this kind of workmen sometimes have almost nothing to do, but that they be commanded to hew timber at home and to square and trim up stoves[8] to the intent that if any work chance, it may the speedilier rise.

Now, sir, in their apparel, mark (I pray you) how few workmen they need. First of all, whilst they be 1 artificers those who make by art or skill; craftspeople.

---

2 Barzanes … Adamus "Barzanes" is from the Hebrew, "son of Zeus"; "Adamus" in the Latin original is "Ademus," from the Greek "without people."

3 suffers allows.

4 upholden upheld.

5 stood one man in cost one man.

6 nice fastidious.

7 goodstay condition.

8 stoves staves, or sticks of wood.

at work they be covered homely[1] with leather or skins that will last seven years. When they go forth abroad they cast upon them a cloak which hides the other homely apparel. These cloaks throughout the whole island be all of one colour and that is the natural colour of the wool. They therefore do not only spend[2] much less woolen cloth than is spent in other countries, but also the same stands them in much less cost. But linen cloth is made with less labour and is therefore had more in use. But in linen cloth only whiteness, in woolen only cleanliness is regarded. As for the smallness or fineness of the thread, that is nothing passed for.[3] And this is the cause wherefore in other places four or five cloth gowns of diverse colours and as many silk coats be not enough for one man. Yea, and if he be of the delicate and nice sort, ten be too few, whereas there one garment will serve a man most commonly two years. For why should he desire more? Seeing if he had them, he should not be the better hapt[4] or covered from cold, neither in his apparel any whit the comelier. Wherefore, seeing they be all exercised in profitable occupations and that few artificers in the same crafts be sufficient, this is the cause that, plenty of all things being among them, they do sometimes bring forth an innumerable company of people to amend the highways if any be broken. Many times also, when they have no such work to be occupied about, an open proclamation is made that they shall bestow fewer hours in work, for the magistrates do not exercise their citizens against their wills in unneedful labours. For why[5] in the institution of that weal public, this end is only and chiefly pretended and minded, that what time may possibly be spared from the necessary occupations and affairs of the commonwealth, all that the citizens should withdraw from the bodily service to the free liberty of the mind and garnishing of the same, for herein they suppose the felicity of this life to consist.

Of Their Living and Mutual Conversation[6] Together

But now will I declare how the citizens use themselves one towards another, what familiar occupying and entertainment there is among the people, and what fashion they use in the distribution of everything. First, the city consists of families; the families most commonly be made of kindreds, for the women, when they be married at a lawful age, they go into their husbands' houses. But the male children, with all the whole male offspring, continue still in their own family and be governed of the eldest and ancientest father, unless he dote for age,[7] for then the next to him in age is placed in his room. But to the intent the prescript number of the citizens should neither decrease nor above measure increase, it is ordained that no family—which in every city be six thousand in the whole, besides them of the country—shall at once have fewer children of the age of fourteen years or thereabout than ten or more than sixteen, for of children under this age no number can be prescribed or appointed. This measure or number is easily observed and kept by putting them that in fuller families be above the number into families of smaller increase. But if chance be that in the whole city the store increase above the just number, therewith they fill up the lack of other cities. But if so be that the multitude throughout the whole island pass and exceed the due number, then they choose out of every city certain citizens and build up a town under their own laws in the next land where the inhabitants have much waste[8] and unoccupied ground, receiving also of the same country people to them if they will join and dwell with them. They thus joining and dwelling together do easily agree in one fashion of living,

1 homely plainly, simply.
2 spend use up.
3 nothing passed for not worried about.
4 hapt covered for warmth.
5 For why for which reason.
6 Conversation society.
7 dote for age be in his dotage; be weakened from age.
8 waste uncultivated.

and that to the great wealth of both the peoples. For they so bring the matter about by their laws that the ground, which before was neither good nor profitable for the one nor for the other, is now sufficient and fruitful enough for them both. But if the inhabitants of that land will not dwell with them to be ordered by their laws, then they drive them out of those bounds which they have limited and appointed out for themselves. And if they resist and rebel, then they make war against them, for they count this the most just cause of war, when any people holds a piece of ground void and vacant to no good nor profitable use, keeping other from the use and possession of it, which notwithstanding by the law of nature ought thereof to be nourished and relieved. If any chance do so much diminish the number of any of their cities that it cannot be filled up again without the diminishing of the just number of the other cities (which they say chanced but twice since the beginning of the land through a great pestilent plague), then they fulfil and make up the number with citizens fetched out of their own foreign towns, for they had rather suffer their foreign towns to decay and perish than any city of their own island to be diminished.

But now again to the conversation of the citizens among themselves. The eldest (as I said) rules the family. The wives be ministers to their husbands, the children to their parents, and, to be short, the younger to their elders. Every city is divided into four equal parts or quarters. In the midst of every quarter there is a market place of all manner of things. Thither the works of every family be brought into certain houses, and every kind of thing is laid up several in barns or storehouses. From hence the father of every family, or every householder, fetches whatsoever he and his have need of and carries it away with him without money, without exchange, without any gage,[1] pawn, or pledge. For why should anything be denied unto him, seeing there is abundance of all things, and that it is not to be feared lest any man will ask more than he needs? For why should it be thought that that man would ask more than enough, which is sure never to lack? Certainly in all kinds of living creatures either fear of lack does cause covetousness and ravin,[2] or in man only pride, which counts it a glorious thing to pass and excel others in the superfluous and vain ostentation of things. The which kind of vice among the Utopians can have no place. Next to the market-places that I spoke of stand meat markets,[3] whither be brought not only all sorts of herbs and the fruits of trees, with bread, but also fish and all manner of four-footed beasts and wild fowl that be man's meat. But first the filthiness and ordure thereof is clean washed away in the running river without the city in places appointed meet for the same purpose. From thence the beasts be brought in, killed, and clean washed by the hands of their bondmen, for they permit not their free citizens to accustom themselves to the killing of beasts, through the use whereof they think clemency, the gentlest affection of our nature, by little and little to decay and perish. Neither they suffer anything that is filthy, loathsome, or unclean to be brought into the city, lest the air by the stench thereof, infected and corrupt, should cause pestilent diseases. Moreover, every street has certain great large halls set in equal distance one from another, every one known by a several[4] name. In these halls dwell the syphogrants, and to every one of the same halls be appointed thirty families, on either side fifteen. The stewards of every hall at a certain hour come into the meat markets, where they receive meat according to the number of their halls.

But first and chiefly of all respect is had to the sick that be cured in the hospitals. For in the circuit of the city, a little without the walls, they have four hospitals, so big, so wide, so ample, and so large that they may seem four little towns, which were devised of that bigness partly to the intent the sick, be they never so many in number,

[1] gage pawn or pledge.

[2] ravin robbery (i.e., rapine) or gluttony.

[3] meat markets more generally, "food markets."

[4] several separate.

should not lie too throng or strait,[1] and therefore uneasily and incommodiously; and partly that they which were taken and holden[2] with contagious diseases, such as be wont by infection to creep from one to another, might be laid apart far from the company of the residue. These hospitals be so well appointed and with all things necessary to health so furnished, and moreover so diligent attendance through the continual presence of cunning physicians is given, that though no man be sent thither against his will, yet notwithstanding there is no sick person in all the city that had not rather lie there than at home in his own house.

When the steward of the sick has received such meats as the physicians have prescribed, then the best is equally divided among the halls according to the company of every one, saving that there is had a respect to the prince, the bishop, the tranibores, and to ambassadors and all strangers if there be any, which be very few and seldom. But they also when they be there have certain several houses appointed and prepared for them. To these halls at the set hours of dinner and supper comes all the whole syphogranty or ward, warned by the noise of a brazen[3] trumpet, except such as be sick in the hospitals or else in their own houses. Howbeit, no man is prohibited or forbid, after the halls be served, to fetch home meat out of the market to his own house, for they know that no man will do it without a cause reasonable. For though no man be prohibited to dine at home, yet no man does it willingly, because it is counted a point of small honesty.[4] And also it were a folly to take the pain to dress a bad dinner at home when they may be welcome to good and fine fare so nigh hand at the hall. In this hall all vile service, all slavery and drudgery with all laboursome toil and base business is done by bondmen. But the women of every family by course have the office and charge of cookery for seething[5] and dressing the meat and ordering all things thereto belonging. They sit at three tables or more, according to the number of their company. The men sit upon the bench next the wall and the women against them[6] on the other side of the table, that if any sudden evil should chance to them, as many times happens to women with child, they may rise without trouble or disturbance of anybody and go thence into the nursery. The nurses[7] sit several alone with their young sucklings in a certain parlour appointed and deputed to the same purpose, never without fire and clean water, nor yet without cradles, that when they will they may lay down the young infants and at their pleasure take them out of their swathing[8] clothes and hold them to the fire and refresh them with play. Every mother is nurse to her own child, unless either death or sickness be the let. When that chances, the wives of the syphogrants quickly provide a nurse, and that is not hard to be done, for they that can do it proffer themselves to no service so gladly as to that, because that there this kind of pity is much praised, and the child that is nourished ever after takes his nurse for his own natural mother. Also among the nurses sit all the children that be under the age of five years. All the other children of both kinds, as well boys as girls, that be under the age of marriage do either serve at the tables or else, if they be too young thereto, yet they stand by with marvellous[9] silence. That which is given to them from the table they eat and other several dinnertime they have none. The syphogrant and his wife sit in the midst of the high table, forasmuch as that is counted the honourablest place and because from thence all the whole company is in their sight, for that table stands overthwart the over end[10] of the hall. To 1 too throng or strait too crowded or confined.

2 holden detained.

3 brazen brass, loud.

4 is counted a point of small honesty i.e., shows small regard or respect for others.

5 seething boiling.

6 against them opposite them or facing them.

7 nurses wet nurses (women hired to breastfeed the babies), or, as the next sentence clarifies, the mothers themselves.

8 swathing swaddling: swaddling clothes were used to restrict the movements of infants.

9 marvellous surprising.

10 overthwart the over end across the upper end.

them be joined two of the ancientist and eldest, for at every table they sit four at a mess. But if there be a church standing in that syphogranty or ward, then the priest and his wife sit with the syphogrant as chief in the company. On both sides of them sit young men and next unto them again old men, and thus throughout all the house equal of age be set together and yet be mixed and matched with unequal ages. This, they say, was ordained to the intent that the sage gravity and reverence of the elders should keep the youngers from wanton license of words and behaviour, forasmuch as nothing can be so secretly spoken or done at the table but either they that sit on the one side or on the other must needs perceive it. The dishes be not set down in order from the first place, but all the old men (whose places be marked with some special token to be known) be first served of their meat and then the residue equally. The old men divide their dainties[1] as they think best to the younger on each side of them. Thus the elders be not defrauded of their due honour, and nevertheless equal commodity comes to everyone.

They begin every dinner and supper of[2] reading something that pertains to good manners and virtue, but it is short because no man shall be grieved therewith. Hereof the elders take occasion of honest communications, but neither sad nor unpleasant. Howbeit, they do not spend all the whole dinnertime themselves with long and tedious talks, but they gladly hear also the young men, yea, and purposely provoke them to talk to the intent that they may have a proof of every man's wit and towardness[3] or disposition to virtue, which commonly in the liberty of feasting does show and utter itself. Their dinners be very short, but their suppers be somewhat longer because that after dinner follows labour, after supper sleep and natural rest, which they think to be of more strength and efficacy to wholesome and healthful digestion. No supper is passed without music, nor their banquets lack no conceits nor junkets.[4] They burn sweet gums and spices or perfumes and pleasant smells, and sprinkle about sweet ointments and waters; yea, they leave nothing undone that makes for the cheering of the company, for they be much inclined to this opinion: to think no kind of pleasure forbidden whereof comes no harm. Thus, therefore, and after this sort they live together in the city, but in the country they that dwell alone far from any neighbours do dine and sup at home in their own houses, for no family there lacks any kind of victuals, as from whom comes all that the citizens eat and live by.

Of Their Journeying or Travelling Abroad, with Divers Other Matters Cunningly Reasoned and Wittily Discussed.

But if any be desirous to visit either their friends dwelling in another city or to see the place itself, they easily obtain license of their syphogrants and tranibores, unless there be some profitable let. No man goes out alone, but a company is sent forth together with their prince's letters, which do testify that they have licence to go that journey and prescribes also the day of their return. They have a wagon given them, with a common bondman which drives the oxen and takes charge of them. But unless they have women in their company, they send home the wagon again as an impediment and a let. And though they carry nothing forth with them, yet in all their journey they lack nothing, for wheresoever they come they be at home. If they tarry in a place longer than one day, then there everyone of them falls to his own occupation and is very gently entertained of the workmen and companies of the same crafts. If any man, of his own head and without leave, walk out of his precinct and bounds, [be] taken without the prince's letters, he is brought again for a fugitive or a runaway with great shame and rebuke and is sharply punished. If he be taken in that fault again, he is punished with bondage. If any be

[1] dainties delicacies.

[2] of with.

[3] towardness inclination.

[4] conceits nor junkets fancy foodstuffs, sweets.

desirous to walk abroad into the fields or into the country that belongs to the same city that he dwells in, obtaining the goodwill of his father and the consent of his wife, he is not prohibited. But into what part of the country soever he comes he has no meat given him until he has wrought out his forenoon's task or dispatched so much work as there is wont to be wrought before supper. Observing this law and condition, he may go whither he will within the bounds of his own city, for he shall be no less profitable to the city than if he were within it. Now you see how little liberty they have to loiter, how they can have no cloak[1] or pretence to idleness. There be neither wine taverns, nor ale-houses, nor stews, nor any occasion of vice or wickedness, no lurking corners, no places of wicked councils or unlawful assemblies. But they be in the present sight and under the eyes of every man, so that of necessity they must either apply their accustomed labours or else recreate themselves with honest and laudable pastimes.

This fashion and trade of life being used among the people, it cannot be chosen but that they must of necessity have store and plenty of all things. And seeing they be all thereof partners equally, therefore can no man there be poor or needy. In the council of Amaurot, whither, as I said, every city sends three men apiece yearly, as soon as it is perfectly known of what things there is in every place plenty and again what things be scant in any place, incontinent the lack of the one is performed[2] and filled up with the abundance of the other. And this they do freely without any benefit,[3] taking nothing again of them to whom the things is given, but those cities that have given of their store to any other city that lacks, requiring nothing again of the same city, do take such things as they lack of another city to the which they gave nothing. So the whole island is as it were one family or household. But when they have made sufficient provision of store for themselves (which they think not done until they have provided for two years following, because of the uncertainty of the next year's proof),[4] then of those things whereof they have abundance, they carry forth into other countries great plenty, as grain, honey, wool, flax, wood, madder,[5] purple dyed fells,[6] wax, tallow,[7] leather, and living beasts. And the seventh part of all these things they give frankly and freely to the poor of that country. The residue they sell at a reasonable and mean[8] price. By this trade of traffic or merchandise they bring into their own country not only great plenty of gold and silver, but also all such things as they lack at home, which is almost nothing but iron. And by reason they have long used this trade, now they have more abundance of these things than any man will believe. Now, therefore, they care not whether they sell for ready money or else upon trust to be paid at a day and to have the most part in debts. But in so doing they never follow the credence of private men, but the assurance or warranties of the whole city by instruments and writings made in that behalf accordingly. When the day of payment is come and expired, the city gathers up the debt of the private debtors and puts it into the common box, and so long has the use and profit[9] of it until the Utopians their creditors demand it. The most part of it they never ask, for that thing which is to them no profit to take it from other to whom it is profitable, they think it no right nor conscience. But if the case so stand that they must lend part of that money to another people, then they require their debt, or when they have war. For the which purpose only they keep at home all the treasure which they have, to be helped and succoured by it either in extreme jeopardies or in sudden dangers, but especially and chiefly to hire therewith, and that for unreasonable great wages, strange[10] soldiers. For they had

1 cloak pretence.
2 performed supplied.
3 benefit gain, recompense.
4 proof issue, results (i.e., harvest).
5 madder plant grown for its dye.
6 fells animal skins or hides.
7 tallow animal fat used in making candles, soaps.
8 mean moderate.
9 use and profit the interest or profit paid on usury.
10 strange foreign.

rather put strangers in jeopardy than their own countrymen, knowing that for money enough their enemies themselves many times may be bought and sold, or else through treason be set together by the ears[1] among themselves. For this cause they keep an inestimable treasure, but yet not as a treasure, but so they have it and use it, as in good faith I am ashamed to show, fearing that my words shall not be believed. And this I have more cause to fear, for that I know how difficultly and hardily I myself would have believed another man telling the same if I had not presently seen it with mine own eyes.

For it must needs be that how far a thing is dissonant and disagreeing from the guise and trade[2] of the hearers, so far shall it be out of their belief. Howbeit, a wise and indifferent esteemer of things will not greatly marvel perchance, seeing all their other laws and customs do so much differ from ours, if the use also of gold and silver among them be applied rather to their own fashions than to ours. I mean in that they occupy[3] not money themselves, but keep it for that chance which, as it may happen, so it may be that it shall never come to pass. In the meantime gold and silver, whereof money is made, they do so use as none of them does more esteem it than the very nature of the thing deserves. And then who does not plainly see how far it is under iron, as without the which men can no better live than without fire and water. Whereas to gold and silver nature has given no use that we may not well lack, if that the folly of men had not set it in higher estimation for the rareness sake. But of the contrary part, nature, as a most tender and loving mother, has placed the best and most necessary things open abroad, as the air, the water and the earth itself, and has removed and hid farthest from us vain and unprofitable things. Therefore, if these metals among them should be fast[4] locked up in some tower, it might be suspected that the prince and the council (as the people is ever foolishly imagining) intended by some subtlety to deceive the commons and to take some profit of it to themselves. Furthermore, if they should make thereof plate and such other finely and cunningly wrought stuff, if at any time they should have occasion to break it and melt it again therewith to pay their soldiers' wages, they see and perceive very well that men would be loath to part from those things that they once began to have pleasure and delight in. To remedy all this they have found out a means which, as it is agreeable to all their other laws and customs, so it is from ours, where gold is so much set by and so diligently kept, very far discrepant and repugnant,[5] and, therefore, incredible, but only to them that be wise.[6] For whereas they eat and drink in earthen and glass vessels which indeed be curiously and properly made and yet be of very small value, of gold and silver they make commonly chamber pots and other vessels that serve for most vile uses, not only in their common halls, but in every man's private house. Furthermore, of the same metals they make great chains, fetters, and gyves wherein they tie their bondmen. Finally, whosoever for any offence be infamed,[7] by their ears hang rings of gold, upon their fingers they wear rings of gold, and about their necks chains of gold, and in conclusion their heads be tied about with gold. Thus by all means possible they procure to have gold and silver among them in reproach and infamy. And these metals, which other nations do as grievously and sorrowfully forego as in a manner their own lives, if they should altogether at once be taken from the Utopians, no man there would think that he had lost the worth of one farthing. They gather also pearls by the seaside and diamonds and carbuncles[8] upon certain rocks, and yet they seek not for them, but, by chance finding them, they cut and polish them, and therewith they deck their young infants, which like as in the first years of their

1 set together by the ears put at variance, put at odds.
2 guise and trade customs, way of life.
3 occupy use.
4 fast firmly.
5 far discrepant and repugnant different and contradictory.
6 wise knowledgeable, experienced.
7 infamed branded with infamy, as shameful.
8 carbuncles precious stones, usually red or fiery in colour.

childhood they make much and be fond and proud of such ornaments, so when they be a little more grown in years and discretion, perceiving that none but children do wear such toys and trifles, they lay them away even of their own shamefastness, without any bidding of their parents, even as our children, when they wax big, do cast away nuts,[1] brooches, and puppets.[2] Therefore, these laws and customs which be so far different from all other nations, how divers fantasies also and minds they do cause, did I never so plainly perceive as in the ambassadors of the Anemolians.[3]

These ambassadors came to Amaurot while I was there, and because they came to entreat of great and weighty matters, those three citizens a piece out of every city were come thither before them. But all the ambassadors of the next countries which had been there before and knew the fashions and manners of the Utopians, among whom they perceived no honour given to sumptuous apparel, silks to be contemned, gold also to be infamed and reproachful,[4] were wont to come thither in very homely and simple array. But the Anemolians, because they dwell far thence and had very little acquaintance with them, hearing that they were all apparelled alike and that very rudely and homely, thinking them not to have the things which they did not wear, being therefore more proud than wise, determined in the gorgeousness of their apparel to represent very gods, and with the bright shining and glistering of their gay clothing to dazzle the eyes of the silly, poor Utopians. So there came in three ambassadors with an hundred servants all apparelled in changeable[5] colours, the most of them in silks, the ambassadors themselves (for at home in their own country they were noblemen) in cloth of gold, with great chains of gold, with gold hanging at their ears, with gold rings upon their fingers, with brooches and aglets[6] of gold upon their caps which glistered full of pearls and precious stones—to be short, trimmed and adorned with all those things which among the Utopians were either the punishment of bondmen, or the reproach of infamed persons, or else trifles for young children to play withal. Therefore, it would have done a man good at his heart to have seen how proudly they displayed their peacock's feathers, how much they made of their painted sheaths,[7] and how loftily they set forth and advanced themselves when they compared their gallant apparel with the poor raiment of the Utopians, for all the people were swarmed forth into the streets. And on the other side it was no less pleasure to consider how much they were deceived and how far they missed of their purpose, being contrary ways taken than they thought they should have been, for to the eyes of all the Utopians, except very few which had been in other countries for some reasonable cause, all that gorgeousness of apparel seemed shameful and reproachful, insomuch that they most reverently saluted the vilest and most abject of them for lords, passing over the ambassadors themselves without any honour, judging them by their wearing of golden chains to be bondmen. Yea, you should have seen children also that had cast away their pearls and precious stones, when they saw the like sticking upon the ambassadors' caps, dig and push their mothers under the sides, saying thus to them: "Look mother how great a lubber[8] does yet wear pearls and precious stones, as though he were a little child still." But the mother, yea, and that also in good earnest, "Peace, son," says she, "I think he be some of the ambassadors' fools." Some found fault at their golden chains as to no use nor purpose, being so small and weak that a bondman might easily break them, and again so wide and large that, when it pleased him, he might cast them off and run away at liberty whither he would. But when the ambassadors had

[1] nuts trifles.
[2] puppets dolls.
[3] Anemolians from Greek, "windy."
[4] reproachful shameful.
[5] changeable various.
[6] aglets pendants, spangles.
[7] sheaths coverings.
[8] lubber clumsy, stupid fellow.

been there a day or two and saw so great abundance of gold so lightly esteemed, yea, in no less reproach than it was with them in honour, and besides that more gold in the chains and guise[1] of one fugitive bondman than all the costly ornaments of them three was worth, they began to abate their courage[2] and for very shame laid away all that gorgeous array whereof they were so proud. And especially when they had talked familiarly with the Utopians and had learned all their fashions and opinions.

For they marvel that any men be so foolish as to have delight and pleasure in the doubtful glistering of a little trifling stone, which may behold any of the stars or else the sun itself. Or that any man is so mad as to count himself the nobler for the smaller or finer thread of wool, which selfsame wool (be it now in never so fine a spun thread) a sheep did once wear, and yet was she all that time no other thing than a sheep. They marvel also that gold, which of its own nature is a thing so unprofitable, is now among all people in so high estimation that man himself, by whom, yea, and for the use of whom it is so much set by, is in much less estimation than the gold itself. Insomuch that a lumpish, blockheaded churl,[3] and which has no more wit than an ass, yea, and as full of naughtiness[4] as of folly, shall have nevertheless many wise and good men in subjection and bondage only for this, because he has a great heap of gold. Which if it should be taken from him by any fortune or by some subtle wile and cautel[5] of the law, (which no less than fortune does both raise up the low and pluck down the high) and be given to the most vile slave and abject drivel[6] of all his household, then shortly after he shall go into the service of his servant as an augmentation nor overplus beside his money.[7] But they much more marvel at and detest the madness of them which to those rich men, in whose debt and danger they be not, do give almost divine honours for none other consideration but because they be rich, and yet knowing them to be such niggish penny-fathers[8] that they be sure, as long as they live, not the worth of one farthing of that heap of gold shall come to them.

These and such like opinions have they conceived partly by education, being brought up in that commonwealth whose laws and customs be far different from these kinds of folly, and partly by good literature and learning. For though there be not many in every city which be exempt and discharged of all other labours and appointed only to learning, that is to say such in whom even from their very childhood they have perceived a singular towardness, a fine wit, and a mind apt to good learning, yet all in their childhood be instruct[ed] in learning, and the better part of the people, both men and women, throughout all their whole life do bestow in learning those spare hours which we said they have vacant from bodily labours. They be taught learning in their own native tongue, for it is both copious in words and also pleasant to the ear, and for the utterance of a man's mind very perfect and sure. The most part of all that side of the world uses the same language, saving that among the Utopians it is finest and purest, and according to the diversity of the countries it is diversely altered. Of all these philosophers whose names be here famous in this part of the world to us known, before our coming thither not as much as the fame of any of them was common among them. And yet in music, logic, arithmetic, and geometry they have found out in a manner all that our ancient philosophers have taught. But as they in all things be almost equal to our old ancient clerks,[9] so our new logicians in subtle inventions have far passed and gone beyond them. For they have not devised one of all those rules of restrictions, amplifications and suppositions, very wittily invented in the [1] guise clothing.

[2] courage confidence, pride.
[3] churl rude, low-bred fellow.
[4] naughtiness wickedness.
[5] wile and cautel trick and deceit.
[6] drivel servant.
[7] as an augmentation nor overplus beside his money i.e., as an addition or surplus to his money.
[8] niggish penny-fathers niggardly or stingy money-hoarders or misers.
[9] clerks scholars.

Small Logicals,[1] which here our children in every place do learn. Furthermore, they were never yet able to find out the second intentions,[2] insomuch that none of them all could ever see man himself in common, as they call him, though he be (as you know) bigger than ever was any giant, yea, and pointed to of us even with our finger.[3] But they be in the course of the stars and the movings of the heavenly spheres very expert and cunning. They have also wittily excogitated[4] and devised instruments of diverse fashions, wherein is exactly comprehended and contained the movings and situations of the sun, the moon, and of all the other stars which appear in their horizon. But as for the amities and dissensions[5] of the planets and all that deceitful divination by the stars, they never as much as dreamed thereof. Rains, winds, and other courses of tempests they know before by certain tokens which they have learned by long use and observation. But of the causes of all these things and of the ebbing, flowing, and saltiness of the sea, and finally of the original beginning and nature of Heaven and of the world, they hold partly the same opinions that our old philosophers hold and partly, as our philosophers vary among themselves, so they also, whiles they bring new reasons of things, do disagree from all them and yet among themselves in all points they do not accord. In that part of philosophy which entreats of manners and virtue, their reasons and opinions agree with ours. They dispute of the good qualities of the soul, of the body, and of fortune, and whether the name of goodness may be applied to all these or only to the endowments and gifts of the soul.

They reason of virtue and pleasure, but the chief and principal question is in what thing, be it one or more, the felicity of man consists. But in this point they seem almost too much given and inclined to the opinion of them which defend pleasure, wherein they determine either all or the chiefest part of man's felicity to rest. And (which is more to be marvelled at) the defence of this so dainty and delicate an opinion they fetch even from their grave, sharp, bitter and rigorous religion. For they never dispute of felicity or blessedness but they join unto the reasons of philosophy certain principles taken out of religion, without the which to the investigation of true felicity they think reason of itself weak and imperfect. Those principles be these and such like: that the soul is immortal and by the bountiful goodness of God ordained to felicity; that to our virtues and good deeds rewards be appointed after this life and to our evil deeds punishments. Though these be pertaining to religion, yet they think it meet that they should be believed and granted by proofs of reason. But if these principles were condemned and disannulled,[6] then without any delay they pronounce no man to be so foolish which would not do all his diligence and endeavour to obtain pleasure by right or wrong, only avoiding this inconvenience: that the less pleasure should not be a let or hindrance to the bigger, or that he laboured not for that pleasure which would bring after it displeasure, grief and sorrow. For they judge it extreme madness to follow sharp and painful virtue, and not only to banish the pleasure of life, but also willingly to suffer grief without any hope of profit thereof ensuing. For what profit can there be if a man, when he has passed over all his life unpleasantly, that is to say miserably, shall have no reward after his death?

But now, sir, they think not felicity to rest in all pleasure, but only in that pleasure that is good and honest and that hereto, as to perfect blessedness,

[1] Small Logicals possibly the textbook of logic written by Peter of Spain, who later became Pope John XXI, though a number of similarly titled texts are possible. More is mocking scholastic philosophy.

[2] second intentions In logic, second intentions are secondary or abstract conceptions formed by the application of thought to first intentions; first intentions are the primary or direct conceptions of things, formed by the first or direct application of the mind to the things themselves.

[3] none of them all ... our finger i.e., they could not think of the idea of humankind, though he is bigger than a giant, even when we pointed to him.

[4] excogitated thought out.

[5] amities and dissensions friendly and hostile influences.

[6] disannulled cancelled.

our nature is allured and drawn even of virtue, whereto only they that be of the contrary opinion do attribute felicity, for they define virtue to be life ordered according to nature, and that we be hereunto ordained of God, and that he does follow the course of nature which, in desiring and refusing things, is ruled by reason. Furthermore, that reason does chiefly and principally kindle in men the love and veneration of the divine majesty, of whose goodness it is that we be, and that we be in possibility to attain felicity. And that secondarily it both stirs and provokes us to lead our life out of care in joy and mirth, and also moves us to help and further all others in respect of the society of nature to obtain and enjoy the same. For there was never man so earnest and painful a follower of virtue and hater of pleasure that would so enjoin[1] you labours, watchings and fastings, but he would also exhort you to ease, lighten and relieve, to your power, the lack and misery of others, praising the same as a deed of humanity and pity. Then if it be a point of humanity for man to bring health and comfort to man, and specially (which is a virtue most peculiarly belonging to man) to mitigate and assuage the grief of others and, by taking from them the sorrow and heaviness of life, to restore them to joy, that is to say to pleasure, why may it not then be said that nature does provoke every man to do the same to himself? For a joyful life, that is to say a pleasant life, is either evil and, if it be so, then thou should not only help no man thereto, but rather, as much as in thee lies, withdraw all men from it as noisome and hurtful, or else if thou not only may, but also of duty art bound to procure it to others, why not chiefly to thyself, to whom thou art bound to show as much favour and gentleness as to other? For when nature bids thee to be good and gentle to others, she commands thee not to be cruel and ungentle to thyself. Therefore, even very nature (say they) prescribes to us a joyful life, that is to say, pleasure as the end of all our operations. And they define virtue to be life ordered according to the prescript of nature. But in that that nature does allure and provoke men, one to help another to live merrily (which surely she does not without a good cause, for no man is so far above the lot of man's state or condition that nature does cark[2] and care for him only, which equally favours all that be comprehended under the communion of one shape, form and fashion), verily she commands thee to use diligent circumspection that thou do not so seek for thine own commodities, that thou procure others incommodities. Wherefore their opinion is that not only covenants and bargains made among private men ought to be well and faithfully fulfilled, observed, and kept, but also common laws, which either a good prince has justly published or else the people, neither oppressed with tyranny, neither deceived by fraud and guile, have by their common consent constituted and ratified, concerning the partition of the commodities of life, that is to say, the matter of pleasure. These laws not offended, it is wisdom that thou look to thine own wealth, and to do the same for the commonwealth is no less than thy duty if thou bear any reverent love or any natural zeal and affection to thy native country. But to go about to let[3] another man of his pleasure whilst thou procures thine own, that is open wrong. Contrariwise, to withdraw something from thyself to give to other, that is a point of humanity and gentleness, which never takes away so much commodity as it brings again. For it is recompensed with the return of benefits and the conscience of the good deed, with the remembrance of the thankful love and benevolence of them to whom thou hast done it, does bring more pleasure to thy mind than that which thou has withholden from thyself could have brought to thy body. Finally (which to a godly disposed and a religious mind is easy to be persuaded), God recompenses the gift of a short and small pleasure with great and everlasting joy. Therefore, the matter diligently weighed and considered, thus they think that all our actions, and in them the virtues themselves, be referred at the last to pleasure as their end and felicity. Pleasure they

[1] enjoin prescribe, impose on.

[2] cark worry about.

[3] let hinder.

call every motion and state of the body or mind wherein man has naturally delectation. Appetite they join to nature, and that not without a good cause, for like as not only the senses but also right reason covets whatsoever is naturally pleasant, so that it may be gotten without wrong or injury, not letting or debarring a greater pleasure, nor causing painful labour, even so those things that men by vain imagination do feign against nature to be pleasant (as though it lay in their power to change the things as they do the names of things), all such pleasures they believe to be of so small help and furtherance to felicity that they count them a great let and hindrance. Because that in whom they have once taken place, all his mind they possess with a false opinion of pleasure, so that there is no place left for true and natural delectations. For there be many things which of their own nature contain no pleasantness, yea, the most part of them much grief and sorrow, and yet through the perverse and malicious flickering enticements of lewd and unhonest desires be taken not only for special and sovereign pleasures, but also be counted among the chief causes of life. In this counterfeit kind of pleasure they put them that I spoke of before, which the better gowns they have on, the better men they think themselves. In the which thing they do twice err, for they be no less deceived in that they think their gown the better than they be, in that they think themselves the better. For if you consider the profitable use of the garment, why should wool of a finer spun thread be thought better than the wool of a coarse spun thread? Yet they, as though the one did pass the other by nature and not by their mistaking, advance themselves and think the price of their own persons thereby greatly increased. And therefore the honour which in a coarse gown they durst not have looked for, they require, as it were of duty, for their finer gown's sake. And if they be passed by without reverence, they take it displeasantly[1] and disdainfully. And again is it not like madness to take a pride in vain and unprofitable honours? For what natural or true pleasure dost thou take of another man's bare head or bowed knees?[2] Will this ease the pain of thy knees or remedy the frenzy of thy head? In this image of counterfeit pleasure, they be of a marvellous madness which, for the opinion of nobility, rejoice much in their own conceit,[3] because it was their fortune to come of such ancestors whose stock of long time has been counted rich (for now nobility is nothing else), specially rich in lands. And though their ancestors left them not one foot of land, or else they themselves have pissed it against the walls,[4] yet they think themselves not the less noble therefore of one here. In this number also they count them that take pleasure and delight (as I said) in gems and precious stones and think themselves almost gods if they chance to get an excellent one, especially of that kind which in that time of their own countrymen is had in highest estimation. For one kind of stone keeps not his price still in all countries and at all times. Nor they buy them not but taken out of the gold and bare,[5] no nor so neither until they have made the seller to swear that he will warrant and assure it to be a true stone and no counterfeit gem. Such care they take lest a counterfeit stone should deceive their eyes instead of a right stone. But why shouldest thou not take even as much pleasure in beholding a counterfeit stone which thine eye cannot discern from a right stone? They should both be of like value to thee, even as to the blind man. What shall I say of them that keep superfluous riches to take delectation only in the beholding and not in the use or occupying thereof? Do they take true pleasure, or else be they deceived with false pleasure? Or of them that be in a contrary vice, hiding the gold which they shall never occupy nor peradventure never see more? And whilst they take care lest they shall lose it, do lose it indeed. For what is it else when they hide it in the ground, taking it both from their own use and perchance from all other

[1] displeasantly disagreeably.

[2] bare head or bowed knees To remove one's hat and kneel was to show deference to one's superiors.

[3] conceit conception, ancestry.

[4] pissed it against the walls i.e., squandered or wasted it.

[5] taken out of the gold and bare taken out of the setting and laid bare.

men's also? And yet thou, when thou hast hid thy treasure, as one out of all care hopes for joy. The which treasure, if it should chance to be stolen and thou ignorant of the theft should die ten years after, all that ten years space that thou lived after thy money was stolen, what matter was it to thee whether it had been taken away or else safe as thou left it? Truly both ways like[1] profit came to thee.

To these so foolish pleasures they join dicers, whose madness they know by hearsay and not by use—hunters also, and hawkers—for what pleasure is there (say they) in casting the dice upon a table, which thou hast done so often that if there were any pleasure in it, yet the oft use might make thee wary thereof? Or what delight can there be, and not rather displeasure, in hearing the barking and howling of dogs? Or what greater pleasure is there to be felt when a dog follows an hare than when a dog follows a dog? For one thing is done in both, that is to say, running, if thou hast pleasure therein. But if the hope of slaughter and the expectation of tearing in pieces the beast does please thee, thou should rather be moved with pity to see a silly innocent hare murdered of a dog: the weak of the stronger, the fearful of the fierce, the innocent of the cruel and unmerciful. Therefore all this exercise of hunting, as a thing unworthy to be used of free men, the Utopians have rejected[2] to their butchers, to the which craft (as we said before) they appoint their bondmen. For they count hunting the lowest, the vilest, and most abject part of butchery, and the other parts of it more profitable and more honest, as bringing much more commodity, in that they kill beasts only for necessity, whereas the hunter seeks nothing but pleasure of the silly and woeful beasts' slaughter and murder. The which pleasure in beholding death they think does rise in the very beasts, either of a cruel affection of mind or else to be changed in continuance of time into cruelty by long use of so cruel a pleasure. These, therefore, and all such like, which be innumerable, though the common sort of people does take them for pleasures, yet they, seeing there is no natural pleasantness in them, do plainly determine them to have no affinity with true and right pleasure. For as touching that they do commonly move the sense with delectation (which seem to be a work of pleasure), this does nothing diminish their opinion. For not the nature of the thing, but their perverse and lewd custom is the cause hereof, which causes them to accept bitter or sour things for sweet things, even as women with child, in their vitiate and corrupt taste,[3] think pitch and tallow[4] sweeter than any honey. Howbeit, no man's judgement, depraved and corrupt either by sickness, or by custom, can change the nature of pleasure, more than it can do the nature of other things.

They make divers kinds of pleasures, for some they attribute to the soul and some to the body. To the soul they give intelligence and that delectation that comes of the contemplation of truth. Hereunto is joined the pleasant remembrance of the good life past. The pleasure of the body they divide into two parts. The first is when delectation is sensibly felt and perceived, which many times chances by the renewing and refreshing of those parts which our natural heat dries up. This comes by meat and drink, and sometimes whilst those things be expulsed and voided whereof is in the body over-great abundance. This pleasure is felt when we do our natural easement, or when we be doing the act of generation, or when the itching of any part is eased with rubbing or scratching. Sometimes pleasure rises exhibiting to any member nothing that it desires, nor taking from it any pain that it feels, which nevertheless tickles and moves our senses with a certain secret efficacy, but with a manifest motion turns them to it, as is that which comes of music.

The second part of bodily pleasure they say is that which consists and rests in the quiet and upright state of the body, and that truly is every man's own proper health intermingled and disturbed with no grief. For this, if it be not letted

[1] like similar (i.e., no profit at all).

[2] rejected left.

[3] vitiate and corrupt taste impaired and corrupt sense of taste.

[4] pitch and tallow tar and animal fat.

nor assaulted with no grief, is delectable of itself, though it be moved with no external or outward pleasure, for though it be not so plain and manifest to the sense as the greedy lust of eating and drinking, yet nevertheless many take it for the chiefest pleasure. All the Utopians grant it to be a right sovereign pleasure and, as you would say, the foundation and ground of all pleasures, as which even alone is able to make the state and condition of life delectable and pleasant, and, it being once taken away, there is no place left for any pleasure. For to be without grief, not having health, that they call insensibility and not pleasure.

The Utopians have long ago rejected and condemned the opinion of them which said that steadfast and quiet health (for this question also has been diligently debated among them) ought not therefore to be counted a pleasure, because they say it cannot be presently and sensibly perceived and felt by some outward motion. But of the contrary part now they agreed almost all in this, that health is a most sovereign pleasure. For seeing that in sickness (say they) is grief, which is a mortal enemy to pleasure even as sickness is to health, why should not then pleasure be in the quietness of health? For they say it makes nothing to this matter whether you say that sickness is a grief or that in sickness is grief, for all comes to one purpose. For whether health be a pleasure itself or a necessary cause of pleasure, as fire is of heat, truly both ways it follows that they cannot be without pleasure that be in perfect health. Furthermore, whilst we eat (say they), then health, which began to be appaired,[1] fights by the help of food against hunger, in the which fight, whilst health by little and little gets the upper hand, that same proceeding and (as ye would say) that onwardness to the wont[2] strength ministers that pleasure whereby we be so refreshed. Health, therefore, which in the conflict is joyful, shall it not be merry when it has gotten the victory? But as soon as it has recovered the pristinate[3] strength, which thing only in all the fight it coveted, shall it incontinent be astonied?[4] Nor shall it not know nor embrace its own wealth and goodness? For where it is said health cannot be felt, this, they think, is nothing true. For what man waking, say they, feels not himself in health but he that is not? Is there any man so possessed with stonish insensibility or with lethargy, that is to say the sleeping sickness, that he will not grant health to be acceptable to him and delectable? But what other thing is delectation than that which by another name is called pleasure?

They embrace chiefly the pleasures of the mind, for them they count the chiefest and most principal of all. The chief part of them they think does come of the exercise of virtue and conscience of good life. Of these pleasures that the body ministers, they give the pre-eminence to health, for the delight of eating and drinking and whatsoever has any like pleasantness they determine to be pleasures much to be desired, but no other ways than for health's sake. For such things of their own proper nature be not so pleasant, but in that they resist sickness privily stealing on. Therefore, like as it is a wise man's part rather to avoid sickness than to wish for medicines, and rather to drive away and put to flight careful griefs than to call for comfort, so it is much better not to need this kind of pleasure than thereby to be eased of the contrary grief. The which kind of pleasure if any man take for his felicity, that man must needs grant that then he shall be in most felicity if he live that life which is led in continual hunger, thirst, itching, eating, drinking, scratching, and rubbing. The which life how not only foul, and unhonest, but also how miserable and wretched it is, who perceives not? These doubtless be the basest pleasures of all, as unpure and unperfect, for they never come but accompanied with their contrary griefs. As with the pleasure of eating is joined hunger, and that after no very equal sort, for of these two the grief is both the more vehement and also of longer continuance, for it begins before the pleasure and ends not until [1] appaired impaired.

[2] wont familiar.
[3] pristinate original.
[4] astonied turned to stone, insensible; astonished.

the pleasure die with it, wherefore such pleasures they think not greatly to be set by, but in that they be necessary. Howbeit, they have delight also in these, and thankfully knowledge[1] the tender love of mother nature, which with most pleasant delectation allures her children to that, to the necessary use whereof they must from time to time continually be forced and driven. For how wretched and miserable should our life be if these daily griefs of hunger and thirst could not be driven away but with bitter potions and sour medicines, as the other diseases be wherewith we be seldomer troubled? But beauty, strength, nimbleness, these as peculiar and pleasant gifts of nature they make much of. But those pleasures that be received by the ears, the eyes, and the nose, which nature wills to be proper and peculiar to man (for no other living creature does behold the fairness and the beauty of the world, or is moved with any respect of savours,[2] but only for the diversity of meats, neither perceives the concordant and discordant distances of sounds and tunes), these pleasures, I say, they accept and allow as certain pleasant rejoicings of life. But in all things this cautel[3] they use, that a less pleasure hinder not a bigger, and that the pleasure be no cause of displeasure, which they think to follow of necessity if the pleasure be unhonest. But yet to despise the comeliness of beauty, to waste the bodily strength, to turn nimbleness into sloughishness,[4] to consume and make feeble the body with fasting, to do injury to health, and to reject the pleasant motions of nature, unless a man neglect these commodities whilst he does with a fervent zeal procure the wealth of others or the common profit, for the which pleasure forborne he is in hope of a greater pleasure at God's hand, else for a vain shadow of virtue for the wealth and profit of no man to punish himself, or to the intent he may be able courageously to suffer adversity which perchance shall never come to him, this to do they think it a point of extreme madness and a token of a man cruelly minded towards himself, and unkind towards nature, as one so disdaining to be in her danger that he renounces and refuses all her benefits.

This is their sentence and opinion of virtue and pleasure, and they believe that by man's reason none can be found truer than this, unless any godlier be inspired into man from Heaven. Wherein, whether they believe well or no, neither the time does suffer us to discuss, neither it is now necessary, for we have taken upon us to show and declare their lores and ordinances,[5] and not to defend them. But this thing I believe verily, howsoever these decrees be, that there is in no place of the world neither a more excellent people, neither a more flourishing commonwealth. They be light and quick of body, full of activity and nimbleness, and of more strength than a man would judge them by their stature, which for all that is not too low. And though their soil be not very fruitful nor their air very wholesome, yet against the air they so defend them with temperate diet, and so order and husband their ground with diligent travail, that in no country is greater increase and plenty of corn and cattle, nor men's bodies of longer life and subject or apt to fewer diseases. There, therefore, a man may see well and diligently exploited and furnished not only those things which husbandmen do commonly in other countries, as by craft and cunning to remedy the barrenness of the ground, but also a whole wood by the hands of the people plucked up by the roots in one place and set again in another place. Wherein was had regard and consideration not of plenty, but of commodious carriage,[6] that wood and timber might be nigher to the sea or the rivers or the cities, for it is less labour and business to carry grain far by land than wood.

The people be gentle, merry, quick, and fine-witted, delighting in quietness and, when need requires, able to abide and suffer much bodily labour, else they be not greatly desirous and fond

[1] knowledge acknowledge.

[2] savours tastes and smells.

[3] cautel precaution, restriction.

[4] sloughishness sluggishness.

[5] lores and ordinances doctrines and institutions, systems of government and discipline.

[6] commodious carriage convenience of transportation.

of it, but in the exercise and study of the mind they be never weary. When they had heard me speak of the Greek literature or learning (for in Latin there was nothing that I thought they would greatly allow besides historians and poets), they made wonderful earnest and importunate suit unto me that I would teach and instruct them in that tongue and learning. I began therefore to read unto them, at the first truly more because I would not seem to refuse the labour than that I hoped that they would anything profit therein. But when I had gone forward a little, I perceived incontinent by their diligence that my labour should not be bestowed in vain, for they began so easily to fashion their letters, so plainly to pronounce the words, so quickly to learn by heart, and so surely to rehearse the same, that I marvelled at it, saving that the most part of them were fine and chosen wits and of ripe age, picked out of the company of the learned men which not only of their own free and voluntary will, but also by the commandment of the counsel, undertook to learn this language. Therefore, in less than three years space there was nothing in the Greek tongue that they lacked. They were able to read good authors without any stay,[1] if the book were not false.[2] This kind of learning, as I suppose, they took so much the sooner because it is somewhat alliant[3] to them. For I think that this nation took their beginning of the Greeks because their speech, which in all other points is not much unlike the Persian tongue, keeps divers signs and tokens of the Greek language in the names of their cities and of their magistrates. They have of me (for when I was determined to enter into my fourth voyage, I cast into the ship in the stead of merchandise a pretty fardel[4] of books, because I intended to come again rather never than shortly), they have, I say, of me the most part of Plato's works, more of Aristotle's, also Theophrastus of plants, but in divers places (which I am sorry for) unperfect. For whilst we were a-shipboard, a marmoset[5] chanced upon the book as it was negligently laid by, which wantonly playing therewith plucked out certain leaves and tore them in pieces. Of them that have written the grammar, they have only Lascaris, for Theodorus I carried not with me, nor never a dictionary but Hesichius and Dioscorides.[6] They set great store by Plutarch's books, and they be delighted with Lucian's merry conceits and jests.[7] Of the poets, they have Aristophanes, Homer, Euripides, and Sophocles in Aldus small print.[8] Of the historians, they have Thucydides, Herodotus, and Herodian.[9] Also my companion, Tricius Apinatus,[10] carried with him physic[11] books, certain small works of Hippocrates, and Galen's Microtechne,[12] the which book they have in great estimation. For though there be almost no nation under Heaven that has less need of physic than they, yet this notwithstanding, physic is nowhere in greater honour because they count the knowledge of it among the goodliest and most profitable parts of philosophy. For whilst they by the help of this philosophy search out the secret mysteries of nature, they think themselves to receive thereby not only wonderful great pleasure, but also to obtain great thanks and favour of the author and

1 stay difficulties.

2 false i.e., flawed by errors.

3 alliant related.

4 pretty fardel considerable collection.

5 marmoset small monkey.

6 Lascaris … Dioscorides Constantine Lascarus and Theodorus of Gaza both wrote books of grammar; Hesichius (c. 5th century CE) wrote a Greek dictionary; Dioscorides (1st century CE) wrote a treatise on the medical properties of plants.

7 Plutarch's books … jests Plutarch (c. 50-120 CE) wrote a work on ethics, Moralia, as well as a work on the lives of important Greeks and Romans; Lucian wrote works in which serious ideas were discussed under the guise of jests, which fulfils the notion that literature should teach and delight (as does Utopia).

8 Aldus small print Aldus Manutius (1449-1515) was a Venetian printer known for his publication of Greek texts in Greek type, including editions of all the poets listed.

9 Thucydides … Herodian Thucydides (c. 460-c. 400 BCE) and Herodotus (c. 480-c. 425 BCE) are Greek historians; Herodian of Syria (c. 175-250 CE) wrote a history of Roman emperors.

10 Tricius Apinatus His name means "trifles and toys" and is drawn from Martial's Epigrams.

11 physic medicine.

12 Hippocrates … Microtechne Hippocrates (5th century BCE) and Galen (c. 199-129 BCE) were influential Greek writers of medical texts.

maker thereof, whom they think, according to the fashion of other artificers, to have set forth the marvellous and gorgeous frame of the world for man with great affection intentively to behold, whom only he has made of wit and capacity to consider and understand the excellency of so great a work. And therefore he bears (say they) more goodwill and love to the curious and diligent beholder and viewer of his work and marveller at the same, than he does to him which, like a very brute beast without wit and reason or as one without sense or moving, has no regard to so great and so wonderful a spectacle.

The wits, therefore, of the Utopians, inured[1] and exercised in learning, be marvellous quick in the invention of feats helping anything to the advantage and wealth of life. Howbeit, two feats they may thank us for, that is the science of imprinting and the craft of making paper. And yet not only us but chiefly and principally themselves. For when we showed to them Aldus his print[2] in books of paper, and told them of the stuff whereof paper is made and of the feat of graving[3] letters, speaking somewhat more than we could plainly declare (for there was none of us that knew perfectly either the one or the other), they forthwith very wittily conjectured the thing. And whereas before they wrote only in skins, in barks of trees, and in reeds, now they have attempted to make paper and to imprint letters. And though at the first it proved not all of the best, yet by often assaying the same they shortly got the feat of both, and have so brought the matter about that, if they had copies of Greek authors, they could lack no books. But now they have no more than I rehearsed before, saving that by printing of books they have multiplied and increased the same into many thousands of copies.

Whosoever comes thither to see the land, being excellent in any gift of wit or through much and long journeying well experienced and seen in the knowledge of many countries (for the which cause we were very welcome to them), him they receive and entertain wondrous gently and lovingly, for they have delight to hear what is done in every land, howbeit very few merchant men come thither. For what should they bring thither unless it were iron, or else gold and silver, which they had rather carry home again? Also such things as are to be carried out of their land, they think it more wisdom to carry that gear themselves than that other should come thither to fetch it, to the intent they may the better know the outlands on every side of them and keep in ure[4] the feat and knowledge of sailing.

Of Bondmen, Sick Persons, Wedlock, and Divers Other Matters.

They neither make bondmen of prisoners taken in battle, unless it be in battle that they fought themselves, nor of bondmen's children, nor, to be short, of any such as they can get out of foreign countries though he were there a bondman, but either such as among themselves for heinous offences be punished with bondage, or else such as in the cities of other lands for great trespasses be condemned to death. And of this sort of bondmen they have most store. For many of them they bring home, sometimes paying very little for them, yea, most commonly getting them for gramercy.[5] These sorts of bondmen they keep not only in continual work and labour, but also in bands.[6] But their own men they handle hardest whom they judge more desperate and to have deserved greater punishment, because they being so godly brought up to virtue in so excellent a commonwealth could not for all that be refrained from misdoing. Another kind of bondmen they have when a vile drudge, being a poor labourer in another country, does choose of his own free will to be a bondman among them. These they entreat and order honestly and entertain almost as gently

[1] inured accustomed.

[2] Aldus his print Aldus's print. On Aldus Manutius, see p. 57, note 8; he introduced italic type.

[3] graving engraving.

[4] in ure in use.

[5] for gramercy "for a thank you," for next to nothing.

[6] bands bonds, shackles.

as their own free citizens, saving that they put them to a little more labour as thereto accustomed. If any such be disposed to depart thence (which seldom is seen), they neither hold him against his will, neither send him away with empty hands.

The sick (as I said) they see to with great affection and let nothing at all pass concerning either physic or good diet whereby they may be restored again to their health. Such as be sick of incurable diseases they comfort with sitting by them, with talking with them, and, to be short, with all manner of helps that may be. But if the disease be not only incurable but also full of continual pain and anguish, then the priests and the magistrates exhort the man, seeing he is not able to do any duty of life and by overliving his own death is noisome and irksome to others and grievous to himself, that he will determine with himself no longer to cherish that pestilent and painful disease, and seeing his life is to him but a torment, that he will not be unwilling to die, but rather take a good hope to him and either dispatch himself out of that painful life as out of a prison or a rack of torment, or else suffer himself willingly to be rid out of it by other. And in so doing they tell him he shall do wisely, seeing by his death he shall lose no commodity, but end his pain. And because in that act he shall follow the counsel of the priests, that is to say of the interpreters of God's will and pleasure, they show him that he shall do like a godly and a virtuous man. They that be thus persuaded finish their lives willingly, either with hunger or else die in their sleep without any feeling of death. But they cause none such to die against his will, nor they use no less diligence and attendance about him, believing this to be an honourable death. Else he that kills himself before that the priests and the council have allowed the cause of his death, him as unworthy either to be buried or with fire to be consumed, they cast unburied into some stinking marsh.

The woman is not married before she be eighteen years old. The man is four years older before he marry. If either the man or the woman be proved to have actually offended before their marriage with another, the party that so has trespassed is sharply punished, and both the offenders be forbidden ever after in all their life to marry, unless the fault be forgiven by the prince's pardon. But both the goodman and the goodwife of the house where that offence was committed, as being slack and negligent in looking to their charge, be in danger of great reproach and infamy. That offence is so sharply punished because they perceive that unless they be diligently kept from the liberty of this vice, few will join together in the love of marriage, wherein all the life must be led with one, and also all the griefs and displeasures coming therewith patiently be taken and borne. Furthermore, in choosing wives and husbands they observe earnestly and straitly a custom which seemed to us very fond and foolish. For a sad[1] and an honest matron shows the woman, be she maid or widow, naked to the wooer. And likewise a sage and discreet man exhibits the wooer naked to the woman. At this custom we laughed and disallowed it as foolish. But they, on the other part, do greatly wonder at the folly of all other nations which in buying a colt,[2] whereas a little money is in hazard, be so chary[3] and circumspect that though he be almost all bare, yet they will not buy him unless the saddle and all the harness be taken off, lest under those coverings be hid some gall or sore. And yet in choosing a wife, which shall be either pleasure or displeasure to them all their life after, they be so reckless that all the residue of the woman's body being covered with clothes, they esteem her scarcely by one hand-breadth (for they can see no more but her face), and so do join her to them not without great jeopardy of evil agreeing together if anything in her body afterward should chance to offend and mislike them.

For all men be not so wise as to have respect to the virtuous conditions of the party, and the endowments of the body cause the virtues of the mind more to be esteemed and regarded, yea, even in the marriages of wise men. Verily, so foul deformity may be hid under those coverings that it may quite alienate and take away the man's mind from his wife when it shall not be lawful for their bodies to be separate again. If such deformity happen by any chance after the marriage is consummate and finished, well, there is no remedy but patience. Every man must take his fortune well-a-worth.[1] But it were well done that a law were made whereby all such deceits might be eschewed[2] and avoided beforehand.

1 sad serious.

2 colt More's first wife was Jane Colt (d. 1511).

3 chary cautious.

And this were they constrained more earnestly to look upon because they only of the nations in that part of the world be content every man with one wife apiece. And matrimony is there never broken but by death, except adultery break the bond or else the intolerable wayward manners of either party. For if either of them find themselves for any such cause grieved, they may by the license of the council change and take another, but the other party lives ever after in infamy and out of wedlock. Howbeit, the husband to put away his wife for no other fault but for that some mishap is fallen to her body, this by no means they will suffer. For they judge it a great point of cruelty that anybody in their most need of help and comfort should be cast off and forsaken and that old age, which both brings sickness with it and is a sickness itself, should unkindly and unfaithfully be dealt withal. But now and then it chances, whereas the man and the woman cannot well agree between themselves, both of them finding other with whom they hope to live more quietly and merrily, that they by the full consent of them both be divorced asunder and married again to other. But that not without the authority of the council, which agrees to no divorces before they and their wives have diligently tried and examined the matter. Yea, and then also they be loath to consent to it, because they know this to be the next way to break love between man and wife, to be in easy hope of a new marriage.

Breakers of wedlock be punished with most grievous bondage. And if both the offenders were married, then the parties which in that behalf have suffered wrong, being divorced from the avoutrers,[3] be married together, if they will, or else to whom they lust. But if either of them both do still continue in love toward so unkind a bedfellow, the use of wedlock is not to them forbidden if the party faultless be disposed to follow in toiling and drudgery the person which for that offence is condemned to bondage. And very oft it chances that the repentance of the one and the earnest diligence of the other does so move the prince with pity and compassion that he restores the bond person from servitude to liberty and freedom again. But if the same party be taken eftsoons[4] in that fault, there is no other way but death. To other trespassers no prescript punishment is appointed by any law, but according to the heinousness of the offence, or contrary, so the punishment is moderated by the discretion of the council. The husbands chastise their wives and the parents their children, unless they have done any so horrible an offence that the open punishment thereof makes much for the advancement of honest manners. But most commonly the most heinous faults be punished with the incommodity of bondage, for that they suppose to be to the offenders no less grief and to the commonwealth more profit than if they should hastily put them to death and so make them quite out of the way. For there comes more profit of their labour than of their death, and by their example they fear[5] others the longer from like offences. But if they, being thus used, do rebel and kick again, then forsooth they be slain as desperate and wild beasts whom neither prison nor chain could restrain and keep under. But they which take their bondage patiently be not left all hopeless, for after they have been broken and tamed with long miseries, if then they show such repentance as thereby it may be perceived that they be sorrier for their offence than for their punishment, sometimes by the prince's prerogative and sometimes by the voice and [1] well-a-worth for what it's worth; as it comes.

[2] eschewed avoided.

[3] avoutrers adulterers.

[4] eftsoons again.

[5] fear frighten.

consent of the people their bondage either is mitigated or else clean released and forgiven. He that moves to avoutry[1] is in no less danger and jeopardy than if he had committed avoutry indeed, for in all offences they count the intent and pretenced purpose as evil as the act or deed itself, thinking that no let ought to excuse him that did his best to have no let.

They have singular delight and pleasure in fools. And as it is a great reproach to do any of them hurt or injury, so they prohibit not to take pleasure of foolishness, for that, they think, does much good to the fools. And if any man be so sad and stern that he cannot laugh neither at their words nor at their deeds, none of them be committed to his tuition,[2] for fear lest he would not entreat them gently and favourably enough to whom they should bring no delectation (for other goodness in them is none), much less any profit should they yield him. To mock a man for his deformity or for that[3] he lacks any part or limb of his body is counted great dishonesty and reproach, not to him that is mocked, but to him that mocks, which unwisely does embraid[4] any man of that as a vice that was not in his power to eschew.

Also, as they count and reckon very little wit to be in him that regards not natural beauty and comeliness, so to help the same with paintings[5] is taken for a vain and a wanton pride, not without great infamy. For they know even by very experience that no comeliness of beauty does so highly commend and advance the wives in the conceit of their husbands as honest conditions and lowliness.[6] For as love is oftentimes won with beauty, so it is not kept, preserved, and continued but by virtue and obedience.

They do not only fear their people from doing evil by punishments, but also allure them to virtue with rewards of honour. Therefore, they set up in the marketplace the images of notable men and of such as have been great and bountiful benefactors to the commonwealth for the perpetual memory of their good acts, and also that the glory and renown of the ancestors may stir and provoke their posterity to virtue. He that inordinately and ambitiously desires promotions is left all hopeless for ever attaining any promotion as long as he lives.

They live together lovingly, for no magistrate is either haughty or fearful.[7] Fathers they be called and like fathers they use themselves. The citizens (as it is their duty) willingly exhibit unto them due honour without any compulsion. Nor the prince himself is not known from the other by princely apparel or a robe of state, nor by a crown or diadem royal or cap of maintenance,[8] but by a little sheaf of corn carried before him. And so a taper of wax is borne before the bishop, whereby only he is known.

They have but few laws, for to people so instruct and institute[9] very few do suffice. Yea, this thing they chiefly reprove among other nations, that innumerable books of laws and expositions upon the same be not sufficient. But they think it against all right and justice that men should be bound to those laws which either be in number more than be able to be read or else blinder and darker than that any man can well understand them. Furthermore, they utterly exclude and banish all attorneys, proctors, and sergeants-at-the-law, which craftily handle matters and subtly dispute of the laws, for they think it most meet that every man should plead his own matter and tell the same tale before the judge that he would tell to his man of law. So shall there be less circumstance of words and the truth shall sooner come to light whilst the judge with a discreet judgement does weigh the words of him whom no lawyer has instruct[ed] with deceit, and whilst he

---

1 avoutry adultery.

2 tuition guardianship, education.

3 for that because.

4 embraid upbraid, taunt.

5 to help the same with paintings to improve one's appearance with cosmetics.

6 conceit opinion; lowliness meekness, humility.

7 fearful a source of fear.

8 cap of maintenance A "cap of maintenance" was formerly worn as a symbol of official dignity or high rank; sometimes it was carried before the individual in processions.

9 instruct and institute educated and established.

helps and bears out simple wits against the false and malicious circumventions of crafty children. This is hard to be observed in other countries in so infinite a number of blind and intricate laws. But in Utopia every man is a cunning lawyer, for (as I said) they have very few laws and the plainer and grosser that any interpretation is, that they allow as most just. For all laws (say they) be made and published only to the intent that by them every man should be put in remembrance of his duty. But the crafty and subtle interpretation of them (forasmuch as few can attain thereto) can put very few in that remembrance, whereas the simple, the plain, and gross[1] meaning of the laws is open to every man. Else as touching the vulgar sort of the people, which be both most in number and have most need to know their duties, were it not as good for them that no law were made at all as, when it is made, to bring so blind an interpretation upon it that without great wit and long arguing no man can discuss it? To the finding out whereof neither the gross judgement[2] of the people can attain, neither the whole life of them that be occupied in working for their livings can suffice thereto.

These virtues of the Utopians have caused their next neighbours and borderers, which live free and under no subjection (for the Utopians long ago have delivered many of them from tyranny), to take magistrates of them, some for a year and some for five years space, which, when the time of their office is expired, they bring home again with honour and praise and take new again with them into their country. These nations have undoubtedly very well and wholesomely provided for their commonwealths. For seeing that both the making and the marring of the weal public does depend and hang upon the manners of the rulers and magistrates, what officers could they more wisely have chosen than those which cannot be led from honesty by bribes (for to them that shortly after shall depart thence into their own country, money should be unprofitable), nor yet be moved either with favour or malice towards any man, as being strangers and unacquainted with the people? The which two vices of affection and avarice, where they take place in judgements, incontinent they break justice, the strongest and surest bond of a commonwealth. These peoples which fetch their officers and rulers from them, the Utopians call their fellows, and others to whom they have been beneficial they call their friends.

As touching leagues,[3] which in other places between country and country be so oft concluded, broken, and renewed, they never make none with any nation. For to what purpose serve leagues, say they? As though nature had not set sufficient love between man and man. And who so regards not nature, think you that he will pass for[4] words? They be brought into this opinion chiefly because that in those parts of the world, leagues between princes be wont to be kept and observed very slenderly. For here in Europa,[5] and especially in these parts where the faith and religion of Christ reigns, the majesty of leagues is everywhere esteemed holy and inviolable, partly through the justice and goodness of princes, and partly at the reverence and motion of the head bishops,[6] which like as they make no promise themselves but they do very religiously perform the same, so they exhort all princes in any wise to abide by their promises, and them that refuse or deny so to do, by their pontifical power and authority they compel thereto. And surely they think well that it might seem a very reproachful thing if in the leagues of them which by a peculiar name be called faithful, faith should have no place. But in that newfound part of the world, which is scarcely so far from us beyond the line equinoctial as our life and manners be dissident from theirs, no trust nor confidence is in leagues. But the more and holier ceremonies the league is knit up with, the sooner it is broken by some cavillation[7] found in

[1] gross obvious.

[2] gross judgement general (implied inferior) opinion.

[3] leagues alliances.

[4] pass for care about.

[5] Europa Europe.

[6] the head bishops The Latin text refers to popes here.

[7] cavillation frivolous objection.

the words, which many times of purpose be so craftily put in and placed that the bands can never be so sure nor so strong, but they will find some hole open to creep out at and to break both league and truth. The which crafty dealing, yea, the which fraud and deceit, if they should know it to be practised among private men in their bargains and contracts, they would incontinent cry out at it with an open mouth and a sour countenance as an offense most detestable and worthy to be punished with a shameful death, yea, even very they[1] that advance themselves authors of like counsel given to princes. Wherefore it may well be thought either that all justice is but a base and a low virtue, and which avails itself far under the high dignity of kings, or at the leastwise, that there be two justices: the one meet[2] for the inferior sort of the people, going afoot and creeping low by the ground and bound down on every side with many bands, because it shall not run at rovers;[3] the other a princely virtue, which like as it is of much higher majesty than the other poor justice, so also it is of much more liberty, as to the which nothing is unlawful that it lusts after.

These manners of princes (as I said), which be there so evil keepers of leagues, cause the Utopians, as I suppose, to make no leagues at all, which perchance would change their mind if they lived here. Howbeit, they think that though leagues be never so faithfully observed and kept, yet the custom of making leagues was very evil begun. For this causes men (as though nations which be separate asunder by the space of a little hill or a river were coupled together by no society or bond of nature) to think themselves born adversaries and enemies one to another, and that it were lawful for the one to seek the death and destruction of the other if leagues were not, yea, and that after the leagues be accorded, friendship does not grow and increase. But the license of robbing and stealing does still remain, as far forth as, for lack of foresight and advisement in writing the words of the league, any sentence or clause to the contrary is not therein sufficiently comprehended. But they be of a contrary opinion: that is, that no man ought to be counted an enemy which has done no injury, and that the fellowship of nature is a strong league, and that men be better and more surely knit together by love and benevolence than by covenants of leagues, by hearty affection of mind than by words.

Of Warfare

War or battle, as a thing very beastly and yet to no kind of beasts in so much use as to man, they do detest and abhor. And contrary to the custom almost of all other nations, they count nothing so much against glory as glory gotten in war. And therefore, though they do daily practise and exercise themselves in the discipline of war, and not only the men but also the women upon certain appointed days, lest they should be to seek in[4] the feat of arms if need should require, yet they never go to battle but either in the defence of their own country or to drive out of their friends' land the enemies that have invaded it, or by their power to deliver from the yoke and bondage of tyranny some people that be therewith oppressed, which thing they do of mere pity and compassion. Howbeit, they send help to their friends not ever in their defence, but sometimes also to requite and revenge injuries before to them done. But this they do not unless their counsel and advice in the matter be asked whiles it is yet new and fresh. For if they find the cause probable, and if the contrary part[5] will not restore again such things as be of them justly demanded, then they be the chief authors and makers of the war, which they do not only as oft as by inroads and invasions of soldiers' preys and booties be driven away,[6] but then also much more mortally when their friends' merchants in any land, either under the pretence of [1] very they these very persons.

[2] meet proper.
[3] at rovers at random.
[4] to seek in without skill in.
[5] contrary part opposition.
[6] not only … driven away not only when soldiers invade and take prey and "booties," or treasures.

unjust laws or else by the wresting and wrong understanding of good laws, do sustain an unjust accusation under the colour of justice. Neither the battle which the Utopians fought for the Nephelogetes against the Alaopolitans,[1] a little before our time, was made for any other cause, but that the Nephelogete merchant men, as the Utopians thought, suffered wrong of the Alaopolitans under the pretence of right. But whether it were right or wrong, it was with so cruel and mortal war revenged, the countries round about joining their help and power to the puissance and malice of both parties, that most flourishing and wealthy peoples, being some of them shrewdly shaken and some of them sharply beaten, the mischiefs were not finished nor ended until the Alaopolitans at the last were yielded up as bondmen into the jurisdiction of the Nephelogetes, for the Utopians fought not this war for themselves. And yet the Nephelogetes before the war, when the Alaopolitans flourished in wealth, were nothing to be compared with them. So eagerly the Utopians prosecute the injuries done to their friends, yea, in money matters, and not their own likewise. For if they by covin or guile be wiped besides[2] their goods—so that no violence be done to their bodies—they wreak their anger by abstaining from occupying[3] with that nation until they have made satisfaction. Not for because they set less store by their own citizens than by their friends, but that they take the loss of their friends' money more heavily than the loss of their own, because that their friends' merchant men, forasmuch as that [which] they lose is their own private goods, sustain great damage by the loss. But their own citizens lose nothing but of the common goods and of that which was at home plentiful and almost superfluous, else had it not been sent forth; therefore no man feels the loss. And for this cause they think it too cruel an act to revenge that loss with the death of many, the incommodity of the which loss no man feels neither in his life nor yet in his living. But if it chance that any of their men in any other country be maimed or killed, whether it be done by a common or a private council, knowing and trying out the truth of the matter by their ambassadors, unless the offenders be rendered unto them in recompense of the injury they will not be appeased, but incontinent they proclaim war against them. The offenders yielded, they punish either with death or with bondage. They be not only sorry, but also ashamed to achieve the victory with bloodshed, counting it great folly to buy precious wares too dear. They rejoice and avaunt[4] themselves if they vanquish and oppress their enemies by craft and deceit. And for that act they make a general triumph, and as if the matter were manfully[5] handled, they set up a pillar of stone in the place where they so vanquished their enemies in token of the victory. For then they glory, then they boast and crack that they have played the men indeed when they have so overcome as no other living creature but only man could, that is to say by the might and puissance of wit. For with bodily strength (say they) bears, lions, boars, wolves, dogs, and other wild beasts do fight, and as the most part of them do pass us in strength and fierce courage, so in wit and reason we be much stronger than they all. Their chief and principal purpose in war is to obtain that thing which, if they had before obtained, they would not have moved battle. But if that be not possible, they take so cruel vengeance of them which be in the fault that ever after they be afraid to do the like.

This is their chief and principal intent which they immediately and first of all prosecute and set forward, but yet so that they be more circumspect in avoiding and eschewing jeopardies than they be desirous of praise and renown. Therefore, immediately after that war is once solemnly denounced,[6] they procure many proclamations signed with their own common seal to be set up

[1] Nephelogetes from Greek, "people born in the clouds"; Alaopolitans from Greek, "people without a country."

[2] wiped besides robbed of.

[3] occupying trading.

[4] avaunt praise.

[5] manfully bravely.

[6] denounced announced.

privily at one time in their enemy's land in places most frequented. In these proclamations they promise great rewards to him that will kill their enemy's prince, and somewhat less gifts, but them very great also, for every head of them whose names be in the said proclamations contained. They be those whom they count their chief adversaries next unto the prince. Whatsoever is prescribed unto him that kills any of the proclaimed persons, that is doubled to him that brings any of the same to them alive, yea, and to the proclaimed persons themselves if they will change their minds and come into them, taking their parts, they proffer the same great rewards with pardon and surety of their lives. Therefore it quickly comes to pass that their enemies have all other men in suspicion, and be unfaithful and mistrusting among themselves one to another, living in great fear and in no less jeopardy. For it is well known that divers times the most part of them (and specially the prince himself) have been betrayed of them in whom they put their most hope and trust, so that there is no manner of act nor deed that gifts and rewards do not enforce men unto, and in rewards they keep no measure. But remembering and considering into how great hazard and jeopardy they call them, endeavour themselves to recompense the greatness of the danger with like great benefits, and therefore they promise not only wonderful great abundance of gold, but also lands of great revenues lying in most safe places among their friends. And their promises they perform faithfully without any fraud or covin. This custom of buying and selling adversaries among other people is disallowed as a cruel act of a base and a cowardish mind. But they in this behalf think themselves much praiseworthy, as who, like wise men, by this means dispatch great wars without any battle or skirmish. Yea they count it also a deed of pity and mercy because that by the death of a few offenders the lives of a great number of innocents, as well of their own men as also of their enemies, be ransomed and saved which in fighting should have been slain. For they do no less pity the base and common sort of their enemies' people than they do their own, knowing that they be driven and enforced to war against their wills by the furious madness of their princes and heads. If by none of these means the matter go forward as they would have it, then they procure occasions of debate and dissension to be spread among their enemies, as by bringing the prince's brother or some of the noblemen in hope to obtain the kingdom. If this way prevail not, then they raise up the people that be next neighbours and borderers to their enemies and them they set in their necks[1] under the colour of some old title of right, such as kings do never lack. To them they promise their help and aid in their war, and, as for money, they give them abundance. But of their own citizens they send to them few or none, whom they make so much of and love so entirely that they would not be willing to change any of them for their adversary's prince. But their gold and silver, because they keep it all for this only purpose, they lay it out frankly and freely, as who should live even as wealthily if they had bestowed it every penny. Yea, and besides their riches which they keep at home, they have also an infinite treasure abroad, by reason that (as I said before) many nations be in their debt.

Therefore, they hire soldiers out of all countries and send them to battle, but chiefly of the Zapoletes.[2] This people is five hundred miles from Utopia eastward. They be hideous, savage, and fierce, dwelling in wild woods and high mountains where they were bred and brought up. They be of an hard nature, able to abide and sustain heat, cold, and labour, abhorring from all delicate dainties,[3] occupying no husbandry nor tillage of the ground, homely and rude both in building of their houses and in their apparel, given unto no goodness, but only to the breeding and bringing up of cattle. The most part of their living is by hunting and stealing. They be born only to war, which they diligently and earnestly seek for, and when they have gotten it, they be wondrous glad thereof.

---

1 set in their necks put on top of or close by them.

2 Zapoletes from Greek, "busy sellers."

3 abhorring from all delicate dainties disliking or shunning all ease and delicacy.

They go forth of their country in great companies together and whosoever lacks soldiers, there they proffer their service for small wages. This is only the craft they have to get their living by. They maintain their life by seeking their death. For them whom with they be in wages they fight hardily, fiercely, and faithfully, but they bind themselves for no certain time. But upon this condition they enter into bonds that the next day they will take part with the other side for greater wages, and the next day after that they will be ready to come back again for a little more money. There be few wars thereaway wherein is not a great number of them in both parties. Therefore, it daily chances that nigh kinsfolk which were hired together on one part, and there very friendly and familiarly used themselves one with another, shortly after being separate in contrary parts, run one against another enviously and fiercely, and forgetting both kindred and friendship thrust their swords one in another. And that for none other cause but that they be hired of contrary princes for a little money, which they do so highly regard and esteem that they will easily be provoked to change parts for a half-penny more wages by the day. So quickly they have taken a smack in[1] covetousness, which for all that is to them no profit, for that [which] they get by fighting immediately they spend unthriftily and wretchedly in riot. This people fights for the Utopians against all nations because they give them greater wages than any other nation will. For the Utopians, like as they seek good men to use well, so they seek these evil and vicious men to abuse, whom, when need requires, with promises of great rewards they put forth into great jeopardies, from whence the most part of them never come again to ask their rewards. But to them that remain alive they pay that which they promised faithfully that they may be the more willing to put themselves in like danger another time. Nor the Utopians pass not how many of them they bring to destruction, for they believe that they should do a very good deed for all mankind if they could rid out of the world all that foul stinking den of that most wicked and cursed people.

Next unto these they use the soldiers of them for whom they fight, and then the help of their other friends, and last of all they join to their own citizens, among whom they give to one of tried virtue and prowess the rule, governance, and conduction[2] of the whole army. Under him they appoint two others, which, whilst he is safe, be both private and out of office.[3] But if he be taken or slain, the one of the other two succeeds him as it were by inheritance. And if the second miscarry, then the third takes his room, lest that (as the chance[4] of battle is uncertain and doubtful) the jeopardy or death of the captain should bring the whole army in hazard.

They choose soldiers out of every city, those which put forth themselves willingly, for they thrust no man forth into war against his will because they believe if any man be fearful and faint-hearted of nature, he will not only do no manful and hardy act himself, but also be occasion of cowardice to his fellows. But if any battle be made against their own country, then they put these cowards (so that[5] they be strong-bodied) in ships among other bold-hearted men, or else they dispose them upon the walls[6] from whence they may not fly. Thus, what for shame that their enemies be at hand and what for because they be without hope of running away, they forget all fear. And many times extreme necessity turns cowardice into prowess and manliness. But as none of them is thrust forth of his country into war against his will, so women that be willing to accompany their husbands in times of war be not prohibited or letted. Yea, they provoke and exhort them to it with praises. And in set field[7] the wives do stand every one by their own husband's side. Also every man is compassed next about with his

1 taken a smack in developed a taste for.

2 conduction leadership.

3 whilst he is safe, be both private and out of office i.e., while the ruler is safe, the two others hold no official position.

4 chance outcome.

5 so that as long as.

6 walls i.e., the city walls.

7 in set field in the order of battle.

own children, kinsfolks, and alliance, that they whom nature chiefly moves to mutual succour, thus standing together, may help one another. It is a great reproach and dishonesty for the husband to come home without his wife or the wife without her husband or the son without his father. And therefore, if the other part stick so hard by it that the battle come to their hands, it is fought with great slaughter and bloodshed even to the utter destruction of both parts. For as they make all the means and shifts that may be to keep themselves from the necessity of fighting, or that they may dispatch the battle by their hired soldiers, so when there is no remedy but that they must needs fight themselves, they do as courageously fall to it as before, whiles they might, they did wisely avoid and refuse it. Nor they be not most fierce at the first brunt,[1] but in continuance by little and little their fierce courage increases with so stubborn and obstinate minds that they will rather die than give back an inch. For that surety of living which every man has at home being joined with no careful anxiety or remembrance how their posterity shall live after them (for this pensiveness oftentimes breaks and abates courageous stomachs) makes them stout and hardy and disdainful to be conquered. Moreover, their knowledge in chivalry and feats of arms puts them in a good hope. Finally, the wholesome and virtuous opinions wherein they were brought up even from their childhood, partly through learning and partly through the good ordinances and laws of their weal public, augment and increase their manful courage. By reason whereof they neither set so little store by their lives that they will rashly and unadvisedly cast them away, nor they be not so far in lewd and fond love therewith that they will shamefully covet to keep them when honesty bids leave them.

When the battle is hottest and in all places most fierce and fervent, a band of chosen and picked young men, which be sworn to live and die together, take upon them to destroy their adversaries' captain, whom they invade now with privy wiles, now by open strength. At him they strike both near and far off. He is assailed with a long and a continual assault, fresh men still coming in the wearied men's places. And seldom it chances (unless he save himself by flying) that he is not either slain or else taken prisoner and yielded to his enemies alive. If they win the field, they persecute not their enemies with the violent rage of slaughter, for they had rather take them alive than kill them. Neither they do so follow the chase and pursuit of their enemies, but they leave behind them one part of their host[2] in battle array under their standards. Insomuch that if all their whole army be discomfited and overcome, saving the rearward, and that they therewith achieve the victory, then they had rather let all their enemies escape than to follow them out of array.[3] For they remember it has chanced unto themselves more than once, the whole power and strength of their host being vanquished and put to flight, whilst their enemies rejoicing in the victory have persecuted them, flying some one way and some another, a small company of their men[4] lying in an ambush, there ready at all occasions, have suddenly risen upon them thus dispersed and scattered out of array, and through presumption of safety unadvisedly pursuing the chase, and have incontinent changed the fortune of the whole battle and, spite of their teeths,[5] wresting out of their[6] hands the sure and undoubted victory, being a little before conquered, have for their part conquered the conquerors. It is hard to say whether they be craftier in laying an ambush or wittier in avoiding the same. You would think they intend to fly when they mean nothing less. And contrariwise, when they go about that purpose you would believe it were the least part of their thought, for if they perceive themselves either overmatched in number or closed in too narrow a place, then they

[1] brunt assault.

[2] their host i.e., their own army.

[3] array order, formation.

[4] their men i.e., the Utopians.

[5] spite of their teeths in defiance of or notwithstanding the opposition.

[6] their i.e., the enemy's.

remove their camp either in the night season with silence, or by some policy they deceive their enemies, or in the daytime they retire back so softly that it is no less jeopardy to meddle with them when they give back than when they press on.

They fence and fortify their camp surely with a deep and a broad trench; the earth thereof is cast inward. Nor they do not set drudges and slaves a-work about it; it is done by the hands of the soldiers themselves. All the whole army works upon it, except them that keep watch and ward in harness before the trench for sudden adventures.[1] Therefore, by the labour of so many, a large trench closing in a great compass of ground is made in less time than any man would believe.

Their armour or harness which they wear is sure and strong to receive strokes and handsome[2] for all movings and gestures of the body, insomuch that it is not unwieldy to swim in, for in the discipline of their warfare among other feats they learn to swim in harness. Their weapons be arrows aloof,[3] which they shoot both strongly and surely, not only footmen but also horsemen. At hand strokes they use not swords but poleaxes, which be mortal as well in sharpness as in weight, both for foins[4] and downstrokes. Engines for war they devise and invent wondrous wittily, which when they be made they keep very secret, lest if they should be known before need require they should be but laughed at and serve no purpose. But in making them hereunto they have chief respect that they be both easy to be carried and handsome to be moved and turned about.

Truce taken with their enemies for a short time they do so firmly and faithfully keep that they will not break it, no not though they be thereunto provoked. They do not waste nor destroy their enemies' land with foragings, nor they burn not up their corn. Yea, they save it as much as may be from being overrun and trodden down either with men or horses, thinking that it grows for their own use and profit. They hurt no man that is unarmed unless he be an espial.[5] All cities that be yielded unto them they defend, and such as they win by force of assault they neither despoil nor sack, but them that withstood and dissuaded the yielding up of the same they put to death; the other soldiers they punish with bondage. All the weak multitude they leave untouched. If they know that any citizen's counselled to yield and render up the city, to them they give part of the condemned men's goods. The residue they distribute and give freely among them whose help they had in the same war, for none of themselves takes any portion of the prey. But when the battle is finished and ended, they put their friends to never a penny cost of all the charges that they were at, but lay it upon their necks that be conquered. Them they burden with the whole charge of their expenses, which they demand of them partly in money to be kept for like use of battle and partly in lands of great revenues to be paid unto them yearly forever. Such revenues they have now in many countries, which by little and little rising of divers and sundry causes be increased above seven hundred thousand ducats[6] by the year. Thither they send forth some of their citizens as lieutenants to live there sumptuously like men of honour and renown. And yet, this notwithstanding, much money is saved which comes to the common treasury, unless it so chance that they had rather trust the country with the money, which many times they do so long until they have need to occupy it. And it seldom happens that they demand all. Of these lands they assign part unto them which, at their request and exhortation, put themselves in such jeopardies as I spoke of before. If any prince stir up war against them, intending to invade their land, they meet him incontinent out of their own borders with great power and strength, for they never lightly make war in their own country, nor they be never brought into so extreme necessity as to take help out of foreign lands into their own island.

[1] harness armour; adventures attacks.

[2] handsome easy to handle.

[3] arrows aloof shot from a distance, probably long bows.

[4] foins thrusts.

[5] an espial a spy.

[6] ducats gold coins; seven hundred thousand would be a fortune.

Of the Religions in Utopia

There be divers kinds of religion not only in sundry parts of the island, but also in divers places of every city. Some worship for god, the sun; some, the moon; some, some other of the planets. There be [those] that give worship to a man that was once of excellent virtue or of famous glory, not only as a god, but also as the chiefest and highest god. But the most and the wisest part (rejecting all these) believe that there is a certain godly power unknown, everlasting, incomprehensible, inexplicable, far above the capacity and reach of man's wit, dispersed throughout all the world, not in bigness, but in virtue and power. Him they call the father of all. To him alone they attribute the beginnings, the increasings, the proceedings, the changes and the ends of all things. Neither they give any divine honours to any other than to him. Yea, all the other also, though they be in divers opinions, yet in this point they agree altogether with the wisest sort, in believing that there is one chief and principal god, the maker and ruler of the whole world: whom they all commonly in their country language call Mythra.[1] But in this they disagree, that among some he is counted one and among some another. For every one of them, whatsoever that is which he takes for the chief god, thinks it to be the very same nature, to whose only divine might and majesty the sum and sovereignty of all things by the consent of all people is attributed and given. Howbeit, they all begin by little and little to forsake and fall from this variety of superstitions and to agree together in that religion which seems by reason to pass and excel the residue. And it is not to be doubted but all the others would long ago have been abolished, but that whatsoever unprosperous thing happened to any of them as he was minded to change his religion, the fearfulness of people did take it not as a thing coming by chance, but as sent from god out of Heaven. As though the god whose honour he was forsaking would revenge that wicked purpose against him.

But after they heard us speak of the name of Christ, of his doctrine, laws, miracles, and of the no less wonderful constancy of so many martyrs whose blood willingly shed brought a great number of nations throughout all parts of the world into their sect, you will not believe with how glad minds they agreed unto the same: whether it were by the secret inspiration of God or else for that they thought it nighest unto that opinion which among them is counted the chiefest. Howbeit, I think this was no small help and furtherance in the matter that they heard us say that Christ instituted among his[2] all things common, and that the same community does yet remain amongst the rightest Christian companies. Verily, howsoever it came to pass, many of them consented together in our religion and were washed in the holy water of Baptism. But because among us four (for no more of us was left alive, two of our company being dead) there was no priest, which I am right sorry for, they, being entered and instructed in all other points of our religion, lack only those sacraments which here none but priests do minister.[3] Howbeit, they understand and perceive them and be very desirous of the same. Yea, they reason and dispute the matter earnestly among themselves, whether without the sending of a Christian bishop, one chosen out of their own people may receive the order of priesthood. And truly they were minded to choose one, but at my departure from them they had chosen none.

They also which do not agree to Christ's religion fear[4] no man from it, nor speak against any man that has received it, saving that one of our company in my presence was sharply punished. He, as soon as he was baptized, began, against our wills, with more earnest affection than wisdom to reason of Christ's religion, and began to wax so hot in his matter that he did not only prefer our

[1] Mythra or Mithra: one of the chief gods of the ancient Persians, in later times often identified with the sun.

[2] among his i.e., among his followers.

[3] those sacraments … minister In the Catholic Church, a layperson can perform baptisms, but other sacraments required a priest. Ordination is performed by a bishop.

[4] fear frighten.

religion before all other, but also did utterly despise and condemn all other, calling them profane and the followers of them wicked and devilish and the children of everlasting damnation. When he had thus long reasoned the matter, they laid hold on him, accused him, and condemned him into exile, not as a despiser of religion, but as a seditious person and a raiser up of dissension among the people.

For this is one of the ancientest laws among them, that no man shall be blamed for reasoning in the maintenance of his own religion. For King Utopus, even at the first beginning, hearing that the inhabitants of the land were before his coming thither at continual dissension and strife among themselves for their religions, perceiving also that this common dissension (whilst every several sect took several parts in fighting for their country) was the only occasion of his conquest over them all, as soon as he had gotten the victory first of all he made a decree that it should be lawful for every man to favour and follow what religion he would, and that he might do the best he could to bring others to his opinion so that he did it peaceably, gently, quietly, and soberly, without hasty and contentious rebuking and inveighing against other. If he could not by fair and gentle speech induce them unto his opinion, yet he should use no kind of violence and refrain from displeasant and seditious words. To him that would vehemently and fervently in this cause strive and contend was decreed banishment or bondage. This law did King Utopus make not only for the maintenance of peace, which he saw through continual contention and mortal hatred utterly extinguished, but also because he thought this decree should make for the furtherance of religion. Whereof he durst define and determine nothing unadvisedly, as doubting whether God, desiring manifold and diverse sorts of honour, would inspire sundry men with sundry kinds of religion; and this surely he thought a very unmeet[1] and foolish thing, and a point of arrogant presumption, to compel all others by violence and threatenings to agree to the same that thou believe to be true. Furthermore, though there be one religion which alone is true and all others vain and superstitious, yet did he well foresee (so that the matter were handled with reason and sober modesty) that the truth of its own power would at the last issue out and come to light. But if contention and debate in that behalf should continually be used, as the worst men be most obstinate and stubborn and in their evil opinion most constant, he perceived that then the best and holiest religion would be trodden underfoot and destroyed by most vain superstitions, even as good corn is by thorns and weeds overgrown and choked. Therefore, all this matter he left undiscussed and gave to every man free liberty and choice to believe what he would, saving that he earnestly and straightly charged them that no man should conceive so vile and base an opinion of the dignity of man's nature as to think that the souls do die and perish with the body, or that the world runs at all adventures governed by no divine providence. And, therefore, they believe that after this life vices be extremely punished and virtues bountifully rewarded.

Him that is of a contrary opinion they count not in the number of men, as one that has avaled[2] the high nature of his soul to the vileness of brute beasts' bodies, much less in the number of their citizens whose laws and ordinances, if it were not for fear, he would nothing at all esteem. For you may be sure that he will study either with craft privily to mock or else violently to break the common laws of his country, in whom remains no further fear than of the laws, nor no further hope than of the body. Wherefore, he that is thus minded is deprived of all honours, excluded from all common administrations in the weal public, and thus he is of all sorts despised as of an unprofitable and of a base and vile nature. Howbeit, they put him to no punishment because they be persuaded that it is in no man's power to believe what he list.[3] No, nor they constrain him not with threatenings to dissemble his mind and show countenance contrary to his thought. For deceit and falsehood and all manners of lies, as next unto fraud, they do marvellously detest and abhor. But they suffer him not to dispute in his opinion, and that only among the common people. For else apart among the priests and men of gravity they do not only suffer but also exhort him to dispute and argue, hoping that at the last that madness will give place to reason.

[1] unmeet improper.

[2] avaled lowered.

[3] list chooses, wills.

There be also others, and of them no small number, which be not forbidden to speak their minds, as grounding their opinion upon some reason, being in their living neither evil nor vicious. Their heresy is much contrary to the other, for they believe that the souls of brute beasts be immortal and everlasting, but nothing to be compared with ours in dignity, neither ordained nor predestinate to like felicity.

For all they believe certainly and surely that man's bless[1] shall be so great that they do mourn and lament every man's sickness, but no man's death, unless it be one whom they see depart from his life carefully[2] and against his will. For this they take for a very evil token, as though the soul being in despair and vexed in conscience, through some privy and secret fore-feeling of the punishment now at hand, were afraid to depart. And they think he shall not be welcome to God which, when he is called, runs not to him gladly, but is drawn by force and sore against his will. They, therefore, that see this kind of death do abhor it, and them that so die they bury with sorrow and silence. And when they have prayed God to be merciful to the soul and mercifully to pardon the infirmities thereof, they cover the dead corpse with earth.

Contrariwise, all that depart merrily and full of good hope, for them no man mourns, but follows the hearse with joyful singing, commending the souls to God with great affection. And at the last, not with mourning sorrow but with a great reverence, they burn the bodies, and in the same place they set up a pillar of stone with the dead man's titles therein graved.[3] When they be come home, they rehearse his virtuous manners and his good deeds, but no part of his life is so oft or gladly talked of as his merry death. They think that this remembrance of the virtue and goodness of the dead does vehemently provoke and enforce the living to virtue, and that nothing can be more pleasant and acceptable to the dead, whom they suppose to be present among them when they talk of them, though to the dull and feeble eyesight of mortal men they be invisible. For it were an inconvenient thing that the blessed should not be at liberty to go whither they would, and it were a point of great unkindness in them to have utterly cast away the desire of visiting and seeing their friends to whom they were in their lifetime joined by mutual love and amity, which in good men after their death they count to be rather increased than diminished. They believe therefore that the dead be presently conversant among the quick as beholders and witnesses of all their words and deeds. Therefore, they go more courageously to their business as having a trust and affiance[4] in such overseers. And this same belief of the present conversation of their forefathers and ancestors among them fears them from all secret dishonesty. They utterly despise and mock soothsayings and divinations of things to come by the flight or voices of birds, and all other divinations of vain superstition, which in other countries be in great observation. But they highly esteem and worship miracles that come by no help of nature as works and witnesses of the present power of God, and such they say do chance there very often. And sometimes in great and doubtful matters, by common intercession and prayers, they procure and obtain them with a sure hope and confidence and a steadfast belief.

They think that the contemplation of nature, and the praise thereof coming, is to God a very acceptable honour. Yet there be many so earnestly bent and affectioned to religion that they pass

[1] bless bliss.
[2] carefully full of care.
[3] graved engraved.
[4] affiance confidence.

nothing for[1] learning, nor give their minds to any knowledge of things.[2] But idleness they utterly forsake and eschew, thinking felicity after this life to be gotten and obtained by busy labours and good exercises. Some, therefore, of them attend upon the sick, some amend highways, cleanse ditches, repair bridges, dig turfs, gravel, and stones, fell and cleave wood, bring wood, corn and other things into the cities in carts, and serve not only in common works, but also in private labours as servants, yea, more than bondmen. For whatsoever unpleasant, hard, and vile work is anywhere from the which labour, loathsomeness, and desperation does fray[3] others, all that they take upon them willingly and gladly, procuring quiet and rest to others, remaining in continual work and labour themselves, not embraiding[4] others therewith. They neither reprove other men's lives nor glory in their own. These men, the more serviceable they behave themselves, the more they be honoured of all men.

Yet they be divided into two sects. The one is of them that live single and chaste, abstaining not only from the company of women, but also from eating of flesh and some of them from all manner of beasts, which, utterly rejecting the pleasures of this present life as hurtful, be all wholly set upon the desire of the life to come by watching and sweating,[5] hoping shortly to obtain it, being in the mean season merry and lusty.[6]

The other sect is no less desirous of labour, but they embrace matrimony, not despising the solace thereof, thinking that they cannot be discharged of their bounden duties towards nature without labour and toil, nor towards their native country without procreation of children. They abstain from no pleasure that does nothing hinder them from labour. They love the flesh of four-footed beasts because they believe that by that meat they be made hardier and stronger to work. The Utopians count this sect the wiser, but the other the holier, which in that they prefer single life before matrimony and that sharp life before an easier life, if herein they grounded upon reason[7] they would mock them, but now, forasmuch as they say they be led to it by religion, they honour and worship them. And these be they whom in their language by a peculiar name they call Buthrescas,[8] the which word by interpretation signifies to us men of religion or religious men.

They have priests of exceeding holiness, and therefore very few, for there be but thirteen in every city according to the number of their churches, saving when they go forth to battle, for then seven of them go forth with the army, in whose steads so many new be made at home. But the other at their return home again re-enter every one into his own place; they that be above the number, until such time as they succeed into the places of the other at their dying, be in the mean season continually in company with the bishop, for he is the chief head of them all. They be chosen of the people, as the other magistrates be, by secret voices for the avoiding of strife. After their election they be consecrate of their own company. They be overseers of all divine matters, orderers of religions, and, as it were, judges and masters of manners. And it is a great dishonesty and shame to be rebuked or spoken to by any of them for dissolute and incontinent living. But as it is their office to give good exhortations and counsel, so is it the duty of the prince and the other magistrates to correct and punish offenders, saving that the priests whom they find exceeding vicious livers, them they excommunicate from having any interest in divine matters.[9] And there is almost no punishment among them more feared,

---

1 pass nothing for care nothing about.

2 things i.e., worldly things.

3 fray frighten.

4 embraiding upbraiding.

5 watching and sweating as devotional exercises, keeping vigils.

6 mean season meanwhile; lusty joyful.

7 if herein they grounded upon reason i.e., if the members of the sect based their actions on reason (rather than faith).

8 Buthrescas from Greek, "exceedingly religious."

9 the priests … divine matters This is a convoluted sentence; it is not the priest who lives a dishonourable life, but the priest excommunicates those he finds live dishonestly, which is why they must "approve" or "prove" that they have amended their ways later in the text.

for they run in very great infamy and be inwardly tormented with a secret fear of religion and shall not long scape[1] free with their bodies. For unless they by quick repentance approve the amendment of their lives to the priests, they be taken and punished of the council as wicked and irreligious.

Both childhood and youth is instructed and taught of them. Nor they be not more diligent to instruct them in learning than in virtue and good manners, for they use with very great endeavour and diligence to put into the heads of their children, whilst they be yet tender and pliant, good opinions and profitable for the conservation of their weal public, which when they be once rooted in children, do remain with them all their life after and be wondrous profitable for the defence and maintenance of the state of the commonwealth, which never decays but through vices rising of evil opinions.

The priests, unless they be women (for that kind is not excluded from priesthood, howbeit few be chosen and none but widows and old women), the men priests, I say, take to their wives the chiefest women in all their country, for to no office among the Utopians is more honour and pre-eminence given. Insomuch that if they commit any offence, they be under no common judgement, but be left only to God and themselves, for they think it not lawful to touch him with man's hand, be he never so vicious, which after so singular a sort was dedicate and consecrate to God as a holy offering. This manner may they easily observe because they have so few priests and do choose them with such circumspection. For it scarcely ever chances that the most virtuous among virtuous, which in respect only of his virtue is advanced to so high a dignity, can fall to vice and wickedness. And if it should chance indeed (as man's nature is mutable and frail), yet by reason they be so few and promoted to no might nor power, but only to honour, it were not to be feared that any great damage by them should happen and ensue to the commonwealth. They have so rare and few priests, lest if the honour were communicated to many, the dignity of the order, which among them now is so highly esteemed, should run in contempt, especially because they think it hard to find many so good as to be meet for that dignity, to the execution and discharge whereof it is not sufficient to be endued with mean virtues.

Furthermore, these priests be not more esteemed of their own countrymen than they be of foreign and strange countries, which thing may hereby plainly appear, and I think also that this is the cause of it. For whilst the armies be fighting together in open field, they a little beside, not far off, kneel upon their knees in their hallowed vestments, holding up their hands to Heaven, praying first of all for peace, next for victory of their own part, but to neither part a bloody victory. If their host get the upper hand, they run in to the main battle and restrain their own men from slaying and cruelly pursuing their vanquished enemies, which enemies, if they do but see them and speak to them, it is enough for the safeguard of their lives. And the touching of their clothes defends and saves all their goods from ravin and spoil. This thing has advanced them to so great worship and true majesty among all nations that many times they have as well preserved their own citizens from the cruel force of their enemies as they have their enemies from the furious rage of their own men. For it is well known that when their own army has reculed[2] and in despair turned back and run away, their enemies fiercely pursuing with slaughter and spoil, then the priests coming between have stayed the murder and parted both the hosts, so that peace has been made and concluded between both parts upon equal and indifferent conditions. For there was never any nation so fierce, so cruel, and rude,[3] but they had them in such reverence that they counted their bodies hallowed and sanctified, and therefore not to be violently and irreverently touched.

They keep holy the first and the last day of every month and year, dividing the year into months which they measure by the course of the moon, as they do the year by the course of the sun. The first days they call in their language Cynemernes and the last Trapemernes,[1] the which words may be interpreted primifest and finifest, or else in our speech "first feast" and "last feast." Their churches be very gorgeous, and not only of fine and curious workmanship, but also (which in the fewness of them was necessary) very wide and large and able to receive a great company of people. But they be all somewhat dark. Howbeit, that was not done through ignorance in building, but, as they say, by the counsel of the priests, because they thought that overmuch light does disperse men's cogitations, whereas in dim and doubtful light they be gathered together and more earnestly fixed upon religion and devotion, which because it is not there of one sort among all men and yet all the kinds and fashions of it, though they be sundry and manifold, agree together in the honour of the divine nature, as going divers ways to one end; therefore nothing is seen nor heard in the churches but that seems to agree indifferently with them all. If there be a distinct kind of sacrifice peculiar to any several sect, that they execute at home in their own houses. The common sacrifices be so ordered that they be no derogation nor prejudice to any of the private sacrifices and religions. Therefore, no image of any god is seen in the church to the intent it may be free for every man to conceive God by their religion after what likeness and similitude they will. They call upon no peculiar name of God, but only Mythra, in the which word they all agree together in one nature of the divine majesty whatsoever it be. No prayers be used but such as every man may boldly pronounce without the offending of any sect. They come, therefore, to the church the last day of every month and year, in the evening yet fasting, there to give thanks to God for that they have prosperously passed over the year or month, whereof that holy day is the last day. The next day they come to the church early in the morning to pray to God that they may have good fortune and success all the new year or month which they do begin of that same holy day. But in the holy days that be the last days of the months and years, before they come to the church, the wives fall down prostrate before their husbands' feet at home, and the children before the feet of their parents, confessing and acknowledging themselves offenders either by some actual deed or by omission of their duty, and desire pardon for their offence. Thus if any cloud of privy displeasure was risen at home, by this satisfaction it is overblown, that they may be present at the sacrifices with pure and charitable minds, for they be afeared to come there with troubled consciences. Therefore, if they know themselves to bear any hatred or grudge toward any man, they presume not to come to the sacrifices before they have reconciled themselves and purged their consciences, for fear of great vengeance and punishment for their offence.

[1] scape escape.

[2] reculed recoiled or retreated.

[3] rude uncivilized, violent.

When they come thither, the men go into the right side of the church and the women into the left side. There they place themselves in such order that all they which be of the male kind in every household sit before the goodman[2] of the house, and they of the female kind before the goodwife.[3] Thus it is foreseen that all their gestures and behaviours be marked and observed abroad of them by whose authority and discipline they be governed at home. This also they diligently see unto, that the younger evermore be coupled with his elder, lest, children being joined together, they should pass over that time in childish wantonness,[4] wherein they ought principally to conceive a religious and devout fear towards God, which is the chief and almost the only incitation to virtue.

They kill no living beast in sacrifice, nor they think not that the merciful clemency of God has delight in blood and slaughter, which has given life to beasts to the intent they should live. They burn

[1] Cynemernes from Greek, "dog day"; Trapemernes from Greek, "turning day."

[2] goodman master or head of the household.

[3] goodwife mistress of the household.

[4] wantonness extravagancy, unruliness.

frankincense and other sweet savours, and light also a great number of wax candles and tapers, not supposing this gear to be anything available to[1] the divine nature, as neither the prayers of men. But this unhurtful and harmless kind of worship pleases them, and by these sweet savours and lights and other such ceremonies men feel themselves secretly lifted up and encouraged to devotion with more willing and fervent hearts.

The people wear in the church white apparel. The priest is clothed in changeable[2] colours, which in workmanship be excellent, but in stuff not very precious, for their vestments be neither embroidered with gold nor set with precious stones, but they be wrought so finely and cunningly with divers feathers of fowls that the estimation of no costly stuff is able to countervail the price of the work. Furthermore, in these birds' feathers and in the due order of them which is observed in their setting, they say, is contained certain divine mysteries. The interpretation whereof known, which is diligently taught by the priests, they be put in remembrance of the bountiful benefits of God toward them, and of the love and honour which of their behalf is due to God, and also of their duties one toward another. When the priest first comes out of the vestry thus apparelled, they fall down incontinent everyone reverently to the ground, with so still silence on every part that the very fashion of the thing strikes into them a certain fear of God, as though he were there personally present. When they have lain a little space on the ground, the priest gives them a sign for to rise. Then they sing praises unto God, which they intermix with instruments of music, for the most part of other fashions than these that we use in this part of the world. And like as some of ours be much sweeter than theirs, so some of theirs do far pass ours. But in one thing doubtless they go exceeding far beyond us, for all their music, both that they play upon instruments and that they sing with man's voice, does so resemble and express natural affections, the sound and tune is so applied and made agreeable to the thing, that whether it be a prayer or else a ditty of gladness, of patience, of trouble, of mourning, of anger, the fashion of the melody does so represent the meaning of the thing, that it does wonderfully move, stir, pierce, and enflame the hearers' minds.

At the last, the people and the priest together rehearse solemn prayers in words expressly pronounced, so made that every man may privately apply to himself that which is commonly spoken of all. In these prayers every man recognizes and 'knowledges God to be his maker, his governor, and the principal cause of all other goodness, thanking him for so many benefits received at his hand, but namely that through the favour of God he has chanced into that public weal which is most happy and wealthy and has chosen that religion which he hopes to be most true. In the which thing if he do anything err, or if there be any other better than either of them is, being more acceptable to God, he desires him that he will of his goodness let him have knowledge thereof, as one that is ready to follow what way soever he will lead him. But if this form and fashion of a commonwealth be best and his own religion most true and perfect, then he desires God to give him a constant steadfastness in the same and to bring all other people to the same order of living and to the same opinion of God, unless there be anything that in this diversity of religions does delight his unsearchable pleasure. To be short, he prays him that after his death he may come to him, but how soon or late, that he dare not assign or determine. Howbeit, if it might stand with his majesty's pleasure, he would be much gladder to die a painful death and so to go to God than by long living in worldly prosperity to be away from him. When this prayer is said, they fall down to the ground again and a little after they rise up and go to dinner. And the residue of the day they pass over in plays and exercise of chivalry.[3] [1] be anything available to produce a desired result from; be able to reach.

[2] changeable various.

[3] plays and exercises of chivalry "plays" is more generally entertainment; "chivalry" refers to military exercises.

Now I have declared and described unto you, as truly as I could, the form and order of that commonwealth, which verily in my judgement is not only the best, but also that which alone of good right may claim and take upon it the name of a commonwealth or public weal. For in other places they speak still of the commonwealth, but every man procures his own private gain. Here, where nothing is private, the common affairs be earnestly looked upon. And truly on both parts they have good cause so to do as they do. For in other countries, who knows not that he shall starve for hunger unless he make some several provision for himself, though the commonwealth flourish never so much in riches? And therefore he is compelled even of very necessity to have regard to himself rather than to the people, that is to say, to others. Contrariwise, there where all things be common to every man, it is not to be doubted that any man shall lack anything necessary for his private uses, so that the common storehouses and barns be sufficiently stored, for there nothing is distributed after a niggish[1] sort, neither there is any poor man or beggar, and though no man have anything, yet every man is rich. For what can be more rich than to live joyfully and merrily, without all grief and pensiveness,[2] not caring for his own living, nor vexed or troubled with his wife's importunate complaints, nor dreading poverty to his son, nor sorrowing for his daughter's dowry? Yea, they take no care at all for the living and wealth of themselves and all theirs, of their wives, their children, their nephews, their children's children, and all the succession that ever shall follow in their posterity. And yet besides this there is no less provision for them that were once labourers and be now weak and impotent, than for them that do now labour and take pain.

Here now would I see if any man dare be so bold as to compare with this equity the justice of other nations, among whom I forsake God if I can find any sign or token of equity and justice. For what justice is this that a rich goldsmith or an usurer[3] or, to be short, any of them which either do nothing at all or else that which they do is such that it is not very necessary to the commonwealth, should have a pleasant and a wealthy living either by idleness or by unnecessary business, when in the meantime poor labourers, carters, ironsmiths, carpenters and ploughmen, by so great and continual toil as drawing and bearing beasts, be scant able to sustain, and again so necessary toil that without it no commonwealth were able to continue and endure one year, should yet get so hard and poor a living and live so wretched and miserable a life that the state and condition of the labouring beasts may seem much better and wealthier? For they be not put to so continual labour, nor their living is not much worse, yea, to them much pleasanter, taking no thought in the mean season for the time to come. But these silly poor wretches be presently tormented with barren and unfruitful labour, and the remembrance of their poor indigent and beggarly old age kills them up. For their daily wages is so little that it will not suffice for the same day, much less it yields any overplus that may daily be laid up for the relief of old age. Is not this an unjust and an unkind public weal, which gives great fees and rewards to gentlemen, as they call them, and to goldsmiths and to such other which be either idle persons or else only flatterers and devisers of vain pleasures, and of the contrary part makes no gentle provision for poor ploughmen, colliers,[4] labourers, carters, ironsmiths, and carpenters, without whom no commonwealth can continue? But after it has abused the labours of their lusty and flowering age, at the last when they be oppressed with old age and sickness, being needy, poor, and indigent of all things, then forgetting their so many painful watchings, not remembering their so many and so great benefits, recompenses and acquits them most unkindly with miserable death. And yet besides this the rich men not only by private fraud, but also by common laws do every day pluck and snatch away from the poor some part of their

[1] niggish niggardly.

[2] pensiveness anxiety or melancholy.

[3] usurer moneylender.

[4] colliers those who work with coal.

daily living. So whereas it seemed before unjust to recompense with unkindness their pains that have been beneficial to the public weal, now they have to this their wrong and unjust dealing (which is yet a much worse point) given the name of justice, yea, and that by force of a law.

Therefore, when I consider and weigh in my mind all these commonwealths which nowadays anywhere do flourish, so God help me, I can perceive nothing but a certain conspiracy of rich men procuring their own commodities under the name and title of the commonwealth. They invent and devise all means and crafts, first how to keep safely without fear of losing that they have unjustly gathered together, and next how to hire and abuse the work and labour of the poor for as little money as may be. These devices, when the rich men have decreed to be kept and observed under colour of the commonality,[1] that is to say also of the poor people, then they be made laws.

But these most wicked and vicious men, when they have by their insatiable covetousness divided among themselves all those things which would have sufficed all men, yet how far be they from the wealth and felicity of the Utopian commonwealth? Out of the which, in that all the desire of money with the use thereof is utterly secluded and banished, how great a heap of cares is cut away? How great an occasion of wickedness and mischief is plucked up by the roots? For who knows not that fraud, theft, ravin, brawling, quarrelling, brabbling,[2] strife, chiding, contention, murder, treason, poisoning, which by daily punishments are rather revenged than refrained, do die when money dies? And also that fear, grief, care, labours and watchings do perish even the very same moment that money perishes? Yea, poverty itself, which only seemed to lack money, if money were gone, it also would decrease and vanish away. And that you may perceive this more plainly, consider with yourselves some barren and unfruitful year wherein many thousands of people have starved for hunger. I dare be bold to say that in the end of that penury so much corn or grain might have been found in the rich men's barns, if they had been searched as, being divided among them whom famine and pestilence then consumed, no man at all should have felt that plague and penury. So easily might men get their living, if that same worthy princess, Lady Money, did not alone stop up the way between us and our living, which, a God's name, was very excellently devised and invented that by her the way thereto should be opened. I am sure the rich men perceive this, nor they be not ignorant how much better it were to lack no necessary thing than to abound with overmuch superfluity, to be rid out of innumerable cares and troubles than to be besieged and encumbered with great riches.

And I doubt not that either the respect of every man's private commodity[3] or else the authority of our Saviour Christ (which for his great wisdom could not but know what were best, and for His inestimable goodness could not but counsel to that which he knew to be best) would have brought all the world long ago into the laws of this weal public if it were not that one only beast, the princess and mother of all mischief, Pride, does withstand and let it. She measures not wealth and prosperity by her own commodities, but by the misery and incommodities of others; she would not by her good will be made a goddess if there were no wretches left over whom she might, like a scornful lady, rule and triumph, over whose miseries her felicities might shine, whose poverty she might vex, torment and increase by gorgeously setting forth her riches. This hell-hound creeps into men's hearts and plucks them back from entering the right path of life and is so deeply rooted in men's breasts that she cannot be plucked out.

This form and fashion of a weal public, which I would gladly wish unto all nations, I am glad yet that it has chanced to the Utopians, which have followed those institutions of life, whereby they have laid such foundations of their commonwealth as shall continue and last not only wealthily, but also, as far as man's wit may judge and conjecture, shall endure forever. For, seeing the chief causes of ambition and sedition with other vices be plucked up by the roots and abandoned at home, there can be no jeopardy of domestical dissension, which alone has cast under foot and brought to naught the well-fortified and strongly-defenced wealth and riches of many cities. But forasmuch as perfect concord remains and wholesome laws be executed at home, the envy of all foreign princes be not able to shake or move the empire, though they have many times long ago gone about to do it, being evermore driven back.

[1] under colour of the commonality under the guise of benefitting the commonwealth.

[2] brabbling wrangling, quarrelling.

[3] commodity benefit, advantage.

Thus when Raphael had made an end of his tale, though many things came to my mind which in the manner and laws of that people seemed to be instituted and founded of[1] no good reason, not only in the fashion of their chivalry, and in their sacrifices and religions, and in other of their laws, but also, yea, and chiefly, in that which is the principal foundation of all their ordinances, that is to say in the community of their life and living without any occupying of money, by the which thing only all nobility, magnificence, worship, honour and majesty, the true ornaments and honours, as the common opinion is, of a commonwealth, utterly be overthrown and destroyed. Yet because I knew that he was weary of talking, and was not sure whether he could abide that anything should be said against his mind—specially remembering that he had reprehended this fault in others, which be afraid lest they should seem not to be wise enough unless they could find some fault in other men's inventions—therefore I, praising both their institutions and his communication, took him by the hand and led him in to supper, saying that we would choose another time to weigh and examine the same matters and to talk with him more at large therein. Which would God it might once come to pass. In the meantime, as I cannot agree and consent to all things that he said, being else without doubt a man singularly well learned and also in all worldly matters exactly and profoundly experienced, so must I needs confess and grant that many things be in the Utopian weal public which in our cities I may rather wish for than hope after.

Thus ends the afternoon's talk of Raphael Hythloday concerning the laws and institutions of the island of Utopia.

—Latin edition, 1516; English translation, 2nd corrected edition, 1556

[1] of on.

Margaret More Roper
1505-1544

Margaret More Roper was a member of the humanist intellectual elite of the first third of the sixteenth century and, as the eldest of Thomas More's children, exemplified the efficacy of her father's theories of education. Indeed, Roper is something of a cipher: almost everything known about her comes from her father's letters, biographers, and friends. In their home in Chelsea—described by Erasmus as a Platonic Academy of the Christian religion[1]—the More children and a group of cousins and wards were tutored in Latin, philosophy, mathematics, and theology. They were also surrounded by both visiting intellectuals and the young scholars who gathered around More. Richard Hyrde, who authored the preface to Roper's Devout Treatise upon the Pater Noster, was one of these and may have acted as tutor to some of the younger children. Through the humanist technique of double translation of texts from Latin to English and back again, Roper developed a remarkable fluency in the language, which she continued to develop through study with tutors after her marriage to William Roper, a young lawyer and admirer of her father, in 1521.[2] During this marriage, she bore at least five children; of these, her daughter Mary followed in her mother's scholarly footsteps.

Roper's unusual education has been seen as evidence of both a humanist revaluation of the status of women and the promotion of the learned woman as a new model for femininity and an object of desire. As Lamb points out, "the figure of the learned woman not only demonstrated the value of humanist learning, but her presence levelled a criticism against the values of an aristocratic culture: hunting, feasting, public displays, even the reading of frivolous books in French."[3] As well, she contributed to the creation of a new class of intellectual bureaucrats by providing a suitable companion for the humanist husband and teacher for their children. Both in theory and practice, however, this new femininity was problematic. On the one hand it granted women considerable linguistic agency; but on the other, this model of femininity was to be contained inside a domestic space. This contradiction appears in both Hyrde's preface, addressed to Frances Staverton (a cousin of the Mores),[4] and More's treatment of his daughter. While Hyrde argues for Roper as a model for Staverton, he also considers one of the virtues of study to be its power to contain the wandering of both mind and body more efficiently than work that engages the hands alone. Effectively, he rearticulates the prevalent notion of chastity, silence, and obedience as ideals of female behaviour. In his letters, More indicates that the audience for Roper's work should be limited to himself and her husband, while at the same time recounting the praises of the significant number of scholars to whom he has shown her writing. With male humanist writers, More employed a similar method of utilizing ostensibly private correspondence to promote a scholarly reputation. However, Roper's fame spread even without her father's assistance, indicated by both English and Continental scholars' references to her emendation of a corrupt passage in St. Cyprian.

Roper's most famous promoter was Desiderius Erasmus, a prolific Dutch scholar and long-time friend of More. Indeed, he is substantially represented in Roper's known works. These works include two letters in English to her father during his imprisonment in the Tower of London; a letter to her cousin Alice Alington that describes a dialogue with More; two Latin letters to Erasmus; and her translation of his treatise, Precatio dominica in septem portiones distributa (1523) as A Devout Treatise upon the Pater Noster, printed in two editions in 1525 and 1531. The letter to Erasmus presented below is the only extant holograph document by Roper. Her translation of Erasmus's clause-by-clause explication of the Lord's Prayer preceded most of the English translations by sixteenth-century humanists and as a result occupies a significant position in the history of English translation. In it, Roper balances imitation of Erasmus's style of long, involved sentences with the insertion of interjected phrases for clarification and fairly straightforward English diction.

---

[1] J.A. Gee, "Margaret Roper's English Version of Erasmus' Precatio Dominica and the Apprenticeship behind Early Tudor Translation," The Review of English Studies 13 (1937): 264.

[2] Ibid., p. 264.

[3] M.E. Lamb, "Margaret Roper, The Humanist Political Project, and the Problem of Agency," Opening the Borders: Inclusivity in Early Modern Studies, ed. P.C. Herman (Newark, 1999), p. 86.

[4] E.E. Reynolds, Margaret Roper (New York, 1960), p. 38.

As Verbrugge notes, her independent, personal expression draws out the work's opposing emphases on human unworthiness and the loving kindness of God.[1] At the same time, Roper's style avoids both slavish transliteration as well as excessively free translation of Erasmus's original.

EDITIONS: A devoute treatise upon the Pater noster. London: Thomas Berthelet, 1526. STC 10477; Margaret Roper, to the most learned theologian, Des. Erasmus Roterodamus Clarissimo simul ac doctissimo theologo, D. Erasmo Ro. Opus Epistolarum Des. Erasmi Roterodamus. Volume VIII. Ed. P.S. Allen, H.M. Allen, H.W. Garrod. Oxford, 1934. pp. 299-300.

from A Devout Treatise upon the Pater Noster, Made First in Latin by the Most Famous Doctor, Master Erasmus Rotterdamus, and Turned into English by a Young, Virtuous, and Well-Learned Gentlewoman of XIX Year of Age.

Richard Hyrde unto the Most Studious and Virtuous Young Maid, Frances S.,[2] Sendeth Greeting and Well to Fare.

I have heard many men put great doubt whether it should be expedient and requisite or not [for] a woman to have learning in books of Latin and Greek. And some utterly affirm that it is not only neither necessary nor profitable, but also very noisome[3] and jeopardous, alleging for their opinion that the frail kind of women, being inclined of their own corage[4] unto vice and mutable at every novelty, if they should have skill in many things that be written in the Latin and Greek tongue, compiled and made with great craft[5] and eloquence, where the matter is happily sometime more sweet unto the ear than wholesome for the mind, it would of likelihood both inflame their stomachs a great deal the more to that vice that men say they be too much given unto of their own nature already, and instruct them also with more subtlety and conveyance[6] to set forward and accomplish their froward[7] intent and purpose. But these men that so say do in my judgement either regard but little what they speak in this matter, or else, as they be for the more part unlearned, they envy it and take it sore to heart that the other should have that precious jewel which they neither have themself nor can find in their hearts to take the pain to get. For first, where they reckon such instability and mutable nature in women, they say therein their pleasure of a contentious[8] mind for the maintenance of their matter, for if they would look thereon with one even eye and consider the matter equally they should find and well perceive that women be not only of no less constancy and discretion than men, but also more steadfast and sure to trust unto than they.

For whether, I pray you, was more light and more to be discommended[9] Helen, that with much labour and suit[10] and many crafty means was at the last overcome and enticed to go away with the King's son of Troy, or Paris,[11] which with

---

1 R.M. Verbrugge, "Margaret More Roper's Personal Expression in the Devout Treatise upon the Pater Noster," Silent But for the Word: Tudor Women as Patrons, Translators, and Writers of Religious Works, ed. M.P. Hannay (Kent, OH, 1985), p. 39.

2 Frances S. Frances Staverton, daughter of Thomas More's sister, was raised and educated among the More children.

3 noisome noxious, harmful.

4 corage heart, desire, inclination.

5 craft skill, ingenuity.

6 conveyance form of expression.

7 froward perverse, ungovernable.

8 contentious disputatious, controversial.

9 discommended disapproved, found fault with.

10 suit pursuit.

11 Helen ... Paris Paris, son of the King of Troy, was smitten by the beauty of Helen, wife of Menelaus, and the pair eloped. Menelaus and a group of Greek warriors followed them to Troy in an attempt to retrieve Helen. The result was the Trojan War (Dict. Gods and Mortals, pp. 265-66).

one sight of her was so doted[1] in her love that neither the great cheer and kindness showed unto him of her husband King Menelaus, nor shame of the abominable deed, nor fear of the peril that was like to come thereupon, nor the dread of God might let[2] him to convey her away contrary to all gentleness, contrary to all right, all laws, and conscience. Nor the woman casteth her mind neither to one nor other of her own proper will, which thing is a sure token of an upright and a steadfast mind, but by the suit and means of the man when he with one look of her is ravished of all his wits. Now if here peradventure[3] a man would say, yes, they be moved as well as men, but they dissemble, forebear,[4] and will not utter their stomachs, neither it is so convenient the woman to speak as the man that shall not help his excuse but rather hinder it, for they be the more worthy to be allowed that will not be so far overseen in that affection which is so naturally given to all things living but that they can remember their duty and honesty, where the man is many times so far beside his reason that he seeth neither where nor when, neither to whom nor how to behave himself, neither can regard what is comely[5] and what is not. For verily it is as unconvenient for the man to demand that thing that is unlawful if he could perceive as for the woman. And if both their vices were all open and showed the man should have much more that he ought to be ashamed of, saving that he is also in that point worse than the woman, inasmuch as she is ashamed of her fault, be it never so small, and he is so far from that virtue that when he hath done nought he rejoiceth of it and advanceth himself as though it were well done. And yet he is so unreasonable in judging the woman that, as Isocrates[6] sayeth, wherein he hath no consideration how oft or how sore he offend his wife, he will not suffer once to be offended himself by her never so little, where he would that she should take his deeds all well in worth. Wherefore[7] indeed women be in gay case[8] and happy if their honesty and praise must hang at the girdles of such people.

Now, as for learning, if it were cause of any evil as they say it is, it were worse in the man than in the woman because (as I have said here before) he can both worse stay[9] and refrain himself than she. And moreover than that, he cometh after and in more occasions than the woman, inasmuch as he liveth more forth abroad among company daily where he shall be moved to utter such craft as he hath gotten by his learning. And women abide most at home, occupied ever with some good or necessary business. And the Latin and the Greek tongue I see not but there is as little hurt in them as in books of English and French, which men both read themself for the proper pastimes that be written in them and for the witty and crafty conveyance of the makings,[10] and also can bear well enough that women read them if they will never so much, which commodities[11] be far better handled in the Latin or Greek than any other language, and in them be many holy doctors' writings so devout and effectuous that whosoever readeth them must needs be either much better or less evil, which every good body, both man and woman, will read and follow rather than other. But as for that that I hear many men lie for the greatest jeopardy in this matter, in good faith to be plain me think it is so foolish that scantly it is worthy either to be rehearsed or answered unto. That is where they say if their wives could[12] Latin or Greek then might they talk more boldly with priests and friars as who sayeth there were no better means (if they were ill disposed) to execute their purposes than by speaking Latin or Greek, either else that priests

---

1 doted infatuated.

2 let prevent, forebear.

3 peradventure by chance, as it happened.

4 forebear refrain, control feelings.

5 comely pleasing, agreeable.

6 Isocrates Isocrates (436-338 BCE) was a Greek orator, rhetorical theorist, and teacher (OCD).

7 Wherefore on which account, therefore.

8 gay case fine condition or state.

9 stay stop, hold back.

10 makings composition.

11 commodities properties.

12 could knew.

and friars were commonly so well learned that they can make their bargain in Latin and Greek so readily, which thing is also far contrary that I suppose nowadays a man could not devise a better way to keep his wife safe from them than if he teach her the Latin and Greek tongue and such good sciences as are written in them, the which now most part of priests, and specially such as be nought, abhor and fly from, yea as fast in a manner as they fly from beggars that ask them alms in the street. And where they find fault with learning because they say it engendereth[1] wit and craft, there they reprehend it for that that it is most worthy to be commended for and the which is one singular cause wherefore learning ought to be desired, for he that had lever[2] have his wife a fool than a wise woman I hold him worse than twice frantic. Also reading and studying of books so occupieth the mind that it can have no leisure to muse or delight in other fantasies when in all handy works that men say be more meet for a woman the body may be busy in one place and the mind walking in another, and while they sit sewing and spinning with their fingers may cast and compass[3] many peevish[4] fantasies in their minds which must needs be occupied either with good or bad so long as they be waking. And those that be evil disposed will find the means to be nought though they can[5] never a letter on the book, and she that will be good, learning shall cause her to be much the better. For it showeth the image and ways of good living, even right as a mirror showeth the similitude and proportion of the body. And doubtless the daily experience proveth that such as are nought are those that never knew what learning meant. For I never heard tell nor read of any woman well learned that ever was (as plenteous as evil tongues be) spotted or infamed as vicious. But on the other side, many by their learning taken such increase of goodness that many may bear them witness of their virtue, of which sort I could rehearse a great number both of old time and late. Saving that, I will be content as for now with one example of our own country and time, that is this gentlewoman which translated this little book hereafter following, whose virtuous conversation, living, and sad[6] demeanour may be proof evident enough what good learning doth where it is surely rooted, of whom other women may take example of prudent, humble, and wifely behaviour, charitable and very Christian virtue with which she hath with God's help endeavoured herself no less to garnish[7] her soul than it hath liked his goodness with lovely beauty and comeliness to garnish and set out her body. And undoubted is it that to th'increase of her virtue she hath taken and taketh no little occasion of her learning besides her other manifold and great commodities taken of the same, among which commodities this is not the least: that with her virtuous, worshipful, wise and well learned husband she hath by the occasion of her learning and his delight therein such especial comfort, pleasure, and pastime as were not well possible for one unlearned couple either to take together or to conceive in their minds what pleasure is therein. Therefore, good Frances, seeing that such fruit, profit, and pleasure cometh of learning, take no heed unto the lewd words of those that dispraise it, as verily no man doth, save such as neither have learning nor wotteth[8] what it meaneth, which is indeed the most part of men, and as the most part and the best part be not alway of one mind so if this matter should be tried, not by wit and reason but by heads or hands, the greater part is like as it often doth to vanquish[9] and overcome the better, for the best part (as I reckon) whom I accompt[10] the wisest of every age, as among the Gentiles the old philosophers and among the Christian men the ancient doctors of Christ's church, all affirm

1 engendereth breeds.
2 lever rather.
3 compass contrive, devise.
4 peevish silly, foolish.
5 can know, have learned.
6 sad serious, grave.
7 garnish clothe, ornament.
8 wotteth know.
9 vanquish defeat.
10 accompt reckon, consider.

learning to be very good and profitable, not only for men but also for women, that which Plato[1] the wise philosopher calleth a bridle for young people against vice. Wherefore, good Frances, take you the best part and leave the most. Follow the wise men and regard not the foolish sort, but apply all your might, will, and diligence to obtain that especial treasure which is delectable in youth, comfortable in age, and profitable at all seasons, of whom without doubt cometh much goodness and virtue. Which virtue whoso lacketh, he is without that thing that only maketh a man, yea, and without the which a man is worse than an unreasonable beast nor once worthy to have the name of a man. It maketh fair and amiable that that is of nature deformed, as Diogenes[2] the philosopher when he saw a young man foul and evil favoured of person[3] but very virtuous of living: "Thy virtue," said he, "maketh thee beautiful." And that that is goodly of itself already it maketh more excellent and bright. Which as Plato the wise philosopher sayeth, if it could be seen with our bodily eyes it would make men wonderfully enamoured and taken in the love of it. Wherefore, unto those especial gifts of grace that God hath lent you and endued[4] you withal,[5] endeavour yourself that this precious diamond and ornament be not lacking, which had shall flourish and lighten all your other gifts of grace and make them more gay, and lacked shall dark and blemish them sore.

And surely the beauty of it, though ye had none other, shall get you both greater love more faithful and longer to continue of all good folks than shall the beauty of the body, be it never so excellent, whose love decayeth together with it that was the cause of it and most commonly before, as by daily experience we may see them that go together for the love of the bodily beauty within a small while when their appetite is satisfied repent themself. But the love that cometh by the means of virtue and goodness shall ever be fresh and increase right as doth the virtue itself.

And it shall you come by none otherwise so readily as if you continue the study of learning which you be entered well in already, and for your time and age I would say had greatly profited, saving that child's age is so frail accompted that it needeth rather monition[6] and continual calling upon than the deserved praise. Howbeit,[7] I have no doubt in you whom I see naturally born unto virtue and having so good bringing up of a babe, not only among your honourable uncle's children of whose conversation and company they that were right evil might take occasion of goodness and amendment, but also with your own mother of whose precepts and teaching and also very virtuous living if you take heed, as I put no fear you will and also do, you cannot fail to come to such grace and goodness as I have ever had opinion in you that ye should. Wherefore, I have ever in my mind favoured you and furthered to my power your profit and increase thereunto and shall as long as I see you delight in learning and virtue no kind of pain or labour refused on my party that may do you good. And as a token of my good mind and an instrument toward your success and furtherance, I send you this book, little in quantity but big in value, turned out of Latin into English by your own forenamed kinswoman, whose goodness and virtue two things there be that let[8] me much to speak of. The one because it were a thing superfluous to spend many words unto you about that matter which yourself know well enough by long experience and daily use.[9] The other cause is for I would eschew the slander of flattery, howbeit I count it no flattery to speak good of them that deserve it, but yet I know that she is as loath to have praise given her as she is worthy to have it and had leaver[10] her praise to rest in men's hearts

1 Plato Greek philosopher (c. 429-347 BCE).

2 Diogenes "the Cynic" (c. 412/403-324/321 BCE), Greek philosopher, who valued education beyond all material wealth and sought to strip worldly accoutrements from his own life.

3 person body.

4 endued granted.

5 withal as well.

6 monition warning, reproof.

7 Howbeit nevertheless, however.

8 let hinder, prevent.

9 use practice, habit.

10 had leaver had rather.

than in their tongues or rather in God's estimation and pleasure than any man's words or thought. And as touching the book itself, I refer and leave it to the judgements of those that shall read it, and unto such as are learned, the only name of the maker putteth out of question the goodness and perfection of the work, which as to mine own opinion and fantasy cannot be amended in any point. And as for the translation thereof, I dare be bold to say it that whoso list[1] and well can confer and examine the translation with the original he shall not fail to find that she hath showed herself not only erudite and elegant in either tongue, but hath also used such wisdom, such discreet and substantial judgement in expressing lively the Latin, as a man may peradventure miss in many things translated and turned by them that bear the name of rightwise[2] and very well learned men, and the labour that I have had with it about the printing I yield wholly and freely give unto you, in whose good manners and virtue as in a child I have so great affection, and unto your good mother unto whom I am so much beholden, of whose company I take so great joy and pleasure, in whose godly communication I find such spiritual fruit and sweetness that as oft as I talk with her, so oft me think I feel my self the better. Therefore now, good Frances, follow still on her steps, look ever upon her life to inform your own thereafter, like as ye would look in a glass to tire[3] your body by, yea, and that more diligently insomuch as the beauty of the body though it never be so well attended will soon fade and fall away. Good living and virtue once gotten tarrieth[4] still, whose fruit ye shall feel not only in this world, which is transitory and of short continuance, but also in another. And also it should be great shame, dishonesty, and rebuke unto you born of such a mother and also nourished up with her own teat for to degenerate and go out of kind.[5] Behold her in this age of hers, in this almost continual disease and sickness, how busy she is to learn and in the small time that she hath had how much she hath yet profited in the Latin tongue, how great comfort she taketh of that learning that she hath gotten, and consider thereby what pleasure and profit you may have hereafter, if God lend you life as I pray he do, of the learning that you may have or you come to her age if you spend your time well, which doing you shall be able to do yourself good and be great joy and comfort to all your friends and all that ever would you well, among whom I would you should reckon me for one, not among the least if not among the chief, and so fare you well mine own good, gentle, and fair Frances. At Chelcheth[6] the year of our Lord God a thousand five hundred xxiiii. The first day of October.

The Seventh Petition.

Sed libera nos a malo.[7] O almighty Father, it hath pleased thy mere[8] and liberal goodness once when we were rid from sin to deliver us by thy son Jesus Christ out of the hands of our most foul and unclean father the Devil and to elect and take us into the honour both of thy name and thine inheritance, but yet of this condition, that all the while we live here in earth we should be in continual battle with our enemy, which nothing mistrust but that thou wilt perform that which we desire of thee. Amen.

—1525

[1] list wish, desire.
[2] rightwise i.e., righteous.
[3] tire attire.
[4] tarrieth stay, remain.
[5] kind character, type.
[6] Chelcheth Chelsea, a SW suburb of London where the More family home was located.
[7] Sed libera nos a malo Latin, "but deliver us from evil."
[8] mere pure.

Letter

Margaret Roper, to the Most Learned Theologian, Des. Erasmus Roterodamus,[1] S.P.D.[2]

Quam illud boni plerumque accidere soleat gratissimum, quo subito quis atque insperato fruatur, id ego nuper, vir omnium eruditissime, verissumum experta sum, quum litteras tuas non minus elegantes quam amantes, certosque studiosi animi tui erga patrem, omnemque eius familiam, testes, Quirinus tuus mihi traderet, quae quanto magis venerunt insperata, tanto merito majorem menti mea vluptatem intulere. Neque enim aut sperare aut exspectare poteram, ut tam multis necessariis studiis assidue occupatissimus, moribs etaim acribus misere perpetuo agitatus, semperque molestia confectus, mihi unquam scripturus esset, in qua nunquam futurum est mereri, ut eo honore dignareris, ad quem litterarum tuarum beneficio evecta sum: quas quoties alicui ostenavero, non mediocrem inde famae meae laudem accessuram intelligo, quae nulla alia magis via illustrari potuit, quam per litteras tuas: quid enim cum illo honore comparandum, quo digna habita sum, quam totius Orbis decus suis litteris dignatus sit? Quare ut mihi rem longe supra meritum meum benignitas tua contulerit, ita me sane pro tam eximio munere dignis agendis gratiis nimis imparem jure confiteor. Quod pictoris tibi adventus tantae voluptati fuit, illo nomine, quod utriusque mei parentis nostrumque omnium effigiem depictam detulerit, ingentibus cum gratiis libenter agnoscimus, nihil ardentius expetentes, quam ut Praeceptorem nostrum cuius eruditis laboribus, quicquid bonarum litterarum imbiberimus, acceptum habemus, felemque patris veteremque amicum coram aliquando colloqui ac contemplari nobis liceat. Vale. Salutat te ex animo D. mater, item totus tuus maritus mens ac frater, ambae soreores meae plurimam tibi salutem mittunt.

Londino 4. Novembris, Anno 1529.

How greatly a good and most welcome thing is delighted in when it takes place suddenly and unexpectedly, as I myself have lately most truly learned by experience, most learned of all men, with your letters, brought to me by your Quirinus,[3] that are no less elegant than affectionate and an assured witness of favourable feeling toward my father and all of his family, which coming more unhoped for the more deservedly brought greater pleasure to my mind. For I could neither hope for nor expect that, so occupied with many unremitting and pressing pursuits, still severely bothered by wretched, ongoing sickness, and always consumed by vexations, you would ever write to me and that you should deem me worthy of such unmerited distinction, to which I am raised by the favour of your letters. Whenever I show them to anyone, I know that from that cause no inconsiderable praise will accrue to my reputation, which can be made more distinguished in no other way than by your letters. Truly, what can be compared to that honour, whereby I, whom the glory of the whole world has honoured with this letter, am deemed worthy? Wherefore, just as your kindness has imputed to me something far beyond my merit, so I acknowledge myself unequal to give thanks for such extraordinary favour. That the arrival of the painter[4] who brought the portrait of all of us and of our parents is for you of greatest pleasure we acknowledge freely and with immense thanks. We desire nothing more ardently than the teacher by whose learned work we received whatever of good letters we have imbibed, and to see and speak personally to the old and faithful friend of our father. Farewell. Greetings to you from our dear mother, likewise my husband, whose mind is yours, and my brother and two sisters send many greetings to you.

London, 4 November 1529.

---

[1] Des. Erasmus Roterodamus Desiderius Erasmus of Rotterdam (c. 1466-1536), the leading northern European humanist scholar and a close friend of the More family. Thomas More sent some of Margaret's Latin letters to him in order to publicize her linguistic skill.

[2] S.P.D. the abbreviation for the common Latin salutation in classical letters Salutem plurimam dicet (sends many greetings).

[3] Quirinus Quirin Talesius (d. 1572), a young scholar who acted as secretary to Erasmus.

[4] painter Hans Holbein (1497-1543), who made a famous portrait of Thomas More surrounded by his family.

William Roper
1495/1498-1578

William Roper, best known as the biographer of Thomas More, came from a family of wealthy landowners with interests in law and politics. His maternal grandfather, John Fineux, served as chief justice of the King's Bench, as did William Roper's father, John Roper, whose will was so complicated that it took five years and an act of Parliament to enact its provisions.[1]

The lives of the Roper and More families intersected at Lincoln's Inn two generations before the 1525 marriage between William Roper and Margaret More, Thomas More's eldest daughter (see pp. 79-85). In 1496, John and Thomas More, father and son, were noted in the Lincoln's Inn records together with John Roper, who appears to have provided the younger More with some of his legal training,[2] while John More and John Roper served together on a number of commissions.[3] By 1518, after receiving an education at one of the universities, William Roper was also admitted to Lincoln's Inn, where he later became a bencher or senior member. In 1523, he acquired the offices of clerk of the pleas and protonotary of the King's Bench, both of which he held for life. Following Thomas More's death, Roper remained an ardent Roman Catholic. He also maintained his interest in public life, sitting during Mary's reign as a member of Parliament for Rochester and Canterbury. Like his father-in-law, Roper's religious conscience drew unwelcome attention when, in 1568, he was summoned before the Privy Council on charges of funding recusants who had fled the country and having books printed against the Queen's government. The problem appears to have been resolved through Roper's entry into a bond to be of good behaviour in 1569. He died in January 1578 and was buried at St. Dunstan's Church, Canterbury.

Much of Roper's young adult life was spent in the household and company of Thomas More, first as a scholar and suitor to his daughter. Later he was a family member living under the spectre of More's opposition to the divorce that Henry VIII had sought from Katherine of Aragon, and More's subsequent execution. Roper's Life of Sir Thomas More was written shortly after More's death in 1535.[4]

The work depicts the events of More's life within the conventions of different types of medieval biography. The secular tradition, typified by Lydgate's Fall of Princes, emphasizes the uncertainty of worldly wealth and power, which can be lost with a simple turn of Fortune's wheel. Biographies written in this tradition tend to sound very similar because they show a repeated pattern of a rise to power, followed by a sudden fall. Another type of biographical writing in this period is hagiography (the writing of saints' lives), in which details are chosen and arranged in order to demonstrate "the exemplary holiness of the saints' lives."[5] Both of these types of writing tend to be highly patterned, with events from their subjects' lives selected and arranged to foreshadow the necessary outcome. In the case of More, Roper creates symmetry in the story of Thomas More's life by balancing his account around More's resignation of the chancellorship, which leads to his fall. In addition, Roper selects events from More's early life that exemplify the characteristics shown in More's saintly actions in his final days.[6] This sense of an overarching pattern is reinforced by the fact that More's execution took place on July 6, the eve of the day honouring St. Thomas à Becket.[7] The connection is significant because Becket was a former chancellor and archbishop of Canterbury who in 1164 resisted a series of attempts by Henry II to gain political control over spiritual matters. In this way, Thomas More is shown to resemble the earlier St. Thomas.

---

1 Pearl Hogrefe, "Sir Thomas More's Connection with the Roper Family," PMLA 47 (1932): pp. 529-30.
2 Ibid., p. 524.
3 Ibid., p. 528-29.
4 The biography, however, was not printed until 1626.
5 D.A. Stauffer, English Biography Before 1700 (Cambridge, MA, 1930), p. 129.
6 J. Anderson, Biographical Truth: The Representation of Historical Persons in Tudor-Stuart Writing (New Haven, 1984), p. 43.
7 Ibid., p. 44.

Roper complicates both of the biographical traditions he inherits, however, by emphasizing More's divided political and spiritual interests. On one hand, he details the young More's gift for spontaneous performance and mastery of classical languages. Both of these talents laid the ground for More's role as companion and advisor to his monarch. In this role, academic prowess combined with virtuoso performance in a kind of intellectual entertainment for the King and Queen. Following the tradition of saint's life, however, Roper introduces the spiritual element of More's character early on, in the midst of an account of demands for his presence at court. Roper observes More's desire to retire into prayerful solitude, a personal desire he sacrificed for a greater public good. Roper emphasizes More's spiritual integrity and humility throughout, with frequent repetition of the word "conscience" in the face of Henry's opportunistic use of both spiritual and political power to divorce his wife in order to marry his mistress.[1] As a writer, Roper's position is as divided as the central figure himself, for he is both the biographer and, as a member of More's family, a character in the story he authors. While the authorial self shapes the narrative to reflect an exemplary—if doomed—life, the voice of the son-in-law points out the difficulties created for the family by More's intransigence, as the triumph of More's conscience spawned political and economic disaster for the family members who depended on him.[2]

EDITION: The mirrour of vertue in worldly greatnes; or the life of Syr T. More. Paris: St. Omer, 1626. STC 21316.

from The Life of Sir Thomas More

Sir Thomas More was born in London of worshipful parents. His father was a student of Lincoln's Inn, and brought him up in the Latin tongue at St. Anthony's School in London, who was very shortly after, by his father's procurement, received into the house of that worthy and learned prelate,[3] Cardinal Morton, where though he was but young in years, he would in the time of Christmas suddenly step in among the players, and there ex tempore,[4] without any study of the matter or least stay or stammering in his speech, make a part of his own present wit amongst them, which was more delightful and pleasing to the nobles and gentlemen that used to be at supper with the Cardinal than all the premeditated parts of the players.

This Cardinal took more delight in his wit and towardness than he did of any other temporal matter whatsoever, and would often say of him unto diverse of his familiar friends who used dinner and supper with him, "This child here waiting at the table, whosoever shall live to see it, will prove a marvellous man." And for his better furtherance in learning he placed him at Oxford, where when he was well instructed in the Greek and Latin tongues, he was then, for the common laws of the kingdom, put to an inn of Chancery,[5] called New Inn, where in small time he profited so well that he was from thence admitted into Lincoln's Inn, with very small allowance, continuing there his study until he was made barrister.

After this, to his high commendations, he read for a good space a public lecture of St. Augustine de Civitate Dei[6] in the church of St. Lawrence in the

[1] Ibid., p. 43.

[2] J. Crewe, "The 'Encomium Moriae' of William Roper," English Literary History 55 (1988): pp. 295-96.

[3] prelate ecclesiastical dignitary of exalted rank and authority (i.e., a bishop).

[4] ex tempore unrehearsed, impromptu.

[5] inn of Chancery The Inns of Chancery were the home of attorneys who practiced in courts of common law and provided initial training for those who went on to further legal study at the Inns of Court (e.g., Lincoln's Inn, Furnival's Inn) in preparation for being called to the bar.

[6] St. Augustine de Civitate Dei St. Augustine's most famous work is The City of God (413-26), in which he contrasts the earthly and heavenly cities in order to explain the fall of Rome.

Old Jewry in London,[1] whereunto resorted one Doctor Grocyn,[2] an excellent scholar and a great divine, and all the chief learned in and about the city of London.

Then was he made reader of Furnival's Inn, where he remained for the space of above three years, and then he gave himself wholly to devotion and prayer in the Charterhouse[3] at London, living there religiously four years without vow, during which time he often resorted to the house of one Mr. Colt,[4] a gentleman of Essex, who used many times to invite him thither.

This Mr. Colt had three daughters whose honest and virtuous educations were the chief motives that induced him to place his affection there and albeit[5] his mind was most most inclined towards the second sister, for that he thought her the fairest and best favoured, yet when he considered it would be both a great grief and some shame also to the eldest to see her younger sister preferred in marriage before her, he out of a kind of pity then framed his affection towards the eldest, and shortly after married her. [...]

For his wisdom and learning, he was held in such honour and esteem that before he came to the service of King Henry the Eight, at the suit and instance[6] of our English merchants, he was, with the King's consent, twice sent ambassador about certain business in controversy betwixt them and the Merchants of the Stilliard.[7] Whose wise and discreet dealings therein, to his high commendations, coming unto the King's ear, he called immediately unto him Cardinal Wolsey,[8] then lord chancellor, and willed him by all means to procure and work Mr. More into his service.

Whereupon the Cardinal, according to the King's pleasure, earnestly laboured with him and, amongst many other his persuasions, he alleged unto him how dear his service must needs be to the King, who could not out of honour seem to recompense him with less than he should otherwise yearly lose thereby. Yet was he loath to change his estate,[9] and made such means to the King by the Cardinal to the contrary that his Majesty, at that time, rested well satisfied. [...] And for that he was ever of a merry and pleasant disposition, it pleased the King and Queen very often to send for him at the time of dinner and supper, as also many other times, to come and recreate with them.

But when he perceived the King to take so much delight in his company and discourse that he could not scarce once in a month get leave to go home to his wife and children, nor that he could not be absent from court two days together, without sending for again, he, disliking this restraint of his liberty, did thereupon begin somewhat to dissemble his merry nature, retiring himself by little and little from his accustomed mirth, so that he was from thenceforth sent for orderly by the King, at such times as was convenient. [...]

Amongst many other his virtues, he was of such meekness that if he happened to enter into argument or dispute with any learned man resorting to him from Oxford, Cambridge, or other place, as there did diverse,[10] some for desire of his acquaintance, some for the famous report of his

---

1 St. Lawrence in the Old Jewry in London church near the centre of London in what was the Jewish quarter prior to the expulsion of Jews from England in 1283.

2 Doctor Grocyn William Grocyn (?1446-1519) was reputed to have introduced the study of Greek at Oxford (DNB online), where he was More's tutor. Grocyn later became rector of the Church of St. Lawrence Jewry.

3 Charterhouse a Carthusian monastery.

4 Mr. Colt John Colt, whose eldest daughter, Jane, was married to More in 1505 (DNB online).

5 albeit although.

6 instance urgent entreaty, persistence.

7 Merchants of the Stilliard The Steelyard was an area on the N bank of the Thames above London Bridge where the Merchants of the Hanse had their establishment. The Old Hanse was the Fellowship of the London Merchants, which had had a monopoly on the foreign trade of London since Norman times; the New Hanse was the company of Merchant Adventurers, first incorporated in 1497, which received charters from Henry VII in 1505 and Elizabeth in 1566.

8 Cardinal Wolsey Thomas, Cardinal Wolsey (c. 1471-1530) wielded both enormous temporal and spiritual power and shaped Henry VIII's foreign policy until his fall in 1529 over the question of Henry's divorce. He was executed in November 1530 for high treason (DNB online).

9 estate moral or material condition.

10 diverse various ones.

wisdom and learning, and some about suits[1] for the universities, although very few were comparable unto him, as well witnesseth Erasmus, and if in discourse he so pressed them that they could not well hold out longer disputation[2] against him, then, lest he should discourage them, as one that sought not his own glory, he would seem conquered and by some wise device courteously break off into some other matter and give over. Of whom, for his wisdom and learning, the King had such an opinion that at such times as he attended his person, in his progress either to Oxford or Cambridge, where he was received with very eloquent orations, his Majesty would always assign Sir Thomas More, as one prompt and ready therein, to make answer thereunto ex tempore. [...]

Thus did Sir Thomas More through the whole course of his life by his actions make it appear that all his travails[3] and pains, without thought of earthly commodity, either to himself or any of his, were only for the service of God, his King, and the commonwealth wholly bestowed and employed. And he was oftentimes, in his latter days, heard to say that he never asked of the King for himself the value of one penny.

His daily custom was, if he were at home, besides his private prayers with his wife, children, and family, often to retire alone and exercise himself in private and godly devotions, as also every night before he went to bed he used to go to his chapel with his whole family aforesaid, and there upon his knees devoutly to say certain litanies,[4] psalms, and collects[5] with them. And because he was always desirous of private exercise, and that he might the better withdraw himself from worldly company, he built himself a lodging a good distance from his mansion house, called the New Building, wherein he placed a chapel, library, and a gallery to walk, spending many days in the week in prayer and study together. And always on the Friday he did usually continue there from morning until night, bestowing his time only in meditation, reading, and such godly exercises.

And the more to stir up and encourage his wife and children to the desire of heavenly things, he would oftentimes use these speeches unto them: "It is no mastery[6] for you, my children, to go to Heaven, for everybody giveth you good counsel, and likewise many show you good examples. You see virtue rewarded and vice punished, so that you are carried up to Heaven even by the chin. But if you live to the time that no man will give you good counsel, nor show you good example, when you shall see virtue punished and vice rewarded, if then you will stand fast, and stick firmly unto God upon pain of my life, though you be but half good, yet God will allow you for wholly good."

If his wife, children, or any of his household had been sick or troubled at any time with any infirmity he would say to them, "We may not look at our pleasure to go to Heaven in featherbeds; it is not the way. For our blessed Lord himself went thither[7] with great pain and by many tribulations, and hard was the pathway wherein he so walked, nor may the servant look to be in better case than his master."

And as he would in this manner always persuade them to take their pains and sickness patiently, so would he in like form teach them to withstand the Devil and his temptations valiantly. [...]

Now, upon the coming home of the Bishop of Durham[8] and Sir Thomas More from Cambrai aforesaid, the King began to renew again his old suit and was very earnest in persuading Sir Thomas More to agree unto the matter of his marriage, using all the ways and means he could devise to draw him to his part and, as it was thought, did the rather for that end soon after 1 suits petitions, entreaties.

---

2 disputation debate, discussion.

3 travails efforts, work.

4 litanies forms of public prayer in which a leader makes petitions, to which the congregation responds.

5 collects short public prayers.

6 mastery victory, skill.

7 thither there.

8 Bishop of Durham Cuthbert Tunstall (1474-1559), scholar, diplomat, and Lord Privy Seal, also resisted Henry VIII's divorce, but when faced with the Oath of Supremacy decided not to oppose it (DNB online).

create him lord chancellor[1] of England. And the King said further unto him that though at his going to Cambrai he was in utter despair to obtain dispensation thereof, yet now he had conceived some good hope to compass the same, alleging that, albeit his marriage, being against the positive law of the Church and the written law of God, was holpen by the dispensation,[2] yet is there another thing found out of late, quoth the King, whereby his marriage appeareth so directly against the law of nature that it could in no wise by the Church be dispensable, as Doctor Stokesley,[3] whom he had then newly preferred to the Bishopric of London, can well instruct you, with whom upon this point I would have you to confer.

So they conferred together. But for all this conference, Sir Thomas More could not be induced to change his opinion therein. Yet notwithstanding, did the Bishop in his report of him to the King affirm falsely that he found Sir Thomas More in the King's cause very forward,[4] as being desirous to find some good matter wherewith he might truly serve the King's contentment in that case.

Now, this Bishop Stokesley having a little before been by the Cardinal Wolsey openly rebuked in the Star Chamber[5] and awarded to the Fleet, he not well brooking[6] this contumelious[7] usage, and knowing that forasmuch as the Cardinal, for his backwardness in pursuing the King's divorce, was falling out of his Highness' favour, and that he had now espied a fit opportunity to revenge his quarrel against the Cardinal, and to incense the King further against him, at last prevailed so far that the Cardinal was soon after displaced from his office of high chancellorship and the same was conferred upon Sir Thomas More, hoping thereby to win him to his side, that he would yield his consent for the matter of the divorce. [...]

Whereunto Sir Thomas More, amongst diverse other wise and learned speeches, made answer and replied that although he had good cause to take comfort of his Highness's singular favour towards him, to whom therefore he acknowledged himself deeply bounden, yet nevertheless he must for his own part needs confess that in all those things by the Duke's Grace[8] there alleged he had done nothing but what was his duty. And furthermore said that he was very unfit for that dignity, wherein, considering how wise and worthy a prelate had lately before taken so great a fall, he said he had no great cause to rejoice. And as they had before in the King's behalf charged him to minister justice uprightly and indifferently to the people without corruption or affection, so did he likewise charge them again that if they saw him at any time to disgress in the least thing touching any part of his duty, in that honourable office, even as they would discharge their own duty and fidelity to God and the King, they would not fail to declare the same to his Majesty, who otherwise might have just cause to lay his fault wholly upon them and to their charge. [...]

This lord chancellor, although he was well known, both to God and the world, to be a man of most eminent virtue, though not so considered of every man, yet for the avoiding of singularity[9] would he appear to the eye of the world no otherwise than other men, as well in his apparel as behaviour. And albeit he appeared outwardly honourable, like to one of his dignity and calling, yet

[1] lord chancellor highest officer of the Crown and keeper of the Great Seal, the symbol of the monarch.

[2] dispensation granting of licence by a pope, archbishop, or bishop, to a person, to do what is forbidden, or omit what is enjoined, by ecclesiastical law or by any solemn obligation.

[3] Doctor Stokesley John Stokesley (?1475-1539), bishop of London, wrote in favour of Henry VIII's divorce (DNB online).

[4] forward ardent, zealous.

[5] Star Chamber a court, chiefly of criminal jurisdiction, developed in the 15th century from the judicial sittings of the King's Council in the Star Chamber at Westminster. The judges were the lord chancellor or lord keeper, the lord treasurer, the lord privy seal, and any peers that chose to attend. The rules of procedure of the court rendered it a powerful instrument in the hands of a sovereign or a ministry desirous of using it for purposes of tyranny.

[6] brooking tolerating.

[7] contumelious reproachful, shameful.

[8] Duke's Grace Thomas Howard, third duke of Norfolk (1473-1554), was a leading judge in More's trial (DNB online).

[9] singularity dissenting from others.

inwardly did he esteem[1] all such things for mere vanity, for next to his naked body he wore almost continually a shirt of hair,[2] the which a young gentlewoman, named Mrs. More, by chance one day espying as he sat in his doublet[3] and hose at dinner in the summer time, and seemed to smile thereat, his daughter Roper[4] perceiving the same, being not ignorant of this his austerity, gave him private notice thereof, and he did presently amend the fault, seeming withal[5] sorry that she had seen it. He also wore another plain coarse shirt without ruff or collar upon his shirt of hair and many times he likewise punished his body with whips made of knotted cords, the which thing was only known to his daughter Roper, who for her secrecy above all the rest he especially trusted, for that as need required she did always wash and mend his shirt of hair, which he would not discover unto any other whatsoever.

Now in this mean[6] space whilst he was lord chancellor of England, the King did one day greatly move him and desire him well to weigh and consider of his great matter, concerning his divorce. Sir Thomas More, falling upon his knees, most humbly besought his Majesty to stand still his gracious sovereign, as ever since his entry into his royal service he had found him, and said that there was nothing in the world more grievous to his heart than that he was not able with the loss of one of his limbs to find anything for that matter whereby he might with safe conscience serve his Majesty's turn. And that he had always borne in mind the most godly words that his Highness spake unto him at his first coming into his royal service, the most virtuous lesson that ever prince taught a subject, to wit, that he should first look unto God, and after God unto his King, as in good faith, said he, "I have most sincerely done or else might your Grace accompt me a most unworthy servant." To this the King replied that if he could not therein with his conscience serve him, he was well content to accept of his service otherwise, and use the advice of some others of his Privy Council, whose consciences would agree well enough therewith, nor would he nevertheless discontinue his gracious favour towards him, nor trouble his conscience any further with that matter for the time forward.

But Sir Thomas More perceived by little and little that the King fully determined to proceed in his marriage with Queen Anne, when he with the bishops and nobles of the Higher House of Parliament were, for the furtherance of that matter, commanded by the King to go unto the Commons of the Lower House[7] and show unto them what the universities, as well of other parts beyond the seas, as of Oxford and Cambridge, had done in that behalf testifying the same with their seals and subscriptions. All which things, at the King's request not showing of what mind he was therein himself, he opened to the Lower House of Parliament.

Nevertheless, doubting greatly lest further inconveniences might follow, into which, contrary to his conscience, by reason of his office he was likely to befall, he made humble suit to the Duke of Norfolk, his singular dear friend, to be a means unto the King, that he might, with his Grace's favour, be discharged from his office of chancellorship, in which for certain infirmities of his body he pretended himself not able any longer to serve.

This good Duke of Norfolk coming on a time to Chelsea[8] to dine with Sir Thomas More, found him in the church singing in the choir with a surplice on his back, to whom, after the Mass was done, as they went towards his house together arm in arm, the Duke said, "God's body, God's body, my Lord Chancellor, what turned parish clerk?[9] You dishon-

---

1 esteem value.

2 shirt of hair prickly garment of cloth made from hair, worn by ascetics and penitents.

3 doublet close-fitting body-garment, with or without sleeves.

4 daughter Roper Margaret More Roper (1505-44; see pp. 79-85), More's eldest daughter and wife of William Roper (DNB online).

5 withal moreover, as well.

6 mean intervening.

7 Commons of the Lower House Parliament, rather than the House of Lords.

8 Chelsea W suburb of London where More lived.

9 what turned parish clerk i.e., who has sided with the Church rather than with the King.

our the King and his office very much." "Nay," quoth Sir Thomas More, smiling upon the Duke, "your Grace may not think that the King, your master and mine, will be offended with me for serving God his master, or thereby accompt his service any way dishonoured."

Now when the Duke, at the special entreaty and importunate suit of Sir Thomas More, had obtained of the King that he should be discharged of his chancellorship, at a convenient time appointed by the King, he repaired unto the Court to yield up the Great Seal,[1] which his Majesty received of him with praise and thanks for his good service done to his person and the realm in that office. And he further said unto him in a gracious manner that if in any suit he should hereafter have unto him, that either concerned his honour, for that word it pleased the King to use unto him, or appertained to his profit, he should ever find his Highness a very good and gracious lord.

After he had thus resigned the office and dignity of the chancellorship and placed all his gentlemen and yeomen with bishops and noblemen, and his eight watermen[2] with the Lord Audley,[3] who succeeded him in his office, to whom also he gave his great barge, he then called all his children unto him and asked their advises how he might now in the decay of his ability, which by the surrender of his office was so impaired that he could not, as he was wont, maintain them to live all together according to his desire, whereat when he saw them all silent and unwilling in that case to show their opinions unto him, "Why then will I," quoth he, "show unto you my poor mind."

"I have been brought up," said he, "at Oxford, at an inn of Chancery, at Lincoln's Inn, and also in the King's courts, and so forth from the lowest degree to the highest, and yet I have in yearly revenues left me at this present little above a hundred pounds by the year, so that now we must hereafter, if we will live together, be content to become contributors to each other. But by my counsel it shall not be best for us to fall to the lowest fare first. We will not therefore descend to Oxford fare, nor the fare of New Inn, but we will begin with Lincoln's Inn diet, where many right worshipful of good years do live full well, which if we find not ourselves the first year able to maintain, then will we the next year after go one step down to New Inn fare, wherewith many an honest man is well contented. Then if that exceed our abilities, will we the next year after descend to Oxford fare, where many grave, learned, and ancient doctors be continually resident, which if our powers be not able to maintain neither, then may we yet with bags and wallets[4] go a-begging together, hoping that for pity some good people will give us their charity, at their door, to sing 'Salve Regina,'[5] and so still may we keep company together and be as merry as beggars." [...]

In the time before his troubles, he would talk with his wife and children of the joys of Heaven and the pains of Hell, and of the lives of the holy martyrs, of their grievous martyrdoms, of their marvellous patience, and of their sufferings and deaths, and that they died most willingly rather than they would offend God, also what an happy and a blessed thing it was for the love of God to suffer loss of goods, imprisonment, loss of life, and lands. Moreover, he would further say unto them that, upon his faith, if he could but perceive that his wife and children would encourage him to die in a good cause, it would be such a comfort unto him that for very joy thereof, he would run merrily[6] to his death. By this discourse and other such like he gave them feeling what troubles might afterwards chance to happen to him, whereby he had so far encouraged them before the time, that

[1] Great Seal chief seal of the King, used to indicate his approval of important state documents, was held by the lord chancellor.

[2] watermen boatmen.

[3] Lord Audley Thomas Audley (1488-1544) became lord chancellor after More's resignation and presided over his trial.

[4] wallets knapsacks.

[5] 'Salve Regina' one of the four anthems of the Blessed Virgin Mary, its opening line is translated roughly as "Hail, Holy Queen, Mother of Mercy."

[6] merrily cheerfully.

afterwards when they happened unto him indeed they seemed a great deal the less.

Now after the resignation of his office there came unto him to Chelsea, Mr. Thomas Cromwell,[1] then in the King's his favour, with a message from his Majesty, about which when they had fully conferred together privately, "Mr. Cromwell," quoth Sir Thomas More, "you are now newly entered into the service of a most royal, wise, and liberal prince and if you follow my poor advice you shall in your counsel-giving ever tell him what he ought to do but never what he is able to do. So shall you show yourself a true and faithful servant and a right worthy counsellor, for if a lion knew his own strength it were hard for any man to rule him."

Within a short time after this there was a commission granted forth and directed to Mr. Cranmer,[2] then archbishop of Canterbury, to determine the matter of the marriage between the King and Queen Katherine at St. Alban's. Where at last it was fully determined and concluded according to the King's desire, and then began he to complain that since he could have no justice at the Pope's hands he would therefore from thenceforth separate himself from the See of Rome,[3] and thereupon he presently married the Lady Anne Boleyn.

Which, when Sir Thomas More understood, he said to Mr. Roper, "God grant, God grant, son Roper, that these matters within a while be not confirmed by oath." [...]

In this Parliament was a statute made for the Oath of Supremacy[4] and lawfulness of the King's marriage, and within a while after all the priests of London and Westminster, and with them Sir Thomas More only and no lay man besides, were cited to appear at Lambeth[5] before the Bishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, and Secretary Cromwell, commissioners appointed there to tender the Oath unto them. [...]

At his coming to Lambeth, he behaved himself so discreetly before the commissioners at the ministration of the foresaid Oath, as may be seen at large in certain letters of his sent to Mrs. Roper, extant in a printed volume of his works, as they had little or nothing to lay unto his charge, yet durst they not, as it seemed, dismiss him, but committed him to the custody of the abbot of Westminster for four or five days, during which time the King consulted with his Council what order were best to be taken with him. And albeit in the beginning it was resolved that he should upon his oath be discharged, yet did Queen Anne, through her importunate clamours so far prevail with the King against him that, contrary to commissioners' expectation, he was committed to the Tower. [...]

After he had remained in the Tower about a month, his daughter Roper, having greatly desired to see her father, made earnest suit and got leave to visit him, at whose coming, after the saying of the seven psalms[6] and litanies which he was ever accustomed to say with her, before they fell into discourse of any other matter he said unto her, "I believe, Meg, that they who have put me here, think they have done me a great displeasure. But I assure thee on my faith, mine own good daughter, if it had not been for my wife and you my children, whom I accompt the chief part of my charge, I would not have failed long ere now to have enclosed myself in a straiter[7] room than this. But since I am come hither without mine own desert,[8] I trust that God of his goodness will disburden me of my care, and with his gracious help

---

1 Mr. Thomas Cromwell Thomas Cromwell (?1485-1540), formerly secretary to Cardinal Wolsey, was now Henry VIII's chief minister, in charge of both the dissolution of the monasteries and seeing the Act of Supremacy through Parliament (DNB online).

2 Mr. Cranmer Thomas Cranmer (1489-1556), as archbishop of Canterbury, declared Henry's marriage to Katherine of Aragon void. He went on to engineer the English Reformation and was ultimately martyred under Mary (DNB online).

3 See of Rome the Vatican (i.e., the Pope's authority).

4 Oath of Supremacy This oath recognized Henry VIII as supreme head of the English Church.

5 Lambeth Lambeth Palace, at the W end of London, is the home of the archbishop of Canterbury.

6 seven psalms The seven penitential psalms (6, 32, 38, 51, 102, 130, and 143) focus particularly on the expression of sorrow for sins and were traditionally recited at times of tribulation.

7 straiter narrower, more confined.

8 desert deserving.

supply my want amongst you. And had I no cause, I thank God Meg, to reckon myself in worse case here than in mine own house. For methinks in this case God maketh me even a wanton, setting me upon his knee and dandling me."

Thus by his patient suffering and cheerful demeanour in all his tribulations[1] and disasters, it plainly appeared that nothing seemed painful unto him, but rather a profitable exercise for the good of his soul. Then when he had questioned a while with his daughter about his wife, children and household state in his absence, he asked her how Queen Anne did. "Never better, Father," quoth she. "Never better, Meg?" quoth he, "Alas, alas, it pitieth[2] me to remember, into what misery, poor soul, she will shortly come." [...]

Now whereas the Oath above mentioned made to confirm the King's Supremacy and marriage was comprised in few words, the Lord Chancellor and Secretary Cromwell did of their own heads add more words unto it, to make it appear of more force and to sound it better in the King's ear, which Oath so amplified, they had caused to be ministered to Sir Thomas More and to all others throughout the kingdom. The which Sir Thomas More perceiving said one day unto his daughter Roper, "I may tell thee, Meg, they that committed me hither for refusing the Oath, not agreeable to the statute, are not by their own law able to justify my imprisonment. And surely, daughter, it is a great pity that any Christian prince should, by so flexible a Council ready to follow his affections, and by so weak a clergy wanting grace to stand constantly to their religion, with flattery be so grossly abused." But at length the Lord Chancellor and Mr. Secretary, espying their own oversight in that behalf, were glad afterwards to find a mean that another statute should be made for the confirmation of the said Oath so amplified with their additions. [...]

As Sir Thomas More came near unto the Tower, his daughter Roper, desirous to see her father once more before his death, and to receive his last blessing, gave attendance about the Tower Wharf, where he was to pass, and so soon as she saw him, hastening unto him, without respect or care of herself, pressed in among the throng of the Guard, that with halberds[3] went round about him, and there openly in the sight of all, asking him blessing on her knees, embraced him, took him about the neck and kissed him, who with a merry countenance, nothing at all dejected, gave her his fatherly blessing with many godly words of comfort and then departed.

So remained he in the Tower more than eight days after his condemnation, from whence the day before he suffered he sent his shirt of hair, not willing to have it seen, to his said daughter Roper and a letter, written with a coal, printed in the aforesaid book of his works, expressing plainly the fervent desire he had to suffer on the morrow in these words following: "I cumber[4] you, good Margaret, very much, but I would be sorry if it should be any longer than tomorrow, for tomorrow is St. Thomas of Canterbury his even,[5] and the Octave of St. Peter,[6] and therefore tomorrow long I to go to God; it were a day very meet and convenient for me. I never liked your manner better towards me, than when you last embraced me, and when daughterly love and dear charity hath no leisure to look towards worldly courtesy."

Upon the next morrow, according as he wished, early in the morning there came unto him Sir Thomas Pope,[7] his singular friend, with a message from the King and Council that he must before nine of the clock the same morning suffer death, and that he should forthwith prepare himself thereto. [...]

---

1 tribulations afflictions, miseries.

2 pitieth grieves.

3 halberds weapons combining a spear with a battle-ax.

4 cumber distress, trouble.

5 St. Thomas of Canterbury his even The remains of St. Thomas à Becket were placed in a new shrine in the Trinity Chapel of Canterbury Cathedral on 7 July 1220 (DNB online), 50 years after his martyrdom. His "even" is the day before.

6 Octave of St. Peter seven days after the feast day of St. Peter (June 29) (i.e., 6 July).

7 Sir Thomas Pope Pope (1507-59) later founded Trinity College, Oxford.

Then was he by Mr. Lieutenant brought out of the Tower, and from thence led towards the place of execution, upon the Tower Hill, where going up the scaffold, which was weak and ready to fall, he said smilingly to Mr. Lieutenant, "I pray you, good Mr. Lieutenant, see me safe up, and for my coming down let me shift for myself." Then desired he all the people about him to pray for him, and to bear witness, that he should now there suffer death in and for the faith of the holy Catholic Church. Which done, he kneeled down, and after his prayers said, he turned to the executioner, and with a cheerful countenance spake thus merrily unto him: "Pluck up thy spirits, man, and be not afraid to do thine office. My neck is somewhat short. Therefore take heed thou strikest not awry for saving of thine honesty, but if thou doest, upon my word I will not hereafter cast it in thy teeth." So, at one stroke of the executioner, passed Sir Thomas More out of this world to God upon the same day which himself had most desired. 6 July. 1535.

—composed, c. 1535; published, 1626

Juan Luis Vives
1492-1540

Juan Luis Vives, a Spanish humanist writer of numerous treatises, came to England in 1523 to serve Queen Katherine (of Aragon). He became, along with Thomas Linacre, the tutor of Princess Mary (later, Mary I [reigned, 1553-58]). Dedicated to the Queen and commissioned by her, The Instruction of a Christian Woman was originally published in Latin in 1523, and translated by Richard Hyrde into English in 1529/30. The text went through more than thirty-six editions (in England and on the Continent), and was translated into six languages before 1700, making it by far the most popular of the Tudor conduct manuals.

The treatise outlines the behaviour and education of the ideal woman through the three stages of her life: as maid, wife, and widow. The Instruction of a Christian Woman, however, is not simply an educational manual providing instruction on pedagogy and curriculum, but also a conduct manual providing instruction on dress, deportment, and conversation. Diane Bornstein notes that even a cursory comparison between a text like Thomas Hoby's translation of Castiglione's The Book of the Courtier and Vives's Instruction reveals that the instruction such manuals offer differs significantly depending on the addressee's gender. While Hoby's treatise presents the model Renaissance courtier as fulfilling his age's own conception of private and public virtues, it also grounds these ideals in the world of antiquity. However, Vives's treatise presents the model Renaissance woman as fulfilling a set of essentially medieval ideals, embodying a chastity, silence, and obedience that would not have been out of place in a fourteenth-century convent.[1] In short, conduct manuals aimed at men depict the ideal man as a soldier, a scholar, an orator, and an active servant of his nation. By contrast, manuals aimed at women describe the ideal woman as a virginal maid, an obedient and chaste wife, and a pious Protestant.[2] However, even in the Instruction itself there is tension between Vives's heavily conservative vision—which devotes only two chapters to matters of education and all the rest to matters of conduct—and Richard Hyrde's more liberal, humanist orientation. Hyrde's dedicatory letter to Queen Katherine specifically defends the education of women, as does his dedicatory letter prefacing Margaret More Roper's A Devout Treatise Upon the Pater Noster (see pp. 80-84).

EDITION: A very frutefull and pleasant boke called the Instructio[n] of a Christen woma[n]. Trans. Richard Hyrde. [London]: Thomas Berthelet, [1529?]. STC 24856.5.

from The Instruction of a Christian Woman[3]

[The Epistle Dedicatory]

Unto the Most Excellent Princess Queen Katherine, the Most Gracious Wife unto the Most Noble and Mighty Prince King Henry the VIII, Her Humble Beadman[4] and Orator Richard Hyrde Praying Good Prosperity and Welfare.

Were it not, most excellent Princess, that the consideration of your great goodness and benignity did as much encourage and bold me as the respect and regard of mine own ignorance retardeth me and holdeth back, I never durst[5] presume to dedi-

[1] "Introduction," Distaves and Dames: Renaissance Treatises For and About Women (Delmar, NY, 1978), p. v.

[2] Ibid., pp. v-vi.

[3] The actual title and subtitles read: A Very Fruitful and Pleasant Book Called The Instruction of a Christian Woman, made first in Latin, and dedicated unto the Queen's good grace by the right famous clerk Master Luis Vives, and turned out of Latin into English by Richard Hyrde. Which book who so readeth diligently shall have knowledge of many things, wherein he shall take great pleasure, and specially women shall take great commodity and fruit toward the increase of virtue and good manners.

[4] beadman one whose duty it is to pray for the welfare of others.

[5] durst dared.

cate and present unto the majesty of your noble Grace this my rude and simple translation, so much the more uncomely and unmete[1] to be offered in your high presence in how much the eloquence of the author staineth and defaceth the rude speech of the translator. For had I, most gracious Princess, that gift of erudition and utterance that I were able in our English tongue to give this book as much perspicuity, light, life, favour, grace, and quickness as Master Luis Vives hath given it in Latin, then durst I boldly put it forth to your Grace, not without good hope of thank[s], considering the matter to be such as neither a more profitable nor more necessary can lightly come in hand. For what is more fruitful than the good education and order of women, the one half of all mankind and that half also whose good behaviour or evil tatchis[2] giveth or bereaveth the other half almost all the whole pleasure and commodity of this present life, beside the furtherance or hindrance further growing thereupon concerning the life to come? And surely for the planting and nourishing of good virtuous[3] in every kind of women—virgins, wives, and widows—I verily believe there was never any treatise made either furnished with more goodly counsels, or set out with more effectual reasons, or garnished with more substantial authorities, or stored more plenteously of convenient examples, nor all these things together more goodly treated and handled than Master Vives hath done in his book; which book when I read I wished in my mind that either in every country women were learned in the Latin tongue or the book out of Latin translated into every tongue; and much I marvelled, as I often do, of the unreasonable oversight of men, which never cease to complain of women's conditions, and yet having the education and order of them in their own hands not only do little diligence to teach them and bring them up better, but also purposely withdraw them fro[m] learning, by which they might have occasions to wax[4] better by themselves.

But sith[5] this fault is too far gone and over largely spread to be shortly remedied, I thought at the least wise for my part it would do well to translate this book into our English tongue, for the commodity and profit of our own country, which when I had secretly done by myself, I showed it unto my singular good master and bringer-up Sir Thomas More,[6] to whose judgement and correction I use[7] to submit whatsoever I do or go about that I set any store by; who not only for the matter itself was very glad thereof, but also for that (as he then showed me) he perceived that it should be to your noble Majesty—for the gracious zeal that ye bear to the virtuous education of the womankind of this realm, whereof our Lord hath ordained you to be queen—so great and special pleasure that he had intended, his manifold business notwithstanding, to have taken the times to have translated this book himself, in which he was (as he said) very glad that he was now prevented, nor for eschewing of his labour, which he would have been very glad to bestow therein, but for because that the fruit thereof may now sooner come forth than he could have found the time. Howbeit as I answered him, "It were better to bring forth dates in a hundred years (for so long it is or [before] that tree bring forth his fruit) than crabs[8] in four year[s]." And though he reckoned himself eased of the translating, I besought him to take the labour to read it over and correct it, which he right gladly did. Whereby I have been the more encouraged to put forth unto your most noble Grace this translation; to whose Majesty sith the original work was dedicate,[9] I was of very duty methought bounden to dedicate the translation. Wherefore if there be, as I well wote[10] there is, any good in the 1 unmete unfitting.

2 tatchis tache: stain, stigma, moral blot.

3 virtuous i.e., virtue.

4 wax grow.

5 sith since.

6 my singular good master and bringer-up Sir Thomas More Hyrde was a tutor in More's household.

7 use am accustomed.

8 crabs crab apples.

9 I.e., the original Latin edition of the text.

10 wote know, understand.

matter, thank[s] be to Master Vives the maker; if anything be well in this translation, thank[s] be to the labour of my good master. For nothing in this work claim I for mine own but the show of my good zeal to do good to other[s] and service to your noble Grace, whom with the sacred majesty of the most excellent Prince, your dearest spouse, and your noble issue,[1] with increase of more, our Lord long preserve into the weal[2] of yourself, your realm, and all Christendom beside.

The Preface of the Most Famous Clerk Master Lodovic Vives upon His Book Called The Instruction of a Christian Woman unto the Most Gracious Princess Katherine, Queen of England.

I have been moved partly by the holiness and goodness of your living, partly by the favour and love that your Grace beareth toward holy study and learning to write something unto your good Grace of the information and bringing up of a Christian woman, a matter never yet entreated[3] of any man among so great plenty and variety of wits and writers. For Xenophon and Aristotle giving rules of housekeeping and Plato making precepts of ordering the commonweal[4] speak many things appertaining unto the woman's office and duty. And Saint Cyprian, Saint Hieronymus,[5] Saint Ambrose, and Saint Augustine have entreated of maids and widows, but in such wise that they appear rather to exhort and counsel them unto some kind of living than to instruct and teach them. They spend all their speech in the lauds and praises of chastity, which is a goodly thing and fitting for those great-witted and holy men. Howbeit,[6] they write but few precepts and rules how to live, supposing it to be better to exhort them unto the best and help them up to the highest than to inform and teach the lower things.

But I will let pass all such exhortations, because everybody shall choose and pick out the ways of living out of these men's authority rather than out of my fantasy, and I will compile rules of living. Therefore, in the first book I will begin at the beginning of a woman's life and lead her forth unto the time of marriage; in the second, from marriage unto widowhood—how she ought to pass the time of her life well and virtuously with her husband; in the last book I inform and teach the widowhood. And because the matter could not be otherwise handled, there be many things told in the first book pertaining unto wives and widows, and much in the second belonging unto unmarried women, and some in the third pertaining unto all. Lest a maid should think that she need to read but only the first book, or a wife the second, or a widow only the third, I will that every of them shall read all, in which I have been more short[7] than many would I should have been. Notwithstanding, who so considereth well the cause of mine intent, and taketh good heed, shall find it done not without a skill. For in giving precepts a man ought specially to be brief, lest he sooner dull the wits of the readers than teach them with long babbling. And precepts ought to be such that everybody may soon con[8] them and bear easily in mind. Nor we should not be ignorant of the laws that Christ and his disciples, Peter, Paul, James, John, and Jude taught us, where we may see that they give us the divine precepts brief and shortly. For who can bear in remembrance those laws which they bear not well in mind that have spent their whole life in study of them? And therefore have I neither thrust in many examples, nor gone out of my matter to entreat generally of vice and virtue, which were a large field to walk in, unto the end that my book might be not only read without tediousness, but also be read often. Moreover, though the precepts for men be innumerable, women yet may be informed with few

[1] issue children.
[2] into the weal for the well-being/health.
[3] entreated treated, handled.
[4] commonweal commonwealth, nation.
[5] I.e., Saint Jerome. See p. 103, note 3; p. 109, note 2.
[6] Howbeit nevertheless, however, be that as it may.
[7] short i.e., brief.
[8] con "understand," but also "memorize."

words. For men must be occupied both at home and forth abroad, both in their own matters and for the commonweal. Therefore it cannot be declared in few books, but in many and long, how they shall handle themselves in so many and diverse things. As for,[1] a woman hath no charge to see to but her honesty and chastity, wherefore when she is informed of that she is sufficiently appointed.[2]

Wherefore,[3] their wickedness is the more cursed and detestable that go about to perish that one treasure[4] of women, as though a man had but one eye and another would go about to put it out. Some write filthy and bawdy rhymes, which men I cannot see what honest excuse they can lay for themselves, but that their corrupt mind and swelled with poison can breathe none other thing but venom to destroy them that are near unto it; but they call themselves lovers, and I believe they be so indeed, yea and blind and mad too withal. And though thou love, canst thou not obtain thine own except thou infect all other[s] therefore? In my mind no man was ever banished more rightfully than was Ovid, at least wise if he was banished for writing The Craft of Love.[5] For other[s] write wanton and naughty ballads, but this worshipful artificer must make rules in God's name and precepts of his unthriftiness, a schoolmaster of bawdry and a common corrupter of virtue.

Now I doubt not but some will think my precepts oversore and sharp. Howbeit the nature of all things is such that the way of virtue is easy and large unto good men, and the way of vice contrary, strait[6] and rough. But unto ill men neither the way that they go in is pleasant, nor the way of virtue large and easy enough; and seeing it is so, it is better to assent unto good men than ill, and rather to reckon the bad folk's opinion false than the good men's. Pythagoras the philosopher and other[s] of his school in the description of this letter "Y" say that when a man is past the first difficulty of virtue, all after is easy and plain.[7] Plato giveth counsel to choose the best way in living, which way use and custom shall also make pleasant. Our Lord in the Gospel sayeth that the way into the kingdom of Heaven is strait,[8] not because it is so indeed but because few go it—except a man would count his words false, where he sayeth: "My yoke is sweet and my burden light"; or else where he promiseth that there is no man that forgoeth anything for his sake but he shall have far more for it again, yea and that in this life. And what was meant thereby but the pleasures of virtue? Therefore I say unto whom my precepts shall seem rigorous and sharp, that is, young men that be ignorant, wanton and unthrifty, which cannot once bear the sight of a good woman; and like as rank horses neigh unto every mare, so they go about every trifling and peevish wench that hath a pleasure to be looked upon and loved, and they would have their folly to be allowable by the multitude of misdoers—as who sayeth, the agreement and abusion[9] of people might change the nature of things—it is no news that ill folk hate them that advise them well.

[...]

Lo, what manner of men we shall displease with teaching them virtuously: verily such as were a shame and rebuke to please. But sad[10] men, chaste maids, virtuous wives, wise widows, and finally all that are true Christian people, not only in name but also in deed and with their hearts, will stand on our party, which know and agree all in this, that

---

1 As for however.

2 appointed equipped.

3 Wherefore thus.

4 that one treasure Chastity, maidenhead, or virginity is commonly described in the period as a woman's jewel or treasure.

5 Ovid (43 BCE-17 CE), a popular Roman poet and society figure whom the Emperor Augustus banished to Tomis (Costanza), on the Black Sea, partly in punishment for Ovid's scandalous and witty poem Ars Amatoria ("The Art of Love").

6 strait narrow.

7 Pythagoras ... plain The Greek philosopher Pythagoras (fl. c. 530 BCE) held that the Greek letter Υ ("upsilon") represented the diverging paths of virtue and vice; each man must decide which of the forks in this path to take (Laertius, 2.8.32).

8 strait difficult.

9 abusion corruption.

10 sad sober, grave, serious.

nothing can be more mild and gentle than the precepts of our faith. From the which Christ grant us never to decline our mind and purpose one hair's breadth. I have put in remembrance of their duty the good and holy women but slightly; others now and then I take up sharply, because I saw that only teaching availeth but a little unto those that struggle with the leader[1] and must be drawn. Therefore have I spoken sometime the more plainly that they might see the filthiness of their conditions as it were painted in a table, to the intent that they should be ashamed, and at last leave their shameful deeds; and also that good women should be gladder to see themselves out of those vices, and labour more to be further from them, and to enter into the abitacle[2] of virtue. For I had leaver,[3] as Saint Hieronymus counselleth, aventure my shamefastness[4] a little while than jeoparde my matter,[5] so yet that[6] I would not fall into any uncleanness, which were the greatest shame that can be for him that should be a master of chastity; wherefore oftentimes the reader must understand more in sentence[7] than I speak in words.

And this work, most excellent and gracious Queen, I offer unto you in like manner as if a painter would bring unto you your own visage and image most cunningly painted. For like as in that portraiture you might see your bodily similitude, so in these books shall you see the resemblance of your mind and goodness, because that you have been both maid, wife, and widow, and wife again—as I pray God you may long continue—and so you have handled yourself in all the order and course of your life that whatsoever you did might be an example unto other[s] to live after. But you had leaver the virtues to be praised than yourself, howbeit[8] no man can praise the virtues of women but he must needs comprehend you in the same praise; howbeit,[9] your mind ought to be obeyed. Therefore you shall understand that many like unto you be praised here by name expressly, but yourself spoken of continually though you be not named. For virtues can never be praised but they must needs be praised withal that be excellent in them, though their name be not spoken of.

Also your dearest daughter, Mary, shall read these instructions of mine and follow in living, which she must needs do if she order herself after the example she hath at home with her of your virtue and wisdom. Nor there is no doubt but she will do after them, and, except she alone of all other[s] disappoint and beguile every man's opinion, she must needs be both very good and holy that is come of you and noble King Henry VIII, such a couple of mates that your honour and virtue pass all crafts of praising.

Therefore, all other women shall have an example of your life and deeds, and by these books that I have dedicated unto your name, they shall have rules and precepts to live by; and so shall they be bounden unto your goodness, both for that which itself hath done in giving example, and that it hath been the occasion of my writing.

And so I pray God give your good Grace long well to fare. At Bruges the year of our Lord 1523, the 5th day of April.

Of Her First Exercise. The Third Chapter.

When she is of age able to learn anything, let her begin with that which pertaineth unto the ornament of her soul and the keeping and ordering of an house.

[...]

The cherishing and sufferance of the fathers and mothers hurteth much the children, that giveth

---

1 leader one who leads a person by the hand, or an animal by a cord or halter.

2 abitacle perhaps a printer's error for "tabernacle," but perhaps a version of the word "abitacioun" (habitation).

3 leaver rather.

4 aventure my shamefastness risk my modesty.

5 jeoparde my matter jeopardize the soundness of my book's content.

6 so yet that so long as.

7 sentence meaning.

8 howbeit although.

9 howbeit nevertheless, however.

them an unbridled liberty unto vice infinite, and specially the maids.

[...]

Therefore let her both learn her book and, beside that, to handle wool and flax, which are two crafts yet left of that old innocent world both profitable and keepers of temperance, which thing specially women ought to have in price.[1] I will meddle here with no low matters lest I should seem to make much ado about things that be too simple for my purpose. But I would in no wise[2] that a woman should be ignorant in those feats that must be done by hand, no not though she be a princess or a queen. For what can she do better, or ought to do rather, what time she hath rid[3] her business in her house? Should she talk with men or other women? And what shall she still talk of? Shall she never hold her peace? Or shall she sit and muse? What I pray you? Woman's thought is swift and for the most part unstable, walking and wandering out from home, and soon will slide, by the reason of it[s] own slipperiness, I wot[4] not how far. Therefore reading were the best, and thereunto I give them counsel specially. But yet when she is weary of reading, I cannot see her idle, as it were the women of Perseland,[5] drowned in volupteis[6] and pleasures, sitting among the company of gelded men, singing and banqueting continually; which pleasures were oft changed and renewed to eschew tediousness, and the end of one pleasure was the beginning of another following.

[...]

Let the maid also learn cookery, not that slubbering and excess in meats to serve a great many full of delicious pleasures and gluttony which cooks meddle with, but sober and measurable, that she may learn to dress meat for her father and mother and brethren while she is a maid, and for her husband and children when she is a wife. And so shall she get her great thank[s] both of the one and the other, when she doth not lay all the labour upon the servants, but herself prepare such things as shall be more pleasant unto her father and mother, brethren and husband and children than if they were dressed by servants. And that the more pleasant if they were sick. Nor let nobody loathe the name of the "kitchen," namely being a thing very necessary, without the which neither sick folks can amend nor whole folks live; the which occupation Achilles, both a king and a king's son and a lord most noble, did not disdain to do. For what time Ulysses and Nestor came to him for agreement between him and Agamemnon, he laid the tables himself, and tucked up his clothes, and went into the kitchen, and prepared their meat to make the noble princes sober and temperate cheer, whom he loved so well.[7]

Also, it is a thing pertaining unto temperance and honesty: for when the mistress or her daughter is by, all thing is done the more diligently. What daintiness of hand is that and what loathing of the kitchen, that they may not abide to handle or see that which their father or mother or husband or brother or else their child must eat! Let them that do so understand that they bewray and file[8] their hands more when they lay them on another man than their own husband than though they babled[9] and blacked them in soot, and that it is more shame to be seen in a dance than in the kitchen, and to handle well tables[10] and cards than meat. And worse becometh a good woman to taste a cup of drink in a feast or a banquet reached unto her

---

1 in price in value.

2 no wise no way.

3 what time she hath rid when she has completed.

4 wot know.

5 Perseland i.e., Persia; Vives draws here on the little that Europeans knew of life in Eastern harems, a life which they saw as morally degraded; the "gelded men" are the eunuchs who served as the guardians of the harem, ensuring that no one but the Sultan had access to its women.

6 volupteis volupty: voluptuous delight.

7 Achilles … loved so well Homer, Iliad, 9.199-221.

8 bewray and file betray and defile.

9 babled printer's error for "dabbled."

10 tables the "men" or pieces used in playing early forms of the board game backgammon.

by another man than to taste a supping in the kitchen to give her husband. Therefore by my counsel a woman shall learn this craft, that she may in every time of her life please her friends and that the meat may come more cleanly unto the table. I have seen in Spain and in France that[1] have mended of their sickness by meats dressed of their wives, daughters or daughters-in-law, and have ever after loved them far the better for it. And again I have seen that have been hated as daughter of the father and daughter-in-law of the father-in-law, and wife of her husband because they have said they could not skill of cookery.[2]

Of the Learning of Maids. The Fourth Chapter.

Of maids some be but little mete[3] for learning. Likewise, as some men be unapt, again some be even born unto it, or at least not unfit for it. Therefore, they that be dull are not to be discouraged, and those that be apt should be hearted and encouraged. I perceive that learned women be suspected of many: as who sayeth, the subtlety of learning should be a nourishment for the maliciousness of their nature. Verily I do not allow in a subtle and a crafty woman such learning as should teach her deceit and teach her no good manners and virtues, notwithstanding the precepts of living, and the examples of those that have lived well, and had knowledge together of holiness, be the keepers of chastity and pureness, and the copies of virtues, and pricks to prick[4] and to move folks to continue in them.

[...]

But you shall not lightly find an ill woman, except it be such one as either knoweth not or at least way considereth not what chastity and honesty is worth; nor seeth what mischief she doth when she forgoeth it; nor regardeth how great a treasure for how foul, for how light and transitory an image of pleasure she changeth; what a sort of ungraciousness she letteth in what time she shutteth forth chastity; nor pondereth what bodily pleasure is, how vain and foolish a thing, which is not worth the turning of an hand, not only unworthy; wherefore she should cast away that which is most goodly treasure that a woman can have. And she that hath learned in books to cast[5] this and such other things, and hath furnished and censed[6] her mind with holy counsels, shall never to do any villainy. For if she can find in her heart to do naughtily, having so many precepts of virtue to keep her, what should we suppose she should do having no knowledge of goodness at all?

And truly if we would call the old world to remembrance and rehearse their time, we shall find no learned woman that ever was ill, where I could bring forth an hundred good: as Cornelia,[7] the mother of Gracchus, which was an example of all goodness and chastity, and taught her children her own self; and Portia,[8] the wife of Brutus, that took of her father's wisdom; and Cleobula,[9]

---

1 that those who.

2 they could not skill of cookery i.e., they had no skill in cooking.

3 mete fit, apt.

4 pricks to prick encouragers to encourage.

5 cast ponder.

6 censed The holy counsel is implicitly compared to incense which is absorbed by the reader, just as incense is burned (or "censed") for the benefit of those attending religious services.

7 Cornelia (d. by 100 BCE) was the second daughter of Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus. Her marriage to Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus produced twelve children, although only three survived to adulthood (Tiberius and Gaius became famed tribunes). After her husband's death she remained a widow, refusing all offers of marriage—even reportedly one from Ptolemy VIII—and dedicated herself exclusively to the education of her children (OCD, p. 392).

8 Portia (or Porcia) was the daughter of Marcus Porcius Cato (95-46 BCE). In 45, she married Brutus, who headed the assassination of Julius Caesar in 44. In the Renaissance, she had become the type of marital love, loyalty, and chastity. Perhaps "the wisdom" Vives refers to here, which Portia has gathered from her father, is his love of and dedication to republican values, the same values her husband was also believed to have espoused. Her status as a virtuous woman in the Renaissance is somewhat complicated by her suicide, with accounts holding both that she killed herself after and before Brutus's death (OCD, p. 1224).

9 Cleobula i.e., Cleobulina, daughter of Cleobulus from Lindos on Rhodes, one of the Seven Sages. Famed for her intelligence and learning, she was a poet, an author (like her father) of a number of enigmas or verse riddles (OCD, p. 1397; Classical Dict., p. 172).

daughter of Cleobulus, one of the seven wise men, which Cleobula was so given unto learning and philosophy that she clearly despised all pleasure of the body and lived perpetually a maid; at whom the daughter of Pythagoras,[1] the philosopher, took example, which after her father's death was the ruler of his school and was made the mistress of the college of virgins. Also Theano, one of the same sect and school, daughter unto Metapontus,[2] which had also the gift of prophecy, was a woman of singular chastity. And Saint Hieronymus[3] sayeth that the ten Sibyls were virgins. Also Cassandra,[4] and prophetess[es] of Apollo and Juno at Cryssa were virgins, and that was a common thing, as we read, that those women that were prophets were virgins eke.[5]

[...]

Also Sulpitia, wife unto Caleno, left behind her holy precepts of matrimony, that she had used in her living herself, of whom the poet Martial writeth in this wise:

> Readeth Sulpitia all young women
> That cast your mind to please one man.
> Readeth Sulpitia also all men
> That do intend to please one woman.
> Of honest and virtuous love doth she tell,
> Chaste pastimes, plays, and pleasure
> Whose books who so considereth well
> Shall say, "There is none holier."[6]

And it is plainly known that no man in that time was more happy of his wife than was Caleno of Sulpitia.[7] Hortentia, the daughter of Hortentius[8] the orator, did so resemble her father's eloquence that she made an oration unto the judges of the city for the women, which oration the successors of that time did read not only as a laud and praise of women's eloquence, but also to learn cunning[9] of it, as well as of Cicero or Demosthenes'[10] orations.

[...]

---

[1] the daughter of Pythagoras Damo, whom Laertius celebrates for her filial love and loyalty. At his death, the Greek philosopher Pythagoras entrusted her with his writings, commanding "her never to give them to anyone outside his house." Even in the face of extreme poverty, she refused to sell his writings (Laertius, 2.8.42). She also obeyed Pythagoras' command to embrace perpetual virginity, and persuaded others to do so also (Classical Dict., p. 215).

[2] Theano … daughter unto Metapontus probably the wife of Pythagoras, but also possibly a daughter or disciple of this Greek philosopher. Some letters and a fragment of a text "On Piety" have been attributed to her (OCD, p. 1493). Laertius says simply she "wrote a few things" (2.8.43).

[3] Saint Hieronymus St. Jerome (c. 342-420 CE), Biblical scholar, translator of the Bible into Latin from the original languages (the Vulgate), and theologian. The Sibyls were oracles or prophetesses, often said to be ten in number, famed for their knowledge of the future. They dwelt at various classical shrines, the most famous of which were at Cumae and Delphi in Italy. For Jerome's statements about virginity, see his "Letter XXII: To Eustochium" and the treatise Against Jovinian.

[4] Cassandra daughter of the Trojan king Priam and his wife Hecuba. Most famously her prophetic powers, granted her by Apollo in exchange for a promise of sexual favours, became a terrible curse when she later refused the god's advances: her predictions were fated never to be believed.

[5] eke also.

[6] Epigrams, 10.38.

[7] Caleno of Sulpitia Sulpicia (d. between 94 and 98 BCE) was a famed Latin love poet and for 15 years the wife of Calenus. Her verses expressed both "total fidelity and bold sensuality" as aspects of her marriage, a "rare example in Latin poetry of married eroticism." Only a fragment of her work survives, although she is mentioned by later poets and writers. Martial's epigram (above) is one of two he wrote in her honour (OCD, p. 1454).

[8] Hortentia, the daughter of Hortentius Hortensia was the daughter of the famous Roman orator Quintus Hortensius Hortalus (d. 49 BCE), Cicero's most serious legal and oratorical rival. Reportedly, when the triumvirs ordered 14,000 women to make a list of their possessions so that they might be taxed by the state, Hortensia pleaded the women's case so successfully that she won an exemption for 1,000 of them (Classical Dict., p. 316). She and her orations (which do not survive) are celebrated by Quintilian (c. 35-100 CE), Latin writer and rhetorician, who notes that this particular oration "is still read and not merely as a compliment to her sex" (Institutio Oratoria, trans. H.E. Butler, 1.1.6).

[9] cunning skill.

[10] Cicero and Demosthenes respectively, for Renaissance writers the most famous Latin and Greek orators and rhetoricians of the ancient world.

I need not to rehearse the Christian women, as Tecla, disciple of Paul,[1] a scholar mete[2] for such a noble master; and Catherine of Alexandria,[3] daughter unto Costus, which overcame in disputations the greatest and most exercised[4] philosophers.

[...]

Nor we need not to envy the pagans for their poets, which have in one house four maids all poets, the daughters of Philip.[5] And in Saint Hieronymus' time all holy women were very well learned. Would God that nowadays many old men were able to be compared unto them in cunning.

[...]

It is told me with great praise and marvel in many places of this country that Dame Joanne, the wife of King Philip, mother unto Carolus that now is, was wont to make answer in Latin, and that without any study, unto the orations that were made after the custom in towns unto new princes; and likewise the Englishmen say by their Queen, sister unto the Dame Joanne. The same sayeth everybody by the other two sisters, which be dead in Portugal. The which four sisters,[6] there were no queens by any man's remembrance more chaste of body than they; none of better name; none better loved of their subjects, nor more favoured, nor better loved their husbands; none that more lawly[7] did obey them, nor that kept both them and all theirs better without spot of villainy. There were none that more hated filthiness and wantonness; none that ever did more perfectly fulfil all the points of a good woman.

Now if a man may be suffered among queens to speak of more mean[8] folks, I would reckon among this sort the daughters of S[ir] T[homas] M[ore] (kn[ight]), M[argaret], E[lizabeth], and C[ecily], and with them their kinswoman M[argaret] G[iggs], whom their father not content only to have them good and very chaste, would also they should be well learned, supposing that by that mean they should be more truly and surely chaste.[9] Wherein neither that great wise man is deceived, nor none other that are of the same opinion. For the study of learning is such a thing that it occupieth one's mind wholly, and lifteth it up unto the knowledge of most goodly matters, and plucketh it from the remembrance of such things as be foul. And if any such thought come into their mind, either the mind, well-fortified with the precepts of good living, avoideth them away, or else it giveth none heed unto those things that be vile and foul when it hath other most goodly and pure pleasure wherewith it is delighted. And therefore I suppose that

---

[1] Tecla, disciple of Paul In the popular apocryphal work "The Acts of Paul and Thecla," St. Paul's sermons in praise of virginity attract the attention of a young pagan gentlewoman, Thecla. Converted by Paul to Christianity and perpetual virginity, she rejects any further contact with her fiancé, Thamyris. Although Thecla's decision leads to Paul's arrest and whipping, and her own condemnation to being burned alive, she is miraculously rescued. Becoming Paul's disciple, Thecla faces other attempted executions (in Antioch she is thrown naked to wild beasts who refuse to touch her), dresses as a boy in order to follow Paul to Lycia, teaches, preaches, and attracts other young women to the celibate life. She is finally miraculously preserved from an attempted gang-rape. See The Lost Books of the Bible and the Forgotten Books of Eden (New York, 1974), pp. 99-111.

[2] mete fit.

[3] Catherine of Alexandria St. Catherine of Alexandria (supposedly 4th century) was "a noble girl, persecuted for her Christianity, who despised marriage with the emperor because she was a 'bride of Christ,' who disputed successfully with fifty philosophers who were called in to convince her of the errors of Christianity." She was finally martyred for her protests against Emperor Maxentius' persecution of her fellow Christians. Her cult was popular in England throughout the Middle Ages (Dict. Saints, pp. 88-89).

[4] excercised experienced.

[5] Philip I (1478-1506) and Joanna, Queen of Castile (1479-1555) had four daughters: Eleanora, Isabella, Catherine, and Mary.

[6] Katherine of Aragon (the works' dedicatee), had three sisters: Joanna (Juana), Isabella, and Maria. Isabella died in 1498, and Maria in 1517.

[7] lawly lawfully.

[8] mean less exalted in rank.

[9] All the daughters of More were famed for their learning, but especially Margaret More Roper (1505-1544), who was an early correspondent with and translator of the European humanist Erasmus. See her translation of Erasmus's A Devout Treatise upon the Pater Noster (1525), p. 84.

Pallas, the goddess of wisdom and cunning,[1] and all the Muses were feigned in old time to be virgins. And the mind set upon learning and wisdom shall not only abhor from foul lust—that is to say, the most white thing from soot, and the most pure from spots—but also they shall leave all such light and trifling pleasures wherein the light fantasies of maids have delight, as songs, dances, and such other wanton and peevish plays. "A woman," sayeth Plutarch, "given unto learning, will never delight in dancing."[2]

But here peradventure[3] a man would ask, what learning a woman should be set unto? and what shall she study? I have told you: the study of wisdom, the which doth instruct their manners, and inform their living, and teacheth them the way of good and holy life. As for eloquence I have no great care, nor a woman needeth it not, but she needeth goodness and wisdom. Nor it is no shame for a woman to hold her peace, but it is shame for her and abominable to lack discretion and to live ill. Nor I will not here condemn eloquence, which both Quintilian and Saint Hieronymus following him say was praised in Cornelia, the mother of Gracchus, and in Hortentia, the daughter of Hortentius.[4]

If there may be found any holy and well-learned woman, I had leaver have her to teach them.[5] If there be none, let us choose some man either well-aged or else very good and virtuous, which hath a wife, and that right fair enough, whom he loveth well, and so shall he not desire other. For these things ought to be seen unto, forasmuch as chastity in bringing up a woman requireth the most diligence, and in a manner all together.

When she shall be taught to read, let those books be taken in hand that may teach good manners. And when she shall learn to write, let not her example be void[6] verses, nor wanton or trifling songs, but some sad sentence,[7] prudent and chaste, taken out of Holy Scripture or the sayings of philosophers, which by often writing she may fasten better in her memory.

And in learning, as I point[8] none end to the man nor more I do to the woman, saying it is mete[9] that the man have knowledge of many and diverse things that may both profit himself and the commonwealth, both with the use and increasing of learning. But I would the woman should be altogether in that part of philosophy that taketh upon it to inform and teach and amend the conditions.[10] Finally, let her learn for herself alone and her young children or her sisters in our Lord. For it neither becometh a woman to rule a school, nor to live among men, or speak abroad[11] and shake off her demureness and honesty, either altogether or else a great part; which if she be good, it were bett[er] to be at home within and unknown to other folks, and in company to hold her tongue demurely. And let few see her, and none at all hear her. The apostle Paul, the vessel of election, informing and teaching the Church of the Corinthians with holy precepts, sayeth: "Let your women hold their tongues in congregations: nor they be not allowed to speak but to be subject as the law biddeth. If they would learn anything, let them ask their husbands at home."[12] And unto his disciples Timothy he writeth on this wise:[13] "Let a woman learn in silence with all subjection. But I give no license to a woman to be a teacher nor to have authority of the man, but to be in silence. For

---

1 cunning skill.

2 In his essay "Advice to the Bride and Groom," Plutarch recommends a woman's study of mathematics in particular as a guard against the vice, vanity, and frivolity that he sees as characterized by a love of dancing (Moralia, vol. 9, 145C).

3 peradventure perhaps.

4 Quintilian ... Hortentius Quintilian praises Cornelia's eloquent letters, the style of which her sons have clearly imitated (Institutio Oratoria, 1.1.6) as part of his general recommendation that parents (mothers, he emphasizes, as well as fathers) would do well to be educated for the sake of their children; for his comments on Hortensia, see p. 103, note 8.

5 them i.e., the young maidens.

6 void empty, valueless.

7 sad sentence sober, wise sayings.

8 point appoint, prescribe.

9 mete appropriate, fitting.

10 conditions character, moral nature, disposition, temperament.

11 abroad publicly.

12 "Let your women ... at home" 1 Corinthians 14:34-35.

13 on this wise in this way.

Adam was the first made, and after Eve; and Adam was not betrayed, the woman was betrayed into the breach of the commandment."[1] Therefore, because a woman is a frail thing, and of weak discretion, and that may lightly be deceived—which thing our first mother Eve showeth, whom the Devil caught with a light argument—therefore, a woman should not teach, lest when she hath taken a false opinion and believe of anything, she spread it into the hearers by the authority of mastership, and lightly bring other[s] into the same error, for the learners commonly do after the teacher with good will.

What Books to Be Read and What Not. The Fifth Chapter.

[...]

There is a use[2] nowadays worse than among the pagans that books written in our mother's tongues, that be made but for idle men and women to read, have none other matter but of war and love; of the which books I think it shall not need to give any precepts. If I speak unto Christian folks, what need I to tell what a mischief is toward[3] when straw and dry wood is cast into the fire? "Yea, but these be written," say they, "for idle folk," as though idleness were not a vice great enough of itself without firebrands be put unto it, wherewith the fire may catch a man altogether and more hot. What should a maid do with armour (which once to name were a shame for her)? I have heard tell that in some places gentlewomen behold marvellous busily the plays[4] and joustings of armed men, and give sentence and judgement of them, and that the men fear and set more by their judgements than the men's. It cannot lightly[5] be a chaste mind that is occupied with thinking on armour and tournay,[6] and man's valiance. What places among these be for chastity unarmed and weak? A woman that useth those feats drinketh poison in her heart; of whom this care and these words be the plain sayings. This is a deadly sickness, nor yet ought to be showed of[7] me, but to be covered and holden under lest it hurt other[s] with the smell and defile them with the infection. Therefore, when I cannot tell whether it be mete for a Christian man to handle armour, how should it be lawful for a woman to look upon them, yea though she handle them not, yet to be conversant among them with heart and mind, which is worse?

Moreover, whereto readest thou other men's love and glozing[8] words, and by little and little drinkest the enticements of the poison unknowing, and many times ware[9] and wittingly? For many in whom there is no good mind already read those books to keep themselves in the thoughts of love. It were better for them not only to have no learning at all, but also to lose their eyes that they should not read, and their ears that they should not hear. For as our Lord sayeth in the Gospel: "It were better for them to go blind and deaf into life, than with two eyes to be cast into Hell."[10] This maid is so vile unto Christian folks that she is abominable unto pagans. Wherefore I wonder of the holy preachers, that when they make great ado about many small matters many times, they cry not out on this in every sermon. I marvel that wise fathers will suffer their daughters, or that husbands will suffer their wives, or that the manners and customs of people will dissemble and overlook that women shall use[11] to read wantonness.

It were fitting that common laws and officers should not only look upon the courts and matters of suit, but also manners both common and

---

1 "Let a woman ... commandment" 1 Timothy 2:11-14.

2 use custom, usual practice.

3 is toward is likely to occur.

4 plays activities like fencing.

5 lightly perhaps a printer's error for "rightly."

6 tournay jousting tournaments where men displayed their skill in various martial feats and contests.

7 showed of revealed by.

8 glozing lying.

9 ware consciously.

10 "It were better ... cast into Hell" Matthew 5:29; 18:8-9; Mark 9:43-48. Interestingly, these passages include eyes, hands, and feet, but not ears.

11 use be accustomed private. Therefore it were convenient by a common law to put away foul rebaudy[1] songs out of the people's mouths, which be so used as though nothing ought to be sung in the city but foul and filthy songs that no good man can hear without shame, nor no wise man without displeasure. They that made such songs seem to have none other purpose but to corrupt the manners of young folks, and they do none otherwise than they that infect the common wells with poison. What a custom is this, that a song shall not be regarded but it be full of filthiness? And this the laws ought to take heed of, and of those ungracious books such as be in my country in Spain: Amadise, Florisande, Tirante, Tristane, and Celestina,[2] the bawdy mother of naughtiness. In France: Lancelot du Lake, Paris and Vienna, Ponthus and Sidonia, and Melucyne.[3] In Flanders: Flori and Whitflower, Leonel and Canamour, Curias and Floret, Pyramus and Thisbe.[4] In England: Parthenope, Genarides, Hippomadon, William and Melyour, Libius and Arthur, Guy, Bevis,[5] and many other[s].

1 rebaudy ribald, obscene.

2 Amadise probably Garcí Rodríguez de Montalvo's Amadís de Gaula ("Amadis of Gaul"; 1508), a wildly popular version of the late thirteenth-century French Arthurian tales. de Montalvo's prose romance and its many sequels were quickly translated into French, Italian, German, Dutch, Portuguese, and Hebrew; the first English translation of Amadis was published in 1572; Florisande Third in the series of sequels to Amadís de Gaula, Florisando (1510) was not published in English before 1640; Tirante Joanot Martorell's posthumously published romance Tirant lo Blanch (1490) was not published in English before 1640; Tristane perhaps El cuento de Tristán de Leonís (c. 1400) or Herido Está Don Tristán (15th century), versions of the original Celtic legend about the knight Tristan and his tragic love for Isolde, wife of his uncle, King Mark. Although these particular versions do not seem to have been published in English before 1640, an English ms. version (Sir Tristrem, c. 1280) did circulate. The tale could also be found in Malory's Le Morte d'Arthur (1470); Celestina Fernando de Rojas's prose dialogue Comedia de Calisto y Melibea (1499; revised and expanded as Tragicomedia de Calisto y Melibea, 1502), which became known as La Celestina, after its most famous character, the old bawd Celestina. By turns, erotic, amorous, and satiric, La Celestina was enormously popular, and was translated into Italian (1505), German (1520, 1534), French (1527, 1578), English (c. 1525-30, 1631), Dutch (1550), Hebrew (mid-sixteenth century), and Latin (1624). Roundly condemned as obscene by English clergymen, many of these romances seem "to have functioned for educated Elizabethans as something of a sexual primer" (W. Schleiner, "Elizabethan Bawdy," Encycl. Renaissance, vol. 1, p. 193).

3 Lancelot du Lake perhaps Chrétien de Troye's Le Chevalier de la Charrette (Lancelot), composed c. 1177-81, part of the Arthurian cycle of chivalric tales, wherein Lancelot's adulterous relationship with Arthur's queen, Guinevere, is recounted. French print versions of Lancelot of the Lake circulated in England between 1400 and 1450; Paris and Vienna Pierre de la Cépède's chivalric romance Paris et Vienne. It was published in English by William Caxton in 1485 (3 more editions: 1492, c. 1505, 1586); Ponthus and Sidonia Geoffrey de la Tour Landry's late fourteenth-century prose romance, based on a twelfth-century Anglo-Norman chanson de geste, Ponthus et la Belle Sidoyne was published in English as The Noble History of King Ponthus (1509?; 2 more editions before 1530: c. 1510 and 1511); Melucyne In Jean d'Arras's Mélusine (composed, 1393), a romance which emphasizes magic and the fantastical, Mélusine, the Serpent Fairy, marries Raymond de Lusignan and helps found the house of the Lusignans, d'Arras's patrons ("Picard Literature," Dict. Middle Ages, vol. 9, p. 634). An English translation was published in 1510.

4 Flori and Whitflower Translated from the twelfth-century French, Diederic van Assenede's Floris ende Blancefloer (c. 1260) was only one of a number of versions of this popular chivalric romance. It appeared in Flemish, Middle-High, and Middle-Low German, Italian, Anglo-Norman, and Old Norwegian. There was a ms. version in English, Floris and Blancheflour (before 1250), but no version was published in England before 1700; Leonel and Canamour perhaps La Hystoria del rey Canamor y de Turian su hijo (16th century?); Curias and Floret perhaps Een schoon historie van Turias ende Floreta (Bodleian Library catalogue online); Pyramus and Thisbe not identified. None of these romances seems to have been published in an English translation in the sixteenth or seventeenth centuries.

5 Parthenope A translation from the twelfth-century French chivalric romance Partonopeus de Blois, Partonope of Blois circulated in ms. in medieval England, but does not seem to have been published before 1700; Genarides Generydes circulated in ms. in medieval England, and was published as The History of the Excellent Knight Generides (1504?; 2 more editions before 1530: 1506?; 1518?); Hippomadon Hue de Rotelande's Anglo-Norman verse romance Ipomedon (written between 1174 and 1191) was published as The Life of Ipomydon (c. 1522; c. 1527); William and Melyour William of Palerne (translated from the French c. 1350) circulated in ms., but was not published before 1640; Libius and Arthur Lybeaus Desconus (sometimes attributed to Thomas Chestre, fl. 1430). Part of the Arthurian cycle of tales, it was based on a now-lost French original (before 12th century). In England, it circulated in ms. but was not published before 1640; Guy Based on the Anglo-Norman romance, Gui De Warewic (composed, 1232-42), the popular Guy of Warwick (c. 1300) was published twice before 1530 (1497?; 1500); and again c. 1553, c. 1565, and c. 1640; Bevis A translation of the early thirteenth-century Anglo-Norman adventure romance (in verse) Boeve de Haumtone, the popular Sir Bevis of Hamtoun (c. 1300) was published six times before 1530 (1500, c. 1500, 1503?, c. 1510, c. 1515, 1533?), and another eight times between 1530 and 1640.

And some translated out of Latin into vulgar speeches, as the unsavoury conceits of Pogius, and of Aeneas Silvius, Eurialus and Lucretia,[1] which books but idle men wrote unlearned, and set all upon filth and viciousness; in whom I wonder what should delight men but that vice pleaseth them so much.

As for learning, none is to be looked for in those men, which saw never so much as a shadow of learning themselves. And when they tell ought, what delight can be in those things that be so plain and foolish lies? One killeth twenty himself alone; another thirty; another, wounded with a hundred wounds and left dead, riseth up again, and on the next day made whole and strong overcometh two giants, and then goeth away laden with gold and silver and precious stones more than a galley[2] would carry away. What a madness is it of folks to have pleasure in these books! Also there is no wit in them, but a few words of wanton lust, which be spoken to move her mind with whom they love, if it chance she be steadfast. And if they be read but for this, the best were to make books of bawds' crafts: for in other things, what craft can be had of such a maker that is ignorant of all good craft? Nor I never heard man say that he liked these books but those that never touched good books. And I myself sometime have read in them, but I never found in them one step either of goodness or wit.

And as for those that praise them, as I know some that do, I will believe them if they praise them after that they have read Cicero and Seneca, or Saint Hieronymus, or Holy Scripture, and have mended their living better. For oftentimes the only cause why they praise them is because they see in them their own conditions as in a glass. Finally, though they were never so witty and pleasant, yet would I have no pleasure infected with poison, nor have no woman quickened unto vice. And verily they be but foolish husbands and mad that suffer their wives to wax more ungraciously subtle by reading of such books.

[...]

But we live now in a Christian country, and who is he that is anything displeased with makers of such books nowadays? Plato casteth out of the commonwealth of wise men, which he made, Homer and Hesiodus[3] the poets. And yet have they none ill thing in comparison unto Ovid's books of love, which we read and carry them in our hands and learn them by heart; yea, and some schoolmasters teach them to their scholars, and some make expositions[4] and expound the vices. Augustus banished Ovid himself,[5] and think you then that he would have kept these expositors in the country? except a man would reckon it a worse deed to write vice than to expound it, and inform the tender minds of young folks therewith. We banish him that maketh false weights and measures, and that counterfeiteth coin, or an instrument. And what a work is made in these things for small matters? But he is had in honour and counted a master of wisdom that corrupteth the young people.

Therefore a woman should beware of all these books, likewise as of serpents or snakes. And if there be any woman that hath such delight in these books that she will not leave them out of her hands, she should not only be kept from them, but also if she read good books with an ill will and loath thereto, her father and friends should provide that she may be kept from all reading, and so by disuse forget learning, if it can be done. For it is better to lack a good thing than to use it ill.

[1] Pogius Gian Francesco Poggio Bracciolini (1380-1459), humanist and classical scholar, wrote the Facetiae, a popular collection of humorous and bawdy tales. There were many Continental editions in Latin, but it was not published in an English translation before 1530. However, a selection of the Facetiae was appended to a Latin edition of Aesop's Fables (Southwark [London], 1531?; see STC 170.7); Aeneas Silvius Enea Silvio Piccolomini (1405-64), diplomat and later Pope Pius II (1458-64), wrote the Latin romance Historia de Duobus Amantibus Eurialo et Lucrecia (1444), one of the most popular romances of the fifteenth century. It was published in four separate English translations: Antwerp, 1515? (3 editions: 1553?; 1560; 1567), London, c. 1570; London, 1596; and London, 1639.

[2] galley ship.

[3] Plato casteth out ... Homer and Hesiodus Republic, 10.605A-606.

[4] expositions explanations.

[5] Augustus banished Ovid himself See p. 99, note 5.

Nor a good woman will take no such books in hand, nor file her mouth with them, and as much as she can, she will go about to make other[s] as like herself as she may, both by doing well and teaching well, and also, as far as she may rule, by commanding and charging.[1]

Now what books ought to be read, some everybody knoweth: as the Gospels, and the Acts and the Epistles of the apostles, and the Old Testament, Saint Hieronymus,[2] Saint Cyprian,[3] Augustine,[4] Ambrose,[5] Hilary,[6] Gregory,[7] Plato,[8] Cicero,[9] Seneca,[10] and such other. But as touching some, wise and sad men

[1] charging instructing.

[2] Saint Hieronymus In 1530 an English gentlewoman might have had access to Erasmus's Latin edition of Jerome's complete works (1516; revised and reprinted seven times between 1520 and 1565). A Latin edition of one of Jerome's works was published in England in 1478; English translations of individual works appeared in c. 1510, 1535?, and 1538. English language biographies appeared in 1495 and 1499?.

[3] Saint Cyprian A pagan rhetorician who was converted to Christianity around 246, Cyprian (d. 258 CE) was elected bishop of Carthage by 248. In 1530 an English gentlewoman might have had access to Erasmus's Latin edition of Cyprian's complete works (1520), including De Habitu Virginum (c. 249), in praise of virginity; De Catholicae Ecclesiae Unitate (251), on the nature of Church unity; De Domine Oratione (c. 252) and De Opere et Eleemosynis (c. 253), on the grace which accompanies the act of almsgiving. English translations of Cyprian began to appear in 1534 (his sermon on mortality). No English translation or Latin edition of his complete works was published in England before 1640.

[4] Augustine St. Augustine (354-430 CE), bishop of Hippo and one of the doctors of the Church. In 1530 an English gentlewoman might have had access to Erasmus's Latin edition of Augustine's complete works (9 vols., 1528-29). Of his individual treatises, Vives would probably have recommended particularly for the female reader De Civitate Dei ("On the City of God"). Vives had published a Latin commentary on it in 1522. Augustine's De Sancta Virginitate ("On Holy Virginity"), and De Beata Vita ("On the Blessed Life") were not published in English until 1610. No English translation or Latin edition of his complete works was published in England before 1640.

[5] Ambrose St. Ambrose (c. 339-397 CE), bishop of Milan, partly responsible for the conversion of St. Augustine. In 1530 an English gentlewoman might have had access to Erasmus's multi-volume Latin edition of Ambrose's complete works (1527), including works on asceticism and monasticism, as well as two tracts in praise of virginity: De Virginibus and De Virginitate. English translations of selected works of Cyprian began to appear in 1555. No English translation or Latin edition of his complete works was published in England before 1640.

[6] Hilary probably St. Hilary of Poitiers (c. 315-367 CE), bishop, doctor of the Church, and one of the leading Latin theologians of his time. In 1530, an English gentlewoman might have had access to Erasmus's Latin edition of Hilary's complete works (1523), including commentaries on the Psalms and Matthew. No English translation or Latin edition of his complete works (or even selected works) was published in England before 1640.

[7] Gregory probably St. Gregory of Nyssa (c. 330-c. 395 CE), bishop and theologian. He wrote a number of works celebrating the ascetic life, including treatises on virginity and Christian perfection; he also wrote a biography of his sister, St. Macrina. In 1530 an English gentlewoman might have had access to George of Trebizond's fifteenth-century Latin edition of Gregory of Nyssa's works. No English translation or Latin edition of his complete works (or even selected works) was published in England before 1640.

[8] Plato the Greek philosopher (c. 429-347 BCE). In 1530 an English gentlewoman might have had access to individual works of Plato in separate Latin editions (editions of Bruni's translation of four of Plato's dialogues were published between 1404 and 1427; George of Trebizond also translated individual works). Marsilio Ficino's Latin translation of Plato's complete works (1484) made Plato's oeuvre available for the first time in the West. No English translation or Latin edition of his complete works (or even selected works) was published in England before 1640.

[9] Cicero Marcus Tullius Cicero (106-43 BCE), Roman lawyer, orator, and writer on numerous topics, was by far the most frequently published, translated, and widely available classical Latin writer in Renaissance Europe: "There were some three hundred print editions of Ciceronian texts before 1500, and almost three thousand more were printed during the sixteenth century" (J. Monfasani, "Cicero," Encycl. Renaissance, vol. 1, p. 451). In 1530 an English gentlewoman might have had access to a few English translations of individual works of Cicero: On Friendship ("De Amicitia," 1481, rept. 1530?), On Old Age ("De Senectute," 1481, 1535?), and On Duties ("De Officiis," 1534). A Latin edition of his complete works began to appear in 1585, but of the 9 projected volumes either 6-9 have not survived or were never published. In the 1570s and 1580s the number of editions increases dramatically; the STC has almost 3 full pages devoted to Cicero's works before 1640.

[10] Seneca probably Lucius Annaeus Seneca ("Seneca the Younger," c. 4 BCE-65 CE), Roman politician, philosopher, and playwright. His major works include: the Dialogi (a set of ethical treatises in dialogue form, in twelve books); De Beneficiis (moral philosophy in seven books); Naturales Quaestiones (natural philosophy); nine tragedies (meant for recitation not performance); 77 epigrams; and his moral letters (Epistulae Morales ad Lucilium). The last of these works has always been the most popular (OCD, pp. 96-98). In 1530 an English gentlewoman might have had access to Erasmus's Latin editions of some of Seneca's works. In the 1560s and 70s English translations of his tragedies, as well as of De Beneficiis, began to appear; his works on ethics and natural philosophy had to wait until Thomas Lodge's translation in 1614. The only work by Seneca published in England before 1530 was the suppositious De quattuor virtutibus (1516).

must be asked counsel of in them. Nor the woman ought not to follow her own judgement, lest when she hath but a light entering in learning, she should take false for true, hurtful instead of wholesome, foolish and peevish for sad and wise. She shall find in such books as are worthy to be read all things more witty, and full of greater pleasure, and more sure to trust unto, which shall both profit the life and marvellously delight the mind. Therefore on holy days continually, and sometime on working days, let her read or hear such as shall lift up the mind to God, and set it in a Christian quietness, and make the living better. Also it should be best afore she go to mass, to read at home the Gospel and Epistle of the day, and with it some exposition, if she have any.

Now when thou comest from mass, and hast overlooked thy house, as much as pertaineth unto thy charge, read with a quiet mind some of these that I have spoken of, if thou canst read, if not, hear. And on some working days do likewise, if thou be not letted with[1] some necessary business in thy house, and thou have books at hand, and specially if there be any long space between the holy days. For think not that holy days be ordained of the Church to play on, and to sit idle, and talk with thy gossips,[2] but unto the intent that then thou mayst more intentively,[3] and with a more quiet mind, think of God and this life of ours and the life in Heaven that is to come.

—1529/30

[1] letted with prevented by.

[2] gossips close friends, but with negative connotations; a word only ever applied to women and their group of female friends.

[3] intentively i.e., attentively.

Hugh Latimer
c. 1485-1555

Hugh Latimer was the son of a yeoman, who had a small farm near Thurcaston in Leicestershire. According to Latimer's own account, his father was not simply an exemplary Christian, subject, farmer, and father, but he also supported his son's education, enabling him to attend Cambridge in 1506. After having received his MA in 1514, Hugh Latimer was ordained a priest. Although initially faithful to Catholic teachings, he came under the influence of Thomas Bilney, and in 1525 was brought before Cardinal Thomas Wolsey to give an account of his beliefs. However, he was so thoroughly cleared of any suspicion of heresy that Wolsey confirmed Latimer's license to preach throughout England. Latimer's approval of Henry VIII's contemplated divorce drew the enmity of members of the conservative clergy, but it also won him the King's favour. This was expressed in Latimer's appointment to preach before the King at Windsor on 13 March 1530, and his being granted the benefice of West Kingston in Wiltshire. His Protestant views were by this time widely known, although the King's favour shielded him from any serious repercussions. However, in 1532 he was summoned to appear before the bishop of London, where in Convocation he was presented with a set of articles of faith to sign. When he refused, he was confined at Lambeth. In the end, he finally agreed to sign two of the articles and was released.

Made a royal chaplain and a regular preacher at court in 1534, and bishop of Worcester in 1535, Latimer became a driving force behind Church reform. In 1537, Latimer publicly proclaimed his rejection of the Catholic doctrines concerning Purgatory, as part of his argument in favour of the dissolution of the monasteries. His reasoning was that the monastery's role to pray for the dead could only be irrelevant if Purgatory itself—that place where souls paid for their forgiven sins after death and that place which (thus) could only be escaped quickly through the intercessory prayers of the living—did not exist. In addition to his radical preaching and political lobbying on behalf of the reformist project, Latimer also put his objections against the veneration of images, saints, and their relics into practice in his own diocese, authorizing the destruction of church statuary and other devotional objects.

However, the conservative reaction against the reformist movement—spurred by Henry VIII's turning upon the very reformers he had earlier supported—resulted in the Act of Six Articles (1539). This act employed extreme penalties to enforce adherence to many of the aspects of Roman Catholicism that Latimer and the reformers found abhorrent: (1) transubstantiation; (2) the denial of the necessity for the laity to receive the Eucharist in both kinds (the bread and the wine); (3) the binding nature of vows of chastity upon those in religious orders; (4) the continued use of private masses; (5) the celibacy of the clergy; and (6) the necessity for auricular confession. Denial of transubstantiation, in particular, was met with the harshest possible penalty: automatic burning. After having resigned his bishopric in protest, Latimer was arrested in 1540, but released on the condition that he stop preaching. Latimer was luckier than Thomas Cromwell and Robert Barnes, who were executed that year. Arrested again in 1546, he remained in the Tower of London until the accession of the young Protestant and reformist-leaning king Edward VI in 1547. During Edward's brief reign, Latimer preached many of his most famous sermons, including the "Sermon on the Ploughers," although he refused to take up again his office as bishop.

Sometimes described as a member of the "Commonwealth Movement," Latimer criticized the social, economic, and spiritual ills of England, focussing on the connections between spiritual and national malaise. Although honoured under Edward VI, when the Catholic monarch Mary I came to power, Latimer was jailed in the Tower. In Oxford in 1555, along with his friend Nicholas Ridley, bishop of London, and Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, Latimer was subject to a show trial, and finally condemned for heresy. He, Ridley, and Cranmer were burned together in Oxford on 16 October 1555; turning to Ridley at the stake, Latimer said, "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man. We shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England as I trust shall never be put out." See John Foxe's account of this execution in Acts and Monuments excerpted in this anthology, pp. 220-24.

"Sermon on the Ploughers" is among Latimer's liveliest and most engaging sermons, dealing not just with what modern readers might consider the more esoteric aspects of reformist theology and liturgical practice, but with matters of social justice and pastoral reform. The passionate depiction of the corrupt minister as a non-preaching parasite on his congregation and the Church as a whole is paired with the equally-committed portrait of the true minister as a tireless preacher of the Gospel and an active fashioner of Christian believers and a true Christian Church. Although, as Latimer shows below, there is ample Scriptural precedent for imagining the Christian minister as a plougher, the minister as shepherd is by far the more common image employed in the religious and secular literature of the period. By using the image of minister as plougher, Latimer suggests that the work of the minister is preaching, and that this work, like sowing seeds and cultivating a harvest, is as essential to the congregation's spiritual sustenance as the work of the plougher is to its physical sustenance. Arguably the image of the minister as shepherd emphasizes watchful protectiveness: he is poised to fight off everything that threatens his flock, and is willing to go off in search of his lost sheep; in contrast, the image of the preacher as ploughman emphasizes the unrelenting, active, and indeed toilsome labour needed to cultivate, and not just protect, the individual Christian believer, the congregation, and the Christian Church as a whole. At the same time, Latimer's preacher-ploughman exposes the vices of luxury, social snobbery, and neglect of duty in the pursuit of sensual pleasure and political power that Latimer presents as the English Church's greatest shame and challenge.[1]

EDITION: A notable sermo[n] of ye reverende father Maister Hughe Latemer whiche he preached in ye Shrouds at paules churche in Londo[n], on the. xviii. daye of January. 1548. [London: John Day, 1548]. STC 15291.

ADDITIONAL ONLINE TEXTS: Anonymous. "An Exhortation Concerning Good Order and Obedience to Rulers and Magistrates" from Certain Sermons or Homilies (1547); Simon Fish. A Supplication for the Beggars (1529).

[1] Latimer appears to have delivered his sermons relying not upon a full text that he simply "read out," but upon a meticulously prepared outline. What we have in published form are his sermons as they were heard and recorded by his amanuensis Augustine Bernher. Given that rote learning and the accurate transcription of oral lectures were a part of early modern education, the printed versions of Latimer's sermons are probably very close to what he delivered. See R. O'Day, "Hugh Latimer: Prophet of the Kingdom," Historical Research 65.158 (1992): 263.

Sermon on the Ploughers[1]

A Notable Sermon of the Reverend Father Master Hugh Latimer, Which He Preached in the Shrouds[2] at Paul's Church in London, on the 18th. Day of January.

Quaecumque scripta sunt ad nostram doctrinam scripta sunt.[3]

"All things which are written are written for our erudition and knowledge." All things that are written in God's book, in the Bible book, in the book of the Holy Scripture, are written to be our doctrine.

I told you in my first sermon, honourable audience, that I purposed to declare unto you two things: the one, what seed should be sown in God's field, in God's plough land; and the other, who should be the sowers. That is to say, what doctrine is to be taught in Christ's Church and congregation, and what men should be the teachers and preachers of it. The first part I have told you in the three sermons past, in which I have assayed to set forth my plough, to prove what I could do. And now I shall tell you who be the ploughers, for God's word is a seed to be sown in God's field—that is, the faithful congregation—and the preacher is the sower. And it is in the Gospel. Exiuit qui seminat seminare semen suum[4] "He that soweth, the husbandman,[5] the ploughman, went forth to sow his seed," so that a preacher is resembled to a ploughman, as it is in another place: Nemo admota arato manu, et a tergo respiciens aptus est regno Dei.[6] "No man that putteth his hand to the plough and looketh back is apt for the kingdom of God." That is to say, "Let no preacher be negligent in doing his office."[7] All be it[8] this is one of the places that hath been racked, as I told you of racking Scriptures. And I have been one of them myself that hath racked it,[9] I cry God mercy for it, and have been one of them that have believed and have expounded it against religious persons that would forsake their order which they had professed, and would go out of their clois-

---

[1] A.G. Chester suggests that both "Sermon on the Ploughers" and the other sermons in the series (now lost), which Latimer preached at Paul's Cross, were delivered to combat opposition to the Royal Injunctions of 1547. These injunctions today seem relatively moderate: each parish church should purchase a copy of the Great Bible and Erasmus's paraphrase of the Gospels and Epistles; at High Mass the Gospel and Epistle were to be read in English; a selection from the authorized reformist collection of homilies, Certain Sermons or Homilies (1547), should be read if the priest himself did not have a sermon prepared; holders of benefices worth more than £100 were required to support one university student, with an extra student added for every extra £100 of income generated by said benefice; chantry priests, those whose primary duty was to pray for their benefactors and supporters, were enjoined not to neglect their teaching duties; parishes should remove all images and eliminate some customary ceremonies, such as the lighting of votive candles before the statues of saints. This last injunction caused enormous conflict in parishes, with physical violence sometimes breaking out between conservatives and reformers. See Hugh Latimer: Apostle to the English (Philadelphia, 1954), pp. 162-65.

[2] The "Shrouds" was an enclosed, protected place (in the crypt of St. Paul's Cathedral, London) used for Paul's Cross sermons when the weather was bad; Paul's Cross was a stone cross in the churchyard of St. Paul's, and it had been used for sermons since at least the fourteenth century. Endowed by Bishop Thomas Kempe, the sermons attracted large crowds, with royalty and the nobility sitting in galleries, while the common people sat on benches, for which they each paid 1 pence.

[3] Quaecumque scripta ... scripta sunt "For whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning" (Romans 15:4). In "Sermon on the Ploughers," Latimer translates his Latin Scriptural citations, usually in the sentences following them.

[4] Exiuit qui ... semen suum "A sower went out to sow his seed" (Luke 8:5); this verse begins the parable of the sower and the fate of his seed, some of which fell on barren ground, some on rock, some among thorns, and some on good ground. Only the last group comes to fruition, producing a good crop. In explaining his parable, Christ says that the seed is the word of God, and the places where the seed lands represent the different ways in which human beings hear and respond to God's word.

[5] husbandman a man who tills or cultivates the soil; a farmer.

[6] Nemo admota ... Dei "No man, having put his hand to plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God" (Luke 9:62).

[7] office here, the pastoral duties attached to being a minister as listed by Latimer in lines 80-129.

[8] All be it even though it be that; even though.

[9] this is one of the places ... racking Scriptures ... racked it "to rack": literally to torture a person by stretching his/her joints by means of a special apparatus (also called a "rack"); thus, fig., to stretch or distort the meaning of words, to give a forced interpretation. Latimer had been charged earlier by his superiors with "racking" Scripture in order to support positions which some of them felt to be not entirely orthodox.

ter,[1] whereas indeed it toucheth not monkery,[2] nor maketh any thing at all for[3] any such matter: but it is directly spoken of diligent preaching of the word of God. For preaching of the Gospel is one of God's plough works, and the preacher is one of God's ploughmen. Ye may not be offended with my similitude, in that I compare preaching to the labour and work of ploughing, and the preacher to a ploughman. Ye may not be offended with this my similitude,[4] for I have been slandered of some persons for such things. It hath been said of me, "Oh Latimer, nay as for him I will never believe him while I live, nor never trust him, for he likened our Blessed Lady to a saffron bag,"[5] where indeed I never used that similitude. But it was, as I have said unto you before now, according to that which Peter saw before in the spirit of prophecy and said that there should come afterward men Per quos via veritatis maledictis afficeretur:[6] there should come fellows "by whom the way of truth should be ill spoken of and slandered." But in case I had used this similitude, it had not been to be reproved, but might have been without reproach. For I might have said thus, "As the saffron bag that hath been full of saffron or hath had saffron in it doth ever after savour and smell of the sweet saffron that it contained, so our Blessed Lady which contained and bore Christ in her womb did ever after resemble the manners and virtues of that precious babe which she bore." And what had our Blessed Lady been the worse for this? or what dishonour was this to our Blessed Lady? But as preachers must be ware[7] and circumspect that they give not any just occasion to be slandered and ill spoken of by the hearers, so must not the auditors be offended without cause. For heaven is in the Gospel likened to a mustard seed. It is compared also to a piece of leaven,[8] and Christ sayeth that at the Last Day he will come like a thief,[9] and what dishonour is this to God? or what derogation is this to heaven? Ye may not then, I say, be offended with my similitude, for because I liken preaching to a ploughman's labour and a prelate to a ploughman. But now you will ask me whom I call a prelate. A prelate is that man, whatsoever he be, that hath a flock to be taught of him, whosoever hath any spiritual charge in the faithful congregation, and whosoever he be that hath cure of soul.[10]

And well may the preacher and the ploughman be likened together. First, for their labour of all seasons of the year. For there is no time of the year in which the ploughman hath not some special work to do, as in my country in Leicestershire;[11] the ploughman hath a time to set forth and to assay his plough, and other times for other necessary works to be done. And then they also may be likened together for the diversity of works and variety of offices that they have to do. For as the ploughman first setteth forth his plough, and then tilleth his land and breaketh it in furrows, and

---

1 against religious persons ... cloister against monks, nuns, and other religious who desired to abandon their religious communities and its governing rule to which they had vowed obedience, and go out from their place of religious seclusion, their monastery, nunnery, convent and so forth.

2 monkery monasticism, monastic life.

3 nor maketh any thing at all for nor relates in any way to; nor is relevant in any way to.

4 similitude simile.

5 likened our Blessed Lady to a saffron bag Leland notes that this simile or "similitude" was associated with the Anabaptist heresy which held that Christ did not partake of the flesh of the Virgin Mary in his birth (8). Robert Barnes, an extremely influential proponent of Lutheranism in England and a preacher burned for heresy in 1540, denied ever having used this simile, rejecting as slanderous the charge that he had (as indeed Latimer does here as well). In 1536, the Convocation inveighed against heresies such as this one, that "our Lady was no better than another woman, and like a bag of pepper or saffron when the spice is out; and that she can do no more with Christ than another sinful woman" (qtd. in J.G. Leland, "'Our Lady Was But a Saffron-Bag': Barnes, Latimer, and an Anabaptist Heresy," English Language Notes 18 [1980]: 10). The second of the Thirty-Nine Articles declares that Christ took flesh from Mary.

6 Per quos via ... afficeretur 2 Peter 2:2.

7 ware on guard, watchful, cautious.

8 For heaven ... mustard seed ... piece of leaven Luke 13:19, 21.

9 Christ sayeth ... like a thief 1 Thessalonians 5:2 and 2 Peter 3:10.

10 A prelate ... a flock to be taught of him ... any spiritual charge in the faithful congregation ... cure of soul Latimer describes the pastoral duties of the ideal minister; cure the spiritual charge or oversight of parishioners or lay people; the office or function of a curate.

11 as in my country in Leicestershire See headnote, p. 111.

sometime ridgeth it up again,[1] and at another time harroweth it, and clotteth it, and sometime dungeth it,[2] and hedgeth it, diggeth it, and weedeth it, purgeth and maketh it clean;[3] so the prelate, the preacher, hath many diverse offices to do. He hath first a busy work:[4] to bring his parishioners to a right faith, as Paul calleth it, and not to a swerving[5] faith, but to a faith that embraceth Christ, and trusteth to his merits, a lively faith, a justifying faith, a faith that maketh a man righteous without respect of works[6]—as ye have it very well declared and set forth in the Homily.[7] He hath then a busy work, I say, to bring his flock to a right faith, and then to confirm them in the same faith. Now casting them down with the law, and with threatenings of God for sin. Now ridging them up again with the Gospel and with the promises of God's favour. Now weeding them, by telling them their faults, and making them forsake sin. Now clotting them, by breaking their stony hearts, and by making them supple-hearted, and making them to have hearts of flesh,[8] that is soft hearts, and apt for doctrine to enter in. Now teaching to know God rightly, and to know their duty to God and to their neighbours. Now exhorting them when they know their duty, that they do it and be diligent in it: so that they[9] have a continual work to do. Great is their business, and therefore great should be their hire.[10] They have great labours, and therefore they ought to have good livings,[11] that they may com-

[1] tilleth his land and breaketh it in furrows, and sometime ridgeth it up again This accurate sequence of activities suggests Latimer's own agricultural background; till the action of ploughing which creates a series of narrow trenches, or furrows in the earth to get the land ready for the sowing of the seed; ridge to break or throw up (land, a field, etc.) into ridges, strips of arable land (with intermediate open furrows).

[2] harroweth it, and clotteth it, and sometime dungeth it A harrow is a heavy frame of timber (or iron) set with iron teeth, which is dragged over ploughed land to break clods, pulverize and stir the soil, root up weeds or cover in the seed; to clot to free (lands) from clods by crushing them; to dung to manure.

[3] purgeth and maketh it clean Through the previous activities (of hedging, digging, and weeding, in particular) the farmer rids the field of anything impure or extraneous that would hinder the crops' development.

[4] busy work work that demands one be constantly and habitually occupied with it.

[5] swerving deviating from the right.

[6] a right faith, as Paul calleth it ... but to a faith ... without respect of works The justification by faith which Paul speaks of occurs in his Letter to the Romans and in his Letter to the Galatians partly in the context of the early Church's controversy over the necessity for converts from non-Jewish cultures to keep Jewish law, including the requirement for male circumcision. See especially Romans 3-11, Galatians 2:16-21, and Galatians 3:11-29. Luther's ideas about justification by faith alone (also known as solifideism), based on his study of Romans (published 1522), asserted that Christ's crucifixion was the determining and sufficient act of salvation for believers, and that good works in the world could not gain one salvation, which was a free gift of God through Christ's sacrifice. This belief in justification by faith alone was central to the reformers, creating a more personalized faith, one which the individual believer was responsible for pursuing through prayer and Scriptural meditation. It thus posed a terrifying challenge to a Catholic faith that emphasized the need for intercession on behalf of all men, both living and dead (though the sacraments, the power of the saints, and the mediatory power of the priest), in addition to good works as the path to salvation. The idea of justification by faith alone threatened to remove the need for the vast intercessory machinery of the Roman Catholic Church, and render irrelevant most of its rituals and institutional practices.

[7] Homily Archbishop Cranmer sponsored Certain Sermons or Homilies, Appointed by the King's Majesty to be Declared and Read by All Parsons, Vicars, or Curates, Every Sunday in Their Churches Where They Have Cure (1547) as part of an attempt to explain and disseminate Protestant ideas. The homilies entitled "Of the True, Lively, and Christian Faith" and "Of Good Works Annexed unto Faith" offer an uncompromising presentation of justification by faith alone. See Certain Sermons or Homilies (1547) and A Homily against Disobedience and Wilful Rebellion (1570): A Critical Edition, ed. R.B. Bond (Toronto, 1987), pp. 91-113.

[8] stony hearts ... hearts of flesh "And I will give them one heart, and I will put a new spirit within them; and I will take the stony heart out of their flesh, and will give them an heart of flesh: that they may walk in my statutes, and keep mine ordinances, and do them: and they shall be my people, and I will be their God" (Ezekiel 11:19-20).

[9] they i.e., the prelates, the preachers.

[10] Great is their business, and therefore great should be their hire "For the labourer is worthy of his hire" (Luke 10:7); hire recompense, payment.

[11] they ought to have good livings One of the criticisms which reformers most often made was that the actual pastoral work of parishes was very rarely done by the minister who "held" the living (who had been granted the tithes and other ecclesiastical fees which belonged to the pastor of the parish). In fact, many ecclesiastics and ecclesiastical corporations (like monasteries) held several livings (or benefices) at the same time, giving rise to the so-called absentee or non-resident clergy. Such a minister or corporation would engage poorly paid curates or deputies who did the actual pastoral work of the parish (such as saying mass, hearing confessions, visiting the sick, etc.). Sometimes (as did Bishop West of Ely in 1520) a bishop would sequester (i.e., confiscate) such livings, if he decided that the people's pastoral needs were being neglected.

modiously feed their flock, for the preaching of the word of God unto the people is called meat; Scripture calleth it meat.[1] Not strawberries, that come but once a year and tarry not long, but are soon gone: but it is meat. It is no dainties. The people must have meat that must be familiar and continual, and daily given unto them to feed upon. Many make a strawberry of it, ministering it but once a year, but such do not the office of good prelates.

For Christ sayeth, Quis putas est servus prudens et fidelis? qui dat cibum in tempore:[2] "Who think you is a wise and a faithful servant? He that giveth meat in due time." So that he must at all times convenient[3] preach diligently. Therefore sayeth he, "Who trow[4] you is a faithful servant?" He speaketh it as though it were a rare thing to find such a one, and as though he should say, there be but few of them to find in the world. And how few of them there be throughout this realm that give meat to their flock as they should do, the visitors[5] can best tell. Too few, too few, the more is the pity, and never so few as now. By this then it appeareth that a prelate or any that hath cure of soul must diligently and substantially work and labour. Therefore sayeth Paul to Timothy, Qui episcopatum desiderat, hic bonum opus desiderat: "He that desireth to have the office of a bishop, or a prelate, that man desireth a good work."[6] Then if it be good work, it is work. Ye can make but a work of it. It is God's work, God's plough, and that plough God would have still going. Such then as loiter and live idly are not good prelates or ministers. And of such as do not preach and teach, nor do not their duties, God sayeth by his prophet Jeremiah, Maledictus qui facit opus dei fraudulenter.[7] Guilefully or deceitfully some books have negligenter, "negligently," or "slackly." How many such prelates, how many such bishops, Lord for thy mercy, are there now in England? And what shall we in this case do? Shall we company with them? O Lord, for thy mercy, shall we not company with them? O Lord, whither shall we fly from them? But cursed be he that doth the work of God negligently or guilefully. A sore word for them that are negligent in discharging their office, or have done it fraudulently, for that is the thing that maketh the people ill.[8] But true it must be that Christ sayeth, Multi sunt vocati, pauci vero electi: "Many are called, but few are chosen."[9]

Here have I an occasion by the way somewhat to say unto you, yea, for the place[10] that I alleged unto you before out of Jeremiah the 48 Chapter. And it was spoken of a spiritual work of God, a work that was commanded to be done, and it was of shedding blood and of destroying the cities of Moab. For (sayeth he) "cursed be he that keepeth back his sword from shedding of blood." As Saul when he kept back the sword from shedding of blood, at what time he was sent against Amalech, was refused of God for being disobedient to God's commandments, in that he spared Agag the

---

[1] Scripture calleth it meat After having fed 5,000 people with five barley loaves and two small fish, Jesus began to be followed by people who had been present, which Jesus said was the result of their having been fed, not of their having witnessed a miracle. He advises them, "Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life, which the Son of man shall give unto you: for him hath God the Father sealed" (John 6:27).

[2] Quis ... tempore "Who then is a faithful and wise servant, whom his lord hath made ruler over his household, to give them meat in due season?" (Matthew 24:45).

[3] convenient proper, due.

[4] trow think, suppose.

[5] visitors A visitor is an ecclesiastic commissioner, appointed to visit religious establishments, churches, parishes, etc. in order to inspect or supervise activities, and especially to investigate and remedy clerical abuses. In 1547, there was a visitation of all churches ordered by Edward Seymour, duke of Somerset and lord protector of the young King Edward VI. It mandated the adoption of reformist measures, and furthered the eradication of Roman Catholic practices. See Visitation Articles and Injunctions of the Period of the Reformation, ed. W.H. Frere, 2 vols. (London, 1910), vol. 1, pp. 103-65.

[6] 1 Timothy 3:1.

[7] Maledictus ... fraudulenter "Cursed be he that doeth the work of the Lord deceitfully" (Jeremiah 48:10).

[8] ill wicked, depraved, immoral.

[9] Matthew 22:14.

[10] place Scriptural passage.

king.[1] So that, that place of the prophet was spoken of them that went to the destruction of the cities of Moab, among the which there was one called Nebo, which was much reproved for idolatry, superstition, pride, avarice, cruelty, tyranny, and for hardness of heart, and for these sins was plagued of God and destroyed. Now what shall we say of these rich citizens of London? What shall I say of them? shall I call them proud men of London, malicious men of London, merciless men of London? No, no, I may not say so; they will be offended with me then. Yet must I speak. For is there not reigning in London as much pride, as much covetousness, as much cruelty, as much oppression, as much superstition,[2] as was in Nebo? Yes, I think and much more too. Therefore, I say, "Repent, O London. Repent, repent. Thou hearest thy faults told thee, amend them, amend them." I think if Nebo had had the preaching that thou hast, they would have converted. And you rulers and officers be wise and circumspect; look to your charge[3] and see you do your duties, and rather be glad to amend your ill living than to be angry when you are warned or told of your fault. What ado[4] was there made in London at a certain man because he said, and indeed at that time on a just cause: "Burgesses," quod he, "nay butterflies."[5] Lord, what ado there was for that word. And yet, would God they were no worse than butterflies. Butterflies do but their nature; the butterfly is not covetous, is not greedy of other men's goods, is not full of envy and hatred, is not malicious, is not cruel, is not merciless. The butterfly glorieth not in her own deeds, nor preferreth the traditions of men before God's word; it committeth not idolatry nor worshippeth false gods.[6] But London cannot abide to be rebuked: such is the nature of man. If they be pricked, they will kick. If they be rubbed on the gale, they will wince.[7] But yet they will not amend their faults, they will not be ill spoken of. But how shall I speak well of them? If you could be content to receive and follow the word of God and favour good preachers; if you could bear to be told of your faults; if you could amend when you hear of them; if you would be glad to reform that is amiss; if I might see any such inclination in you that leave[8] to be merciless and begin to be charitable: I would then hope well of you; I would then speak well of you. But London was never so ill as it is now. In times past, men were full of pity and compassion, but now there is no pity, for in

[1] For (sayeth he) ... As Saul ... Agag the king the complete text of Jeremiah 48:10 reads: "Cursed be he that doeth the work of the Lord deceitfully, and cursed be he that keepeth back his sword from blood." Saul, in his successful attack on the Amalekites spared the life of King Agag, and he also preserved the best of his foe's livestock to offer the Lord, in defiance of God's command that the slaughter of the Amalekites and all they owned should be total. For the full account, see 1 Samuel 15.

[2] superstition While this list of failings could apply generally to the laity as well as the clergy, the reformers did castigate the clergy in particular for pride (since many directed their energies at rising through the hierarchy of Church and state) and covetousness (since wealth and power were the concomitants of such a rise, although parish priests were also charged with covetousness in their attempts to extract increased tithes and ecclesiastical fees). Superstition, however, was a fault with which Latimer was particularly concerned; he saw many Catholic devotional practices (such as the saying of the Rosary) and local religious customs (such as the ringing of church bells during storms to drive away the Devil) as promoting false belief in the efficacy of objects against evil, rather than the true belief in the efficacy of prayer and faith in God.

[3] charge duty, responsibility.

[4] ado a "to do"; a fuss, uproar.

[5] What ado ... certain man ... nay butterflies J.H. Morey suggests that the "certain man" whose comments caused such a commotion was William Jerome, vicar of Stepney, and that the "ado" was his execution on charges of heresy on 30 July 1540 ("Latimer's 'Sermon on the Plough' and Spenser's Muiopotmos," N&Q, 42.3 [1995]: 287). Jerome acknowledged his error in rejecting the Sacrament of Confession and apologized for calling MPs "butterflies, yea, and knaves" in a sermon on 24 August 1539 (ibid., 287). Jerome's (and Latimer's) target was probably the London citizenry's wavering support for the reformist cause in the latter part of Henry VIII's reign, in keeping with the King's own attempt to maintain many aspects of Roman Catholic doctrine and practice (ibid., 287). As a slur meaning a vain, gaudily attired, or frivolous person, "butterfly" dates to the early seventeenth century (see OED, "butterfly," I.2a).

[6] her own deeds ... traditions of men ... idolatry ... false gods a familiar reformist litany of complaints, describing the failings of Catholicism.

[7] If they be pricked ... they will wince The implicit comparison is between the citizens of London and horses; pricked spurred. A gall is a painful swelling or blister, especially on a horse; thus, "to rub on the gall" means fig. to touch (a person) on a sore or tender point.

[8] that leave that leave off, stop.

London their brother shall die in the streets for cold. He shall lie sick at their door between stock and stock[1]—I cannot tell what to call it—and perish there for hunger. Was there any more unmercifulness in Nebo? I think not. In times past when any rich man died in London, they were wont to help the poor scholars of the university with exhibition.[2] When any man died, they would bequeath great sums of money toward the relief of the poor. When I was a scholar in Cambridge myself,[3] I heard very good report of London and knew many that had relief of[4] the rich men of London, but now I can hear no such good report, and yet I inquire of it, and hearken for it, but now charity is waxed[5] cold; none helpeth the scholar nor yet the poor. And in those days what did they when they helped the scholars? Marry,[6] they maintained and gave them livings that were very papists and professed the Pope's doctrine, and now that the knowledge of God's word is brought to light, and many earnestly study and labour to set it forth, now almost no man helpeth to maintain them. O London, London, repent, repent, for I think God is more displeased with London than ever he was with the city of Nebo. Repent, therefore, repent London, and remember that the same God liveth now that punished Nebo, even the same God and none other, and he will punish sin as well now as he did then, and he will punish the iniquity of London as well as he did then of Nebo. Amend, therefore, and ye that be prelates look well to your office, for right prelating is busy labouring and not lording.[7] Therefore, preach and teach, and let your plough be doing. Ye lords, I say, that live like loiterers, look well to your office; the plough is your office and charge. If you live idle and loiter, you do not your duty, you follow not your vocation; let your plough, therefore, be going and not cease, that the ground may bring forth fruit. But now me thinketh I hear one say unto me, "Wot[8] you what you say? Is it a work? Is it a labour? how then hath it happened that we have had so many hundred years so many unpreaching prelates, lording loiterers and idle ministers?" Ye would have me here to make answer and to show the cause thereof. Nay, this land is not for me to plough; it is too stony, too thorny, too hard for me to plough.[9] They have so many things that make for them, so many things to lay for themselves[10] that it is not for my weak team to plough them. They have to lay for themselves long customs, ceremonies, and authority, placing in parliament and many things more. And I fear me this land is not yet ripe to be ploughed. For as the saying is, "it lacketh weathering, this grear lacketh weathering."[11] At least way it is not for me to plough. For what shall I look for among thorns but pricking and scratching? what among stones but stumbling? what (I had almost said) among serpents but stinging? But this much I dare say, that since lording and loitering hath come up, preaching hath come down contrary to the apostles' times. For they preached and lorded not. And now they lord and preach not.

For they that be lords will ill[12] go to plough. It is no meet office[13] for them. It is not seeming for 1 stock post or stake; i.e., between the posts of a doorway.

---

2 exhibition maintenance, support.

3 When I was a scholar in Cambridge myself see headnote, p. 111.

4 had relief of received charity from.

5 waxed grown.

6 Marry interjection, "why, to be sure" or "surely."

7 lording behaving in a lordly manner by assuming airs of grandeur; ruling tyrannously, domineering.

8 Wot know, understand.

9 Nay, this land is not for me ... to plough Latimer perhaps implies that the effective correction of clerical abuses lies with the King, the head of the English Church, and with the episcopacy (the bishops and archbishops).

10 They have so many things that make for them i.e., "they have so many things that operate in their favour; they have so much in their favour" OR "they have so many things that avail for them"; so many things to lay for themselves i.e., "they have so many things to arrange or plan for themselves" OR "they have so many things to put forward or allege for themselves," often with the sense of offering excuses.

11 "it lacketh weathering, this grear lacketh weathering" i.e., this land has not been thoroughly prepared through the actions of the elements for ploughing; "weathering" refers to the action of weather on soil which breaks it down and makes it fertile. Metaphorically, the preparations have not been made for a discussion of the political solutions necessary for the problems Latimer has outlined.

12 ill unhappily, unskilfully.

13 meet office fitting or proper sphere of duty; here, the activities of pastoral duty.

their state.[1] Thus came up lording loiterers. Thus crept in unpreaching prelates, and so have they long continued.

For how many unlearned prelates have we now at this day? And no marvel. For if the ploughmen that now be were made lords, they would clean give over ploughing; they would leave off their labour and fall to lording outright, and let the plough stand. And then both ploughs not walking, nothing should be in the commonweal but hunger. For ever since the prelates were made lords and nobles, the plough standeth, there is no work done, the people starve.

They hawk,[2] they hunt, they card, they dice, they pastime in their prelacies[3] with gallant gentlemen, with their dancing minions,[4] and with their fresh[5] companions, so that ploughing is set aside. And by the lording and loitering, preaching and ploughing is clean gone. And thus if the ploughmen of the country were as negligent in their office as prelates be, we should not long live for lack of sustenance. And as it is necessary for to have this ploughing for the sustentation[6] of the body, so must we have also the other for the satisfaction of the soul, or else we cannot live long ghostly.[7] For as the body wasteth and consumeth away for lack of bodily meat, so doth the soul pine away for default of ghostly meat. But there be two kinds of enclosing[8] to let[9] or hinder both these kinds of ploughing. The one is an enclosing to let or hinder the bodily ploughing, and the other to let or hinder the holiday ploughing,[10] the Church ploughing. The bodily ploughing is taken in and enclosed through singular commodity.[11] For what man will let go or diminish his private commodity for a common wealth? and who will sustain any damage for the respect of a public commodity?[12] The other plough also no man is diligent to set forward, nor no man will hearken to it; but to hinder and let it, all men's ears are open, yea, and a great many of this kind of ploughmen which are very busy and would seem to be very good workmen. I fear some be rather mock Gospellers[13] than faithful ploughmen. I know many myself that profess the Gospel, and live nothing thereafter. I know them, and have been conversant with some of them. I know them, and—I speak it with an heavy heart—there is as little charity and good living in them as in any other, according to that which Christ said in the Gospel to the great number of people that followed him, as though they had had an earnest zeal to his doctrine, whereas in deed they had it not, Non qui vidistis signa, sed quia comedistis de panibus: "Ye follow me," (sayeth he) "not because ye have seen the signs and miracles that I have done, but because ye have eaten the bread and refreshed your bodies. Therefore you follow me"; so that I think many one nowadays professeth the Gospel for the

---

1 seeming for their state i.e., seemly for or suitable to their high rank or status.

2 hawk hunt with the use of birds of prey.

3 prelacies "prelacy": the domain of a prelate or bishop; a word with hostile connotations.

4 minions favourites; lovers or lady-loves, here contemptuously, mistresses or paramours.

5 fresh gaily dressed.

6 sustentation feeding, nourishment.

7 ghostly spiritually.

8 enclosing The negligent and avaricious prelate is compared to landlords who were enclosing land, taking waste or common land and transforming it from plough-land into more lucrative pastures for sheep and cattle; enclosing led to unemployment among rural people and increased poverty and hardship.

9 to let to put up obstacles to, prevent.

10 holiday ploughing "holiday": a consecrated day, a day on which a religious festival took place.

11 singular commodity private advantage or gain (with the sense of selfish or private interest).

12 public commodity public interest, advantage, benefit; literally, public property. Like Edmund Dudley in his book of advice to the newly crowned Henry VIII (The Tree of Commonwealth, 1509), Latimer seems to have viewed a healthy commonwealth as resting upon a renewed and vigorous spiritual community of believers; for Latimer, social and economic problems resulted from a weak "body spiritual" and a renewed commitment to God's will was the only thing which would cure this spiritual malaise and lead to a concomitant renewal of the "body politic" (R. O'Day, "Hugh Latimer: Prophet of the Kingdom," p. 263). On Latimer and the Commonwealth Movement, see A.G. Chester, Hugh Latimer, pp. 171-75.

13 mock Gospellers Gospellers are those who profess the faith of the Gospel, or who claim for themselves and their supporters the exclusive possession of Gospel truth; in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the term was often applied diversely to Protestants, Puritans, and sectaries generally.

living sake,[1] not for the love they bear to God's word. But they that will be true ploughmen must work faithfully for God's sake, for the edifying of their brethren. And as diligently as the husbandman plougheth for the sustentation of the body, so diligently must the prelates and ministers labour for the feeding of the soul. Both the ploughs must still be doing, as most necessary for man. And wherefore are magistrates ordained, but that the tranquillity of the commonweal may be confirmed limiting[2] both ploughs.[3]

But now for the default[4] of unpreaching prelates methink I could guess what might be said for excusing of them: They are so troubled with lordly living, they be so placed in palaces, couched in courts, ruffling in their rents,[5] dancing in their dominions, burdened with ambassages,[6] pampering of their paunches like a monk that maketh his jubilee,[7] munching in their mangers,[8] and moiling[9] in their gay manors and mansions, and so troubled with loitering in their lordships that they cannot attend it.[10] They are otherwise occupied, some in the King's matters, some are ambassadors, some of the Privy Council,[11] some to furnish the Court, some are lords of the Parliament,[12] some are presidents,[13] and some comptrollers of mints.[14] Well, well.

Is this their duty? Is this their office? Is this their calling? Should we have ministers of the Church to be comptrollers of the mints? Is this a meet[15] office for a priest that hath cure of souls? Is this his charge? I would here ask one question: I would fain know who comptrolleth the Devil at home at his parish, while he comptrolleth the mint? If the apostles might not leave the office of preaching to be deacons, shall one leave it for minting?[16]

I cannot tell you, but the saying is[17] that since priests have been minters, money hath been worse than it was before. And they say that the evilness of money hath made all things dearer.[18] And in this behalf[19] I must speak to England.

---

[1] for the living sake for the sake of the tithes and other ecclesiastical fees that went along with a benefice or living.

[2] limiting controlling, regulating.

[3] And wherefore are magistrates ordained ... limiting both ploughs Latimer touches here on the controversy concerning the state's authority over the Church.

[4] default failure in duty, care, etc.; culpable neglect of some duty or obligation.

[5] ruffling in their rents "to ruffle": to make a great stir or display; to swagger, bear oneself proudly or arrogantly; "rent": revenue, income.

[6] ambassages the message conveyed by an ambassador; the business entrusted to him.

[7] paunches bellies; jubilee i.e., the fiftieth anniversary of his taking of his religious vows.

[8] munching in their mangers Some uses of "munching" emphasize that it is a rude, lower-class way of eating; most often used of animals chewing their fodder, as is clear with the reference to "mangers."

[9] moiling toiling, drudging (obviously meant sarcastically).

[10] attend it i.e., attend to their duty to preach and offer pastoral care.

[11] Privy Council the group of royal counsellors who were responsible for advising the King on matters both foreign and domestic; as officers of the state and of the royal household, they had enormous power, and functioned as well as a judicial body. They comprised by far the most powerful and influential group in the English state (D. Hoak, "Privy Council," Hist. Dict. Tudor England, p. 399).

[12] lords of the Parliament High-ranking prelates sat in the House of Lords, that body responsible for debating and then ratifying or refusing to ratify the bills sent them from the House of Commons.

[13] presidents those who headed a Commission or Council.

[14] comptrollers of mints i.e., controllers of mints. The controller was the person responsible for the administration of the mint. Here, the episcopal mint at Durham and its head, Bishop Cuthbert Tunstall, are perhaps the specific objects of criticism, given that Durham was the only one of England's three Counties Palatine that still retained any of its characteristic judicial, legal, and administrative independence from the Crown, thus making its bishop in many ways a secular prince, with the power (among other things) to issue his own coinage. Since Durham, however, lost most of its special powers and stopped minting money in 1536, Latimer is using this position simply as an example of the wide-ranging civil duties that bishops and archbishops undertook in this period. See C. Sturge, Cuthbert Tunstall: Churchman, Scholar, Statesman, Administrator (London, 1938), pp. 252-56.

[15] meet fitting, appropriate.

[16] If the apostles ... minting The Twelve Apostles authorized the creation of Church ministers called deacons who would be responsible for the equitable, daily distribution of charity to the community's widows. The apostles decided that it would be wrong for them to "give up preaching the word of God" in order to take care of such practical matters (Acts 6:1-6).

[17] I cannot tell you, but the saying is i.e., I cannot assert positively [to] you, but the rumour is.

[18] money hath been worse than it was before ... dearer There is perhaps the implication that clerical comptrollers of the mint have been clipping or in some other way debasing the coinage, in order to line their own pockets. As a result, money's true value has plummeted and fuelled inflation.

[19] in this behalf in this respect, in regard to this.

Hear, my country England, as Paul said in his first epistle to the Corinthians (6. chap.), for Paul was no sitting[1] bishop, but a walking and a preaching bishop. But when he went from them, he left there behind him the plough going still, for he wrote unto them and rebuked them for going to law and pleading their causes before heathen judges: "Is there," sayeth he, "utterly among you no wise man to be an arbitrator in matters of judgement? What? not one of all that can judge between brother and brother? But one brother go to law with another, and that under heathen judges?" Constituite contemptos qui sunt in ecclesia: et cete: "Appoint them judges that are most abject and vile in the congregation," which he speaketh in rebuking them, for, sayeth he, Ad erubescenciam vestram dico: "I speak it to your shame."[2] So England I speak it to thy shame. Is there never a nobleman to be a lord president,[3] but it must be a prelate? Is there never a wise man in the realm to be a comptroller of the mint? I speak it to your shame, I speak it to your shame. If there be never a wise man, make a water bearer, a tinker,[4] a cobbler,[5] a slave,[6] a page,[7] comptroller of the mint. Make a mean gentleman,[8] a groom,[9] a yeoman,[10] make a poor beggar lord president. Thus I speak not that I would have it so, but to your shame, if there be never a gentleman meet nor able to be lord president. For why are not the noblemen and young gentlemen of England so brought up in knowledge of God and learning that they may be able to execute offices in the commonweal? The King hath a great many of wards, and I trow that there is a court of Wards; why is there not a school for the wards, as well as there is a court for their lands?[11] Why are they not set in schools, where they may learn? Or why are they not sent to the universities, that they may be able to serve the King when they come to age? If the wards and young gentlemen were well brought up in learning and in the knowledge of God, they would not when they come to age so much give themselves to other vanities.

And if the nobility be well trained in godly learning, the people would follow the same train.[12] For truly such as the noblemen be, such will the people be. And now the only cause why noblemen be not made lord presidents is because they have not been brought up in learning. Therefore, for the love of God, appoint teachers and schoolmasters, you that have charge of youth, and give the teachers stipends worthy their pains, that they may bring them up in grammar, in logic, in rhetoric, in philosophy, in the civil law, and in that which I cannot leave unspoken of—the word of

---

1 sitting both lit. sitting down, and fig. one who holds the office.

2 1 Corinthians 6:4-7.

3 lord president perhaps, the lord president of the Council, an officer of the English Crown whose duty is to preside at the meetings of the Privy Council, and to report to the King the business transacted there. He takes precedence next after the lord chancellor and the first lord of the treasury. There were, however, other powerful secular officers known by this title, such as the president of the Council of the North (see p. 120, note 14).

4 tinker a craftsman (usually itinerant) who mends pots, kettles, and other metal household utensils; traditionally held in particularly low esteem; often a synonym for "vagrant" or "gypsy."

5 cobbler a mender of shoes.

6 slave used as a term of contempt: lowest of the low.

7 page in this context, a young serving-boy, the lowest-ranked and least-experienced servant in a household.

8 mean gentleman "mean": undistinguished in position, of low status; here, a man who only just makes it into the category of "gentry."

9 groom a serving-man who takes care of horses.

10 yeoman a servant in a royal or noble household, usually of a superior grade; or perhaps, here, a man holding a small landed estate; a commoner or farmer of respectable standing, especially one who cultivates his own land.

11 court of Wards ... lands The practice of wardship involved the Crown's taking responsibility for the landed property of heirs who had not yet reached the age of majority; until an heir reached his majority, the Crown could exploit his land for its own enrichment. In addition, the heir would pay the Crown a fee to assume control of this property. Wardships could also be profitable since the Crown could sell them (and the right to exploit the said land) to a third party. Young heiresses could expect to be treated as saleable marriage commodities under this system. The Court of Wards (1542) was the court which determined on the rights of the Crown vis-à-vis these estates and their young heirs. See G.R. Elton, Reform and Reformation: England, 1509-1558 (Cambridge, MA, 1977), p. 147; Joyce Youings, The Penguin Social History of Britain: Sixteenth-Century England (London, 1984), pp. 52-53.

12 train training, way of life.

God.[1] Thanks be unto God, the nobility otherwise is very well brought up in learning and godliness, to the great joy and comfort of England, so that there is now good hope in the youth, that we shall another day have a flourishing commonwealth, considering their godly education. Yea, and there be already noblemen enough (though not so many as I would wish) able to be lord presidents, and wise men enough for the mint. And as unmeet[2] a thing it is for bishops to be lord presidents or priests to be minters, as it was for the Corinthians to plead matters of variance before heathen judges. It is also a slander to the noblemen, as though they lack wisdom and learning to be able for[3] such offices, or else were no men of consciences, or else were not meet to be trusted and able for such offices. And a prelate hath a charge and cure otherwise, and therefore he cannot discharge his duty and be a lord president too. For a presidentship requireth a whole man, and a bishop cannot be two men. A bishop hath his office—a flock to teach, to look unto—and therefore he cannot meddle with another office, which alone requireth a whole man. He should therefore give it over to whom it is meet, and labour in his own business, as Paul writeth to the Thessalonians: "Let every man do his own business, and follow his calling."[4] Let the priest preach, and the noblemen handle the temporal matters. Moses was a marvellous man, a good man. Moses was a wonderful fellow, and did his duty being a married man.[5] We lack such as Moses was. Well, I would all men would look to their duty, as God hath called them, and then we should have a flourishing Christian commonweal.

And now I would ask a strange question. Who is the most diligent bishop and prelate in all England, that passeth all the rest in doing his office? I can tell, for I know him; who it is I know him well. But now I think I see you listing[6] and hearkening, that I should name him. There is one that passeth all the other, and is the most diligent prelate and preacher in all England. And will ye know who it is? I will tell you. It is the Devil. He is the most diligent preacher of all other; he is never out of his diocese;[7] he is never from his cure.[8] Ye shall never find him unoccupied; he is ever in his parish;[9] he keepeth residence at all times.[10] Ye shall never find him out of the way; call for him when you will, he is ever at home; the diligentest preacher in all the realm, he is ever at his plough; no lording nor loitering can hinder him; he is ever applying his business.[11] Ye shall never find him idle, I warrant you.[12] And his office is to hinder religion, to maintain superstition,[13] to [1] in grammar, in logic, in rhetoric, in philosophy, in the civil law, and ... the word of God the branches of a humanist education in Tudor England, as proposed by individuals such as Erasmus and Ascham, confined generally to the grammar schools and universities, which were attended almost exclusively by boys of the nobility and gentry; "grammar" refers here exclusively to Latin grammar, since the study of Latin (the international language of learning and diplomacy) was a necessity for a young man intent on a public or court career, although the humanists also encouraged the study of Greek and Hebrew at the universities; learned through the study of classical textbooks, "rhetoric" consisted of learning to speak and write effectively and persuasively through the mastery of argument and the various formulae, topoi, metaphors etc., which would help illustrate and support one's analysis; "philosophy" refers to classical philosophy, especially Aristotle and Plato; the study of "civil law" was generally confined to the Inns of Court, not the universities.

---

[2] unmeet improper, inappropriate.

[3] to be able for to be competent to fill.

[4] 1 Thessalonians 4:11.

[5] Moses was a marvellous man ... being a married man The reference is, of course, to the patriarch Moses, who led the Israelites out of their slavery in Egypt. Although a seeming non sequitur, the remark about Moses' status as a married man is a not-so-subtle comment on the compulsory clerical celibacy demanded by the Roman Catholic Church; like most reformers, Latimer saw this requirement as having no Scriptural foundation, and leading to a variety of sexual sins. He lamented of a licentious priest in a letter of 1537: "O unholy and also unchaste chastity, which is preferred in a Christian realm to chaste and holy matrimony." (qtd. in A.G. Chester, Hugh Latimer: Apostle to the English, p. 109).

[6] listing listening.

[7] diocese the area over which a particular bishop has jurisdiction.

[8] cure here, a parish or other sphere of spiritual administration.

[9] parish a specified area ministered to by its own priest or clergyman, to whom its tithes and ecclesiastical dues are paid.

[10] he keepeth residence at all times implicitly, unlike absentee or non-resident clergy; see p. 115, note 11.

[11] applying his business vigorously devoting his energy to his professional duties.

[12] I warrant you exclamation of strong belief, meaning "I promise you."

[13] superstition See p. 117, note 2.

set up idolatry,[1] to teach all kind of popetry.[2] He is ready as can be wished, for to set forth his plough, to devise as many ways as can be to deface and obscure God's glory. Where the Devil is resident and hath his plough going: there away with books and up with candles; away with bibles and up with beads;[3] away with the light of the Gospel, and up with the light of candles, yea at noon days. Where the Devil is resident, that he may prevail, up with all superstition and idolatry, censing,[4] painting of images,[5] candles, palms,[6] ashes, holy water,[7] and new service of men's inventing,[8] as though man could invent a better way to honour God with than God himself hath appointed. Down with Christ's cross, up with Purgatory pickpurse;[9] up with him, the popish purgatory I mean. Away with clothing the naked, the poor and impotent, up with decking of images and gay garnishing of stocks and stones;[10] up with man's traditions and his laws, down with God's traditions and his most holy word. Down with the old honour due to God, and up with the new god's honour. Let all things be done in Latin. There must be nothing but Latin, not as much as Memento homo quod cinis es, et in cinerem reverteris: "Remember man that thou art ashes, and into ashes thou shalt return."[11] Which be the words that the minister speaketh to the ignorant people, when he giveth them ashes upon Ash Wednesday,[12] but it must be spoken in Latin. God's word may in no wise be translated into English. Oh that our prelates would be as diligent to sow the corn of good doctrine as Satan is to sow cockel and darnel.[13] And this is the devilish ploughing, the which worketh to have things in Latin, and letteth[14] the fruitful edification.

But here some man will say to me, "What, sir, are ye so privy of the Devil's counsel that ye know all this to be true?" Truly I know him too well, and have obeyed him a little too much in condescending to some follies. And I know him as other men

---

1 idolatry See p. 117, note 2; reformers saw superstition and idolatry as closely linked failings of Catholic doctrine and practice.

2 popetry i.e., "puppetry": mimic action of representation as of puppets; specifically applied to idolatrous or superstitious observances (in the sixteenth century often in the form "popetry," with play on "popery,") having to do with the Pope and Roman Catholicism in general.

3 beads the Rosary beads, a Roman Catholic devotional aid which came under intense reformist criticism because its set of formal, repetitious prayers seemed to them an example of superstitious belief; also they saw the elevation of the Virgin Mary, at whom this particular devotional practice was aimed, as little less than idolatrous, replacing devotion to God with devotion to Mary.

4 censing burning incense as an act of worship or honour.

5 painting of images e.g., the painting of statues of saints, or the painting of devotional murals. See R.N. Swanson, Catholic England: Faith, Religion and Observance before the Reformation (Manchester, 1993), especially Part II, section 7, pp. 174-95.

6 palms a branch or leaf of the palm tree, especially as carried or worn as a symbol of victory or triumph, and on festal occasions (as still in the Roman or Greek Churches); on Palm Sunday, the Church commemorates Jesus' entrance into Jerusalem, the action which initiated his arrest, trial, and crucifixion; the feast is so called because the crowds welcoming Jesus laid down palm branches before him.

7 holy water water blessed by a priest and used in various rites and devotional acts; reformers objected to the use of holy water because they viewed its consecration and use as one of those Catholic superstitious practices akin to magic.

8 new service of men's inventing Many reformers claimed that the Mass and its centrepiece, the Eucharist or Lord's Supper, was not an ancient religious service, sanctioned by Scripture and tradition (as the Catholics argued), but a new service, not found in Scripture and grounded only in man's traditions rather than the word of God; see lines 621-711.

9 Purgatory pickpurse a term of sixteenth-century controversial literature which Latimer apparently invented to describe those Roman Catholic clerics who enriched themselves through the use of Purgatory. The souls of dead Catholics who went to purgatory dwelt in a place midway between Heaven and Hell, where they made reparation for their sins in preparation for admission to Heaven. The prayers and masses said by the priest—for which he charged often hefty fees—could speed the soul's journey to bliss, and thus grieving relatives felt obliged to pay for such services. A "pickpurse" is a pickpocket or more generally a thief.

10 decking of images and gay garnishing of stocks and stones "decking of images": statues of saints, particularly at the many English shrines which were the object of pilgrimages, were often adorned with fine jewels, offerings from pilgrims seeking intercessory favours from a particular saint. In an individual's local parish church, the statues of saints would also be decked and garnished on the particular saint's feast day; "stocks and stones": contemptuous phrase meaning "gods of wood and stone" (i.e., idols).

11 Genesis 3:19.

12 ashes upon Ash Wednesday In the Roman Catholic liturgical calendar, Ash Wednesday marks the beginning of the penitential season called Lent, 40 days of fasting, repentance, and abstinence; during Ash Wednesday Mass, the priest will place a small smudge of ash (the symbol of repentance and mortality) on the forehead of each member of the congregation, intoning the Latin words above.

13 cockel and darnel both a kind of weed which grows up amongst corn.

14 letteth hinders, obstructs.

do, yea, that he is ever occupied and ever busy in following his plough. I know by St Peter which sayeth of him, Sicut leo rugiens circuit querens quem devoret: "He goeth about like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour."[1] I would have this text well viewed and examined—every word of it. Circuit, "he goeth about" in every corner of his diocese. He goeth on visitation[2] daily. He leaveth no place of his cure unvisited. He walketh round about from place to place and ceaseth not, Sicut leo, "as a lion" that is strongly, boldly and proudly, straitly[3] and fiercely, with haughty looks, with his proud countenances, with his stately braggings. Rugiens, "roaring," for he letteth not slip any occasion to speak or to roar out when he seeth[4] his time. Querens, "he goeth about seeking," and not sleeping as our bishops do, but he seeketh diligently, he searcheth diligently all corners, whereas he may have his prey; he roveth abroad in every place of his diocese; he standeth not still; he is never at rest, but ever in hand with his plough that it may go forward. But there was never such a preacher in England as he is. Who is able to tell[5] his diligent preaching? which every day and every hour laboureth to sow cockel and darnel, that he may bring out of form and out of estimation and room[6] the institution of the Lord's Supper and Christ's cross, for there he lost his right, for Christ said, Nunc iudicium est mundi, princeps seculi huius eiicietur foras,[7] et sicut exaltavit Moises serpentem in deserto, ita exaltari oportet filium hominis,[8] et cum exaltatus fuero, a terra, omnia traham ad meipsum:[9] "Now is the judgement of this world and the prince of this world shall be cast out." "And as Moses did lift up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the son of man be lift up." "And when I shall be lift up from the earth, I will draw all things unto myself." For the Devil was disappointed of his purpose, for he thought all to be his own.

And when he had once brought Christ to the cross, he thought all cock-sure.[10] But there lost he all his reigning, for Christ said, Omnia traham ad meipsum: "I will draw all things to myself." He meaneth drawing of man's soul to salvation. And that he said he would do per semetipsum, "by his own self," not by any other body's sacrifice. He meant by his own sacrifice on the cross, where he offered himself for the redemption of mankind, and not the sacrifice of the Mass to be offered by another.[11] For who can offer him but himself? He was both the offerer and the offering. And this is the prick,[12] this is the mark at which the Devil shooteth, to evacuate[13] the cross of Christ and to mingle[14] the institution of the Lord's Supper; the which although he cannot bring to pass, yet he goeth about by his sleights and subtle means, to frustrate the same, and these fifteen hundred years he hath been a doer, only purposing to evacuate Christ's death and to make it of small efficacy and virtue.

For whereas Christ according as the serpent was lifte[d] up in the wilderness:[15] so would he himself to be exalted, that thereby as many as trusted in him should have salvation. But the Devil would none of that. They would have us saved by a daily oblation propitiatory, by a sacrifice expiatory, or remissory.[16]

---

[1] 1 Peter 5:8.

[2] visitation See p. 116, note 5.

[3] straitly severely.

[4] seeth i.e., sees.

[5] to tell to recount, describe; to calculate the total amount of value of (something).

[6] out of form and out of estimation and room "out of form": out of proper shape or order, out of correct order; "estimation": esteem or respect; "room": proper place.

[7] Nunc iudicium … foras "Now is the judgement of this world: now shall the prince of this world be cast out" (John 12:31).

[8] et sicut … hominis "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up" (John 3:14).

[9] et cum … meipsum "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me" (John 12:32).

[10] cock-sure absolutely safe or secure from interference by others.

[11] He meaneth ... by another See p. 125, note 4.

[12] prick a target in archery.

[13] to evacuate to void, annul, deprive of force or validity, used mostly in religious and legal contexts; to render worthless.

[14] mingle confound, confuse.

[15] serpent was lifte[d] up in the wilderness See p. 126, note 9.

[16] by a daily oblation propitiatory, by a sacrifice expiatory, or remissory "oblation": the act of solemnly offering or promising something to God, here referring directly to the offering of the bread and wine in the Eucharist. The offering of the Eucharist is described as "propitiatory," and as a "sacrifice expiatory" meaning that it atones for or expiates the sins of humanity. "Remissory" means that the Eucharistic sacrifice is imagined as one which gains the community of believers

Now if I should preach in the country among the unlearned, I would tell what "propitiatory," "expiatory" and "remissory" is: but here is a learned auditory.[1] Yet for them that be unlearned, I will expound it. "Propitiatory," "expiatory," "remissory," or "satisfactory," for they signify all one thing in effect, and is nothing else but a thing whereby to obtain remission of sins, and to have salvation. And this way the Devil used to evacuate the death of Christ, that we might have affiance[2] in other things, as in the daily sacrifice of the priest,[3] whereas Christ would have us to trust in his only sacrifice.[4] So he was Agnus occisus ab origine mundi, "the lamb that hath been slain from the beginning of the world,"[5] and therefore is he called Iuge sacrificium, "a continual sacrifice,"[6] and not for the continuance of the Mass, as the blanchers[7] have blanched it and wrested[8] it, and as I myself did once mistake it. But Paul sayeth, Per semetipsum purgatio facta: "By himself" and by none other, Christ "made purgation" and satisfaction for the whole world.[9] Would Christ this word "by himself" had been better weighed and looked upon, and In sancrificationem, "to make them holy," for he is Iuge sacrificium, "a continual sacrifice," in effect, fruit and operation, that like as they which seeing the serpent hung up in the desert were put in remembrance of Christ's death, in whom as many as believed were saved: so all men that trusted in the death of Christ shall be saved, as well they that were before, as they that came after. For he was a continual sacrifice, as I said, in effect, fruit, operation and virtue, as though he had from the beginning of the world and continually should to the world's end hang still on the cross; and he is as fresh hanging on the cross now to them that believe and trust in him, as he was fifteen hundred years ago when he was crucified. Then let us trust upon his only death, and look for none other sacrifice propitiatory than the same bloody sacrifice, the lively sacrifice, and not a dry sacrifice, but a bloody sacrifice. For Christ himself said, Consummatum est: "It is perfectly finished."[10] "I have taken at my Father's hand the dispensation of redeeming mankind. I have wrought man's redemption, and have dispatched the matter."[11] Why then mingle ye him? Why do ye divide him? Why make you of him more sacrifices than one? Paul sayeth, Pascha nostrum immolatus est Christus: "Christ our passover is offered up,"[12] so that the thing is done, and Christ hath done it, and he hath done it, semel, "once for all." And it was a bloody sacrifice, not a dry sacrifice.

forgiveness for its sins and the cancelling of the penalties attached thereto. The Council of Trent (1561), called largely in response to Protestant challenges, asserted that the offering of the bread and wine during the celebration of the Eucharist was a "sacrifice ... truly propitiatory and that by means thereof this is effected, that we obtain mercy, and find grace ... For the Lord, appeased by the oblation thereof, and granting the grace and gift of penitence, forgives even heinous crimes" (Session XXII).

1 auditory audience.

2 affiance trust.

3 daily sacrifice of the priest i.e., the Mass, in particular the Eucharist.

4 And this way the Devil used to evacuate the death of Christ ... whereas Christ would have us to trust in his only sacrifice Like Luther, Latimer objected to the Catholic doctrine which stated that the Mass's central action—the consecration of the Eucharist—is a sacrifice offered for sin, and that it has a mystical continuance with Christ's sacrifice on the cross. Like Luther, Latimer argued that such a doctrine tended to displace and devalue Christ's sacrifice in favour of that which the priest offered before the congregation in the celebration of the Eucharist, since in his view the Roman Catholic Eucharist encourages people to believe that they can, through their own sacrifices and efforts, achieve salvation. Both seize upon the Catholic definition of the Eucharistic sacrifice as "propitiatory, expiatory, or remissory," which Latimer interprets as transforming the Eucharist into a ritual wherein one can "obtain" forgiveness for one's sins, a ritual which (in his view) displaces and indeed "evacuates" the only efficacious sacrifice which can cleanse humanity of its sins and ensure salvation: the crucifixion of Christ. According to Luther and Latimer, salvation can only be won by placing one's faith entirely in the sufficiency of Christ's crucifixion as a sacrifice to God for humanity's sins. To describe the Mass as a sacrifice for sin is, in the reformist view, not only to doubt in the sufficiency of Christ's sacrifice on the cross, it is to offer a substitute, man-made sacrifice, and thus an idolatrous and blasphemous one. For a cogent refutation of this view, see Council of Trent, Session XXII and "Eucharist, Sacrifice of the" in Catholic Encycl.

5 Revelation 13:8.

6 Daniel 8:11-12.

7 blanchers perverters, obstructers, hinderers.

8 wrested misinterpreted (carries its literal connotations, thus "to twist" or "contort" the meaning of something).

9 "When he had by himself purged our sins" (Hebrews 1:3).

10 It is perfectly finished. "It is finished" (John 19:30).

11 I have taken at my Father's hand ... have dispatched the matter Latimer imagines Christ here interpreting the text cited.

12 "For even Christ our passover is sacrificed for us" (1 Corinthians 5:7).

Why, then, it is not the Mass that availeth or profiteth for the quick and the dead. Woe worth[1] thee, O Devil, woe worth thee, thou hast prevailed so far and so long that thou hast made England to worship false gods, forsaking Christ their Lord. Woe worth thee, Devil. Woe worth thee, Devil, and all thine angels. If Christ by his death draweth all things to himself, and draweth all men to salvation and to heavenly bliss that trust in him, then the priests at the Mass (at the popish Mass, I say) what can they draw when Christ draweth all, but lands and goods from the right heirs? The priests draw goods and riches, benefices and promotions to themselves, and such as believed in their sacrifice they draw to the Devil. But Christ it is that draweth souls unto him by his bloody sacrifice. What have we to do then, but Epulari in domino, "to eat in the Lord" at his Supper.[2] What other service have we to do to him? And what other sacrifice have we to offer, but the mortification of our flesh? What other oblation have we to make, but of obedience, of good living, of good works, and of helping our neighbours? But as for our redemption, it is done already, it cannot be better. Christ hath done that thing so well that it cannot be amended. It cannot be devised how to make that any better than he hath done it. But the Devil, by the help of that Italian bishop[3] yonder, his chaplain, hath laboured by all means, that he might, to frustrate the death of Christ and the merits of his passion. And they have devised for that purpose to make us believe in other vain things by his pardons, as to have remission of sins for praying on hallowed beads, for drinking of the bakehouse bowl, as a canon of Waltham Abbey once told me, that whensoever they put their loaves of bread into the oven, as many as drank of the pardon bowl[4] should have pardon for drinking of it. A mad thing to give pardon to a bowl![5] Then to Pope Alexander's holy water,[6] to hallowed bells, palms, candles, ashes, and what not?

And of these things every one hath taken away some part of Christ's sanctification. Every one hath robbed some part of Christ's passion and cross, and hath mingled[7] Christ's death, and hath been made to be propitiatory and satisfactory, and to put away sin. Yea, and Alexander's holy water yet at this day remaineth in England, and is used for a remedy against spirits, and to chase away devils; yea, and I would this had been the worst. I would this were the worst. But woe worth thee, O Devil, that hast prevailed to evacuate Christ's cross and to mingle the Lord's Supper. These be the Italian bishop's devices,[8] and the Devil hath pricked at this mark to frustrate the cross of Christ; he shot at this mark long before Christ came; he shot at this prick four thousand years before Christ hanged on the cross, or suffered his passion.

For the brazen serpent was set up in the wilderness to put men in remembrance of Christ's coming, that like as they which beheld the brazen serpent were healed of their bodily diseases,[9] so

---

1 Woe worth cursed be.

2 "to eat in the Lord" at his Supper This passage is part of Paul's advice on how to participate in the Lord's Supper, consisting at least partly of a rebuke for the Corinthians' unseemly conduct at services: "When ye come together therefore into one place, this is not to eat the Lord's supper. For in eating every one taketh before other his own supper: and one is hungry and another is drunken" (1 Corinthians 12:20-21).

3 Italian bishop i.e., the Pope.

4 pardon bowl the alms bowls which had belonged to saints were sometimes venerated as relics.

5 for drinking of the bakehouse bowl ... pardon to a bowl This anecdote has not been traced, although the general drift is that the monks at Waltham Abbey were in the habit of drinking from a bowl (presumably filled with alcohol) while they were baking the community's bread; Latimer satirically suggests that in drinking from the pardon bowl (the presumably holy relic of the community's patron saint) they received pardon for the carnal pleasure they received when drinking from the bakehouse bowl.

6 Pope Alexander's holy water Alexander I (pope and martyr, c. 105-c. 115) first sanctioned the use of holy water (mixed with salt) to purify Christian homes from devils and evil spirits. See "Alexander I, Pope & Saint," Catholic Encycl.

7 mingled confused, confounded.

8 devices stratagems.

9 For the brazen serpent ... bodily diseases In Numbers 21:1-9, the Lord sends fiery serpents to punish the wandering Israelites for murmuring against him; in obedience to the Lord's subsequent command, Moses makes a serpent of brass and places it on a pole; the Lord decrees that anyone who has been bitten will live if he or she looks upon this brass serpent. Interpreting Old Testament figures, events and objects as mystical anticipations of New Testament figures, events and objects was a popular practice, known as typology.

they that looked spiritually upon Christ that was to come in him should be saved spiritually from the Devil. The serpent was set up in memory of Christ to come, but the Devil found means to steal away the memory of Christ's coming and brought the people to worship the serpent self, and to cense him, to honour him, and to offer to him, to worship him, and to make an idol of him.

And this was done by the market men that I told you of.[1]

And the clerk of the market[2] did it for the lucre[3] and advantage of his master, that thereby his honour might increase, for by Christ's death he could have but small worldly advantage. And even now so hath he certain blanchers longing[4] to the market, to let[5] and stop the light of the Gospel, and to hinder the King's proceedings in setting forth the word and glory of God. And when the King's Majesty, with the advice of his honourable Council, goeth about to promote God's word and to set an order in matters of religion,[6] there shall not lack blanchers that will say, "As for images, whereas they have been used to be censed and to have candles offered unto them, none be so foolish to do it to the stock or stone,[7] or to the image self, but it is done to God and his honour before the image." And though they should abuse it, these blanchers will be ready to whisper the King in his ear, and to tell him that this abuse is but a small matter. And that the same,[8] with all other like abuses in the Church, may be reformed easily. "It is but a little abuse," say they, "and it may be easily amended. But it should not be taken in hand at the first for fear of trouble, or further inconveniences. The people will not bear sudden alterations; an insurrection may be made after sudden mutation, which may be to the great harm and loss of the realm. Therefore all things shall be well, but not out of hand,[9] for fear of further business." These be the blanchers that hitherto have stopped the word of God, and hindered the true setting forth of the same. There be so many put-offs, so many put-byes, so many respects, and considerations of worldly wisdom. And I doubt not but there were blanchers in the old time to whisper in the ear of good King Hezekiah[10] for the maintenance of idolatry done to the brazen serpent, as well as there hath been now of late, and be now that can blanch[11] the abuse of Images and other like things. But good King Hezekiah would not be so blinded; he was like to Apollos, "fervent in spirit."[12] He would give no ear to the blanchers; he was not moved with these worldly respects, with these prudent considerations, with

---

1 by the market men that I told you of presumably a reference to one of the earlier sermons in the series, now lost, which Latimer was licensed to give at Paul's Cross. According to the OED, a "market man" is simply a man who buys and sells at a market; however, the context suggests that the term "market men" is an insulting description of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, from bishops down to deacons, who, in accepting the Roman Catholic definition of the Mass as propitiatory and remissory both for the living and the dead, have "made a market" of the Eucharist, profiting handsomely from the fees attached to masses for the dead (Requiem masses). Only in the repeated and profitable celebration of the Roman Catholic Mass can such ecclesiastical "market men" realize a profit, since if everyone accepted the notion that Christ's sacrifice on the cross and one's belief in it were all that were required for salvation, no one would will money to the Church for the saying of Requiem masses, for the building of chantries (chapels dedicated to such masses and daily prayers for their founders and their founders' ancestors), and for the endowment of monasteries.

2 clerk of the market a royal officer responsible for attending at markets, to enforce and punish violations of the standard of weights and measures; also, an officer appointed by city or town corporations, to collect market dues, and inspect the market; here, again, a term used metaphorically. Although the clerk and the master of Latimer's opportunistic clerical market are difficult to pinpoint, perhaps "the clerk" is the bishop, who is in charge of his diocese ("the market"), and the master is the Pope, who is his ultimate superior. However, the master of this market is ultimately the Devil.

3 lucre wealth, monetary gain.

4 blanchers longing perverters belonging.

5 let obstruct, obscure.

6 the King's Majesty ... to promote God's word ... matters of religion refers to the Royal Injunctions of 1547. See p. 113, note 1.

7 stock or stone wood or stone idols.

8 the same i.e., that same abuse of worshipping images.

9 out of hand at once, immediately.

10 Hezekiah He destroys the brazen serpent that Moses made because of the Israelites' idolatrous worship of it (2 Kings 18:1-5).

11 blanch cover up; "whitewash."

12 Apollos, "fervent in spirit" a Jew born in Alexandria, who became a preacher of the Gospel in Achaia and Corinth (Acts 18:24-28; 19:1); tradition makes him the bishop of Caesarea and the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

these policies; he feared not insurrections of the people. He feared not lest his people would not bear the glory of God; but he (without any of these respects, or policies, or considerations, like a good king, for God's sake and for conscience sake) by and by[1] plucked down the brazen serpent, and destroyed it utterly, and beat it to powder. He out of hand did cast down all images; he destroyed all idolatry, and clearly did extirpate all superstition. He would not hear these blanchers and worldly-wise men, but without delay, followeth God's cause and destroyeth all idolatry out of hand. Thus did good King Hezekiah, for he was like Apollos, "fervent in spirit" and diligent to promote God's glory. And good hope there is that it shall be likewise here in England, for the King's Majesty is so brought up in knowledge, virtue and godliness that it is not to be mistrusted but that we shall have all things well, and that the glory of God shall be spread abroad throughout all parts of the realm, if the prelates will diligently apply their plough and be preachers rather than lords. But our blanchers, which will be lords, and no labourers, when they are commanded to go and be resident upon their cures, and preach in their benefices, they would say, "What, I have set a deputy there. I have a deputy that looketh well to my flock, and the which shall discharge my duty."[2] "A deputy," quod he. I looked for that word all this while. And what a deputy must he be, trow[3] ye? Even one like himself; it must be a cannoniste[4]—that is to say, one that is brought up in the study of the Pope's laws and decrees. One that will set forth papistry as well as himself will do, and one that will maintain all superstition and idolatry.

And one that will nothing at all, or else very weakly, resist the Devil's plough. Yea, happy it is if he take not part with the Devil, and where he should be an enemy to him, it is well if he take not the Devil's part against Christ. But in the meantime the prelates take their pleasures. They are lords and no labourers, but the Devil is diligent at his plough. He is no unpreaching prelate. He is no lordly loiterer from his cure, but a busy ploughman, so that among all the prelates, and among all the pack of them that have cure, the Devil shall go for my money,[5] for he still applieth his business. Therefore, ye unpreaching prelates, learn of the Devil to be diligent in doing of your office. Learn of the Devil. And if you will not learn of God nor good man, for shame learn of the Devil. Ad erubescentiam vestram dico: "I speak it for your shame."[6] If you will not learn of God nor good man to be diligent in your office, learn of the Devil. Howbeit there is now very good hope that the King's Majesty—being by the help of good governance of his most honourable counsellors he is trained and brought up in learning and knowledge of God's word—will shortly provide a remedy and set an order herein; which thing that it may so be, let us pray for him. Pray for him, good people, pray for him. Ye have great cause and need to pray for him.

Imprinted at London, by John Day,[7] dwelling at Aldersgate, and William Seres, dwelling in Peter College.

These books are to be sold by the little Conduit in Cheapside.

Cum gracia et Privilegio ad imprimendum solum.[8]

—1548

[1] by and by immediately.

[2] be resident upon their cures ... discharge my duty" See p. 115, note 11.

[3] trow think, suppose.

[4] cannoniste canon-lawyer.

[5] the Devil shall go for my money exclamation, "He's the man for me!"

[6] "I speak it for your shame" "I speak it to your shame" (1 Corinthians 6:5). See p. 121, note 2.

[7] John Day (?1546-84) zealously supportive of the reformist movement, Day published a number of important Protestant texts, such as John Foxe's Acts and Monuments (1563); he was an early innovator in the presentation and marketing of books.

[8] Latin, "With the favour and license/privilege [of the authorities] for the exclusive printing (of)."

Sir Thomas Elyot

c. 1490-1546

Sir Thomas Elyot was an important and influential humanist, writing treatises on education, health, religion, and government. He helped to popularize humanist ideals by translating a number of classical texts and compiling an English dictionary of classical Latin. Elyot found a patron at court in Cardinal Wolsey, and held a position as junior clerk of the King's Council for six years, until Wolsey's fall from favour in 1530. Elyot was knighted at this time, but lost his place at court. In 1531, in an attempt to regain status at court, Elyot wrote The Governor, a work which discusses good government, and the best education and virtues of the governing class. In its scholarship and its support of the doctrine of absolute monarchy, The Governor depicts Elyot himself as an excellent candidate for service as councillor in Henry VIII's Court. In 1531, Elyot was appointed ambassador to the Holy Roman Emperor Charles V, at the very time that Henry VIII wished to divorce his first wife, Katherine of Aragon; perhaps because Elyot himself did not support the divorce, he was less than successful in convincing Charles V of the rightness of Henry's desires, and in just over a year the King recalled him to England and ended his ambassadorship. Despite Elyot's attempts to be influential in government affairs, he managed only a number of minor posts in Henry VIII's administration. His many treatises were popular, however, and became source texts for a number of writers in the period, including Spenser and Shakespeare.

EDITION: The boke named the governour, devised by [Sir?] Thomas Elyot knight. London: Thomas Berthelet, [1531]. STC 7635.

from The Book Named the Governor

The Proem[1] of Thomas Elyot Knight unto the Most Noble and Victorious Prince King Henry the Eighth King of England and France, Defender of the True Faith, and Lord of Ireland.

I late considering (most excellent Prince and mine only redoubted[2] sovereign lord) my duty that I owe to my natural[3] country, with my faith also of allegiance and oath wherewith I am double bounden unto your Majesty, moreover the accompt[4] that I have to render for that one little talent delivered to me to employ (as I suppose) to the increase of virtue,[5] I am (as God judge me) violently stirred to divulge or set forth some part of my study, trusting thereby to acquit me of my duties to God, your Highness and this my country, wherefore taking comfort and boldness partly of your Grace's most benevolent inclination toward the universal weal[6] of your subjects, partly inflamed with zeal, I have now enterprised to describe in our vulgar tongue[7] the form of a just public weal,[8] which matter I have gathered, as well of the sayings of most noble authors (Greeks and Latins) as by mine own experience, I being continually trained in some daily affairs of the public weal of this your most noble realm almost from my childhood, which attempt is not of presumption to teach any person, I myself having most need of teaching, but only to the intent that men which will be studious about the weal public may find the thing thereto expedient compendiously[9] written. And forasmuch as this present book treateth of the education of them that hereafter

1 Proem preface.
2 redoubted feared.
3 natural native.
4 accompt account.
5 one little talent ... increase of virtue The parable of the talents is told in Matthew 25:14-30.
6 weal welfare, well-being.
7 vulgar tongue vernacular, i.e., English.
8 public weal commonwealth.
9 expedient compendiously usefully and briefly or comprehensively.

may be deemed worthy to be governors of the public weal under your Highness (which Plato affirmeth to be the first and chief part of a public weal, Solomon saying also, where governors be not, the people shall fall into ruin), I therefore have named it "The Governor" and do now dedicate it unto your Highness as the first fruits of my study, verily trusting that your most excellent wisdom will therein esteem my loyal heart and diligent endeavour by the example [of] Artaxerxes, the noble king of Persia, who rejected not the poor husbandman which offered to him his homely hands full of clean water, but most graciously received it with thanks, esteeming the present not after the value, but rather to the will of the giver.[1] Semblably,[2] King Alexander retained with him the poet Cherilus[3] honourably, for writing his history, although that the poet was but of a small estimation, which that prince did not for lack of judgement, he being of excellent learning as disciple to Aristotle, but to the intent that his liberality employed on Cherilus should animate or give courage to others much better learned to contend with him in a semblable enterprise. And if, most virtuous Prince, I may perceive your Highness to be herewith pleased, I shall soon after (God giving me quietness) present your Grace with the residue of my study and labours, wherein your Highness shall well perceive that I nothing esteem so much in this world as your royal estate (my most dear sovereign lord) and the public weal of my country, protesting unto your excellent Majesty that where I commend herein any one virtue or dispraise any one vice, I mean the general description of the one and the other without any other particular meaning to the reproach of any one person. To the which protestation I am now driven through the malignity of this present time, all disposed to malicious detraction, wherefore I most humbly beseech your Highness to deign to be patron and defender of this little work against the assaults of malign interpreters, which fail not to rent[4] and deface the renown of writers, they themselves[5] being in nothing to the public weal profitable, which is by no man sooner perceived than by your Highness, being both in wisdom and very nobility equal to the most excellent princes, whom I beseech God ye may surmount in long life and perfect felicity. Amen.

The Signification of a Public Weal and Why It Is Called, in Latin, Respublica

[...] But now to prove by example of those things that be within the compass of man's knowledge of what estimation order is, not only among men, but also with God, albeit his wisdom, bounty and magnificence can be with no tongue or pen sufficiently expressed. Hath not he set degrees and estates in all his glorious works?

First in his heavenly ministers, whom as the Church affirmeth, he hath constituted to be in divers[6] degrees called hierarchies. Also Christ saith by his evangelist that in the house of his Father (which is God) be many mansions.[7] But to treat of that which by natural understanding may be comprehended, behold the four elements, whereof the body of man is compact, how they be set in their places, called spheres, higher or lower, according to the sovereignty of their natures: that is to say, the fire as the most pure element, having in it nothing that is corruptible, in his place is highest and above the other elements. The air, which next to the fire is most pure in substance, is in the second sphere or place. The water, which is somewhat consolidate[8] and approacheth to corruption,[9] is next unto the earth. The earth, which is of [1] Artaxerxes ... will of the giver Artaxerxes (d. 359 BCE) was noted as a noble and gentle ruler; the story of the gift of water is told in Plutarch's Artaxerxes; husbandman farmer.

[2] Semblably similarly.

[3] King Alexander ... Cherilus The poet Cherilus wrote a history of Alexander the Great (356-323 BCE).

[4] rent tear.

[5] they themselves i.e., the detractors.

[6] divers various.

[7] Christ saith ... many mansions See John 14:2.

[8] consolidate solid, compact.

[9] corruption something broken up, not solid.

substance gross and ponderous,[1] is set of all elements most lowest.

Behold also the order that God hath put generally in all his creatures, beginning at the most inferior or base and ascending upward; he made not only herbs to garnish the earth, but also trees of a more eminent stature than herbs, and yet in the one and the other be degrees of qualities, some pleasant to behold, some delicate or good in taste, other wholesome and medicinable, some commodious[2] and necessary. Semblably in birds, beasts and fishes, some be good for the sustenance of man, some bear things profitable to sundry uses, other be apt to occupation and labour. In divers is strength and fierceness only; in many is both strength and commodity.[3] Some others serve for pleasure. None of them hath all these qualities; few have the more[4] part or many, specially beauty, strength and profit. But where any is found that hath many of the said properties, he[5] is more set by than all the other and by that estimation the order of his place and degree evidently appeareth, so that every kind of trees, herbs, birds, beasts, and fishes, beside their diversity of forms, have (as who saith) a peculiar disposition appropred[6] unto them by God their creator, so that in everything is order, and without order may be nothing stable or permanent. And it may not be called order except it do contain in it degrees, high and base, according to the merit or estimation of the thing that is ordered.

Now to return to the estate of mankind, for whose use all the said creatures were ordained of God, and [who] also excelleth them all by prerogative of knowledge and wisdom, it seemeth that in him should be no less providence of God declared than in the inferior creatures, but rather with a more perfect order and disposition. And therefore it appeareth that God giveth not to every man like gifts of grace or of nature, but to some more, some less, as it liketh his divine Majesty. Ne[7] they be not in common (as fantastical fools would have all things), nor one man hath not all virtues and good qualities. Notwithstanding, for as much as understanding is the most excellent gift that man can receive in his creation, whereby he doth approach most nigh unto the similitude of God, which understanding is the principal part of the soul. It is therefore congruent and according that as one excelleth another in that influence as thereby being next to the similitude of his maker, so should the estate of his person be advanced in degree or place where understanding may profit, which is also distributed into sundry uses, faculties and offices necessary for the living and governance of mankind. And like as the angels, which be most fervent in contemplation, be highest exalted in glory (after the opinion of holy doctors); and also the fire, which is the most pure of elements and also doth clarify the other inferior elements, is deputed to the highest sphere or place; so in this world, they which excel others in this influence of understanding and do employ it to the detaining of others within the bounds of reason and show them how to provide for their necessary living, such ought to be set in a more high place than the residue, where they may see and also be seen, that by the beams of their excellent wit showed through the glass of authority, others of inferior understanding may be directed to the way of virtue and commodious living.

And unto men of such virtue by very equity appertaineth honour as their just reward and duty, which by other men's labours must also be maintained according to their merits. Forasmuch as the said persons excelling in knowledge, whereby others be governed, be ministers for the only profit and commodity of them which have not equal understanding, where they which do exercise artificial science or corporal labour do not travail[8] for their superiors only, but also for their own necessity. So the husbandman feedeth himself and 1 ponderous heavy.

2 commodious beneficial.
3 commodity usefulness, profit.
4 more most.
5 he it.
6 appropred assigned.
7 Ne neither.
8 travail labour.

the clothmaker; the clothmaker apparelleth himself and the husbandman; they both succour other artificers,[1] other artificers them; they and other artificers them that be governors. But they that be governors (as I before said) nothing do acquire by the said influence of knowledge for their own necessities, but do employ all the powers of their wits and their diligence to the only preservation of others their inferiors, among which inferiors also behooveth[2] to be a disposition and order according to reason, that is to say, that the slothful or idle person do[es] not participate with him that is industrious and taketh pain, whereby the fruits of his labours should be diminished, wherein should be none equality, but thereof should proceed discourage[ment] and finally dissolution for lack of provision. Wherefore it can none otherwise stand with reason but that the estate of the person in pre-eminence of living should be esteemed with his understanding, labour and policy, whereunto must be added an augmentation of honour and substance, which not only impresseth a reverence, whereof proceedeth due obedience among subjects, but also inflameth men naturally inclined to idleness or sensual appetite to covet like fortune, and for that cause to dispose them to study or occupation.

Now to conclude my first assertion or argument: where all thing is common[3] there lacketh order, and where order lacketh, there all thing is odious and uncomely.[4] And that have we in daily experience, for the pans and pots garnisheth well the kitchen, and yet should they be to the chamber[5] none ornament. Also, the beds, testars[6] and pillows beseemeth not the hall, no more than the carpets and cushions becometh the stable. Semblably the potter and tinker,[7] only perfect in their craft, shall little do in the ministration of justice. A ploughman or carter shall make but a feeble answer to an ambassador. Also a weaver or fuller[8] should be an unmeet[9] captain of an army or in any other office of a governor.

Wherefore to conclude, it is only a public weal where, like as God hath disposed the said influence of understanding, is also appointed degrees and places according to the excellency thereof, and thereto also would be substance convenient and necessary for the ornament of the same, which also impresseth a reverence and due obedience to the vulgar people or commonalty, and without that, it can be no more said that there is a public weal than it may be affirmed that a house without his[10] proper and necessary ornaments is well and sufficiently furnished.

That One Sovereign Governor Ought to Be in a Public Weal. And What Damage Hath Happened Where a Multitude Hath Had Equal Authority without Any Sovereign.

Like as to a castle or fortress sufficeth one owner or sovereign, and where any more be of like power and authority, seldom cometh the work to perfection, or being all readymade where the one diligently overseeth and the other neglecteth, in that contention all is subverted and commeth to ruin. In semblable wise[11] doth a public weal that hath more chief governors than one. Example we may take of the Greeks, among whom in divers cities were divers forms of public weals governed by multitudes, wherein one was most tolerable where the governance and rule was always permitted to them which excelled in virtue, and was in the Greek tongue called Aristocratia, in Latin Optimorum Potentia, in English the rule of men of best disposition, which the Thebans[12] of long time observed.

---

1 artificers they who make by art or skill; craftspeople.

2 also behooveth i.e., it is also required or fitting.

3 common shared equally, had in common.

4 uncomely not pleasing, improper.

5 chamber bedchamber.

6 testars bed canopies.

7 tinker fixer of metal household utensils (pots, kettles).

8 fuller one who treads or beats cloth to cleanse and thicken it.

9 unmeet unfit, improper.

10 his its.

11 semblable wise a similar way.

12 Thebans Thebes was the capital of ancient Boeotia in Greece.

Another public weal was among the Athenians,[1] where equality was of estate among[2] the people, and only by their whole consent their city and dominions were governed, which might well be called a monster with many heads. Nor never it was certain nor stable, and often times they banished or slew the best citizens, which by their virtue and wisdom had most profited to the public weal.

This manner of governance was called in Greek democratia, in Latin popularis potentia, in English "the rule of the commonalty." Of these two governances, none of them may be sufficient. For in the first, which consisteth of good men, virtue is not so constant in a multitude but that some being once in authority be incensed with glory, some with ambition, other with covetousness and desire of treasure or possessions, whereby they fall into contention, and finally where any achieveth the superiority, the whole governance is reduced unto a few in number, which fearing the multitude and their mutability, to the intent to keep them in dread to rebel, ruleth by terror and cruelty, thinking thereby to keep themselves in surety, notwithstanding rancour, coarcted[3] and long detained in a narrow room, at the last brasteth[4] out with intolerable violence and bringeth all to confusion. For the power that is practised to the hurt of many cannot continue. The popular estate,[5] if it anything do vary from equality of substance or estimation, or that the multitude of people have overmuch liberty, of necessity one of these inconveniences must happen: either tyranny, where he that is too much in favour would be elevate[d] and suffer none equality; or else into the rage of commonality,[6] which of all rules is most to be feared. For like as the commons, if they feel some severity, they do humbly serve and obey, so where they embracing a licence refuse to be bridled, they fling and plunge, and if they once throw down their governor, they order everything without justice, only with vengeance and cruelty, and with incomparable difficulty and uneath[7] by any wisdom be pacified and brought again into order. Wherefore undoubtedly the best and most sure governance is by one king or prince, which ruleth only for the weal of his people to him subject, and that manner of governance is best approved and hath longest continued and is most ancient, for who can deny but that all thing in heaven and earth is governed by one God, by one perpetual order, by one providence? One sun ruleth over the day, and one moon over the night. And to descend down to the earth, in a little beast which of all other is most to be marvelled at, I mean the bee, is left to man by nature, as it seemeth a perpetual figure of a just governance or rule, who hath among them one principal bee for their governor, who excelleth all other in greatness, yet hath he no prick or sting, but in him is more knowledge than in the residue.[8] For if the day following shall be fair and dry and that the bees may issue out of their stalls without peril of rain or vehement wind, in the morning early he calleth them, making a noise as it were the sound of a horn or a trumpet, and with that, all the residue prepare them[selves] to labour and fleeth abroad, gathering nothing but that shall be sweet and profitable, although they sit oftentimes on herbs and other things that be venomous and stinking. The captain himself laboreth not for his sustenance, but all the other for him. He only seeth that if any drone or other unprofitable bee ent'reth into the hive and consumeth the honey gathered by others, that he be immediately expelled from that company. And when there is another number of bees increased, they semblably have also a captain, which be not suffered to continue with the other. Wherefore this new company gathered into a swarm, having their captain among them, and environing[9] him to preserve him from [1] Athenians Athens was the leading city in ancient Greece.

[2] of estate among the state of.
[3] coarcted confined.
[4] brasteth bursts.
[5] popular estate common people.
[6] the rage of commonality mob rule.
[7] uneath only with difficulty, scarcely.
[8] one principal bee ... in the residue It was generally thought that the "principal bee" was male.
[9] environing encircling, surrounding.

harm, they issue forth, seeking a new habitation, which they find in some tree, except with some pleasant noise they be allured and conveyed unto another hive. I suppose who seriously beholdeth this example and hath any commendable wit shall thereof gather much matter to the forming of a public weal. But because I may not be long therein, considering my purpose, I would that if the reader hereof be learned, that he should repair to the Georgics of Virgil, or to Pliny or Collumella,[1] where he shall find the example more ample and better declared.

And if any desireth to have the governance of one person proved by histories, let him first resort to the Holy Scripture, where he shall find that almighty God commanded Moses only to bring His elected people out of captivity, giving only to him that authority, without appointing to him any other assistance of equal power or dignity, except in the message to King Pharaoh, wherein Aaron rather as a minister than a companion went with Moses.[2]

But only Moses conducted the people through the Red Sea. He only governed them forty years in desert. And because Dathan and Abiram disdained his rule and coveted to be equal with him, the earth opened and fire issued out and swallowed them in, with all their whole family and confederates, to the number of 14700.[3] And although Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, counselled him to depart his importable[4] labours in continual judgements unto the wise men that were in his company,[5] he notwithstanding still retained the sovereignty by God's commandment until a little before he died he resigned it to Joshua, assigned by God to be ruler after him.[6] Semblably, after the death of Joshua by the space of 246 years, succeeded from time to time one ruler among the Jews, which was chosen for his excellency in virtue and specially justice, wherefore he was called the judge, until the Israelites desired of almighty God to let them have a king, as other people had, who appointed to them Saul to be their king,[7] who exceeded all other in stature. And so successively one king governed all the people of Israel unto the time of Rehoboam, son of the noble King Solomon, who being unlike to his father in wisdom, practised tyranny among his people, wherefore nine parts of them, which they called Tribus, forsook him and elected Jeroboam, late servant to Solomon to be their king, only the tenth part remaining with Rehoboam,[8] and so in that realm were continually two kings until the king of Mede had depopulate[d] the country and brought the people in captivity to the city of Babylon. So that during the time that two kings reigned over the Jews was ever continual battle among themselves, where if one king had always reigned like to David or Solomon, of likelihood the country should not so soon have been brought in captivity [...]

[...] We have also an example domestical, which is most necessary to be noted. After that the Saxons by treason had expelled out of England the Britons, which were the ancient inhabitants, this realm was divided into sundry regions or kingdoms. O what misery was the people then in. O how this most noble isle of the world was decerpt[9] and rent in pieces, the people pursued and hunted like wolves or other beasts savage. None[10] industry availed, no strength defended, no riches profited. Who would then have desired to have been rather a man than a dog, when men

---

[1] Georgics of Virgil … Collumella Publius Vergilius Maro (70-19 BCE) wrote his Georgics in 29 BCE; Pliny the Elder, or Caius Plinius Secundus (23-79 CE); Lucius Junius Moderatus Columella (1st century CE). All three Latin authors wrote on nature and agriculture.

[2] Holy Scripture … went with Moses See Exodus 6:1-13.

[3] Dathan and Abiram … 14700 See Numbers 16:1-35 and 41-50 for the story of the earth swallowing Dathan and Abiram and 250 others, and the plague which killed 14,700.

[4] importable unbearable.

[5] Jethro … company Jethro told Moses to lighten his work load by dividing it amongst capable men in Exodus 18:13-27.

[6] resigned it to Joshua … after him See Deuteronomy 31:1-8.

[7] the Israelites desired … Saul to be their king See 1 Samuel 8:6 and 11:15.

[8] unto the time of … Rehoboam See 1 Kings 12-14 for the stories of Rehoboam and Jeroboam.

[9] decerpt pulled to pieces, divided.

[10] None not one.

either with sword or with hunger perished, having no profit or sustenance of their own corn or cattle, which by mutual war was continually destroyed? Yet the dogs, either taking that that men could not quietly come by, or feeding on the dead bodies which on every part lay scattered plenteously, did satisfy their hunger.

Where find ye any good laws that at that time were made and used, or any commendable monument of any science or craft in this realm occupied? Such iniquity seemeth to be then that, by the multitude of sovereign governors, all things had been brought to confusion if the noble King Edgar had not reduced the monarch to his pristinate estate and figure,[1] which brought to pass, reason was revived and people came to conformity and the realm began to take comfort and to show some visage of a public weal, and so (lauded be God) have continued, but not being always in like estate or condition. Albeit, it is not to be despaired but that the King our sovereign lord now reigning, and this realm always having one prince like unto his Highness equal to the ancient princes in virtue and courage, it shall be reduced (God so disposing) unto a public weal, excelling all other in pre-eminence of virtue and abundance of things necessary.

But forasmuch as I do well perceive that to write of the office or duty of a sovereign governor or prince far exceedeth the compass of my learning, Holy Scripture affirming that the hearts of princes be in God's own hands and disposition, I will therefore keep my pen within the space that is described[2] to me by the three noble masters: reason, learning and experience. And by their ensignment[3] or teaching I will ordinately[4] treat of the two parts of a public weal, whereof the one shall be named "due administration," the other "necessary occupation," which shall be divided into two volumes. In the first shall be comprehended the best form of education or bringing up of noble children from their nativity, in such manner as they may be found worthy and also able to be governors of a public weal. The second volume—which, God granting me quietness and liberty of mind, I will shortly after send forth—it shall contain all the remnant which I can either by learning or experience find apt to the perfection of a just public weal, in the which I shall so endeavour myself that all men, of what estate or condition soever they be, shall find therein occasion to be always virtuously occupied, and not without pleasure, if they be not of the schools of Aristippus or Apicius,[5] of whom the one supposed felicity to be only in lechery, the other in delicate feeding and gluttony. From whose sharp talons and cruel teeth I beseech all gentle readers to defend these works, which for their commodity is only compiled.

At What Age a Tutor Should Be Provided and What Shall Appertain to His Office to Do.

After that a child is come to seven years of age, I hold it expedient that he be taken from the company of women, saving that he may have, one year or two at the most, an ancient and sad[6] matron attending on him in his chamber, which shall not have any young woman in her company. For though there be no peril of offence in that tender and innocent age, yet in some children nature is more prone to vice than to virtue, and in the tender wits be sparks of voluptuosity which, nourished by any occasion or object, increaseth oftentimes into so terrible a fire that therewith all virtue and reason is consumed. Wherefore, to eschew[7] that danger, the most sure counsel is to withdraw him from all company of women and to assign

[1] reduced the monarch … pristinate estate and figure brought back or returned the monarchy to its first and original state. King Edgar ruled from 959 to 975 CE.

[2] described apportioned.

[3] ensignment instruction.

[4] ordinately in an orderly manner.

[5] Aristippus or Apicius Aristippus (435-366 BCE) was a disciple of Socrates and founder of the school of hedonism; Marcus Gaius Apicius (b. 25 BCE) was a cookbook author.

[6] sad serious, trustworthy.

[7] eschew avoid.

unto him a tutor which should be an ancient and worshipful man, in whom is approved to be much gentleness mixed with gravity, and as nigh as can be such one as the child by imitation following may grow to be excellent. And if he be also learned, he is the more commendable. [...]

The office of a tutor is first to know the nature of his pupil, that is to say, whereto he is most inclined or disposed, and in what thing he setteth his most delectation[1] or appetite. If he be of nature courteous, piteous, and of a free and liberal heart, it is a principal token of grace (as it is by all scripture determined). Then shall a wise tutor purposely commend those virtues, extolling also his pupil for having of them, and therewith he shall declare them to be of all men most fortunate which shall happen to have such a master. And moreover shall declare to him what honour, what love, what commodity shall happen to him by these virtues. And if any have been of disposition contrary, then to express the enormities of their vice with as much detestation as may be. And if any danger have thereby ensued, misfortune or punishment to aggrieve it in suchwise,[2] with so vehement words, as the child may abhor it and fear the semblable adventure.

[...]

Wherefore in the Good Order of Dancing a Man and a Woman Danceth Together.

It is diligently to be noted that the associating of man and woman in dancing, they both observing one number[3] and time in their movings, was not begun without a special consideration, as well for the necessary conjunction of those two persons, as for the intimation of sundry virtues which be by them represented. And forasmuch as by the association of a man and a woman in dancing may be signified matrimony, I could in declaring the dignity and commodity of that sacrament make entire volumes, if it were not so commonly known to all men that almost every frere lymitour[4] carrieth it written in his bosom, wherefore, lest in repeating a thing so frequent and common my book should be as fastidious or fulsome to the readers as such merchant preachers be now to their customers, I will reverently take my leave of divines. And for my part I will endeavour myself to assemble out of the books of ancient poets and philosophers matter as well apt to my purpose as also new, or at the least ways infrequent or seldom heard of them, that have not read very many authors in Greek and Latin.

But now to my purpose. In every dance of a most ancient custom, there danceth together a man and a woman, holding each other by the hand or the arm, which betokeneth concord. Now it behooveth the dancers and also the beholders of them to know all qualities incident to a man and also all qualities to a woman likewise appertaining.

A man in his natural perfection is fierce, hardy, strong in opinion, covetous of glory, desirous of knowledge, appetiting[5] by generation to bring forth his semblable. The good nature of a woman is to be mild, timorous, tractable, benign, of sure remembrance, and shamefast. Divers other qualities of each of them might be found out, but these be most apparent and for this time sufficient.

Wherefore, when we behold a man and a woman dancing together, let us suppose there to be a concord of all the said qualities being joined together, as I have set them in order. And the moving of the man would be more vehement, of the woman more delicate and with less advancing of the body, signifying the courage and strength that ought to be in a man, and the pleasant soberness that should be in a woman. And in this wise, fierceness joined with mildness maketh severity; audacity with timorosity maketh magnanimity; wilful opinion and tractability (which is to be shortly persuaded and moved) maketh constancy a virtue; covetousness of glory adorned with benig-

[1] delectation delight.

[2] suchwise such a way.

[3] number rhythm.

[4] frere lymitour A friar limiter was a friar licensed to beg within certain limited areas.

[5] appetiting desiring.

nity causeth honour; desire of knowledge with sure remembrance procureth sapience;[1] shamefastness joined to appetite of generation maketh continence,[2] which is a mean between chastity and inordinate lust. These qualities, in this wise being knit together and signified in the personages of man and woman dancing, do express or set out the figure of very nobility which, in the higher estate it is contained, the more excellent is the virtue in estimation.

[...]

—1531

1 sapience wisdom, understanding.

2 continence self-restraint.

Anne Askew

c. 1521-1546

Anne Askew's texts reflect some of the passionate fervour of the Protestant reformers in the dying days of Henry VIII's reign. Her family and her marriage placed her firmly in the ranks of the gentry. Her father, Sir William Askew, attended Henry VIII at the Field of Cloth of Gold in 1520 and served as a member of Parliament and high sheriff of Lincolnshire. Her mother, Elizabeth Wrottesley, and her step-mother, Elizabeth Hutton Hansard, were both members of old established Lincolnshire families. The marriages and patronage appointments of her sisters and brothers indicate that the family, and not just Anne herself, were sympathetic to reformist ideas.[1] It is worth noting, however, that there was also a strongly conservative, Catholic strain of sentiment in Lincolnshire in the 1530s, which makes Askew's conversion, her request for a divorce from Thomas Kyme—her staunchly Catholic husband—and her participation in London reformist circles even more surprising. After leaving her husband in order to go to London to petition the courts for a divorce, she became associated with the reformers around Queen Katherine Parr. In fact, Askew seems to have come to the attention of the King's churchmen partly because of the political capital they hoped to make of this association; their intent was to use Askew to incriminate the Queen and destroy her influence over Henry. When she refused to name other noblewomen as her associates, Askew was initially released, but was rearrested in June 1545, and ultimately tortured with the rack, an extraordinary step to take against a gentlewoman at the time. When she adamantly refused to surrender her reformist beliefs, in particular her conviction that transubstantiation was a popish lie, she was burned at the stake as a heretic.

Askew's accounts of her interrogation and torture were smuggled out of Newgate prison to John Bale, a Carmelite friar turned reformer who spent the latter part of Henry VIII's reign in exile in Wesel, a city on the Rhine in western Germany. He had varied experience as a writer and publisher in a number of genres, including drama, prose tracts, biblical commentary, history, autobiography, saint's life, and dialogue. All of these converge in his handling of Askew's text, where Bale is responsible for one of its most notable features: its heavy interlinear annotation. Throughout the work, Bale's commentary is interpolated among paragraphs of Askew's testimony and serves to emphasize her points, refute the arguments of her interrogators, place her statements in biblical and theological context, and compare her actions to those of the early Christian martyrs. The result is a text that looks like a dialogue between Askew and Bale. This form mimics the conventions of debates in print between humanist or Protestant scholars, who typically included their opponents' statements in one typeface and their own responses in another. The difference here is that Bale does not disagree with Askew, but rather repeats and expands her statements. At the same time, Bale also adapts the Roman Catholic traditions of writing the lives of saints and martyrs for reformist purposes. Like the writers of medieval hagiography, Bale presents his subject as a model for Christian behaviour both in life and in death. As a female martyr, Askew is highly prized in the text for her chastity and conformity to ideals of female speech and behaviour. However, while Bale intends her to encourage by example and show the working of divine power through an otherwise insignificant individual, he does not show Askew as either a mediator between sinners and God or as a performer of miracles. Both of these were traditional functions of saints. Rather, the miracle lies in her resistance, through her faith and knowledge of Scripture, the cornerstones of Protestantism. Bale's enumeration of her similarities to Blandina, a Roman gentlewoman, places Askew historically in a tradition of persecuted saints that stretches back to the early Church that preceded both Protestantism and Roman Catholicism.[2] The result is that Bale creates a link between early Christianity and contemporary Protestantism and gives this Protestant reformist Church an authoritative foundation. In his preface to the Latter Examination, Bale expands the historical scope of this tradition by listing, in particular, early English saints to honour and hold up as examples, especially for comparison with a litany of false saints that mocks Roman Catholic ceremonies and behaviour.

---

[1] E.V. Beilin gives a detailed account of Askew's family in the introduction to her edition of the Examinations (Oxford, 1996), p. xviii.

[2] K. Kesselring, "Representations of Women in Tudor Historiography: John Bale and the Rhetoric of Exemplarity," Renaissance and Reformation/Renaissance et Réforme 22.2 (1998): 46.

In Askew's testimony, the persona that emerges is outspoken, articulate, humorous, clever, self-aware, and absolute in her belief in the principles of reformist theology. As she spars with her examiners, Askew reveals considerable knowledge of Scripture by citing biblical passages directly and, in other places, enigmatically paraphrasing. She is also keenly aware of the contradiction between the Protestant doctrine of the priesthood of all believers, which gives everyone in the Church equal status, and St. Paul's prohibition against women's preaching.[1] Askew's solution is typically dramatic and rhetorically sophisticated, as she uses her examiners' words against them in some places, while in others maintains strategic silence. Frequently, there is significant contrast between Askew's rhetorical strategies and the modesty and frailty attributed to her by Bale's commentary, or between her comparatively plain style and his elaborate interpretation. This tension has been understood, on the one hand, to show Bale's attempt to exert power over Askew in order to recreate her in a gendered image more suitable to his purpose and, on the other, to emphasize the sense of many voices in the text, an effect that creates a virtual community of faith in which Askew participates. In the latter argument, Askew's use of Scripture builds around her a community of biblical figures, into which she as a martyr fits. Bale's comparisons, interjections, and commentary then appear more as a part of this community-building process than as a means of erasing Askew's distinctive voice and persona.[2] In order to give a sense of the effect of both Bale's editorializing and Askew's distinct voice, the selections from the Latter Examination are presented without his commentary.

EDITIONS: The first examinacyon of Anne Askewe lately martyred in Smythfelde, by the Romysh popes upholders, with the elucydacyon of Iohan Bale. Wesel: D. van der Straten, 1546. STC 848; The lattre examinacyon of Anne Askewe latelye martyred in Smythfelde, by the wycked Synagoge of Antichrist, with the Elucydacyon of Iohan Bale. Wesel: D. van der Straten, 1547. STC 850.

ADDITIONAL ONLINE TEXTS: John Bale. "The Epistle Dedicatory" and "John Bale to the Reader" in John Leland's The Laborious Journey and Search for England's Antiquities (1549).

from THE FIRST EXAMINATION of the Worthy Servant of God Mistress Anne Askew the Younger Daughter of Sir William Askew, Knight of Lincolnshire, Lately Martyred in Smithfield by the Romish Pope's Upholders.

The Censure or Judgement of John Bale thereupon, after the Sacred Scriptures and Chronicles.

Of no less Christian constancy was this faithful witness and holy martyr of God, Anne Askew, nor no less a fast member of Christ by her mighty persistence in his verity at this time of mischief, than was the aforenamed Blandina[3] in the primitive Church. This shall well appear in her ii. examinations or tyrannous handlings here following,

[1] In his letter to the Corinthians, Paul says, "As in all the churches of the saints, the women should keep silence in the churches. For they are not permitted to speak, but should be subordinate, even as the law says. If there is anything they desire to know, let them ask their husbands at home. For it is shameful for a woman to speak in church" (1 Corinthians 14:33-35).

[2] See T. Kemp, "Translating (Anne) Askew: The Textual Remains of a Sixteenth-Century Heretic and Saint," Renaissance Quarterly 52 (1999): 1021-45; and J.P. Linton, "The Plural Voices of Anne Askew," Write or Be Written: Early Modern Women Poets and Cultural Constraints, ed. B. Smith and U. Appelt (Aldershot, 2001), pp. 297-313. Both present arguments that show these critical perspectives.

[3] Blandina a member of the band of martyrs of Lyons who, after some of their number had endured the most frightful tortures, suffered a glorious martyrdom in the reign of Marcus Aurelius (177). Blandina was a slave, who had been taken into custody along with her master, also a Christian. Her companions feared that on account of her bodily frailty she might not remain steadfast under torture. However, although she was tortured in a horrible manner, so that even the executioners became exhausted, she remained faithful and repeated to every question "I am a Christian and we commit no wrongdoing." At her execution, she was scourged, placed on a red-hot grate, enclosed in a net and thrown before a wild steer, and at last killed with a dagger (Catholic Encycl.).

whom she wrote with her own hand at the instant desire of certain faithful men and woman, yea rather at the secret motion of God, that the truth thereof might be known the world over. As within short space it will be, if the Latin speech can carry it.[1] Mark well the communications here both of her and of her examiners, so proving their sprites[2] as St. John the Apostle giveth you counsel (1. Jo. 4): "And then shall ye know the tree by his fruit, and the man by his work."

ANNE ASKEW.

To satisfy your expectation, good people (sayeth she) this was my first examination in the year of our Lord 1545 and in the month of March. First, Christopher Dare[3] examined me at Saddlers' Hall,[4] being one of the quest,[5] and asked if I did not believe that the sacrament hanging over the altar was the very body of Christ really.[6] Then I demanded this question of him, wherefore St. Stephen[7] was stoned to death? And he said, he could not tell. Then I answered, that no more would I assoil[8] his vain question.

JOHN BALE.

A sacrament[9] (sayeth Saint Augustine) is a sign, shape, or similitude of that it representeth, and no God nor yet thing represented. This word "real" or "really" is not of belief, for it is not in all the sacred Scriptures. Only is it sophistically[10] borrowed of the pagans' learning by Winchester[11] and his fellows to corrupt our Christian faith. Beware of that filthy poison. The perfect belief of Stephen (Act. 7), of Paul (Act. 17), and of Solomon (3. Regum 8 and 2 Parali. 6) was that God dwelleth not in temples made with hands.[12] Agreeable unto this was the faith of this godly woman, which neither could believe that he dwelleth in the box. God sayeth (Esaie 66),[13] "Heaven is my seat, not the box." David sayeth (Psalm. 113), "Our God is in Heaven, not in the pyx."[14] Christ taught us to say, when we pray (Matth. 6; Luke 11), Our Father which art in Heaven, and not our Father which art in the box. Now discern and judge.

ANNE ASKEW.

Secondly he said, that there was a woman, which did testify that I should read, how God was not in temples made with hands. Then I showed him the 7 and the 8 chapter of the Apostles' Acts, what Stephen and Paul had said therein. Whereupon he asked me, how I took those sentences? I answered,

---

1 if the Latin speech can carry it Latin was still the international language of scholarship in the sixteenth century.

2 sprites spirits.

3 Christopher Dare one of Askew's inquisitors, otherwise unidentified.

4 Saddlers' Hall hall belonging to the Company of Saddlers.

5 quest official or judicial inquiry.

6 the very body of Christ really Askew refers here to the Roman Catholic doctrine of the Real Presence, according to which the consecrated bread became literally the body of Christ.

7 St. Stephen In early church history, Stephen was an uncompromising apologist for the Christian way. When challenged as a blasphemer, he argued that God has never restricted his presence to a single place (i.e., a temple) and that the people of Israel have always rebelled against God and persecuted his messengers. For his blasphemy, Stephen was stoned to death, but was vindicated by a vision of the glorified Christ (Wycliffe Bible Dictionary, pp. 1623-24).

8 assoil resolve, clear up.

9 sacrament religious ceremonies, acts, or practices distinguished from others in Christian rites as having been observed by Christ, often understood as the visible means by which divine grace is sought and conferred. While the Church of Rome acknowledged seven sacraments (Baptism, Confirmation, the Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Holy Orders, and Matrimony), reformists accepted only two, Baptism and the Lord's Supper.

10 sophistically fallaciously, with deceptive subtlety.

11 Winchester Stephen Gardiner (?1483-1555), bishop of Winchester and religious conservative who supported the Church of Rome.

12 belief of Stephen ... made with hands In Acts 7:49, Stephen quotes Isaiah 66:1 (see p. 140, note 13), while Paul announces, "The God who made the world and everything in it, being Lord of heaven and earth, does not live in shrines made by man" (Acts 17:24), and Solomon comments "Behold, heaven and the highest heaven cannot contain thee; how much less this house which I have built!" (1 Kings 8:27).

13 Esaie 66 "Thus says the Lord: 'Heaven is my throne and the earth is my footstool; what is the house which you would build for me, and what is the place of my rest?'" (Isaiah 66:1).

14 pyx box in which the host or consecrated bread of the Sacrament is reserved.

that I would not throw pearls among swine, for acorns were good enough.[1]

JOHN BALE.

An ignorant woman, yea a beast without faith, is herein allowed to judge the holy Scriptures heresy, and against all good laws admitted to accuse this godly woman, the servant of Christ, for an heinous heretic, for the only reading of them. As perverse and blasphemous was this questmonger[2] as she, and as beastly ignorant in the doctrine of health, yet is neither of them judged ill of[3] the world, but the one permitted to accuse this true member of Christ, and the other to condemn her. Wherefore her answer out of the 7 chapter of Matthew, was most fit for them. For they are no better than swine, that so condemn the precious treasure of the Gospel, for the mire of men's traditions.

ANNE ASKEW.

Thirdly[4] he asked me, wherefore I said that I had rather to read five lines in the Bible, than to hear five masses in the temple. I confessed, that I said no less. Not for the dispraise of either the Epistle or Gospel,[5] but because the one did greatly edify me, and the other nothing at all. As Saint Paul doth witness in the 9 chapter of his first Epistle to the Corinthians, whereas he doth say, "If the trumpet giveth an uncertain sound, who will prepare himself to the battle?"

Fourthly he laid unto my charge, that I should say, "If an ill-priest ministered, it was the Devil and not God."[6] My answer was, that I never spake such thing. But this was my saying, "That whatsoever he were, which ministered unto me, his ill conditions[7] could not hurt my faith. But in sprite I received nevertheless the body and blood of Christ."

Fifthly he asked me, what I said concerning confession? I answered him my meaning, which was as Saint James sayeth, that every man ought to acknowledge his faults to other, and the one to pray for the other.[8]

Sixthly he asked me, what I said to the King's book?[9] And I answered him, that I could say nothing to it, because I never saw it.

JOHN BALE.

All crafty ways possible sought this quarrelling questmonger, or else the Devil in him, to bring this poor innocent lamb to the slaughter place of Antichrist. Much after this sort sought the wicked Pharisees by certain of their own faction or hired satellites[10] with the Herodians,[11] to bring Christ in danger of Caesar, and so have him slain (Mat. 22; Mar. 12; Luke 21).

ANNE ASKEW.[12]

Seventhly he asked me, if I had the sprite of God in me? I answered if I had not, I was but a reprobate[13] or castaway.

---

1 I would not throw … for acorns were good enough Askew paraphrases Matthew 7:6: "Do not give dogs what is holy; and do not throw your pearls before swine, lest they trample them underfoot and turn to attack you."

2 questmonger one who makes a business of conducting inquests.

3 of by.

4 Thirdly After each of the paragraphs beginning "Thirdly," "Fourthly," and "Fifthly," Bale has a section of interpretative comments.

5 the Epistle or Gospel readings from, respectively, letters to early Christian congregations in, for example, Corinth, Ephesus, etc. and from the New Testament books of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John.

6 If an ill-priest … God Askew here refers to clerical abuses that were among the issues objected to by reformers.

7 ill conditions behaviour, state of his soul.

8 as Saint James sayeth … the other "The prayer of faith will save the sick man and the Lord will raise him up; and if he has committed sins he will be forgiven. Therefore confess your sins to one another, and pray for one another, that you may be healed. The prayer of a righteous man has great power in its effects" (James 5:15-16).

9 the King's book Thomas Cranmer's A Necessary Doctrine and Erudition for any Christian Man (1543), in which were listed the doctrinal principles of Henry VIII's Reformation. It followed and revised Cranmer's Institutions of Christian Religion (1537) to reestablish essential Roman Catholic doctrine as the standard for the English Church. This revision was popular with neither English clergy nor staunch reformists.

10 satellites attendants upon a person of importance, forming part of his retinue and employed to execute his orders.

11 Herodians Members of a Jewish party, mainly political, who were partisans of the Herodian dynasty and lax in their adherence to Judaism.

12 After each of the paragraphs beginning "Seventhly" and "Then he said," Bale inserts a section of interpretive commentary.

13 reprobate one who has fallen away from grace or religion, one lost in sin.

Then he said, he had sent for a priest to examine me, which was there at hand. The priest asked me, what I said to the Sacrament of the altar and required much to know therein my meaning. But I desired him again, to hold me excused concerning that matter. None other answer would I make him, because I perceived him a papist.

Eighthly he asked me, if I did not think, that private masses did help souls departed. And I said, it was great idolatry to believe more in them, than in the death which Christ died for us.[1]

JOHN BALE.

Here riseth the serpent of the cockatrice eggs,[2] workmanly to fulfill the afore alleged prophecy. If their masses had been of God's creation, ordinance or commandment, or if they had been in any point necessary for man's behove,[3] they had been registered in the Book of Life, which is the sacred Bible. But therein is neither mention of mass private nor public, several nor common, single nor double, high nor low, by foot nor on horseback, or by note as they call it.[4] If they be things added by man's invention (as they can be none other, not being there named), then I am sure that the Scriptures call them filthiness, rust, chaff, draff,[5] swill, drunkenness, fornication, menstrue, man's dirt, adders' eggs, poison, snares, the bread of wicked lies, and the cup of God's curse. Their original ground should seem to be taken of the druids or pagan priests, which inhabited this realm long afore Christ's incarnation, and had then practiced sacrifices public and private. Look Cornelius Tacitus, Caius Julius, Plinius, Strabo,[6] and such other authors. That name of privation added unto their Mass, clearly depriveth it of Christian communion, where one man eateth up all, and distributeth nothing.[7]

How such ware should help the souls departed, I cannot tell. But well I wote,[8] that the wounded man betwixt Jerusalem and Jericho had no help of them (Luke 10). The Samaritan which was reckoned but a pagan among them, was his only comfort. In the most popish time was never more horrible blasphemy, than this is. This wickedness impugneth[9] all the promises of God concerning faith and remission of sins. It repugneth[10] also to the whole doctrine of the Gospel. The application of Christ's Supper availeth them only that be alive, talking, eating, and drinking that is therein ministered. No more can the priest's receiving of that sacrament profiteth another man, than can his receiving of Baptism or of Penance, as they call it. If it profiteth not the quick, how can it profit the dead? No sacrifice is the Mass, nor yet good work, but a blasphemous profanation of the Lord's Holy Supper, a manifest wickedness, an horrible idolatry, and a foul abomination, being thus a rite of worshipping without the word,[11] yea against the express word of God.

ANNE ASKEW.[12]

Then they had me from thence unto my Lord Mayor.[13] And he examined me, as they had before, and I answered him directly in all things, as I answered the quest afore.

---

[1] private masses … Christ died for us reference to the practice of having masses said for the dead to move them from Purgatory to Heaven. Askew counters with the comment that Christ's death supersedes all other practices for absolution of sins.

[2] serpent of the cockatrice eggs serpent, identified with the basilisk, fabulously said to kill by its mere glance, and to be hatched from a cock's egg.

[3] behove use, benefit, advantage.

[4] several nor common … or by note as they call it various forms of the Mass, including individual and communal, High Mass celebrated with incense, music, and a number of clergy and Low Mass without, masses offered by priests who travelled among a number of parishes, mass with music.

[5] draff refuse, dregs.

[6] Cornelius Tacitus, Caius Julius, Plinius, Strabo Roman authors who give accounts of the early history of Britain, including pagan religious practices.

[7] That name of privation added unto their Mass … distributeth nothing i.e., private mass at which a congregation is present, but does not receive communion.

[8] wote know.

[9] impugneth attacks, disputes.

[10] repugneth is contrary, opposed.

[11] worshipping without the word i.e., worship unsanctioned by Scripture.

[12] After the paragraph beginning, "Then they," Bale inserts a section of interpretive commentary.

[13] my Lord Mayor Sir Martin Bowes, Lord Mayor of the City of London, 1545-46.

Besides this, my Lord Mayor laid one thing unto my charge, which was never spoken of me, but of them. And that was whether a mouse eating the host received God or no? This question did I never ask, but indeed they asked it of me, whereunto I made them no answer, but smiled.

JOHN BALE.

Is not here (think you) well favoured and well fashioned divinity, to establish an article of the Christian faith? Wily Winchester[1] answereth this question, as foolish as it is, in his wise detection of the Devil's sophistry, in fol. 16: "Believe," sayeth he, "that a mouse cannot devour God." Yet reporteth he after, in fol. 21, that Christ's body may as well dwell in a mouse as it did in Judas. Then followeth Friar Finke, Friar Peryn I should say,[2] a bachelor of the same school. And he answereth in the end of his third sermon, that the Sacrament eaten of a mouse is the very and real body of Christ. And when he hath affirmed it to be no derogation[3] to Christ's presence, to lie in the maw[4] of that mouse. He divideth me the one from the other, the Sacrament from Christ's body, concluding that though the Sacrament be digested in the mouse's maw, yet is not Christ's body there consumed. O blasphemous beasts, and blind blodering[5] Balaamites.[6]

Because these 2 workmen be scant witty[7] in their own occupation, I shall bring them forth here 2 old artificers of theirs to help them: Guimundus Aversanus,[8] a bishop, to help Bishop Stephen, and Thomas Walden,[9] a friar, to help Friar Peryn. The Sacraments (say they both) are not eaten of mice, though they seem so to be in the exterior similitudes.[10] For the virtues (sayeth Guimundus) of holy men are not eaten of beasts, when they are eaten of them (51. 2. De corpore & sanguine domini). No marry (quoth[11] Walden) no more is the painter's occupation destroyed, when a picture is destroyed. Mark this gear[12] for your learning. But now cometh Algerus,[13] more crafty than they both, and he sayeth (51. 2 cap. 1. De Eucharistia) that as well is this meat spiritual as material, because David calleth it the bread of angels, and a bread from Heaven (Psa. 77). That which is material in this bread (sayeth he) is consumed by digestion, but that which is spiritual remaineth uncorrupted.

If we would attend well unto Christ's divinity, and let these oiled[14] divines dispute among old gossips, we should soon discharge[15] mice and rats, weak stomachs and parbreaking[16] drunkards, of a far other sort than thus: "He that eateth my flesh," sayeth Christ (Jo. 6), "and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me and I in him." This eating is all one with the dwelling, and is neither for mice nor rats, burnt chancels[17] nor drunken priests. For as we eat we dwell, and as we dwell we eat, by a grounded and perfect faith in him. The substance

---

1 Wily Winchester Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester.

2 Friar Finke, Friar Peryn I should say William Peryn (d. 1558), a Dominican friar who left England in self-imposed exile in 1534, rather than acknowledge Henry VIII's supremacy over the Church, and author of the 1545 Three Godly … Sermons of the Sacrament of the Altar (DNB online).

3 derogation lessening, weakening.

4 maw mouth.

5 blodering blundering.

6 Balaamites In Numbers 22-24, Balaam's ass sees God's angel before Balaam does.

7 witty expert, intelligent.

8 Guimundus Aversanus Guitmundus, archbishop of Aversa (d. 1084), whose tract, De corpore & sanguine domini (On the body and blood of the Lord), opposed the doctrine of consubstantiation proposed by Berengarius (1000-88). Berengarius argued that the substance of Christ's body exists together with the substance of bread, and similarly the substance of his blood together with the substance of wine. The doctrine of transubstantiation stated that Christ is present in the Eucharist by the change of the entire substance of bread and wine into his body and blood (Catholic Encycl.).

9 Thomas Walden Thomas Netter of Walden (c. 1380-1430), Carmelite confessor to Henry V who took part in the prosecution of Wycliffites and Lollards, earlier sects that held beliefs broadly similar to the later Henrician reformers (Catholic Encycl.).

10 exterior similitudes external appearances or similarities.

11 quoth said.

12 gear doctrine, rubbish.

13 Algerus Alger of Liège (1055-1132), a French priest whose writing on the Eucharist supported transubstantiation (Catholic Encycl.).

14 oiled anointed, also slippery.

15 discharge exculpate, acquit.

16 parbreaking vomiting.

17 chancels parts of churches in which the altars stand, also used to refer to churches and temples.

of that most godly refection[1] lyeth not in the mouth eating nor yet in the belly feeding, though they be necessary, but in the only spiritual or soul eating. No wise man will think that Christ will dwell in a mouse, nor yet that a mouse can dwell in Christ, though it be the doctrine of these doughty[2] douzepers,[3] for they shall find no Scriptures for it. If these men were not enemies to faith and friends to idolatry, they would never teach such filthy learning. More of this shall I write (God willing) in the answer of their books.

ANNE ASKEW.

Then the Bishop's Chancellor[4] rebuked me, and said that I was much to blame for uttering the Scriptures. For St. Paul (he said) forbode women to speak or to talk of the word of God.[5] I answered him, that I knew Paul's meaning so well as he, which is 1 Corinthiorum 14 that a woman ought not to speak in the congregation by the way of teaching. And then I asked him, how many women he had seen go into the pulpit and preach. He said, he never saw none. Then I said, he ought to find no fault in poor women, except they had offended the law.

JOHN BALE.

Plenteous enough is her answer here, unto this quarrelling and (as appeareth) unlearned chancellor. Many godly women both in the old law and the new, were learned in the Scriptures, and made utterance of them to the glory of God. As we read of Elisabeth, Mary, and Anna the widow (Luke 1 and 2),[6] yet were they not rebuked for it. Yea, Mary, Christ's mother, retained all that was afterward written of him (Luke 2), yet was it not imputed unto her an offence. Christ blamed not the woman that cried whilst he was in preaching, "Happy is the womb that bare thee" (Luke 11). The woman which gave knowledge to his disciples, that he was risen from death to life, discomfited[7] not he, but solaced[8] them with his most glorious appearance (Mat. 28.; Jo. 20). In the primitive Church, specially in Saint Jerome's time, was it a great praise unto women to be learned in the Scriptures. Great commendations giveth our English chronicles to Helena, Ursula, and Hilda,[9] women of our nation, for being learned also in the Scriptures. Such a woman was the said Hilda, as openly disputed in them against the superstitions of certain bishops. But this chancellor by like[10] chanced upon that blind popish work, which Walter Hunt, a White Friar[11] wrote 4 score years ago—Contra doctrices mulieres (Against school women)—or else some otherlike blind Romish beggaries.[12]

ANNE ASKEW.

Then my Lord Mayor commanded me to ward.[13] I asked him if sureties[14] would not serve me, and he made me short answer, that he would take none. Then was I had to the Counter,[15] and there remained 12 days, no friend admitted to speak with me.

---

1 refection recreation, refreshment.

2 doughty worthy, virtuous.

3 douzepers illustrious nobles, knights, or grandees.

4 Bishop's Chancellor Dr. John Standish (?1509-70), author of several anti-Protestant pamphlets (DNB online).

5 St. Paul … word of God 1 Corinthians 14:33-35 (see headnote, p. 139).

6 Elisabeth, Mary, and Anna … 2 Elisabeth, the mother of John the Baptist, was visited by Mary and, filled with the Holy Spirit, prophesied and addressed Mary as the mother of her Lord (Luke 1). Anna was the aged prophetess who was present at the dedication of the infant Christ (Luke 2:26-30).

7 discomfited threw into perplexity, confusion, or dejection.

8 solaced comforted, consoled.

9 Helen, Ursula, and Hilda St. Helen (c. 250-330) was mother of Emperor Constantine the Great and confused by medieval chroniclers with the daughter of a British prince; St. Ursula was said to have been a British princess who, accompanied by 11,000 virgins, went on a pilgrimage to Rome, and on her return was massacred with her companions at Cologne by the Huns; St. Hilda (614-80) was daughter of the King of Northumbria and abbess of Whitby (Catholic Encycl.).

10 by like belike, perhaps.

11 Walter Hunt, a White Friar Carmelite friar and theologian (d. 1478).

12 beggaries rubbish.

13 ward custody, imprisonment.

14 sureties bonds.

15 the Counter prison attached to the London city court.

JOHN BALE.

Here is Christ yet trodden on the heel, by that wicked serpent which tempted Eve (Gene. 3). His faithful member for believing in him is here thrown in prison. And no marvel, for it was his own promise, ye shall be brought before rulers and deputies (sayeth he) for my truth's sake (Mat. 10). Ye shall be betrayed of your own nation and kindred, and so thrown in prison (Luke 21). If they have persecuted me, think not but they will also persecute you (Jo. 15). This serpent is again become the prince of this world, and holdeth the governors thereof captive (Jo. 14). Sureties would have been taken for a thief or a murderer, but not for Christ's member, the Bishop's Chancellor being at hand, nor yet her friends permitted to comfort her.

ANNE ASKEW.[1]

But in the meantime there was a priest sent to me, which said that he was commanded of the Bishop to examine me, and to give me good counsel, which he did not. But first he asked me for what cause I was put in the Counter? And I told him, I could not tell. Then he said, it was great pity that I should be there without cause, and concluded that he was very sorry for me.

Secondly he said, it was told him, that I should deny the Sacrament of the altar. And I answered him again, that that I had said, I had said.

JOHN BALE.

In this brief answer, she remembered Solomon's counsel: "Answer not a fool, all after his foolishness."[2] Beware of them (sayeth Christ) which come in sheep's clothing, for inwardly they are most ravening wolves (Mat. 7). God destroyeth the crafts[3] of the wicked (sayeth Job) so that they are not able to perform that they take in hand (Job 5).

ANNE ASKEW.

Thirdly he asked me, if I were shriven,[4] I told him no. Then he said, he would bring one to me, for to shrive me. And I told him, so that I might have one of these 3—that is to say, Doctor Crome, Sir Gyllam, or Huntington[5]—I was contented, because I knew them to be men of wisdom. "As for you or any other, I will not dispraise, because I know ye not." Then he said, "I would not have you think, but that I or another that shall be brought you, shall be as honest as they. For if we were not, ye may be sure, the King would not suffer us to preach." Then I answered by the saying of Solomon: "By commoning[6] with the wise, I may learn wisdom, but by talking with a fool, I shall take scathe"[7] (Prover. 1).

JOHN BALE.

See how this adversary compasseth[8] like a ravening lion to devour this lamb (1. Pet. 5). Now tempteth he her with Confession, which hath been such a bait of theirs as hath brought into their nets and snares the mightiest princes of the world, both kings and emperors. See here if they leave any subtlety unsought to obtain their prey. He reckoned by this to win his purpose, which way soever she had taken. If she had been confessed to him, he had known which way she had been bent. If she had utterly refused Confession, he had more matter to accuse her of. O subtle seed of the serpent, this part played your old generation, the Pharisees and priests, with Christ, to bring him in danger of the law (Mat. 22. and Jo. 8). No Chris-

---

[1] After the paragraph beginning, "But in the meantime," Bale inserts a section of interpretive commentary.

[2] Answer … foolishness "Answer not a fool in his folly, lest you be like him yourself" (Proverbs 26:4).

[3] crafts devices, artifices.

[4] shriven received absolution and penance after confession to a priest.

[5] Doctor Crome, Sir Gyllam, or Huntington Dr. Edward Crome (d. 1562) was a Cambridge divine who was connected with reformists like Hugh Latimer and Robert Barnes, brought before Stephen Gardiner in 1546, forced to preach a recantation of his sermon against the Mass, and imprisoned by Mary in 1554-55 (DNB online); Sir Gyllam is unidentified; John Huntington, author of the doggerel poem, Genealogy of Heretics (1540), which was reprinted by Bale, was a former priest, fervent reformer, and later canon of Exeter (DNB online).

[6] commoning conversing.

[7] scathe harm.

[8] compasseth contrives, devises.

tian erudition[1] bringeth this priest, nor yet good counsels of the Scripture. But as Esaye[2] sayeth, "The hypocrite imagineth abomination against God, to famish the hungry, and withhold drink from the thirsty. Yet shall not the eyes of the seeing be dim, nor the ears of the hearing be deaf" (Esa. 32). If the King admit such preachers (as I cannot think it) a sore plague remaineth both to him and to his people.

ANNE ASKEW.[3]

Fourthly he asked me if the host should fall, and a beast did eat it, whether the beast did receive God or no? I answered, "Seeing ye have taken the pains to ask this question, I desire you also to take so much pain more, as to assoil it yourself. For I will not do it, because I perceive ye come to tempt me." And he said, it was against the order of schools, that he which asked the question should answer it. I told him, I was but a woman, and knew not the course of schools.[4]

Fifthly he asked me, if I intended to receive the Sacrament at Easter, or no?[5] I answered, that else I were no Christian woman, and that I did rejoice, that the time was so near at hand. And then he departed thence, with many fair words.

JOHN BALE.

This hungry wolf practiseth,[6] by all crafty ways possible, to suck the blood of this innocent lamb. Is not that (think you) an holy congregation, which is thus spiritually occupied? Some godly wise men will wonder that they be not ashamed. But marvel not of it. For the Holy Ghost sayeth, in his fore judgements, that the same holy mother which hath hatched them up in oils and shavings, is an unshamefast[7] whore (Apo. 17 and Dan. 8). Then of very nature must her whelps be shameless children. Such shameless dogs are they (sayeth Esaye) as be never satisfied (Es. 56).[8] When they kill you (sayeth Christ) they shall think they do God good service (Jo. 16)[9] so greatly have their malice blinded them (Sapien 2),[10] which is partly the drunkenness afore spoken of.

ANNE ASKEW.

And the 23 day of March, my cousin Brittain[11] came into the Counter to me, and asked there whether I might be put to bail or no? Then went he immediately unto my Lord Mayor, desiring of him to be so good lord unto me that I might be bailed. My lord answered him, and said that he would be glad to do the best that in him lay. Howbeit,[12] he could not bail me without the consent of a spiritual officer. So requiring him to go and speak with the Chancellor of London. For he said, like as he could not commit me to prison without the consent of a spiritual officer, no more could he bail me without consent of the same.

JOHN BALE.

True it is here, that is written of St. John in the Apocalypse[13] that Antichrist is worshipped of the potentates and kings of the earth (Apo. 13). The Mayor of London, which is the King's lieutenant, and representeth there his own person,[14] standeth here like a dead idol, or like such a servant slave as can do nothing within his own city concerning their matters. Who is like the Beast (sayeth Saint 1 erudition knowledge, learning.

---

2 Esaye Isaiah.

3 After the paragraph beginning "Fourthly," Bale inserts a section of interpretive commentary.

4 the course of schools rules of debate in Roman Catholic scholarship.

5 if I intended to receive the Sacrament at Easter, or no Easter is a day of obligation, when Roman Catholics receive Communion.

6 practiseth schemes, plans.

7 unshamefast immodest.

8 (Es. 56) Isaiah 56:11.

9 John 16:2: "They will put you out of the synagogues; indeed, the hour is coming when whoever kills you will think he is offering service to God."

10 Sapien. 2: "Thus they reasoned, but they were led astray, for their wickedness blinded them" (Wisdom of Solomon 2:21).

11 my cousin Brittain Christopher Brittain.

12 Howbeit however, nevertheless.

13 Apocalypse i.e., the Book of Revelation.

14 his own person i.e., represents the King's person.

John) who is able to war with him?[1] He hath brought all lands and their kingdoms in fear (sayeth Esaye); the strength of their cities hath he taken away, and restrained the deliverance of their prisoners (Esa. 14). The parents of him that was born blind, feared this spiritual tyranny or captivity of theirs, such time as they were examined of the bishops for the sight of their son (John[2] 9). Such as believed in Christ among the chief rulers of the Jews, would not be acknown[3] thereof, for fear of like violence (John 12). No new thing is it then in that spiritual generation, but a custom of old antiquity. Both Christ and his apostles have suffered like tyranny under them. But never did they yet minister it to any creature after their example.

ANNE ASKEW.

So upon that[4] he went to the Chancellor, requiring of him as he did afore of my Lord Mayor. He answered him, that the matter was so heinous that he durst not of himself do it, without my Lord of London were made privy thereunto.[5] But he said, he would speak unto my lord in it. And bade him repair[6] unto him the next morrow and he should well know my lord's pleasure.

And upon the morrow after, he came thither, and spake both with the Chancellor, and with my Lord Bishop of London.[7] My lord declared unto him, that he was very well contented that I should come forth to a communication.[8] And appointed me to appear afore him the next day after, at 3 of the clock, at afternoon. Moreover he said unto him, that he would[9] there should be at that examination such learned men as I was affectioned to.[10] That they might see, and also make report, that I was handled with no rigour.[11] He answered him, that he knew no man that I had more affection to than other. Then said the Bishop, "Yes, as I understand, she is affectioned to Doctor Crome, Sir Gyllam, Whitehead, and Huntington, that they might hear the matter." For she did know them to be learned, and of a godly judgement.

Also he required my cousin Brittain, that he should earnestly persuade me to utter, even the very bottom of my heart. And he swore, by his fidelity,[12] that no man should take any advantage of my words. Neither yet would he lay ought to my charge, for anything that I should there speak. But if I said any manner of thing amiss, he with other more would be glad to reform me therein, with most godly counsel.

JOHN BALE.

O vengeable tyrant and devil. How subtly seekest thou the blood of this innocent woman, under a colour[13] of friendly handling. God once commanded thee earnestly in no case to compass thy neighbour with deceit, to the effusion of his blood (Lev. 19). But his commandment thou reckonest but a Canterbury tale.[14] By swearing by thy fidelity, thou art not all unlike unto Herod, whom Christ for like practices, first to put John and then him to death, called also a most crafty, cruel fox (Luke 13). Thou labourest here to have this woman in snare, with certain of her friends. But God put in her mind at this time to reckon thee a dog and a swine (Matth. 7) and thereupon to have few words.

---

[1] Who ... him? "Men worshipped the dragon, for he had given his authority to the beast, and they worshipped the beast, saying, 'Who is like the beast, and who can fight against it?'" (Revelation 13:4).

[2] John John 9:18-22, and below, John 12:42.

[3] acknown acknowledged.

[4] So upon that After each of the paragraphs beginning "So upon that" and "And upon the morrow," Bale has a section of interpretive comment.

[5] without my Lord of London were made privy thereunto without the awareness of the Bishop of London.

[6] repair return, go back.

[7] Lord Bishop of London Edmund Bonner (c. 1500-69), bishop of London 1540-49 and 1553-59, actively persecuted reformers (DNB online).

[8] communication conference.

[9] would wished.

[10] affectioned to inclined toward, fond of.

[11] rigour severity, harshness.

[12] fidelity faithfulness, loyalty.

[13] colour appearance.

[14] a Canterbury tale story told on a pilgrimage to the tomb of St. Thomas à Becket at Canterbury Cathedral by a character from Chaucer's Canterbury Tales (1400).

Anne Askew.[1]

On the morrow after, my Lord of London sent for me, at one of the clock, his hour being appointed at three. And as I came before him, he said he was very sorry of my trouble, and desired to know my opinion in such matters as were laid against me. He required me also in any wise[2] boldly to utter the secrets of my heart, bidding me not to fear in any point. For whatsoever I did say within his house, no man should hurt me for it. I answered, "For so much as your lordship appointed three of the clock, and my friends shall not come till that hour, I desire you to pardon me of giving answer till they come."

Then said he that he thought it meet to send for those four men which were afore named, and appointed. Then I desired him not to put them to the pain. For it should not need, because the two gentlemen which were my friends were able enough to testify that[3] I should say. Anon[4] after, he went into his gallery[5] with Master Spelman, and willed him in any wise, that he should exhort me to utter all that I thought.

In the meanwhile, he commanded his archdeacon to commen[6] with me, who said unto me, "Mistress wherefore are ye accused?" I answered, "Axe[7] my accusers, for I know not as yet." Then took he my book out of my hand, and said, "Such books as this is, hath brought you to the trouble ye are in." "Beware," sayeth he, "beware, for he that made it was burnt in Smithfield." Then I asked him, if he were sure that it was true that he had spoken. And he said, he knew well the book was of John Frith's[8] making. Then I asked him, if he were not ashamed for to judge of the book before he saw it within, or yet knew the truth thereof. I said also, that such unadvised and hasty judgement is a token apparent of a very slender wit. Then I opened the book and showed it him. He said, he thought it had been another, for he could find no fault therein. Then I desired him no more to be so swift in judgement, till he throughly[9] knew the truth. And so he departed.

Immediately after came my cousin Brittain in with diverse[10] other, as Master Hawe of Gray's Inn, and such other like. Then my Lord of London persuaded my cousin Brittain as he had done oft before, which was, that I should utter the bottom of my heart in any wise.

My lord said after that unto me, that he would I should credit the counsel of my friends in his behalf, which was, that I should utter all things that burdened my conscience. For he ensured[11] me, that I should not need to stand in doubt to say anything. For like as he promised them (he said) he promised me, and would perform it. Which was that neither he, nor any man for him, should take me at advantage of any word I should speak. And therefore he bade me say my mind without fear. I answered him I had nought to say. For my conscience (I thanked God) was burdened with nothing.

Then brought he forth this unsavoury similitude: that if a man had a wound, no wise surgeon would minister help unto it before he had seen it uncovered. "In like case," sayeth he, "can I give you no good counsel, unless I know wherewith your conscience is burdened." I answered, that my conscience was clear in all things. And for to lay a plaster unto the whole skin, it might appear much folly.

"Then ye drive me," sayeth he, "to lay to your charge your own report, which is this: ye did say, 'he that doth receive the Sacrament by the hands of an ill priest or a sinner, he receiveth the Devil, and not God.'" To that I answered, that I never spake such words. But as I said afore both to the

---

[1] Each of the following paragraphs is followed by commentary by Bale, similar to those included above.

[2] in any wise in any way or manner.

[3] that what.

[4] Anon soon.

[5] gallery corridor.

[6] commen come.

[7] Axe ask.

[8] John Frith theologian (1503-33) martyred for his adherence to reformist doctrine and distribution of illegal Protestant books (DNB online).

[9] throughly thoroughly.

[10] diverse various, sundry.

[11] ensured assured.

quest and to my Lord Mayor, so say I now again, that the wickedness of the priest should not hurt me, but in sprite and in faith I received no less, the body and blood of Christ. Then said the Bishop unto me, "What a saying is this? 'In sprite.' I will not take you at that advantage." Then I answered, "My lord, without faith and sprite, I cannot receive him worthily."

Then he laid unto me, that I should say that the Sacrament remaining in the pyx was but bread. I answered that I never said so, but indeed the quest asked me such a question, whereunto I would not answer (I said) till such time as they had assoiled me this question of mine: wherefore Stephen was stoned to death. They said, they knew not. Then said I again, no more would I tell them what it was.

Then laid it my lord unto me, that I had alleged[1] a certain text of the Scripture. I answered that I alleged none other but St. Paul's own saying to the Athenians, in the 17 chapter of the Apostles' Acts: that God dwelleth not in temples made with hands. Then asked he me, what my faith and belief was in the matter? I answered him, "I believe as the Scripture doth teach me." Then inquired he of me, "What if the Scripture doth say, that it is the body of Christ?" "I believe," said I, "like as the Scripture doth teach me." Then asked he again, "What if the Scripture doth say, that it is not the body of Christ?" My answer was still, "I believe as the Scripture informeth me." And upon this argument he tarried[2] a great while, to have driven me to make him an answer to his mind.[3] Howbeit, I would not, but concluded thus with him, that I believed therein and in all other things, as Christ and his holy apostles did leave[4] them.

Then he asked me, why I had so few words? And I answered, "God hath given me the gift of knowledge, but not of utterance. And Solomon sayeth, that a woman of few words, is a gift of God (Proverb. 19)."

Thirdly my lord laid unto my charge, that I should say that the Mass was idolatry.[5] I answered him, "No, I said not so." "Howbeit," I said, "the quest did ask me, whether private masses did relieve souls departed, or no? Unto whom then I answered: 'O Lord, what idolatry is this? that we should rather believe in private masses, than in the healthsome death of the dear son of God.'" Then said my lord again, "What an answer was that?" "Though it were but mean," said I, "yet was it a good enough answer for the question."

Then I told my lord that there was a priest, which did hear what I said before my lord the Mayor and them. With that the Chancellor answered, which was the same priest. "So she spake it in very deed," sayeth he, "before my Lord Mayor and me." Then were there certain priests, as Doctor Standish and other, which tempted me much to know my mind. And I answered them always thus: "That I have said to my Lord of London, I have said."

And then Doctor Standish desired my lord, to bid me say my mind concerning that same text of St. Paul. I answered that it was against Saint Paul's learning that I, being a woman, should interpret the Scriptures, specially where so many wise learned men were.

JOHN BALE.

It is not yet half a score of years ago, since this blasphemous idiot Standish compared, in a lewd sermon of his, the dear price of our redemption, or precious blood of Christ, to the blood of filthy swine, like himself a swine. And for his good doing, he is now become a daw,[6] a doctor I should say, of the Pope's divinity, and a scholastical interpreter[7] of the Scripture to his behove.[8] Here

---

1 alleged cited, quoted.

2 tarried delayed, lingered.

3 an answer to his mind a response to his liking, in agreement with him.

4 leave transmit.

5 idolatry worship of idols or images.

6 daw fool.

7 scholastical interpreter reading according to the doctrines of the Schoolmen, which was the predominant theological and philosophical teaching of the period 1000-1500 CE, based upon the authority of the Christian Fathers and of Aristotle and his commentators, by this time denoting the pedantic, unduly formal or subtle.

8 behove benefit, advantage.

would the swinish gentleman have proved both that St. Stephen died an heretic, and St. Paul a schismatic[1] for teaching that God dwelleth not in temples made with hands (Act. 7 and 17), if he might have reasoned out the matter with this woman. But she took a swine for a swine, and would lay no pearls afore him, as Christ had charged her afore (Matth. 7). For all their interrogations are now about the temple and the temple wares (Matth. 26).

ANNE ASKEW.

Then my Lord of London said that he was informed, that one should ask me if I would receive the Sacrament at Easter, and I made a mock of it. Then I desired that mine accuser might come forth, which my lord would not. But he said again unto me, "I sent one to give you good counsel, and at the first word ye called him 'papist.'" That I denied not, for I perceived he was no less. Yet made I none answer unto it.

Then he rebuked me, and said that I should report, that there were bent against me three score priests at Lincoln. "Indeed," quoth I, "I said so. For my friends told me, if I did come to Lincoln, the priests would assault me and put me to great trouble, as thereof they had made their boast. And when I heard it, I went thither indeed, not being afraid, because I knew my matter to be good. Moreover I remained there six days, to see what would be said unto me. And as I was in the minster,[2] reading upon the Bible, they resorted unto me by two and by two, by five and by six, minding to have spoken to me, yet they went their ways again without words speaking."

Then my lord asked, if there were not one that did speak unto me. I told him, yes, that there was one of them at the last, which did speak to me indeed. And my lord then asked me, what he said? And I told him, his words were of so small effect, that I did not now remember them.

Then said my lord, "There are many that read and know the Scripture, and yet do not follow it, nor live thereafter." I said again, "My lord, I would wish that all men knew my conversation and living in all points, for I am so sure of myself this hour, that there are none able to prove any dishonesty by me. If you know any that can do it, I pray you bring them forth."

Then my lord went away, and said, he would entitle[3] somewhat of my meaning. And so he writ a great circumstance.[4] But what it was, I have not all in memory. For he would not suffer me to have the copy thereof. Only I do remember this small portion of it:

"Be it known (sayeth he) to all men, that I, Anne Askew, do confess this to be my faith and belief, notwithstanding my reports made afore to the contrary: I believe that they which are houseled[5] at the hands of a priest, whether his conversation[6] be good or not, do receive the body and blood of Christ in substance really. Also I do believe it after the consecration, whether it be received or reserved,[7] to be no less than the very body and blood of Christ in substance. Finally, I do believe in this and in all other sacraments of holy Church, in all points according to the old Catholic faith of the same. In witness whereof, I, the said Anne, have subscribed my name." There was somewhat more in it, which because I had not the copy, I cannot now remember.

Then he read it to me, and asked me, if I did agree to it. And I said again, "I believe so much thereof, as the holy Scripture doth agree to. Wherefore I desire you, that ye will add that thereunto." Then he answered, that I should not teach him what he should write. With that, he went forth into his great chamber, and read the same bill afore the audience, which inveigled[8] and willed me

[1] schismatic one who promotes or countenances schism or breach of external unity in the Church.

[2] minster Lincoln Cathedral.

[3] entitle write down under proper titles or headings.

[4] circumstance detailed narration.

[5] houseled given Communion.

[6] conversation manner of conducting oneself in the world.

[7] received or reserved consecrated bread and/or wine distributed or kept aside and stored for later use.

[8] inveigled cajoled, urged.

to set to my hand, saying also that I had favour showed me.

Then said the Bishop, I might thank other and not myself, of the favour I found at his hand. For he considered (he said) that I had good friends, and also that I was come of a worshipful stock.[1] Then answered one Christopher, a servant to Master Denny,[2] "Rather ought ye, my lord, to have done it in such case, for God's sake than for man's."

Then my lord sat down, and took me the writing to set thereto my hand, and I writ after this manner: "I, Anne Askew, do believe all manner of things contained in the faith of the Catholic church." Then because I did add unto it, "the Catholic church," he flung into his chamber in a great fury.[3] With that, my cousin Brittain followed him, desiring him for God's sake to be good lord unto me. He answered, that I was a woman, and that he was nothing deceived in me. Then my cousin Brittain desired him to take me as a woman, and not to set my weak woman's wit to his lordship's great wisdom.

Then went in unto him Doctor Weston,[4] and said, that the cause why I did write there "the Catholic church" was that I understood not the church written afore. So with much ado, they persuaded my lord to come out again, and to take my name with the names of my sureties, which were my cousin Brittain and Master Spelman of Gray's Inn.

This being done, we thought that I should have been put to bail immediately, according to the order of the law. Howbeit, he would not so suffer it, but committed me from thence to prison again until the next morrow. And then he willed me to appear in the Guildhall,[5] and so I did. Notwithstanding, they would not put me to bail there neither, but read the Bishop's writing unto me as before, and so commanded me again to prison.

Then were my sureties appointed to come before them on the next morrow in Paul's Church,[6] which did so indeed. Notwithstanding, they would once again have broken off with them, because they would not be bound also for another woman at their pleasure, whom they knew not, nor yet what matter was laid unto her charge. Notwithstanding, at the last, after much ado and reasoning to and fro, they took a bond of them of recognizance[7] for my forth coming. And thus I was at the last delivered.[8] from THE LATTER EXAMINATION of the Worthy Servant of God, Mistress Anne Askew, the Younger Daughter of Sir William Askew, Knight of Lincolnshire, Lately Martyred in Smithfield by the Wicked Synagogue of Antichrist.

Written by me Anne Askew.

—1546

The Censure or Judgement of John Bale thereupon, after the Sacred Scriptures and Chronicles.

Christ willed his most dear apostle and secretary Saint John the Evangelist, to signify by writing to the overseer or preacher of the congregation of Pergamos,[9] that there only are his faithful

[1] worshipful stock good and/or noble family.

[2] Master Denny Sir Anthony Denny (1501-49) was a favourite of Henry VIII and privy councillor, as well as a zealous promoter of the Reformation (DNB).

[3] Then ... "Catholic church"... in a great fury the use of the term "catholic" to denote either the Church of Rome or the church universal was much contested between conservatives and reformists. Askew's use of the term without the modifiers "holy" or "old," to denote the universal church, rather than the Church of England, indicates her dissent and incites the Mayor's wrath.

[4] Doctor Weston Hugh Weston (?1505-58) held traditional Catholic views and later became dean of Westminster and of Windsor under Mary (DNB online).

[5] Guildhall Guildhall, the centre of administration for the city of London.

[6] Paul's Church St. Paul's Cathedral, London, seat of the Bishop of London.

[7] recognizance bond by which a person engages him/herself to perform some act or observe some condition (e.g., to appear for trial when called on).

[8] delivered released.

[9] Saint John ... Pergamos The Book of Revelation was addressed by St. John the Evangelist to the seven churches in Asia Minor, of which Pergamos was one.

members murdered, where Satan inhabiteth or holdeth residence. And for example he bringeth forth his constant witness, Antipas, which was there most cruelly slain of that Synagogue of his, for confessing the verity (Apo.[1] 2) that Behemoth (sayeth Job) that Leviathan,[2] that Satan, reigneth as a most mighty king over all the spiritual children of pride (Job 42). A murderer (sayeth Christ to the spirituality of the Jews) and a blasphemous liar is that father of yours, and hath been from the world's beginning (John 8). These manners hath he not yet left, but continueth them still in his wicked posterity.[3]

In the primitive Church (as testifyeth Bedas[4]) they persecuted the hairs of Christ's head, which were so pure as the white wool that is apt to receive all colours (Apo. 1). They slew those true believers which his word and sprite had depured[5] from all false worshippings and made fit for all tribulations to be suffered for his name's sake. In these latter days they meddle with his feet which are like unto brass, burning as it were in a whote[6] furnace (Apo. 1). For they that believe now agreeably to his word, and not after their corrupted and cursed customs, are consumed in the fire. As hereafter will appear by this godly woman, Anne Askew, which with other more was brent[7] at London in the year of our Lord 1546, for the faithful testimony of Jesu against Antichrist. Whose latter handling here followeth in course, like as I received it in copy, by certain Dutch merchants coming from thence, which had been at their burning and beholden the tyrannous violence there showed. First out of the prison she wrote unto a secret friend of hers, after this manner following.

ANNE ASKEW.

I do perceive (dear friend in the Lord) that thou art not yet persuaded throughly in the truth concerning the Lord's Supper, because Christ said unto his apostles, "Take, eat. This is my body which is given for you." In giving forth the bread as an outward sign or token to be received at the mouth, he minded[8] them in a perfect belief to receive that body of his which should die for the people, or to think the death thereof the only health and salvation of their souls. The bread and the wine were left us for a sacramental communion, or a mutual participation of the inestimable benefits of his most precious death and blood shedding. And that we should, in the end thereof, be thankful together for that most necessary grace of our redemption. For in the closing up thereof, he said thus, "This do ye, in remembrance of me. Yea, so oft as ye shall eat it or drink it" (Luke 22 and 1 Corinth. 11). Else should we have been forgetful of that we ought to have in daily remembrance, and also been altogether unthankful for it.

Therefore it is meet, that in prayers we call unto God, to graft in our foreheads, the true meaning of the Holy Ghost concerning this communion. For St. Paul doth say that the letter slayeth. The sprite is it only that giveth life (2 Cor. 3). Mark well the 6 chapter of John, where all is applied unto faith. Note also the fourth chapter of St. Paul's first Epistle to the Corinthians, and in the end thereof ye shall find plainly, that the things which are seen are temporal, but they that are not seen are everlasting. Yea, look in the third chapter to the Hebrews, and ye shall find that Christ as a son and no servant ruleth over his house (whose house are we, and not the dead temple) if we hold fast the confidence and rejoicing of that hope to the end. Wherefore as sayeth the Holy Ghost: "Today if you shall hear his voice, harden not your hearts, &c" (Psalm. 94).

---

1 Apo. the Book of Revelation.

2 Behemoth ... Leviathan Biblical monsters, the first mentioned in the Book of Job, possibly a hippopotamus, and the latter referred to in Isaiah.

3 posterity succeeding generations.

4 Bedas St. Bede (c. 672-735) was a priest from Jarrow monastery in Northumberland whose influential Ecclesiastical History of the English People was completed in 731 (DNB online).

5 depured cleansed, purified.

6 whote hot.

7 brent burnt.

8 minded admonished, exhorted.

The Sum of My Examination afore the King's Council at Greenwich.[1]

Your request as concerning my prison fellows, I am not able to satisfy, because I heard not their examinations. But the effect of mine was this: I, being before the Council, was asked of Master Kyme. I answered, that my Lord Chancellor[2] knew already my mind in that matter. They with that answer were not contented, but said, it was the King's pleasure that I should open the matter to them. I answered them plainly, that I would not so do. But if it were the King's pleasure to hear me, I would show him the truth. Then they said, it was not meet for the King with me to be troubled. I answered, that Solomon was reckoned the wisest king that ever lived, yet misliked not he to hear two poor common women,[3] much more his Grace a simple woman and his faithful subject. So in conclusion, I made them none other answer in that matter.

Then my Lord Chancellor asked me of my opinion in[4] the Sacrament. My answer was this: "I believe, that so oft as I in a Christian congregation, do receive the bread in remembrance of Christ's death, and with thanksgiving according to his holy instruction, I receive therewith the fruits also of his most glorious passion." The Bishop of Winchester[5] bade me make a direct answer. I said, I would not sing a new song to the Lord in a strange land.[6]

Then the Bishop said, I spoke in parables. I answered, it was best for him. "For if I show the open truth," quoth I, "ye will not accept it." Then he said I was a parrot. I told him again, I was ready to suffer all things at his hands. Not only his rebukes, but all that should follow besides, yea, and that gladly. Then had I diverse rebukes of the Council, because I would not express my mind in all things as they would have me. But they were not in the meantime unanswered for all that, which now to rehearse[7] were too much, for I was with them there above five hours. Then the clerk of the Council conveyed me from thence to my Lady Garnish.[8]

The next day I was brought again before the Council. Then would they needs know of me, what I said to[9] the Sacrament. I answered that I already had said that I could say. Then after diverse words, they bade me go by.[10] Then came my Lord Lisle, my Lord of Essex,[11] and the Bishop of Winchester requiring me earnestly, that I should confess the Sacrament to be flesh, blood, and bone. Then said I to my Lord Parr and my Lord Lisle, that it was great shame for them to counsel contrary to their knowledge. Whereunto in few words they did say, that they would gladly all things were well.

Then the Bishop said, he would speak with me familiarly. I said, so did Judas when he unfriendly betrayed Christ. Then desired the Bishop to speak with me alone. But that I refused. He asked me, why? I said, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every matter should stand,[12] after Christ's and Paul's doctrine (Math. 18 and 2 Cor. 13).

Then my Lord Chancellor began to examine me again of the Sacrament. Then I asked him, how long he would halt[13] on both sides? Then

---

[1] John Bale's interjections have been omitted from this examination in order to give a sense of Askew's voice when not in dialogue with Bale's.

[2] Lord Chancellor Thomas Wriothesley (1505-50) was active in the persecution of both Protestants and Catholics during his term of office.

[3] Solomon … common women Solomon was called to judge two women's claims to the same baby (1 Kings 3:16-28).

[4] in about, on.

[5] Bishop of Winchester Stephen Gardiner (1483-1555), religious conservative who supported the Church of Rome.

[6] sing a new song to the Lord in a strange land Psalm 137:4.

[7] rehearse repeat, recount.

[8] my Lady Garnish i.e., prison. "Garnish" was money extorted from a new prisoner, either as a jailer's fee, or as drink-money for the other prisoners.

[9] to about.

[10] go by pass.

[11] my Lord Lisle, my Lord of Essex John Dudley (?1502-53) was a privy councillor and William Parr (1513-71) was brother of Katherine Parr and a privy councillor.

[12] in the mouth … should stand "Any charge must be sustained by the evidence of two or three witnesses" (2 Corinthians 13:1).

[13] halt waver, vacillate.

would he needs know where I found that? I said in the scripture 3. Reg. 18.[1] Then he went his way.

Then the Bishop said, I should be brent. I answered, that I had searched all the Scriptures yet could I never find there that either Christ or his apostles put any creature to death. "Well, well," said I, "God will laugh your threatenings to scorn" (Psal. 2). Then was I commanded to stand aside.

Then came Master Paget[2] to me with many glorious words and desired me to speak my mind to him. I might (he said) deny it again, if need were. I said, that I would not deny the truth. He asked me, how I could avoid the very words of Christ: "Take, eat. This is my body, which shall be broken for you." I answered, that Christ's meaning was there, as in these other places of the Scripture: "I am the door" (John 10); "I am the vine" (John 15); "behold the lamb of God" (John 1); "the rock stone was Christ" (1 Cor. 10), and such other like. "Ye may not here," said I, "take Christ for the material thing that he is signified by. For then ye will make him a very door, a vine, a lamb, and a stone, clean contrary to the Holy Ghost's meaning. All these indeed do signify Christ, like as the bread doth his body in that place. And though he did say there, 'Take, eat this in remembrance of me,' yet did he not bid them hang up that bread in a box,[3] and make it a god, or bow to it."

Then he compared it[4] unto the King, and said, that the more his Majesty's honour is set forth, the more commendable it is. Then said I, that it was an abominable shame unto him, to make no better of the eternal word of God, than of his slenderly conceived fantasy. A far other meaning requireth God therein, than man's idle wit can devise, whose doctrine is but lies without his heavenly verity. Then he asked me, if I would common[5] with some wiser man? That offer, I said, I would not refuse. Then he told the Council. And so I went to my lady's[6] again.

Then came to me Doctor Cox, and Doctor Robinson.[7] In conclusion, we could not agree. Then they made me a bill[8] of the Sacrament, willing me to set my hand thereunto,[9] but I would not. Then on the Sunday I was sore[10] sick, thinking no less than to die. Therefore I desired to speak with Latimer;[11] it would not be. Then was I sent to Newgate[12] in my extremity of sickness. For in all my life afore, was I never in such pain. Thus the Lord strengthen you in the truth. Pray, pray, pray.

The Confession of Me Anne Askew, for the Time I Was in Newgate, Concerning my Belief.

I find in the Scriptures (sayeth she) that Christ took the bread, and gave it to his disciples saying, "Eat. This is my body, which shall be broken for you," meaning in substance his own very body, the bread being thereof an only sign or sacrament. For after like manner of speaking, he said, he would break down the temple, and in three days build it up again, signifying his own body by the temple, as St. John declared it (John 2), and not the stony temple itself. So that the bread is but a remembrance of his death, or a sacrament of thanksgiving for it, whereby we are knit unto him by a communion of Christian love. Although there be many that cannot perceive the true meaning thereof, for the veil that Moses put over his face before the children of Israel, that they should not see the clearness thereof (Exo. 34 and 2 Cor. 3). I perceive the same veil remaineth to this 1 3. Reg. 18 1 Kings 18:21.

---

2 Master Paget William Paget (1505-63), secretary of state and one of Henry VIII's chief advisors (DNB online).

3 in a box Askew refers here to the practice, abhorrent to Protestants, of placing consecrated bread in a small container (a pyx) for the purpose of bringing it to the sick, but also to display it for veneration.

4 it the consecrated host.

5 common confer, debate.

6 my lady's Lady Garnish.

7 Doctor Cox, and Doctor Robinson theologians brought in to question Askew.

8 bill statement, document.

9 to set my hand thereunto affix a signature.

10 sore seriously, severely.

11 Latimer Hugh Latimer (c. 1485-1555), reformist preacher and later Marian martyr (DNB online).

12 Newgate prison in London for those charged with criminal offences.

day. But when God shall take it away, then shall these blind men see.

For it is plainly expressed in the history of Bel[1] in the Bible, that God dwelleth in nothing material. O King (sayeth Daniel) be not deceived (Daniel 14). For God will be in nothing that is made with hands of men (Act. 7). Oh what stiff-necked people are these, that will always resist the Holy Ghost. But as their fathers have done, so do they, because they have stony hearts. Written by me Anne Askew, that neither wish death, nor yet fear his might, and as merry as one that is bound towards Heaven. Truth is laid in prison (Luke 21). The law is turned to wormwood (Amos 6). And there can no right judgement go forth (Esaie 59).

Oh, forgive us all our sins and receive us graciously. As for the works of our hands, we will no more call upon them. For it is thou Lord that art our God. Thou showest every mercy unto the fatherless. Oh, if they would do this (sayeth the Lord), I should heal their sores, yea with all my heart would I love them. O Ephraim, what have I to do with idols anymore?[2] Whoso is wise, shall understand this. And he that is rightly instructed, will regard it. For the ways of the Lord are righteous. Such as are godly will walk in them. And as for the wicked, they will stumble at them (Osee[3] 14).

Solomon (sayeth St. Stephen) builded an house for the God of Jacob. Howbeit[4] the highest of all dwelleth not in temples made with hands. As sayeth the prophet (Esa. 66), "Heaven is my seat and the earth is my foot stool. What house will ye build for me?" sayeth the Lord, "or what place is it that I shall rest in? Hath not my hands made all these things?" (Act. 7). "Woman believe me," sayeth Christ to the Samaritan, "the time is at hand that ye shall neither in this mountain nor yet at Jerusalem worship the Father. Ye worship ye wot not what, but we know what we worship. For salvation cometh of the Jews. But the hour cometh, and now is, wherein the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in verity" (John 4). "Labour not," sayeth Christ, "for the meat that perisheth, but for that endureth into the life everlasting, which the Son of Man shall give you. For him God the Father hath sealed" (John 6).

The Sum of the Condemnation of Me Anne Askew at Yelde Hawle.[5]

They said to me there, that I was an heretic and condemned by the law, if I would stand in my opinion. I answered that I was no heretic, neither yet deserved I any death by the law of God. But as concerning the faith which I uttered and wrote to the Council, I would not (I said) deny it, because I knew it true. Then would they needs know, if I would deny the Sacrament to be Christ's body and blood; I said, yea. For the same son of God, that was born of the virgin Mary, is now glorious in Heaven, and will come again from thence at the Latter Day like as he went up (Acto. 1). And as for that ye call your God, is but a piece of bread. For a more proof thereof (mark it when ye list) let it lie in the box but three months, and it will be mould, and so turn to nothing that is good. Whereupon I am persuaded, that it cannot be God.

After that they willed me to have a priest. And then I smiled. Then they asked me, if it were not good? I said, I would confess my faults to God. For I was sure that he would hear me with favour. And so we were condemned without a quest.[6]

My belief which I wrote to the Council was this: that the sacramental bread was left us to be received with thanksgiving, in remembrance of Christ's death, the only remedy of our souls' recover. And that thereby we also receive the whole benefits and fruits of his glorious passion.

Then would they needs know, whether the bread in the box were God or no? I said, "God is a sprite, and will be worshipped in sprite and

---

[1] Bel the god of Babylon, whose temple was the Tower of Babel, which became a symbol of human pride.

[2] O Ephraim … anymore? Hosea 14:8.

[3] Osee Hosea 14:9.

[4] Howbeit however, nevertheless.

[5] Yelde Hawle Guildhall.

[6] quest judicial inquiry.

truth" (John 4). Then they demanded, "Will you plainly deny Christ to be in the Sacrament?" I answered that I believed faithfully the eternal son of God not to dwell there. In witness whereof I recited again the history of Bel, and the 9 chapter of Daniel, the 7 and 17 of the Acts, and the 24 of Matthew,[1] concluding thus: I neither wish death, nor yet fear his might, God have the praise thereof with thanks.

My Letter Sent to the Lord Chancellor.

The Lord God, by whom all creatures have their being, bless you with the light of his knowledge, amen. My duty to your lordship remembered, etc. It might please you to accept this my bold suit as the suit of one, which upon due considerations, is moved to the same and hopeth to obtain. My request to your lordship is only that it may please the same to be a mean[2] for me to the King's Majesty, that his Grace may be certified[3] of these few lines which I have written concerning my belief. Which when it shall be truly conferred[4] with the hard judgement given me for the same, I think his Grace shall well perceive me to be weighed in an uneven pair of balances.[5] But I remit[6] my matter and cause to almighty God, which rightly judgeth all secrets. And thus I commend your lordship to the governance of him, and fellowship of all saints. Amen. By your handmaid, Anne Askew.

My Faith Briefly Written to the King's Grace.

I, Anne Askew, of good memory[7] although God hath given me the bread of adversity and the water of trouble, yet not so much as my sins have deserved, desire this to be known to your Grace: that forasmuch as I am by the law condemned for an evil doer, here I take heaven and earth to record, that I shall die in my innocency. And according to that I have said first, and will say last, I utterly abhor and detest all heresies. And as concerning the Supper of the Lord, I believe so much as Christ hath said therein, which he confirmed with his most blessed blood. I believe also so much as he willed me to follow and believe, and so much as the catholic church of him doth teach. For I will not forsake the commandment of his holy lips, but look what God hath charged me with his mouth; that have I shut up in my heart. And thus brevily[8] I end, for the lack of learning.
Anne Askew.

The Effect of My Examination and Handling, Since My Departure from Newgate.

On Tuesday I was sent from Newgate to the sign of the crown where as Master Rich and the Bishop of London[9] with all their power and flattering words went about to persuade me from God. But I did not esteem glozing pretences.[10] Then came there to me Nicholas Shaxton,[11] and counselled me to recant as he had done. Then I said to him, that it had been good for him never to have been born, with many other like words.

Then Master Rich sent me to the Tower, where I remained till three of the clock. Then came Master Rich and one of the Council, charging me upon my obedience, to show unto them, if I knew man or woman of my sect. My answer was, that I knew none. Then they asked me of my Lady of Suffolk, my Lady of Sussex, my Lady of Hertford,

---

[1] the 9 chapter of Daniel ... 24 of Matthew All of these passages address the worship of idols and false gods.

[2] mean intermediary.

[3] certified informed.

[4] conferred compared.

[5] uneven pair of balances uneven scale.

[6] remit give up, surrender.

[7] of good memory of sound mind.

[8] brevily briefly.

[9] Master Rich and the Bishop of London Richard Rich (?1496-1567), a member of the conservative faction at court (DNB online), and Edmund Bonner (c. 1500-69), bishop of London, 1540-49 and 1553-59.

[10] esteem glozing pretences i.e., place value on flattering, false professions.

[11] Nicholas Shaxton Shaxton (1485?-1556), former bishop of Salisbury, was condemned for heresy on the same day as Askew, but recanted (DNB online).

my Lady Denny, and my Lady Fitzwilliam.[1] I said, if I should pronounce anything against them, that I were not able to prove it.

Then said they unto me, that the King was informed, that I could name, if I would, a great number of my sect. Then I answered that the King was as well deceived in that behalf as dissembled with in other matters.

Then commanded they me to show, how I was maintained in the Counter,[2] and who willed me to stick by my opinion. I said that there was no creature, that therein did strengthen me. And as for the help that I had in the Counter, it was by the means of my maid. For as she went abroad in the streets, she made to the prentices,[3] and they by her did send me money. But who they were, I never knew.

Then they said, that there were diverse gentlewomen, that gave me money. But I knew not their names. Then they said that there were diverse ladies, which had sent me money. I answered, that there was a man in a blue coat, which delivered me 10 shillings, and said that my Lady of Hertford sent it me. And another in a violet coat did give me eight shillings, and said that my Lady Denny sent it me. Whether it were true or no, I cannot tell. For I am not sure who sent it me, but as the men did say.

Then they said, there were of the Council that did maintain me. And I said, no. Then they did put me on the rack,[4] because I confessed no ladies nor gentlewomen to be of my opinion, and thereon they kept me a long time. And because I lay still and did not cry, my Lord Chancellor and Master Rich took pains to rack me their own hands, till I was nigh dead.

Then the lieutenant[5] caused me to be loosed from the rack. Incontinently I swounded,[6] and then they recovered me again. After that I sat two long hours reasoning with my Lord Chancellor upon the bare floor, where as he with many flattering words persuaded me to leave my opinion. But my Lord God (I thank his everlasting goodness) gave me grace to persevere, and will do (I hope) to the very end.

Then was I brought to an house, and laid in a bed, with as weary and painful bones as ever had patient Job,[7] I thank my Lord God thereof. Then my Lord Chancellor sent me word if I would leave my opinion, I should want nothing. If I would not, I should forth to Newgate, and so be burned. I sent him again word, that I would rather die, than to break my faith. Thus the Lord open the eyes of their blind hearts, that the truth may take place. Farewell dear friend, and pray, pray, pray.

Anne Askew's Answer unto John Lascelles's Letter.

O friend most dearly beloved in God, I marvel not a little what should move you to judge in me so slender a faith as to fear death, which is the end of all misery. In the Lord I desire you, not to believe of me such wickedness. For I doubt it not, but God will perform his work in me, like as he hath begun.

I understand the Council is not a little displeased, that it should be reported abroad, that I was racked in the Tower. They say now, that[8] they did there was but to fear me. Whereby I perceive, they are ashamed of their uncomely[9] doings, and fear much lest the King's Majesty should have

[1] my Lady of Suffolk … my Lady Fitzwilliam Katherine Parr's reformist ladies-in-waiting included Catherine Brandon, duchess of Suffolk, whose husband was a friend of Askew's brother-in-law; Anne Calthorpe, countess of Sussex; Anne Stanhope, countess of Hertford, whose husband was Edward Seymour, later Lord Protector; Lady Joan Denny, wife of a close friend and member of Henry VIII's household; Lady Jane Fitzwilliam, wife of a privy councillor.

[2] the Counter a London prison.

[3] prentices apprentices.

[4] rack instrument of torture, consisting (usually) of a frame having a roller at each end; the victim was fastened to these by the wrists and ankles, and had the joints of his/her limbs stretched by their rotation.

[5] the lieutenant Sir Anthony Knyvett (1485-1549) was a gentleman in Henry VIII's household.

[6] Incontinently I swounded at once I fainted.

[7] Job In the Old Testament, God allows Satan to afflict Job, a wealthy and pious Jew, with many hardships, including the death of his children and physical afflictions, in order to test his faith.

[8] that i.e., that which.

[9] uncomely unbecoming, unseemly.

information thereof. Wherefore they would no man to noise[1] it. Well, their cruelty God forgive them. Your heart in Christ Jesu. Farewell, and pray.

I have read the process, which is reported of them that know not the truth to be my recantation. But as sure as the Lord liveth, I never meant thing less than to recant. Notwithstanding this I confess, that in my first troubles, I was examined of the Bishop of London about the Sacrament. Yet had they no grant of my mouth but this: that I believed therein, as the word of God did bind me to believe. More had they never of me.

Then he made a copy, which is now in print, and required me to set thereunto my hand. But I refused it. Then my two sureties did will me in no wise to stick thereat. For it was no great matter, they said. Then with much ado, at the last I wrote thus: "I, Anne Askew, do believe this if God's word do agree to the same, and the true catholic church."

Then the Bishop, being in great displeasure with me, because I made doubts in my writing, commanded me to prison, where I was awhile. But afterwards by the means of friends, I came out again. Here is the truth of that matter. And as concerning the thing that ye covet most to know, resort to the 6 of John,[2] and be ruled always thereby. Thus fare ye well. Quoth[3] Anne Askew.

The Confession of Her Faith Which Anne Askew Made in Newgate Afore She Suffered.

I, Anne Askew, of good memory although my merciful Father hath given me the bread of adversity, and the water of trouble, yet not so much as my sins hath deserved, confess myself here a sinner before the throne of his heavenly Majesty desiring his eternal mercy. And for so much as I am by the law unrighteously condemned for an evil doer concerning opinions, I take the same most merciful God of mine, which hath made both heaven and earth, to record that I hold no opinions contrary to his most holy word.

And I trust in my merciful Lord, which is the giver of all grace, that he will graciously assist me against all evil opinions, which are contrary to his blessed verity. For I take him to witness, that I have, do, and will do, unto my life's end, utterly abhor them to the uttermost of my power. But this is the heresy which they report me to hold, that after the priest hath spoken the words of consecration, there remaineth but bread still.

But they both say, and also teach it for a necessary article of faith, that after those words be once spoken, there remaineth no bread, but even the self same body that hung upon the cross on Good Friday,[4] both flesh, blood, and bone. To this belief of theirs, say I nay. For then were our common Creed[5] false, which sayeth that he sitteth on the right hand of God the Father almighty, and from thence shall come to judge the quick[6] and the dead. Lo, this is the heresy that I hold, and for it must suffer the death.

But as touching the holy and blessed Supper of the Lord, I believe it to be a most necessary remembrance of his glorious sufferings and death. Moreover I believe as much therein, as my eternal and only redeemer Jesus Christ would I should believe. Finally I believe all those Scriptures to be true, whom he hath confirmed with his most precious blood.

Yea, and as St. Paul sayeth, those Scriptures are sufficient for our learning and salvation, that Christ hath left here with us. So that I believe, we need no unwritten verities to rule his Church with. Therefore look what he hath laid unto me with his own mouth, in his holy Gospel, that have I with God's grace closed up in my heart. And my full trust is (as David sayeth) that it shall be a lantern to my footsteps (Psalm 118).

There be some do say, that I deny the Eucharist or sacrament of thanksgiving, but those people do

[1] to noise report, spread.

[2] the 6 of John John 6:31-63, in which Christ refers to himself as the bread of life.

[3] Quoth said.

[4] Good Friday the day Christ was crucified.

[5] Creed statement of belief used by most Christian denominations.

[6] quick living.

untruly report of me. For I both say and believe it, that if it were ordered like as Christ instituted it and left it, a most singular comfort it were unto us all. But as concerning your Mass, as it is now used in our days, I do say and believe it to be the most abominable idol that is in the world. For my God will not be eaten with teeth, neither yet dieth he again. And upon these words, that I have spoken, will I suffer death.

O Lord, I have more enemies now than there be hairs on my head. Yet, Lord, let them never overcome me with vain words. But fight thou, Lord, in my stead. For on thee cast I my care. With all the spite they can imagine, they fall upon me which am thy poor creature. Yet sweet Lord, let me not sit by them which are against thee. For in thee is my whole delight.

And Lord, I heartily desire of thee, that thou wilt of thy most merciful goodness, forgive them that violence, which they do and have done unto me. Open also thou their blind hearts, that they may hereafter do that thing in thy sight, which is only acceptable before thee. And to set forth thy verity aright, without all vain fantasies of sinful men. So be it. O Lord, so be it. By me Anne Askew.

The Ballad Which Anne Askew Made and Sang When She Was in Newgate.

Like as the armed knight[1]
Appointed to the field,
With this world will I fight,
And faith shall be my shield.

Faith is that weapon strong
Which will not fail at need.
My foes therefore among Therewith will I proceed.

As it is had in strength
And force of Christes[2] way,
It will prevail at length,
Though all the devils say nay.

Faith in the fathers old
Obtained rightwiseness,[3]
Which make me very bold
To fear no world's distress.[4]

I now rejoice in heart,
And hope bid me do so,
For Christ will take my part
And ease me of my woe.

Thou sayst, Lord, who so knock
To them wilt thou attend.[5]
Undo therefore the lock,
And thy strong power send.

More enemies now I have,
Than hairs upon my head.
Let them not me deprave,
But fight thou in my stead.

On thee my care I cast.
For all their cruel spite
I set not by their hast[6]
For thou art my delight.

I am not she that list
My anchor to let fall,
For every drizzling mist,
My ship substantial.

Nor oft use I to write
In prose nor yet in rhyme.
Yet will I show one sight
That I saw in my time.

I saw a royal throne,
Where Justice should have sit,

[1] armed knight allusion to Ephesians 6:10-17, which refers to the loincloth of truth, breastplate of righteousness, shoes of the Gospel, shield of faith, helmet of salvation, and sword of the word of God.
[2] Christes i.e., Christ's (two syllables).
[3] rightwiseness righteousness.
[4] distress trouble, adversity.
[5] Thou sayst … attend "Ask, and it will be given to you; seek, and you will find; knock, and it will be opened to you" (Matthew 7:7).
[6] hast rashness.

But in her stead was one
Of moody cruel wit.

Absorpt[1] was rightwiseness
As of the raging flood.
Satan in his excess
Sucked up the guiltless blood.

Then thought I, Jesus Lord,
When thou shalt judge us all,
Hard is it to record
On these men what will fall.

Yet, Lord, I thee desire
For that they do to me
Let them not taste the hire[2]
Of their iniquity.

FINIS.

God save the King.

God hath chosen the weak things of the world, to confound things which are mighty. Yea, and things of no reputation, for to bring to nought things of reputation, that no flesh should presume in his sight (1 Corinth. 1).

—1547

[1] Absorpt absorbed.

[2] hire wage, recompense.

Katherine Parr, queen of England
1512-1548

Katherine Parr's devotional writing was produced in the midst of stormy debate over religious reform in Tudor England while she engaged in the dangerous world of religious politicking at the court of the ailing Henry VIII. As his sixth and final wife, Parr was twice-widowed by the age of 29: she had married Edward, Lord Borough of Gainsborough, at 13, followed by John Neville, Lord Latimer, at 20. The Parr family was well established at court. Her father served as master of wards and comptroller of the household to Henry VIII, and her mother as lady-in-waiting to Henry's first wife, Katherine of Aragon.[1]

Her mother arranged for Katherine to be educated in Latin and the central texts of Christian humanism with Princess Mary and the children of Thomas More. After the death of her first husband, Parr became lady-in-waiting to Katherine of Aragon, leaving to marry her second husband when the King married Anne Boleyn in 1533. Steeped in Catholicism by virtue of her family roots in the north and her service to Katherine of Aragon, Parr's first foray into religious politics occurred in 1536 soon after Henry VIII's split with the Church of Rome. At this time her husband, Lord Latimer, led a group of northern rebels dismayed at the disposition of Church properties after the dissolution of the monasteries in what became known as the Pilgrimage of Grace. Parr's deft diplomacy, conducted through her sister and brother, succeeded in saving her husband and herself from the imprisonment and death that awaited many of the other leaders.

Parr's conversion to Protestantism appears to have occurred after her 1543 marriage to Henry VIII. During his military campaign in France in the summer of 1544, she was appointed regent, a responsibility unprecedented among Henry's wives, and met for daily study of Scripture with the architect of the English Reformation, Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury. Certainly, her patronage of a circle of Protestant humanist intellectuals, including John Cheke, Miles Coverdale, William Cecil, Nicholas Udall, and John Parkhurst, and spearheading of a project to translate Erasmus's Paraphrases upon the New Testament as a guide for Bible study in English churches indicate reformist tendencies. Through this period, she also directed the education of Edward and Elizabeth, the younger children of Henry VIII, and attempted to repair relations with her elder stepdaughter, Mary. By 1545-46, Parr's diplomatic skill was again required when conservative archbishop Stephen Gardiner planted rumours of her disloyalty with the increasingly capricious King; he attempted to have the Queen and the ladies of her chamber arrested for their connections to the Protestant martyr, Anne Askew. Indeed, the Queen and her ladies were known to read and discuss Scripture and, through her northern family connections, Parr was acquainted with Lincolnshire-born Askew. However, catching wind of the plot—Gardiner had gone so far as to have articles of heresy drawn up and signed—she interceded successfully with Henry. While he ostensibly acquiesced to the plan to have Gardiner's henchmen search the chambers of the Queen and her ladies, no incriminating evidence of their divergence from Henry's more Catholic stance on religious matters was found and the perpetrators were imprisoned.

Published in the same year, the first edition of Parr's Prayers or Meditations reflects the careful balance she maintained during Henry's life. While the apparent motive for its production was to provide an English manual for private devotion to accompany Cranmer's translation of the Litany, the content of the volume is not markedly reformist. At its core is a redaction of an English translation of Thomas à Kempis's Imitatio Christi, albeit with its monastic elements, invocation of saints, and prayers for the departed omitted. The collection closes with stand-alone prayers. The contents of the book avoided any kind of offence, whether to "Roman Catholic, Lutheran, or Calvinist. The prayers are not related to any liturgical observances but comprise a collection of purely private devotions."[2] Despite, or perhaps because of, its lack of clear doctrinal alignment, the collection became immensely popular and a staple in the burgeoning market for books of private prayer. It became known as "The Queen's Prayers," with 16 editions by 1640.

---

[1] The biographical details of this headnote are drawn largely from S. James's Kateryn Parr: The Making of a Queen (Aldershot, 1999).

[2] W. Haugaard, "Katherine Parr: The Religious Convictions of a Renaissance Queen," Renaissance Quarterly 22 (1969): 354.

Less temporizing is Parr's Lamentation of a Penitent Sinner, published a few months after the death of Henry VIII in 1547. Lamentation is one of the earliest Protestant spiritual autobiographies in English. The preface, written by William Cecil (later Elizabeth I's chief minister), frames the work as a call to reform. Structured in roughly three parts, Parr gives an account of her conversion, in which she confesses previous sins—including pride, love of riches, ignorance, and superstition—and describes her struggle to achieve faith through personal understanding of Christ's crucifixion. This intimate reflection is followed by an elaboration of its broader doctrinal meaning, which is in turn applied to wider social and political concerns in the final section. Characteristically, each part includes reflection on biblical verses and questions of doctrine. While its tone is personal, Parr's text is clearly influenced by key Reformation figures like Erasmus, Thomas Cranmer, Hugh Latimer, and William Tyndale in its structure, literary style, self-referentiality, and social concern with building Christian community.[1] Like Prayers or Meditations, the Lamentation was also popular and went through three editions between 1547 and 1563.

Katherine Parr lived the last year of her life with Lord Admiral Thomas Seymour, a notorious rascal whom she married within an unseemly four months following Henry VIII's death. Their home at Sudley Castle was also home to the young Princess Elizabeth until Seymour's advances made it impracticable. With Seymour, Parr gave birth to a daughter, Mary, on 30 August 1548, but like many women in this period died a week later on September 7 of puerperal or "childbed" fever, the direct result of her physician's poor hygiene.

EDITIONS: Prayers or medytacions … London: Thomas Berthelet, 1545. STC 4818.5; The lamentacion of a synner. London: Edward Whitchurch, 1547. STC 4827; "Letter to Mary," Letters of Royal and Illustrious Ladies of Great Britain. Vol. II. Ed. Mary Anne Everett Green. London: H. Colburn, 1860. pp. 180-82.

from Prayers or Meditations, Wherein the Mind Is Stirred, Patiently to Suffer All Afflictions Here, to Set at Nought the Vain Prosperity of This World, and Always to Long for the Everlasting Felicity: Collected out of Certain Holy Works by the Most Virtuous and Gracious Princess Katherine, Queen of England, France and Ireland.

[2]Most benign Lord Jesu, grant me thy grace, that it may alway work in me and persevere with me unto the end.

Grant me that I may ever desire and will that which is most pleasant and most acceptable to thee.

Thy will be my will, and my will be to follow alway thy will.

Let there be alway in me one will and one desire with thee, and that I have no desire to will, or not to will, but as thou wilt.

Lord, thou knowest what thing is most profitable and most expedient for me.

Give therefore what thou wilt, as much as thou wilt, and when thou wilt.

Do with me what thou wilt, as it shall please thee, and as shall be most to thine honour.

Put me where thou wilt and freely do with me in all things after thy will.

Thy creature I am, and in thy hands lead and turn me where thou wilt.

Lo, I am thy servant, ready to all things that thou commandest, for I desire not to live to myself, but to thee.

Lord Jesu, I pray thee grant me grace that I never set my heart on the things of this world, but that all worldly and carnal affections may utterly die and be mortified in me.

[1] J. Mueller, "A Tudor Queen Finds Voice: Katherine Parr's Lamentation of a Sinner," The Historical Renaissance: New Essays on Tudor and Stuart Literature and Culture (Chicago, 1988), pp. 15-47, traces Parr's use of multiple sources in the production of her authorial voice.

[2] The following two selections are from the main body of the text, preceding the titled prayers.

Grant me above all things that I may rest in thee and fully quiet and pacify my heart in thee.

[...]

Behold Lord, I have nought, and of myself I am nought worth; thou art only God. Righteous and holy, thou orderest all things, thou givest all things, and thou fulfillest all things with goodness.

I am a sinner, barren and void of godly virtue.

Remember thy mercies and fill my heart with plenty of thy grace, for thou wilt not that thy works in me should be made in vain.

How may I bear the misery of this life, except thy grace and mercy do comfort me?

Turn not thy face from me, defer not thy visiting of me, ne withdraw not thy comforts, lest haply my soul be made as dry earth without the water of grace.

Teach me, Lord, to fulfill thy will, to live meekly and worthily before thee, for thou art all my wisdom and cunning,[1] thou art he that knowest me as I am, that knewest me before the world was made, and before I was born or brought into this life. To thee, O Lord, be honour, glory and praise for ever and ever. Amen.

A Prayer for the King.[2]

O Lord Jesu Christ, most high, most mighty, King of kings, Lord of lords, the only ruler of princes, the very Son of God, on whose right hand sitting, dost from thy throne behold all the dwellers upon earth. With most lowly hearts we beseech thee, vouchsafe with favourable regard to behold our most gracious sovereign lord, King Henry the VIII and so replenish him with the grace of thy Holy Spirit, that he always incline to thy will, and walk in thy way. Keep him far off from ignorance, but through thy gift let prudence and knowledge always abound in his royal heart. So instruct him, O Lord Jesu, reigning upon us in earth, that his human majesty alway obey thy divine majesty in fear and dread. Indue[3] him plentifully with heavenly gifts. Grant him in health and wealth long to live. Heap glory and honour upon him. Glad him with the joy of thy countenance.[4] So strength him, that he may vanquish and overcome all his and our foes, and be dread and feared of all the enemies of his realm. Amen.

A Prayer for Men to Say Entering into Battle.

O almighty King and Lord of hosts, which by thy angels thereunto appointed dost minister both war and peace, and which didst give unto David both courage and strength, being but a little one, unarmed, and unexpert in feats of war with his sling to set upon and overthrow the great huge Goliath,[5] our cause now being just, and being enforced to enter into war and battle, we most humbly beseech thee, O Lord God of hosts, so to turn the hearts of our enemies to the desire of peace, that no Christian blood be spilt, or else grant, O Lord, that with small effusion[6] of blood, and to the little hurt and damage of innocents, we may to thy glory obtain victory, and that the wars being soon ended, we may all with one heart and mind, knit together in concord and unity, laud and praise thee, which livest and reignest, world without end. Amen.

—1545

[1] cunning knowledge, learning.

[2] A Prayer for the King This prayer and the next were likely added by the printer, rather than composed by Parr herself.

[3] Indue invest, endow.

[4] countenance favour.

[5] David … Goliath allusion to the story of the unequal battle between the Philistine giant, Goliath, and David, who defeated him with a single stone from his slingshot (1 Samuel 17:41-50).

[6] effusion spilling, outpouring.

from The Lamentation of a Sinner, Made by the Most Virtuous Lady, Queen Katherine, Bewailing the Ignorance of Her Blind Life: Set Forth and Put in Print at the Instant Desire of the Right Gracious Lady Catherine, Duchess of Suffolk,[1] and the Earnest Request of the Right Honourable Lord William Parr, Marquis of Northampton.[2]

William Cecil,[3] Having Taken Much Profit by the Reading of This Treatise Following, Wisheth unto Every Christian by the Reading Thereof Like Profit with Increase from God.

Most gentle and Christian reader, if matters should be rather confirmed by their reporters than the reports warranted by the matters, I might justly bewail our time wherein evil deeds be well worded, and good acts evil cleped.[4] But since truth is that things be not good for their praises, but be praised for their goodness, I do not move thee to like this Christian treatise because I have mind to praise it, but I exhort thee to mind it and for the goodness thou shalt allow it, for whose liking I labour not to obtain, only moved by my example, their judgement I regard chiefly confirmed by the matter.

Truly our time is so disposed to grant good names to evil fruits and excellent terms to mean works, that neither can good deeds enjoy their due names, being defrauded by the evil, neither excellent works can possess their worthy terms, being forestalled by the mean. Insomuch that men seek rather how much they can than how much they ought to say, inclining more to their pleasure than to their judgement, and to show themselves rather eloquent than the matter good, so that neither the goodness of the cause can move them to say more, neither the evilness less. For if the excellence of this Christian contemplation, either for the goodness herein to marvel appearing, either for the profit hereupon to the reader ensuing,[5] should be with due commendation followed, I of necessity should either travail[6] to find out new words, the old being anticipated by evil matters, or wish that the common speech of praising were spared until convenient matters were found to spend it, such is the plenty of praising and scarceness of deserving.

Wherefore lacking the manner in words, and not the matter in deed of high commendation, I am compelled to keep in my judgement with silence, trusting whom my report could not have moved to like this present treatise, the worthiness of the matter shall compel to give it honour. Any earthly man would soon be stirred to see some mystery of magic, or practice of alchemy, or perchance[7] some enchantment of elements, but thou which art christened hast here a wonderful mystery of the mercy of God, a heavenly practice of regeneration, a spiritual enchantment of the grace of God. If joy and triumphs be showed when a king's child is born to the world, what joy is sufficient when God's child is regenerated from Heaven? The one is flesh which is born of flesh; the other is spirit, which is born of spirit. The one also shall wither like the grass of the earth in short time; the other shall live in Heaven beyond all time.

If the finding of one lost sheep be more joyful than the having of ninety and nine,[8] what joy is it to consider the return of a stray child of almighty God, whose return teacheth the ninety and nine to come to their fold? Even such cause of joy is this, that the angels in Heaven take comfort herein. Be thou therefore joyful where a noble child is newly

---

1 Catherine, Duchess of Suffolk Catherine Brandon (1519/20-80) was a close friend and ardent reformer who, with her husband, spent Mary's reign in exile on the Continent.

2 Lord William Parr, Marquis of Northampton Katherine's brother.

3 William Cecil Lord Burghley (1520/21-98) was secretary to Lord Protector Somerset, who headed the Council of Regency during Edward VI's reign, and later Elizabeth I's lord treasurer (DNB online).

4 cleped called.

5 ensuing following as a result or consequence.

6 travail exert, work.

7 perchance as it happens.

8 one lost sheep … ninety and nine Luke 15:4-7.

born; show thyself glad where the lost sheep hath won the whole flock; be thou not sad, wherein angels rejoice. Here mayest thou see one, if the kind may move thee, a woman, if degree may provoke thee, a woman of high estate by birth made noble, by marriage most noble, by wisdom godly, by a mighty king, an excellent queen, by a famous Henry, a renowned Katherine, a wife to him that was a king to realms, refusing the world wherein she was lost to obtain Heaven wherein she may be saved, abhorring sin which made her bound to receive grace, whereby she may be free, despising flesh, the cause of corruption, to put on the spirit, the cause of sanctification, forsaking ignorance, wherein she was blind, to come to knowledge whereby she may see, removing superstition, wherewith she was smothered, to embrace true religion, wherewith she may revive.

The fruit of this treatise, good reader, is thy amendment. This only had, the writer is satisfied. This good lady thought no shame to detect her sin, to obtain remission; no vileness to become nothing, to be a member of him, which is all things in all; no folly to forget the wisdom of the world, to learn the simplicity of the Gospel; at the last, no displeasantness to submit herself to the school of the cross, the learning of the crucifix, the book of our redemption, the very absolute library of God's mercy and wisdom. This way thought she her honour increased and her state permanent, to make her earthly honour heavenly and neglect the transitory for the everlasting. Of this I would thee warned that the profit may ensue. These great mysteries and graces be not well perceived, except they be surely studied, neither be they perfectly studied, except they be diligently practiced, neither profitably practiced, without amendment. See and learn hereby what she hath done, then mayest thou practice and amend that thou canst do; so shalt thou practice with ease, having a guide, and amend with profit, having a zeal. It is easier to see these than to learn; begin at the easiest to come to the harder; see thou her confession, that thou mayest learn her repentance; practice her perseverance, that thou mayest have like amendment; displease thyself, in eschewing vice, that thou mayest please God in asking grace; let not shame hinder thy confession, which hindered not the offence; be thou sure if we knowledge our sins, God is faithful to forgive us, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness; obey the prophet's saying; declare thy ways to the Lord. Thus far thou mayest learn to know thyself; next this be thou as diligent to relieve thyself in God's mercy, as thou hast been to reveal thyself in thine own repentance. For God hath concluded all things under sin because he would have mercy upon all who hath also borne our sins in his body, upon the tree, that we should be delivered from sin, and should live unto rightwiseness, by whose stripe[1] we be healed. Here is our anchor, here is our shepherd, here we be made whole, here is our life, our redemption, our salvation, and our bliss. Let us therefore now feed by this gracious Queen's example and be not ashamed to become in confession publicans, since this noble lady will be no Pharisee.[2]

And to all ladies of estate I wish as earnest mind to follow our Queen in virtue, as in honour, that they might once appear to prefer God before the world and be honourable in religion, which now be honourable in vanities; so shall they, as in some virtuous ladies of right high estate it is with great comfort seen, taste of this freedom of remission of this everlasting bliss, which exceedeth all thoughts and understandings, and is prepared for the holy in spirit, for the which let us with our intercession in holiness and pureness of life, offer ourselves to the heavenly Father an undefiled host, to whom be eternal praise and glory through all the earth, without end. Amen.

A Lamentation or Complaint of a Sinner

When I consider, in the bethinking of mine evil, and wretched former life, mine obstinate, stony,

[1] stripe welt, wound.

[2] publicans … Pharisee allusion to Luke 18:9-14, in which Christ tells the story of the Pharisee and the tax collector at the temple. The Pharisee made much of his own virtue, while the tax collector simply prayed "God, be merciful to me, a sinner."

and intractable[1] heart, to have so much exceeded in evilness that it hath not only neglected, yea contemned[2] and despised God's holy precepts and commandments, but also embraced, received, and esteemed vain, foolish, and feigned trifles, I am, partly by the hate I owe to sin, who hath reigned in me, partly by the love I owe to all Christians, whom I am content to edify, even with the example of mine own shame, forced and constrained with my heart and words to confess and declare to the world how ingrate,[3] negligent, unkind, and stubborn I have been to God my Creator and how beneficial, merciful, and gentle he hath been always to me his creature, being such a miserable, and wretched sinner. Truly I have taken no little small thing upon me, first to set forth my whole stubbornness and contempt in words, the which is incomprehensible in thought as it is in the Psalm,[4] who understandeth his faults? Next this to declare the excellent beneficence, mercy, and goodness of God, which is infinite, unmeasurable. Neither can all the words of angels and men make relation thereof, as appertaineth to his most high goodness. Who is he that is not forced to confess the same, if he consider what he hath received of God, and doth daily receive? Yea, if men would not acknowledge, and confess the same, the stones would cry it out.[5] Truly I am constrained and forced to speak and write thereof to mine own confusion and shame, but to the great glory and praise of God. For he as a loving father, of most abundant and high goodness, hath heaped upon me innumerable benefits.

[...] Therefore inwardly to behold Christ crucified upon the cross is the best and godliest meditation that can be [...]. Therefore to learn to know truly our own sins is to study in the book of the crucifix, by continual conversation in faith, and to have perfect and plentiful charity is to learn first by faith the charity that is in God towards us [...]. Truly it may be most justly verified that to behold Christ crucified in spirit is the best meditation that can be. I certainly never knew mine own miseries and wretchedness so well by book, admonition, or learning, as I have done by looking into the spiritual book of the crucifix. I lament much I have passed so many years not regarding that divine book, but I judged, and thought myself to be well instructed in the same, whereas now I am of this opinion that if God would suffer me to live here a M. year[6] and should study continually in the same divine book I should not be filled with the contemplation thereof. Neither hold I myself contented, but always have a great desire to learn and study more therein. I never knew mine own wickedness, neither lamented for my sins truly, until the time God inspired me with his grace, that I looked into this book. Then I began to see perfectly that mine own power and strength could not help me, and that I was in the Lord's hand, even as the clay is in the potter's hand.

[...] If any man shall be offended at this my lamenting the faults of men which be in the world, fantasying[7] with themselves that I do it either of hatred or of malice to any sort or kind of people, verily in so doing they shall do me great wrong, for I thank God by his grace, I hate no creature. Yea, I would say more to give witness of my conscience, that neither life, honour, riches, neither whatsoever I possess here, which appertaineth unto mine own private commodity, be it never so dearly beloved of me, but most willingly and gladly I would leave it to win any man to Christ, of what degree or sort soever he were. And yet is this nothing in comparison to the charity that God hath showed me in sending Christ to die for me. No, if I had all the charity of angels and apostles, it should be but like a spark of fire compared to a great heap of

---

1 intractable stubborn, resistant.

2 contemned despised, disdained.

3 ingrate ungrateful, disagreeable.

4 Psalm Psalm 92:5-7: "How great are thy works, O Lord! Thy thoughts are very deep! The dull man cannot know, the stupid man cannot understand this: that, though the wicked sprout like grass and all evildoers flourish, they are doomed to destruction forever."

5 if men would not acknowledge … would cry it out "He answered, 'I tell you, if these were silent, the very stones would cry it out'" (Luke 19:40).

6 M. year M is the Roman numeral designating 1000 (i.e., a thousand years).

7 fantasying fancying.

burning coals. God knoweth of what intent and mind I have lamented mine own sins and faults to the world. I trust nobody will judge that I have done it for praise, or thank of any creature, since rather I might be ashamed than rejoice in rehearsal thereof. For if they know how little I esteem and weigh the praise of the world, that opinion were soon removed and taken away, for I thank God, by his grace, I know the world to be a blind judge and the praises thereof vain and of little moment. And therefore I seek not the praises of the same, neither to satisfy it none otherwise than I am taught by Christ to do according to Christian charity. I would to God we would all, when occasion doth serve, confess our faults to the world, all respects to our own commodity laid apart. But, alas, self love doth so much reign amongst us that, as I have said before, we cannot espy our own faults. And although sometime we find our own guilt, either we be favourable to interpret it no sin, or else we be ashamed to confess ourselves thereof [...]. But yet willful blindness and obstinate ignorance shall receive greater punishment, and not without just cause. Then shall it be known who hath walked in the dark, for all things shall appear manifest before him. No man's deeds shall be hidden, no, neither words nor thoughts. The poor and simple observers of God's commandments shall be rewarded with everlasting life as obedient children to the heavenly Father. And the transgressors, adders, and diminishers of the law of God shall receive eternal damnation for their just reward. I beseech God we may escape this fearful sentence and be found such faithful creatures and loving children that we may hear the happy, comfortable, and most joyful sentence, ordained for the children of God, which is, "Come hither ye blessed of my Father and receive the kingdom of Heaven prepared for you before the beginning of the world."[1] Unto the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost be all honour and glory, world without end. Amen.

—1547

[1] Come hither … beginning of the world Matthew 25:34.

Letter to Mary

Although, most noble and dearest lady, there are many reasons that easily induce my writing to you at this time, yet nothing so greatly moves me thereto as my concern for your health, which, as I hope it is very good, so am I greatly desirous to be assured thereof.

Wherefore, I dispatch to you this messenger, who will be, I judge most acceptable to you, not only from his skill in music, in which you, I am well aware, take as much delight as myself, but also because, having long sojourned[2] with me, he can give the most certain information of my whole estate and health. And, in truth, I have had it in mind before this to have made a journey to you and salute you in person, but all things do not correspond with my will. Now, however, I hope this winter and that ere long, that, being nearer, we shall meet, than which, I assure you, nothing can be to me more agreeable and more to my heart's desire.

Now since, as I have heard, the finishing touch, as far as the translation is concerned, is given by Mallet to Erasmus's work upon John,[3] and nought[4] now remains but that proper care and vigilance should be taken in revising, I entreat you to send over to me this very excellent and useful work, now amended by Mallet or some of your people, that it may be committed to the press in due time, and farther, to signify whether you wish it to go forth to the world, most auspiciously, under your name, or as the production of an unknown writer. To which work you will, in my opinion, do a real injury if you refuse to let it go down to posterity under the auspices of your own name, since you have undertaken so much labour in accurately translating it for the great good of the public, and would have undertaken still greater, as [2] sojourned remained, resided.

[3] Mallet … upon John Francis Mallet, Mary's chaplain, participated with the two women in the translation of Erasmus's Paraphrases upon the New Testament. He completed Mary's translation of the section on the Gospel of John (James, Kateryn Parr, p. 228).

[4] nought nothing.

is well known, if the health of your body had permitted.

And since all the world knows that you have toiled and laboured much in this business, I do not see why you should repudiate that praise which all men justly confer on you. However, I leave this whole matter to your discretion and, whatever resolution you may adopt, that will meet my fullest approbation.[1]

For the purse, which you have sent me as a present, I return you great thanks. I pray God, the greatest and best of beings, that he deign[2] to bless you uninterruptedly with true and unalloyed[3] happiness. May you long fare well in him.

From Hanworth, 20th of September,
Most devotedly and lovingly yours,
Katherine the Queen.

—1544 (first published,1860)

[1] approbation approval.

[2] deign condescend.

[3] unalloyed unmixed, pure.

Lady Anne Cooke Bacon

c. 1528-1610

The second daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke was born into a heady intellectual and political world. Her father served as tutor to Edward VI, and the accomplishments of the Cooke sisters earned the household at Gidea Hall a reputation as a "female university."[1] As well as developing fluency in Latin, Greek, French, and Italian, the intellectually formidable Cooke sisters were acquainted with a network of politically active young humanists who became highly influential in the latter half of the century. Mildred, the eldest, married William Cecil, Elizabeth I's chief secretary. Elizabeth married Sir Thomas Hoby and, after his death, John, Lord Russell. Katherine married Sir Henry Killigrew, one of Elizabeth I's diplomats. The youngest Cooke sister, Margaret, died young. Anne married Sir Nicholas Bacon, lord keeper of the Great Seal, in February 1553[2] and bore two children, Anthony and Francis. The latter became lord chancellor under James I.

Through the 1550s and 1560s, the sisters moved in a circle of international reformists that included figures like Barnardino Ochino, John Ponet, and Theodore de Bèze. Prior to her marriage, Bacon participated actively in this environment, translating sermons by Ochino that were published in several collections in 1548, 1551, and 1570. Translation was generally presented as a lesser literary activity, as indicated by Florio's comment in the preface to his 1603 translation of Montaigne that "all translations are reputed females, delivered at second hand." Sixteenth-century educators such as Juan Luis Vives and Richard Hyrde deemed translation to be a suitable form of work for women, because the women's words originated in a text by a man, which was understood then to place boundaries on what the female translator could say. While it was in some ways belittled, translation was also very significant because it constituted the largest single category of printed books and was essential for the dissemination of humanist scholarship and reformist theology in England. In her dedicatory epistle to Fourtene Sermons concerning the predestination and election of God (1551), Bacon demonstrates the notion that translation was a means of containing female speech and learning. She notes that in light of her mother's objections to her study of Italian, she has chosen to limit its use to religiously motivated translation. What Bacon suppresses with this comment is the importance of Ochino, and thus her translation, to the international reformist cause.

Bacon's other major work, An Apology of the Church of England (1564), was perhaps even more significant in religio-political terms, but shows the same downplaying of its political intent in deference to her gender. In 1559, once Elizabeth had been established on the throne and the Church of England re-established as separate from the Roman Catholic Church, attention turned to the unification of the English Church. Bishop John Jewel composed his Apologia Ecclesiae Anglicanae (1562), a work designed to articulate the English position to an international audience. This work was published in Latin, but an English version was needed for domestic purposes. In his preface to Bacon's translation, Archbishop Matthew Parker claims that an unsatisfactory translation had been printed the year before, in 1563, but that Bacon happened to send her version, unsolicited, to Bishop Jewel, who subsequently arranged its publication as a replacement. As a number of critics argue, it seems unlikely that Bacon would undertake translation of such a major political document for purely recreational purposes. Moreover, revised sections of the 1563 version appear in Bacon's work,[3] indicating that her translation was likely commissioned, despite protestations to the contrary. Thus, while Bacon's translation is framed by Parker in accordance with contemporary theories of both translation and gender, the circumstances of its production indicate a very different intent.

By 1572, the now-married Cooke sisters turned their attention locally when they acted in defence of Anne Locke's second husband, Edward Dering. The young Dering was a radical preacher, accused of insulting the Queen in a sermon;

---

1 L. Schleiner, Tudor and Stuart Women Writers (Indiana, 1994), p. 34.

2 L. Magnusson, "Bacon [née Cooke], Anne, Lady Bacon (c. 1528-1610)," DNB online.

3 A. Stewart, "The Voices of Anne Cooke, Lady Anne and Lady Bacon" in "This Double Voice": Gendered Writing in Early Modern England, ed. D. Clarke and E. Clarke (London, 2000), p. 93.

he argued that her tolerance of poorly educated clergy and corrupt leadership in the English Church was sinful. The result was loss of both royal favour and his licence to preach, each of which was a blow to the strongly reformist faction at Elizabeth's Court. In an effort to soften the Queen's stance on Dering, the Cooke sisters produced a beautiful manuscript of a scientific work by Bartolo Sylva in Italian, Elizabeth I's favourite language. The volume opened with dedicatory poems in Greek and Latin composed by the sisters, Anne Locke, and Dering himself. This gift was channelled to the Queen through Robert Dudley, earl of Leicester (one of Elizabeth's favourites).[1] While the gift of a book to a monarch may seem an oddly indirect intervention, its boldness is made clearer with the knowledge that Anne Bacon's husband, Nicholas, was the Star Chamber prosecutor in Dering's case.

Nicholas Bacon died in 1579. The letters written during Anne Bacon's long widowhood reveal an ongoing interest in both political and domestic affairs and devotion to Protestant causes—a passion also expressed through her ongoing patronage of reformist preachers. In some of her letters, addressed to figures like her brother-in-law William Cecil, Lord Burghley, she offers instruction on matters of national import. By contrast, in letters addressed to her sons, she discusses the running of the family estate at Gorhambury, and dispenses strongly phrased advice and admonition. This is particularly true in the case of Anthony, who was sent on an extended Continental tour from 1579 to 1591 to gather intelligence for Francis Walsingham, the head of Elizabeth I's secret service, and his uncle, William Cecil. On this tour Anthony came into dangerous proximity to papist influences; in addition, his profligate spending progressively depleted the resources of both his inherited estates and those held by his mother for the remainder of her life.[2] The imperious tone of Bacon's letters has been used as evidence that she was "little better than frantic in her age."[3] However, analysis of over 170 extant letters from the 1590s between Bacon and her sons suggests that Bacon's blunt speech may result not from incipient dementia but from a combination of the prerogative of power and a poor reception by her recalcitrant offspring.[4] A similar recent suggestion is that "from 1579 Anne Cooke Bacon's voice is heard, independent, for the first time, and it is heard as mad."[5] Mad or not, this voice was finally silenced when Bacon died at age 82, but such was her influence that in his will her famous son asked to be buried by her side.

EDITIONS: "To the Christian Reader" and "To the ... Beloved Mother the Lady F." Fouretene sermons of Barnardine Ochyne. London: John Day, 1551. STC 18767; "The Interpreter to the Gentle Reader, Health in Christ Jesu" and "How a Christian Ought to Make His Last Will and Testament." Sermons of Barnardine Ochine of Sena. London: R. Carr for W. Redell, 1548. STC 18764; "Letter to Lord Burghley," "Lady Bacon to Anthony Bacon–3 February 1592," "Lady Bacon to Anthony Bacon–29 May 1592," "Lady Bacon to Anthony Bacon–24 July 1592," and "Francis Allen about Lady Bacon" in The Letters and the Life of Francis Bacon. Vol. 1. Ed. James Spedding. London: Longman, Green, Longman, and Roberts, 1861.

1 For an account of this incident, see Schleiner, Tudor and Stuart Women Writers, pp. 39-40.

2 DNB online.

3 DNB online.

4 L. Magnusson, "Widowhood and Linguistic Capital: The Rhetoric and Reception of Anne Bacon's Epistolary Advice," English Literary Renaissance 31 (2001): 19-22 from Sermons of Barnardine Ochine of Sena, Godly, Fruitful, and Very Necessary for All True Christians, Translated out of Italian into English.

5 Stewart, "The Voices of Anne Cooke," p. 89.

The Interpreter to the Gentle Reader, Health in Christ Jesu.

Death, good reader, as Scripture declareth, and our daily experience practiseth, to all mankind is a thing most certain and sure. For who is he that shall live and not see nor taste of death's cup. The longest livers at length died, neither king ne[1] keysar[2] can avoid the duty of death, but of necessity, as all are of earth and ashes, so shall they return into the same.

Notwithstanding this that sure we be to die, yet when it shall come, the Lord hath left secret to his own wisdom, chiefly because we should ever keep watch and ward and be still in a readiness with our lamps burning to wait upon the bridegroom,[3] which cometh we cannot tell when, whether at midnight, or at the cock's crowing, wherefore our master Christ gave us warning that we should be always waking and look vigilantly, for he cometh closely like a thief, without warning us at what hour he will come.[4]

Then as he findeth every man, so will he judge him, and where the tree falleth, whether it be toward the south or north, there it lieth. There is then no respite to be had, but straightway[5] due execution of God's justice shall come upon all flesh. Happy is he, therefore, whom his master at his returning findeth waking, for him shall he put in authority over all his treasure.[6]

And for so much as then the matter shall hang altogether in clearness of conscience, which at that time shall accuse a man or defend him, according as he hath kept it[7] clean with virtues or stained with vices (for in the book of men's conscience are all these deeds laid up, to be opened at the audit day of our death), me think nothing can be a greater stay to the conscience of man than to know how he ought to go out of this present life and what to carry with him to his account or leave behind him in the world.

In consideration whereof I have translated into my native speech out of Italian a sermon of master Barnadine Ochine, teaching how a true Christian ought to make his last will and for so much as the Devil is at that instant of death very bragging busily with man and diversely[8] troubleth him, and the justice of God on the other side feareth him, I have, to stay and strengthen the conscience on these behalfs, turned into English two sermons instructing us how to answer the Devil when he tempteth us at what time, and by what means to quiet our minds. As touching God's justice, other two have I also translated, which inform us of the true works that God requireth of us and the way to go to Heaven, and that our Saviour Christ Jesus hath by his most precious death purchased for us paradise without our deservings.

Which five sermons taken out of the first part of Master Barnardine's sermons, as they be written and published of good zeal to the wealth of many, so it is thy courtesy, gentle reader, to accept them in good part and pardon my gross terms as of a beginner, and bear with my translation as of a learner. Obtaining this of thee, good reader, I shall be ready and willing hereafter when God giveth better knowledge (according as my talent will extend) to turn more godly sermons of the said Master Barnardine into English for the information of all that desire to know the truth. For they truly contain much to the defacing of all papistry[9] and hypocrisy, and to the advancement of the glory of God and of the benefits of Christ Jesus. To whom with the

---

1 ne nor.

2 keysar caesar (i.e., emperor).

3 lamps … bridegroom allusion to the parable of the five wise and five foolish virgins (Matthew 25:1-13).

4 Christ … will come See Luke 12:39-40.

5 straightway immediately, at once.

6 master … all his treasure another allusion to Luke 12:35-40.

7 it conscience.

8 diversely variously, in many ways.

9 papistry Roman Catholic doctrine and practice.

Holy Ghost be all honour and glory for ever and ever. So be it.

God save the King, and grant us the truth of His word.

How a Christian Ought to Make His Last Will and Testament.

It is commonly the custom of men in their testaments and last wills to say I leave, I bequeath, I give, without once saying I take or carry with me, wherein certes[1] they be far deceived, because they take that which they ought to leave behind them and go without carrying that which is very behoveful[2] and necessary. Wherefore to the intent they should no more err on that behalf, I would we should consider and weigh how a true Christian should make his will.

Men that be either fools, mad, frantic neither can nor yet know how to make a will, by reason they have not wit to discern good from evil, what is theirs or what is not, what to take, nor what to restore or bequeath, nor yet to whom nor in what manner. And if happily they go about to make their testament, it should be but vain and of no force. God alloweth it not as a thing made of a person witless. Wherefore he that is willing to make a testament effectual[3] (as expedient[4] is to him that will be saved) behoveth to have very good spiritual judgement, a lively faith in Christ, and an understanding and light above a natural man. He must also be the son and lawful heir of God.

And then he may say: I sound of mind, and ready of spirit and remembrance, albeit as touching my flesh sick, make my testament, and bequeath first of all my being and substance to God. He gave it to me and also preserved it and of him I recognise to have it, and for it I render him thanks. I leave to him likewise the gifts, graces, benefits temporal, bodily and ghostly, that I have had, or shall hereafter receive, for they be his and from him by grace I acknowledge to have received all. As Paul sayeth, what hast thou, that thou hast not received at God's hands?[5] Yea, for as much as all the slanders, misreports, persecutions, sickness, and misfortunes, which I have already or shall from henceforth suffer, and even death self, I confess (by the understanding that the Lord hath given me) that they have been and shall be his gifts and graces, given and granted of a great love for my wealth and profit. Wherefore as his divine rewards I grant to have had them of God, for them I thank him, and as his own I leave and restore them to him.

And for so much as I cannot but acknowledge that I have gone always backward from him so often as I would rule myself by my blind judgement, foolish wisdom, and devilish sprite, neither did so much as go one step forth toward God, but when I was moved, driven, and thrust forward of his Holy Sprite. Wherefore I commit to the highest God, my most dear Father, and to his governance all the world and specially myself. In him, as I may, I will help myself with mine own wit and freedom, namely, by making it obedient to him.

Moreover, if ever I have spoken or shall from henceforth utter any word, if I have done so or shall do any work that is to him pleasant, if I have had or after this time shall have thought, desire, or will that good is, I give it to God and at his hands I profess that I have had all my goodness, so that if it were God's will to take from me all that he hath given me, there should in me remain nothing but only sins. Those are mine own and all other things be his.

Thus be my sins if I should go before God's presence. I were but damned, if I were minded to make satisfaction I could not, no nor yet any saint that ever was. There is none whose love is so great to take my sins upon him and satisfy for them and appease God's anger save Christ alone. Wherefore to him I bequeath my sins, I leave to him my pride, unkindness, unbelief, mistrust, arrogancy, envy, wrath, ambition, and all my innumerable wickedness. I give to him my evil thoughts, affections,

---

1 certes certainly.

2 behoveful useful, advantageous.

3 effectual valid, effective.

4 expedient effective, to a purpose.

5 what hast … God's hands See 1 Corinthians 4:7.

and desires. To be short, I make one faggot[1] and bundle of all my offences present, past, and to come, and give them to Christ, having sure faith and steadfast hope that he will accept them for his own, and hath even already taken them, and for them hath satisfied on the cross. His Father laid them on his neck[2] and he did not once gainsay it, but of great love allowed them for his, and to consume and burn them in the flame of his divine love, he bore them on his innocent shoulders upon the cross (as Peter writeth)[3] and so was offered a sacrifice for us. Now seeing I have left all my sins to Christ and given to God my substance and being, with all[4] other gifts and graces that he bestowed on me, I remain naked without either good or evil and, truly to say, I am rather nothing, in that I have restored to God my being that I had by creation and birth.

But for because it is impossible that he should save me without being, and so it is that he will save me, therefore first I carry with me Christ himself, which is my life. [...] I carry also with me his sprite, that was of his eternal Father given me of his most royal liberality, as well declareth Paul, where he sayeth, God hath sent the sprite of his Son into our hearts whereby we cry and call Father, Father.[5]

And in that he hath given me him, he hath restored me to myself and former being, with a new substance and nature spiritual, so that for the possibility of my salvation, I have a being, but yet lack I treasure to discharge my great debts, and to appear rich in God's sight, in consideration whereof I bear with me Christ's watching, abstinences, travails,[6] prayers, persecutions, slanders. I take with me his tears, his sweat, his blood, and all that ever he did or suffered in three and thirty years is mine every deal,[7] and with lively faith I embrace it as for mine own. I embrace my sweet Jesus for mine own. He is my rightwiseness,[8] wisdom, ransom, and holiness, he is my strength, he is my sprite, my light, life, hope, and all my goodness. Even Christ himself in his last will bequeathed me all that he had of the Father. Wherefore he sayeth, I entertain you at my table as my Father hath used me, as my Father hath made me his heir so now I ordain you, I will that as you be my brethren so you shall be my followers.[9] [...]

Then should I do no small injury to Christ, if I should search to store[10] myself by any other mean or shift,[11] although I might do it never so easily, nay rather with Paul[12] will I reckon all other things as mire and dirt so that I have Christ, with whom alone I will appear before God, and of and by him will I glory and make boast. [...] We cannot promise ourselves too much of God's goodness, no we never can behete[13] us so much, but he will recompense much more. I will not suffer, therefore, that after my life any good be done for me. Truth it is that if I have any goods them must I leave to the poor flock of Christ, not because they should pray for me that am already saved, but for the use of other that live and shall be born, as Christ did, and also because the rather they may live godly, and know that they shall never lack that be his, and put their trust in him. To whom be always, honour and glory through Jesu Christ our Lord Amen.

—1548

---

1 faggot bundle of sticks.

2 he will accept them … on his neck allusion to Isaiah 53.

3 as Peter writeth See 1 Peter 3:18.

4 with all along with, in addition to.

5 God … call Father, Father See Galatians 4:6.

6 travails troubles, hardships.

7 every deal entirely, in every respect.

8 rightwiseness i.e., righteousness.

9 I entertain you … my followers See Luke 22:29-30.

10 store restore, sustain.

11 shift expedient.

12 with Paul i.e., 1 Corinthians 1:27-31.

13 behete promise.

from Fourteen Sermons of Barnardine Ochine,[1] Concerning the Predestination and Election of God; Very Expedient to the Setting Forth of His Glory Among His Creatures. Translated out of Italian into Our Native Tongue by A.C.

It is good to hide the King's secrets, but to declare and praise the works of God, it is an honourable thing. To. xii.

I will say to the north, let go and to the south, keep not back: but bring my sons and my daughters from the ends of the world, namely all those that be called after my name. For them have I created, fashioned and made for mine honour. Isa. xliii.[2]

To the Christian Reader.

When these translated sermons of the famous Barnardine were come to mine hand, gentle reader, I thought it meet[3] to publish them to the end so godly apostolic doctrine should not be private to those only which understand the Italian tongue, since through the honest travail of a well-occupied gentlewoman, and virtuous maiden they speak in English, whose shamefastness would rather have suppressed them, had not I, to whose hands they were committed half against her will, put them forth, bidding them blush that deserve blame. For this of her part, I dare safely affirm, craveth perpetual praise and if any pretty prickmedainties[4] shall happen to spy a mote in this godly labour (as I doubt not but the niceties[5] will), saying it is meeter for doctors of divinity to meddle with such matters than maidens, let them remember how womanly they waste their time the one part in pricking and trimming to vain heathenish ostentation, and in devising new fashions of apparel, to whom if in their glass appeared the foul faults of their filthy conditions as plainly as the defaults[6] of their foresaid faces, I doubt much whether they would delight to toot[7] therein so often as they do, the other part speaking in print like parrots with solemn countenances, debate matters of importance and grave weight as though the order of realms appertained[8] to them, or else warbling words of Scripture in all their doings, deface the thing they most babble of. But I require thee (Christian reader) with judgement to read, and in the equal balance of Scripture to weigh these learned and godly sermons, which thou shalt find (I doubt not) of just weight with the sacred word of God. I forbear to praise them, lest I should say too little, defend them I need not, the author living and here amongst us, a man whose life without words were a sufficient protection to his work. If ought[9] be erred in the translation, remember it is a woman's, yea, a gentlewoman's, who commonly are wonted[10] to live idly, a maiden's that never gadded farther than her father's house to learn the language. Farewell and use her labour to the amendment of thy life.

To the Right Worshipful and Worthily Beloved Mother, the Lady. F.[11] Her Humble Daughter Wisheth Increase of Spiritual Knowledge, with Full Fruition of the Fruits Thereof.

Since the original of whatsoever is, or may be converted to any good use, in me hath freely proceeded (though as the minister of God) of your ladyship's meet, careful, and motherly goodness,

---

1 Barnardine Ochine Bernardino Ochino (1487-1564), a Capuchin friar who became a reformist.

2 It is good … Isa. xliii Verses on the title page come from the apocryphal Book of Tobit and from the prophetic Book of Isaiah.

3 meet good, fitting.

4 prickmedainties finicky ones.

5 niceties those who are excessively refined.

6 defaults blemishes, defects.

7 toot proclaim loudly, trumpet.

8 appertained pertained to, belonged to.

9 ought anything.

10 wonted customary, usual.

11 Lady. F. Bacon's mother, Ann, daughter of Sir William Fitzwilliam.

as well in procuring all things thereunto belonging, as in your many, and most godly, exhortations, wherein among the rest it hath pleased you often to reprove my vain study in the Italian tongue, accompting[1] the seed thereof to have been sown in barren, unfruitful ground (since God thereby is no whit[2] magnified), I have at the last perceived it my duty to prove how much the understanding of your will could work in me towards the accomplishing of the same. And for that I have well known your chief delight to rest in the destroying of man his glory and exalting wholly the glory of God, which may not be unless we acknowledge that he doth foresee and determine from without beginning all things and cannot alter or reward after our deserved works, but remain steadfast, according to his immutable will, I have taken in hand to dedicate unto your ladyship this small number of sermons for the excellent fruit sake in them contained, proceeding from the happy spirit of the sanctified Barnardine, which treat of the election and predestination of God, with the rest (although not of the self[3] title) appertaining[4] to the same effect to the end it might appear that your so many worthy sentences touching the same have not utterly been without some note in my weak memory, and albeit they be not done in such perfection, as the dignity of the matter doth require, yet I trust and know ye will accept the humble will of the presenter, not weighing so much the excellency of the translation, although of right it ought to be such as should not by the grossness thereof deprive the author of his worthiness. But not meaning to take upon me the reach to his high style of theology and fearing also lest, in enterprising to set forth the brightness of his eloquence, I should manifest myself unapt to attain unto the lowest degree thereof. I descend, therefore, to the understanding of mine own debility.[5] Only requiring that it may please your ladyship to vouchsafe[6] that this my small labour may be allowed at your hands under whose protection only it is committed with humble reverence, as yielding some part of the fruit of your motherly admonitions in this my willing service.

Your ladyship's daughter most boundenly[7] obedient,

A.C.

—1551

Selected Letters

Letter to Lord Burghley[8]

[no date]

I know well, mine especial good lord, it becometh me not to be troublesome unto your Honour at any other time, but now chiefly at this season of your greatest affairs and small or no leisure; but yet because yesterday's morning speech,—as in that I was extraordinarily admitted it was your lordship's favour—so, fearing to stay too long, I could not so plainly speak, nor so well perceive your answer thereto as I would truly and gladly in that matter—I am bold by this writing to enlarge to same more plainly and to what end I did mean.

If it may like your good lordship, the report of the late conference at Lambeth[9] hath been so handled to the discrediting of those learned that labour for right reformation in the ministry of the Gospel, that it is no small grief of mind to the faithful preachers, because the matter is thus by the other side carried away as though their cause could not sufficiently be warranted by the word of God, for the which proof they have long been sad suitors, and would most humbly crave still, both of God in Heaven, whose cause it is, and of her Majesty their most excellent sovereign here on 1 accompting accounting.

2 whit bit, jot.
3 self same.
4 appertaining relating.
5 debility weakness, infirmity.
6 vouchsafe grant, permit.
7 boundenly according to bounden duty.
8 Lord Burghley William Cecil, husband of Bacon's sister, Mildred.
9 Lambeth Lambeth Palace is home to the archbishop of Canterbury.

earth, that they might obtain quiet and convenient[1] audience either before her Majesty herself, whose heart is in God his hand to touch and to turn, or before your Honours of the Council, whose wisdom they greatly reverence; and if they cannot strongly prove before you out [of] the word of God, that reformation which they so long have called and cried for to be according to Christ his own ordinance,[2] then to let them be rejected with shame out of the Church forever. And that this may be the better done to the glory of God and the true understanding of this great cause, they require first leave to assemble and consult together purposely, which they have forborne[3] to do, for avoiding suspicion of private conventicles.[4] For hitherto,[5] though in some writing they have declared the state of their, yea God his cause, yet were they never allowed to confer together, and so together be heard fully; but now some one, and then some two, called upon a sudden unprepared to forepreparedto catch them, rather than gravely and moderately to be heard to defend their right and good cause. And, therefore, for such weighty conference they appeal to her Majesty and her honourable wise Council,[6] whom God hath placed in highest authority for the advancement of his kingdom, and refuse the bishops for judges, who are parties partial in their own defence, because they seek more worldly ambition than the glory of Christ Jesus.

For mine own part, my good lord, I will not deny, but as I may hear them in their public exercises as a chief duty commanded by God to widows, and also I confess as one that hath found mercy, that I have profited more in the inward feeling knowledge of God his holy will, though but in a small measure, by such sincere and sound opening of the Scriptures by an ordinary preaching within these seven or eight years, than I did by hearing odd sermons at Paul's wellnigh[7] twenty years together [...] I mention this unfeignedly[8] the rather to excuse this my boldness towards your lordship, humbly beseeching your lordship to think upon their suit, and as God shall move your understanding heart to further it. And if opportunity will not be had as they require, yet I once again in humble wise am a suitor unto your lordship that you would be so good as to choose two or three of them, which it likes best, and license them before your own self, or other at your pleasure, to declare and to prove the truth of the cause, with a quiet and an attentive ear. I have heard them say or now, that they will not come to dispute and argue to breed contention, which is the manner of the bishops' hearing, but to be suffered patiently to lay down before them that shall command (they excepted), how well and certainly they can warrant[9] by the infallible touchstone[10] of the word the substantial and main ground of their cause. Surely, my Lord, I am persuaded you should do God acceptable service herein. And for the very entire affection I owe and do bear to your Honour, I wish from the very heart that to your other rare gifts sundry-wise you were fully instructed and satisfied in this principal matters, so contemned[11] of the great rabbis to the dishonour of the Gospel so long amongst us. I am so much bound to your lordship for your comfortable dealing towards me and mine, as I do incessantly desire that by your lordship's means God his glory may more and more be promoted, the grieved godly comforted, and you and yours abundantly blessed. None is privy[12] to this. And indeed, though I hear them, yet I see them very seldom.

I trust your lordship will accept in best part my best meaning.

In the Lord, dutifully and most heartily,

A. Bacon.

---

1 convenient favourable.

2 ordinance direction, command.

3 forborne avoided.

4 conventicles clandestine religious assemblies.

5 hitherto thus far, up to this point.

6 Council Elizabeth I's Privy Council, made up of her closest advisors.

7 wellnigh very nearly.

8 unfeignedly sincerely, honestly.

9 warrant guarantee as true.

10 touchstone test of genuineness or value.

11 contemned condemned.

12 privy familiar.

Lady Bacon to Anthony Bacon

3 February, 1592

The grace of God be daily multiplied in you, with mercy in Christ our Lord.

That you are returned now at length I am right glad. God bless it to us both. But when I heard withal[1] that Lawson,[2] who I foresuspected, stole hence unto you, and so belike hath wrought upon you again to your hurt, to serve his own turn as heretofore,[3] how welcome that could be to your long-grieved mother, judge you. I can hardly say whether your gout or his company were the worse tidings. I have entertained this gentleman, Mr. Fant,[4] to do so much kindness for me as to journey towards you, because your brother is preparing your lodging at Gray's Inn[5] very carefully for you. I thank God that Mr. Fant was willing so to do, and was very glad, because he is not only an honest gentleman in civil behaviour, but one that feareth God indeed, and as wise withal, having experience of our state, and is able to advise you both very wisely and friendly. For he loveth yourself, and needeth not yours, as others have and yet dis[semble][6] with you. He doth me pleasure in this, for I could not have found another so very meet for you and me in all the best and most necessary respects. Use him therefore, good son, and make much of such, and of their godly and sound friendly counsel. This one chiefest counsel your Christian and natural mother doth give you even before the Lord, that above all worldly respects you carry yourself ever at your first coming as one that doth unfeignedly profess the true religion of Christ, and hath the love of the truth now by long continuance[7] fast settled in your heart, and that with judgment, wisdom, and discretion, and are not afraid or ashamed to testify the same by hearing and delighting in those religious exercises of the sincerer sort, be they French or English. In hoc noli adhibere fratrem tuum ad consilium aut exemplum. Sed plus dehinc.[8] If you will be wavering (which God forbid, God forbid), you shall have examples and ill encouragers too many in these days. [...] Beware, therefore, and be constant in godly profession without fainting, and that from your heart: for formality wanteth none with us, but too common. Be not speedy of speech nor talk suddenly, but where discretion requireth, and that soberly then. For the property of our world is to sound out at first coming, and after to contain. Courtesy is necessary, but too common familiarity in talking and words is very unprofitable, and not without hurt-taking, ut nunc sunt tempora.[9] Remember you have no father. And you have little enough, if not too little, regarded your kind and no simple mother's wholesome advice from time to time. And as I do impute[10] all most humbly to the grace of God whatsoever he hath bestowed upon me, so dare I affirm that it had been good for you every way if you had followed it long ere this. But God is the same, who is able to heal both mind and body, whom in Christ I beseech to be your merciful father and take care of you, guiding you with his holy and most comfortable spirit, now and ever.

Let not Lawson, that fox, be acquainted with my letters. I disdain both it and him. He commonly opened underminingly all letters sent to you from counsel or friends, I know it, and you may too much, if God open your eyes as I trust he will. Send it back, to be sure, by Mr. Fant sealed,

---

[1] withal in addition, besides.

[2] Lawson Anthony Bacon's servant, Thomas Lawson, whom his mother contrived to have arrested on suspicion of being a papist in order to have her son recalled to England (DNB online).

[3] heretofore as in time past, as before.

[4] Mr. Fant Nicholas Faunt, one of Francis Walsingham's secretaries and a close friend to Anthony Bacon (DNB online). Walsingham was the head of Elizabeth I's secret service.

[5] Gray's Inn one of the Inns of Court (i.e., law schools) in London.

[6] dis[semble] The rest of the word is illegible in the manuscript (J. Spedding, ed., The Letters and the Life of Francis Bacon, vol. 1, London, 1874, p. 112).

[7] continuance perseverance, persistence.

[8] In hoc noli … Sed plus dehinc Latin, "I do not wish to use your brother as counsel or example. But [will do] more henceforth."

[9] ut nunc sunt tempora Latin, "although now is the right time."

[10] impute attribute, ascribe.

but it will pry and prattle. So fare you well, and the Lord bless you and keep you for ever.

Your mother,

A. Bacon.

Lady Bacon to Anthony Bacon

29th of May, 1592

I am glad and thank God of your amendment.[1] But my man said he heard you rose at three of the clock. I thought that was not well, so suddenly from bedding much to rise so early, newly out of your diet. Extremities be hurtful to the whole, more to the sickly. [...] Be wise and godly too, and discern what is good and what not for your health. [...] I like not your lending your coach yet to any lord or lady. If you once begin, you shall hardly end. [...] It was not well it was so soon into the Court, to make talk and at last procured[2] or misliked.[3] Tell your brother I counsel you to send it no more. What had my Lady Shreifess[4] to borrow your coach?

Lady Bacon to Anthony Bacon

On the 24th of July, 1592

I thank you for your letter, but I understand not one chief point, nor do not desire yet but you had need be very circumspect[5] and wise. [...] I assure you I ask not nor know not where Lawson is, but this I counsel: be very wary that his very subtle and working head work not your cumber.[6] You have been long absent and by your sickliness cannot be your own agent, and so, wanting right judgement of our state, may be much deceived. That which you did for the merchants was scantly[7] well taken, and fell not out as you looked.[8] And I remember once you dealt with — I wot[9] not wherefore,[10] it is a good while since, but both envy and also dislike did appear, some doubting your soundness in religion, you were so great with some such great papist then. Have a sure warrant and ground, lest you may purchase[11] your encumbrance[12] without good success, contrary to your expectation. [...] Be not overcredulous[13] nor too open. Sub omni lapide latet diebus[14] [...] This Monday one brought hither for you from Mr. Gray dozen ½ pigeons,[15] whereof I send you the dozen, [...] which I send all by Peter my cook. I would your brother's cook were like him in Christian behaviour; and yet a young man and merry. Give him a shilling, because he had good will to carry them on foot.

Francis Allen[16] about Lady Bacon

17th August, 1589

Upon my arrival at Godombury[17] my lady used me courteously until such time I began to move her for Mr. Lawson and, to say the truth, for yourself, being much transported with your abode there that she let not to say that you are a traitor to God and your country, you have undone her; you seek her death; and when you have that you seek for, you shall have but a hundred pounds more than you have now.

She is resolved to procure her Majesty's letter to force you to return, and when that should be, if

---

1 amendment correction.

2 procured urged.

3 misliked disapproved of.

4 Lady Shreifess Lady Sheriffess. As a widow, Bacon ran the estate and heard the disputes of its tenants.

5 circumspect cautious, considered.

6 cumber distress, embarrassment.

7 scantly scarcely, hardly.

8 looked expected.

9 wot know.

10 wherefore why.

11 purchase obtain, bring about.

12 encumbrance annoyance, trouble.

13 overcredulous too believing.

14 Sub omni lapide latet diebus Latin, "hide all beneath a stone for a time."

15 dozen ½ pigeons a dozen and a half.

16 Francis Allen friend of Anthony Bacon, whom he sent to his mother to reassure her of Lawson's probity (DNB online).

17 Godombury Gorhambury, the Bacon family's Hertfordshire estate.

her Majesty give you your right to desert, she should clap you up in prison. She cannot abide to hear of you, as she saith, nor of the other especially, and told me plainly she should be the worse this month for my coming without you, and axed[1] me why you could not have come from thence as well as myself.

She saith you are hated of all the chiefest on that side, and cursed of God in all your actions, since Mr. Lawson's being with you.

I am sorry to write it, considering his deserts[2] and your love towards him; but the truth will be known at the last, and better late than never; it is vain to look for Mr. Lawson's return, for these are her ladyship's own words: "No, no" saith she, "I have learned not to employ ill to good; and if there were no more men in England, and although you should never come home, he shall never come to you." [...]

It is as unpossible to persuade my lady to send him as for myself to send you Paul's steeple.[3] [...]

I must confess your brother, Mr. Francis Bacon, is most tractable[4] and most earnest, if possible it may be done, to fulfill your demand. He hath used me with great humanity, for which I humbly pray you to give him thanks.

My lady seemed to be angry with me because I had brought this bearer, Guillaume, from you, saying you had but one honest and trusty man, and I had deboshed[5] him from you, which is cause I have taken resolution to send him to you again. I send him not more willingly than he is willing to return.

Mr. Lawson is in great necessity, and your brother dares not help him, in respect of my lady's displeasure. [...]

My lady said she rather you made the wars with the King of Navarre[6] than to have stayed so long idle in Montoban,[7] and with great earnestness, also tears in her eyes, she wished that when she heard of Mr. Selum's[8] imprisonment you had been fairly buried, provided you had died in the Lord. In my simple judgment she spoke it in her passion, and repented immediately her words.

When you have received your provision, make your repair[9] home again, lest you be a means to shorten her days, for she told me the grief of mind received daily by your stay will be her end, and saith her jewels be spent for you, and that she borrowed the last money of seven several persons.

Thus much I must confess unto you for a conclusion, that I have never seen nor never shall see a wise lady and honourable woman, a mother, more perplexed for her son's absence than I have seen that honourable dame of yours.—Therefore lay your hand on your heart, look not for Mr. Lawson; here he hath, as a man say, heaven and earth against him and his return.

If you think much of my plainness, take heed you give me no authority another time, for I shall do the like.

F. Allen.

---

1 axed asked.

2 deserts merits, deserving.

3 Paul's steeple steeple of St. Paul's Cathedral in London.

4 tractable compliant, easily persuaded.

5 deboshed i.e., debauched, drawn away, enticed.

6 King of Navarre Henry of Navarre (1553-1610), leader of the Protestant community in France.

7 Montoban Montauban, where Anthony Bacon lived for five years in close contact with Henry of Navarre's counsellors (DNB online).

8 Mr. Selum Ned Selwyn, one of Anthony Bacon's companions in Montauban.

9 repair return.

Lady Jane (or Joanna) Lumley
1537-1578

The eldest daughter of Henry Fitzalan, twelfth earl of Arundel, and his wife, Katherine Grey, Jane Lumley clearly received an excellent humanist education. In her teens she produced the first English translation from the Greek of Euripides' Iphigenia at Aulis, as well as Latin translations of five of Isocrates' Greek orations. Both of these works seem to have been meant as a New Year's gift for her father, prefaced by two dedicatory Latin letters addressed to him. Lumley's Iphigeneia, its dedicatory letters, and translations of Isocrates are part of a manuscript volume that was clearly a commonplace book or rough copybook, and with only two minor exceptions the book is entirely in Jane Lumley's hand.

Lumley was encouraged in her intellectual pursuits by her husband, John, first Baron Lumley (c. 1533-1609), whom she married sometime between 1550 and 1553. They had three children together, two sons and one daughter, all of whom died young. John Lumley was himself a scholar, book-collector, and writer, producing a translation of Erasmus's Institution of a Christian Prince or Ruler in 1550, and eventually amassing the largest private library in England at the time. John also dedicated his translation to Jane's father, so it is possible that the works were "companion pieces," particularly given their shared theme: "the subordination of the self for the good of one's country."[1]

As Catholics, the Lumleys and Arundels were caught up in the politics of mid-century, particularly in the struggle for the throne following the death of Edward VI. Stephanie Hodgson-Wright has argued that Jane Lumley may have partly chosen Iphigenia at Aulis as a text for translation in light of the many parallels between Lumley's cousin, Lady Jane Grey, and the character of Iphigenia. There are also connections between Lumley and Lady Jane Grey: they were close in age, similarly educated, and had the same Christian name. Lumley's unfortunate cousin Grey had been manipulated into claiming the throne of England. Through the concerted scheming of Jane Lumley's father, Lady Jane Grey was eventually imprisoned and executed, making way for the Catholic monarch Mary I to ascend the throne. Lumley's proximity to the tragic manipulation and destruction of her cousin inform her translation of Euripides' play. Lumley relied on both the Latin and Greek versions of the play available to her, but her translation is far from literal.[2] Indeed, until recently Lumley's translation was seen as a poor one by many classical scholars, citing the work's inaccuracies and omissions.[3] Paring down the chorus, rejecting ornamental prose in favour of a plain, direct style, yet retaining all "the vital ingredients of Euripides's original story," Lumley creates not only an energetic and highly stageable play, but one where the central "moral dilemma" is emphasized and the play's commentary on "the religious, political and dynastic concerns of sixteenth-century England" becomes apparent.[4]

EDITIONS: "Letter 1" and "Letter 2" translated from the Latin originals in BL Royal MS 15 A. IX; Here Beginneth the Tragedy of Euripides Called Iphigeneia in Iphigenia at Aulis. Translated by Lady Lumley, ed. H.H. Child. The Malone Society reprints, gen. ed. W.W. Greg (Chiswick, 1909).

---

1 Beilin, Redeeming Eve (Princeton, 1987), pp. 154, 155.

2 "Jane Lumley's Iphigenia at Aulis: multum in parvo, or less is more," in Readings in Renaissance Women's Drama, ed. S.P. Cerasano and M. Wynne-Davies (London, 1998), pp. 130-34.

3 See for example D.H. Greene, "Lady Lumley and Greek Tragedy," Classical Journal 36 (1941): 537-47; and Frank Crane, "Euripides, Erasmus and Lady Lumley," Classical Journal 39 (1944): 223-28.

4 Ibid, pp. 130-31.

[from Jane Lumley's Commonplace Book: Dedicatory Letters and Translations from Euripides and Isocrates][1]

Letter 1[2]

It is established in the custom and habit of people, most honoured father, that individuals give to their friends at the start of a new year tokens of those skills which they profess. In this way they are able both to practice their skills and to do their friends a favour. I was impelled by this good and honourable motive, most distinguished father, to present to you these two short orations, which I have translated from Greek into Latin, as a sort of mark of my devotion, partly because I know that you are especially pleased by such things and are zealous for knowledge, and partly so that I might hone my skills by working with Greek and Latin at the same time. Indeed, this type of practice is so highly approved by all learned and educated men that it in no way needs to be praised by me now. Please accept, then, I beg you, these two orations, which I have decided to give you at this time because I would judge them to be very well-suited to your authority and wisdom. Indeed, Isocrates, that most eloquent orator, wrote the first one to Nicocles as the latter was about to become ruler of the republic on Cyprus, in order that, furnished with good instructions and sound precepts for living, he might be made fitter to govern it. In this oration he teaches with great wisdom and brevity the duty of a king and magistrate, and how he ought to conduct himself toward his subjects in any situation. But in the second oration Isocrates represents Nicocles speaking to his subjects; in this way, he most ingeniously shows the people's respect toward their rulers, just as in the first he shows the king's duty toward his subjects. I have translated these so that the Greek corresponds closely with the Latin, and the Latin with the Greek. The orations are delightful for reading, short for learning, useful for encouraging, and most beneficial for imitating. Wherefore I beg and beseech that you regard this, my own effort in translation, with kindness and favour, and that you approve my trifling little gift. For the rest, I pray to God, the best and greatest,[3] that he long keep you safe and sound for the state and for us. Farewell.

Your daughter, most devoted to you,
Jane Lumley

—date unknown

Letter 2

Cicero, most honoured father, that famous orator and serious philosopher, not only in the study of philosophy, but also in rhetorical training, was accustomed to join Greek with Latin, teaching that one could derive certain inconsequential and commonplace things from the latter and richer more solid things from the former. By his authority I was especially moved to devote myself, as much as I could, to the learning of Greek literature, judging it to be a disgrace to be at odds with the opinion of one whom I had always valued highly before. He desired that his own son, whom he sent to Athens to learn the liberal arts, be persuaded of this above all, urging him to mix Greek with Latin more often, because in this way he could get more enjoyment and benefit from them. Prompted by this noble motive, most cherished father, I have translated from Greek into Latin the oration which Isocrates wrote to Nicocles in praise of his father Euagoras. It is the fourth of those orations which I have rendered into Latin in gratitude for your lordship in recent years. I have always taken incredible pleasure in reading this one, for it is elegant in the brilliance of its words, apt in construction, abundant in skill, wise in thought, and venerable in every respect. The divine Plato, in the Phaedrus,[1] had Socrates praise this man wonderfully as being entirely his own equal—and Socrates was called the greatest orator by all learned men. The writings of Isocrates are so abundant in good advice and weighty thought, that one could rightly call him not so much an orator as a perfect philosopher. I would write more in his praise, if not for the fact that I have gone on at length about him in my previous writings to your lordship. And so in this oration, which he intended to praise Euagoras, he is much engaged in praising Nicocles, because he [Nicocles] so zealously and splendidly and with such great ceremony graced his father's funeral. Then he most eloquently teaches him with what zeal, what skill, and with how much toil and danger he strove for supreme command. Finally he shows that Euagoras was not so concerned with expanding his realm as with ruling it most virtuously and scrupulously. This oration is as delightful to read, most honoured father, as it is fruitful to use and practise. Wherefore I beg and beseech that you accept this, my rough and unskilled version, with kindness. If you do, you will certainly hearten me to take on greater projects in future. For when I thought more often about your kindnesses, which you most generously bestowed on me from the day I was born, I had to write something[2] by which you would understand my deference to your lordship, and also that I was grateful to you for those various kindnesses. For the rest, may God, the best and greatest, long preserve you safe and unharmed for us and for our state.

[1] The MS volume is labelled on the spine, "Isocrates, Orations, Etc."; the front cover is stamped with the Lumley family crest and the motto of the Order of the Garter, Honi soit qui mal y pense ("Evil be to him that thinks evil"). The fly leaf inscription is in a different hand from Jane Lumley's and it reads: "The doing of my Lady Lumley daughter to my L[ord] the earl of Arundell."

[2] These two letters were translated by Jonathan Entwistle (St. Andrew's, Edinburgh) with suggestions by Michael Treschow (UBC-O, Canada).

[3] the best and greatest in Latin, optimum maximum, an epithet which the Romans often applied to Jupiter. See the end of the following letter for the same usage.

Farewell.

End of Letter.

—date unknown

[1] Phaedrus, 279A and B.

[2] literally, "I was not able not to write something."

from The Tragedy of Euripides Called Iphigenia.[3]

[...]

CLYTEMNESTRA: Harken now, I pray you, therefore, for I must needs tell you of your fault. Do you not remember that you married me without the goodwill of all my friends,[4] taking me away with strong hand after that you had slain my other husband Tantalus, which cruel deeds my brother Castor and Pollux would have revenged except Tindarus my father had delivered you out of that peril? So that by his means, you did obtain me to be your wife, who after I was married never showed myself disobedient unto you in anything. And then I happened to have three sons at one birth, and afterward one daughter, and will you now slay her, knowing no just cause why? For if any man should ask of you the cause of the death of your daughter, you would answer "for Helen's sake," which can be no lawful cause, for it is not meet[5] that we should slay our own child for a [3] The story of Iphigenia is retold in a number of classical works. In essence, the story that Euripides inherits runs like this: the Greek fleet is set to sail from Aulis to Troy to revenge Paris' theft of Helen from her husband Menelaus, younger brother of Agamemnon and king of Sparta. However the goddess Artemis (Diana) has called up contrary winds which prevent the ships from sailing. For a reason which is never really made clear, she demands the sacrifice of Iphigenia, the daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, in exchange for propitious winds and a safe journey. At this point, the two major classical versions of the tale diverge: in Aeschylus' Agamemnon Iphigenia is an unwilling victim right until the moment of her death, while in Euripides' Iphigenia at Aulis, the bound and gagged victim has become an eloquent saint, willing to die for her country and in obedience to the will of the gods. Euripides' version also tends to highlight the flaws and frailties of Homer's heroes, particularly Agamemnon. The tragedy's "happy ending" where Iphigenia is snatched away by the gods at the moment of her execution and a hind left in her place is not Euripides' work, but was added much later. While it is usually omitted or relegated to an appendix in modern editions of the play, it was part of all earlier editions, including that which Lumley would have used. See C.R. Walker, "Introduction to Iphigenia at Aulis," The Complete Greek Tragedies: Euripides-Vol. IV, 4 vols., ed. D. Grene and R. Lattimore (Chicago, 1959), pp. 290-95.

[4] friends relations, kinsfolk.

[5] meet fitting, proper.

naughty woman's sake; neither destroy those that by nature we ought to love for their cause only which are hated of all men. Besides this, if you kill my daughter, what lamentation must I needs make when I shall go home and want the company of her, considering that she was slain by the hands of her own father? Wherefore if you will not be moved with pity, take heed lest you compel me to speak those things that do not become a good wife, yea and you yourself do those things that a good man ought not. But tell me now, I pray you, what good do you obtain by the death of your daughter? Do you look for a fortunate return? Truly you cannot by this means get that, for that journey cannot end happily which is begun with mischief.[1] Beside this, surely you shall stir up the gods to anger against you, for they do even hate them that are manquellers.[2] Again, you cannot enjoy the company of your other children when you come home, for they will even fear and abhor you, seeing that willingly you do destroy your daughter. And you shall not only fall into this mischief, but also you shall purchase yourself the name of a cruel tyrant. For you were chosen the captain over the Grecians to execute justice to all men, and not to do both me and also your children such an injury, for it is not meet that your children should be punished for that which pertaineth not to you; neither ought I to lose my daughter for Helena's cause, who hath never showed herself faithful to her husband.

CHORUS: It is meet, Agamemnon, that you should follow your wife's counsel, for it is not lawful that a father should destroy his child.

IPHIGENIA: Now, O father, I kneeling upon my knees and making most humble suit do most earnestly desire you to have pity upon me, your daughter, and not to slay me so cruelly. For you know it is given to all mortal men to be desirous of life. Again, remember that I am your daughter, and how you seemed ever to love me best of all your children, insomuch that you were wont ever to desire that you might see me married to one worthy of my degree,[3] and I did ever wish again that I might live to see you an old man, that you might have much joy both of me and also of your other children. And will you now consent to my death, forgetting both that which you were wont to say and also what pain you and my mother took in bringing me up, knowing no cause in me worthy of death? For what have I to do with Helena? But now, father, seeing you are nothing moved with my lamentation, I will call hither my young brother Orestes, for I know he will be sorry to see his sister slain, and again you cannot choose but you must needs have pity either of him or else of me, considering what a lawful request we do desire; for you know that all men are desirous of life, and there is no wise man but he will choose rather to live in misery than to die.

AGAMEMNON: I know in what things I ought to show pity and wherein I ought not, and I love my children as it becometh a father, for I do not this of myself nor yet for my brother's sake, but rather by compulsion of the host;[4] for the gods have answered that they cannot pass the sea without your death, and they are so desirous to go thither that they care not what trouble and misery they suffer so that they may see it. Wherefore it lieth not in my power to withstand them, for I am not able to make any resistance against them. I am therefore compelled, daughter, to deliver you to them.

CLYTEMNESTRA: Alas, daughter, into what misery are both you and I driven, seeing that your own father will consent to your death.

IPHIGENIA: Alas, mother, this is the last day that ever I shall see you! O unhappy Troy, which hast nourished and brought up that wicked man Paris! O unfortunate Venus, which didest promise to give Helena to him, for you have been the cause of my destruction, though indeed I through my death

[1] with mischief evilly.

[2] manquellers manslayers, murderers.

[3] degree social position or rank.

[4] the host the Greek army.

shall purchase the Grecians a glorious victory. Alas, mother, in what an unlucky time was I born, that mine own father, which hath consented unto my death, doth now forsake me in this misery! I would to God that the Grecians had never taken in hand this journey! But methinks, mother, I see a great company of men coming hither. What are they, I pray you?

CLYTEMNESTRA: Truly, yonder is Achilles.

IPHIGENIA: Let me then, I pray you, go hence that I may hide my face, for I am ashamed.

CLYTEMNESTRA: What cause have you so to do?

IPHIGENIA: Truly, because it was said that I should have been his wife.

CLYTEMNESTRA: Daughter, you must lay away all shamefastness[1] now, for you may use no niceness,[2] but rather prove[3] by what means you may best save your life.

[...]

ACHILLES: Do you not see a great company of harnessed[4] men?

CLYTEMNESTRA: I pray God they be your friends.

ACHILLES: Yes, truly, that they be.

CLYTEMNESTRA: Then I hope my daughter shall not die.

ACHILLES: No, that she shall not, if I can help her.

CLYTEMNESTRA: But will there come anybody hither to slay her?

ACHILLES: Yea, truly, Ulysses will be here anon[5] with a great company of men to take her away.

CLYTEMNESTRA: Is he commanded to do so, or doth he it but of his own head?[6]

ACHILLES: No, truly, he is not commanded.

CLYTEMNESTRA: Alas then he hath taken upon him a wicked deed, seeing he will defile himself with the danger and death of my daughter.

ACHILLES: Truly but I will not suffer him.

CLYTEMNESTRA: But if he go about to take my daughter away with strong power, what shall I do then?

ACHILLES: You were best to keep her by you, for the matter shall be driven to that point.

IPHIGENIA: Harken, O mother I pray you, unto my words, for I perceive you are angry with your husband, which you may not do, for you cannot obtain your purpose by that means. And you ought rather to have thanked Achilles, because he so gently[7] hath promised you his help, which may happen to bring him into a great mischief. I would counsel you, therefore, to suffer this trouble patiently, for I must needs die and will suffer it willingly. Consider, I pray you mother, for what a lawful cause I shall be slain. Doth not both the destruction of Troy and also the wealth[8] of Greece, which is the most fruitful country of the world, hang upon my death? And if this wicked enterprise of the Trojans be not revenged, then truly the Grecians shall not keep neither their children nor yet their wives in peace. And I shall not only remedy all these things with my death, but also get a glorious renown to the Grecians forever. Again remember how I was not born for your sake only, but rather for the commodity[9] of my country.[10] Think you, therefore, that it is meet that such a company of men, being gathered together to revenge the great injury which all Greece hath suffered, should be let[11] of their journey for my cause? Surely, mother, we cannot speak against this, for do you not think it to be better that I should die than so many noble men to be let of their journey for one woman's sake? For one noble man is better than a thousand women. Besides this, seeing my death is determined amongst the 1 shamefastness modesty; bashfulness, shyness.

---

2 niceness reserve; perhaps, fastidiousness.

3 prove endeavour to learn.

4 harnessed armed, dressed in armour.

5 anon straightaway.

6 of his own head out of his own thought or will; of his own accord.

7 gently as befits one of gentle birth; generously, nobly, courteously.

8 wealth the common or public welfare.

9 commodity advantage, benefit.

10 I was not born ... country a variation on the classical commonplace: "... as Plato has admirably expressed it, we are not born for ourselves alone, but our country claims a share of our being, and our friends a share." See Cicero, De Officiis ("On Duties"), 1.7.22.

11 let hindered, prevented.

gods, truly no mortal man ought to withstand it. Wherefore I will offer myself willingly to death for my country, for by this means I shall not only leave a perpetual memory of my death, but I shall cause also the Grecians to rule over the barbarians, which doth as it were properly belong to them. For the Grecians by nature are free, like as the barbarians are born to bondage.

CHORUS: Surely you are happy, O Iphigenia, that you can suffer so patiently all this trouble.

ACHILLES: Truly, I would count myself happy if I might obtain thee, O Iphigenia, to be my wife, and I think thee, O Greece, to be very fortunate because thou hast nourished such a one, for you have spoken very well, in that you will not strive against the determination of the gods.[1] Wherefore I being not only moved with pity, for that I see you brought into such a necessity, but also stirred up more with love towards you, desiring to have you to my wife, will promise you faithfully to withstand the Grecians, as much as shall lie in my power, that they shall not slay you.

IPHIGENIA: Surely, I have spoken even as I thought indeed. Wherefore I shall desire you, O Achilles, not to put yourself in danger for my cause, but suffer[2] me rather to save all Greece with my death.

ACHILLES: Truly I wonder greatly at the boldness of your mind. And because you seem to be so willing to die, I cannot speak against you. Yet nevertheless I will promise to help you still, lest you should happen to change your mind.

IPHIGENIA: Wherefore, mother, do you hold your peace, lamenting so within yourself?

CLYTEMNESTRA: Alas, I, wretched creature, have great cause to mourn.

IPHIGENIA: Be of good comfort, mother, I pray you, and follow my counsel and do not tear your clothes so.

CLYTEMNESTRA: How can I do otherwise, seeing I shall lose you?

IPHIGENIA: I pray you, mother, study not to save my life, for I shall get you much honour by my death.

CLYTEMNESTRA: What, shall not I lament your death?

IPHIGENIA: No truly you ought not, seeing that I shall both be sacrificed to the goddess Diana and also save Greece.

CLYTEMNESTRA: Well, I will follow your counsel, daughter, seeing you have spoken so well. But tell me, what shall I say to your sisters from you?

IPHIGENIA: Desire them, I pray you, not to mourn for my death.

CLYTEMNESTRA: And what shall I say unto the other virgins from you?

IPHIGENIA: Bid them all farewell in my name, and, I pray you, for my sake bring up my little brother Orestes till he come to man's age.

CLYTEMNESTRA: Take your leave of him, for this is the last day that ever you shall see him.

IPHIGENIA: Farewell, my well-beloved brother, for I am even as it were compelled to love you, because you were so glad to help me.

CLYTEMNESTRA: Is there any other thing that I may do for you at Greece?

IPHIGENIA: No, truly, but I pray you not to hate my father for this deed, for he is compelled to do it for the wealth and honour of Greece.

CLYTEMNESTRA: If he hath done this willingly, then truly he hath committed a deed far unworthy of such a noble man as he is.

[...]

CLYTEMNESTRA: And will you go away, O daughter, leaving me your mother here?

IPHIGENIA: Yea surely, mother, I must go from you unto such a place from whence I shall never come again, although I have not deserved it.

[1] Lumley spells both "gods" and "goddess" as "goddes," and thus here and in one other place (see p. 187, l.351) it is somewhat unclear which one she means. I have adopted here a reading which is closest to a modern translation of the play. Here, Walker translates these lines as, "You gave up the fight /Against God's will and chose the thing that was/Good and fated ..." (lines 1411-13, p. 371).

[2] suffer permit, allow.

CLYTEMNESTRA: I pray you, daughter, tarry, and do not forsake me now!

IPHIGENIA: Surely I will go hence, mother, for if I did tarry I should move you to more lamentation. Wherefore I shall desire all you women to sing some song of my death, and to prophesy good luck unto the Grecians, for with my death I shall purchase unto them a glorious victory. Bring me therefore unto the altar of the temple of the goddess Diana, that with my blood I may pacify the wrath of the goddess against you.

CHORUS: O Queen Clytemnestra of most honour, after what fashion shall we lament, seeing we may not show any token of sadness at the sacrifice?

IPHIGENIA: I would not have you to mourn for my cause, for I will not refuse to die.

CHORUS: Indeed by this means you shall get yourself a perpetual renown forever.

IPHIGENIA: Alas, thou sun which art comfort to man's life, O thou light which dost make joyful all creatures, I shall be compelled by and by[1] to forsake you all and to change my life.

CHORUS: Behold, yonder goeth the virgin to be sacrificed with a great company of soldiers after her, whose beautiful face and fair body anon shall be defiled with her own blood. Yet happy art thou, O Iphigenia, that with thy death thou shalt purchase unto the Grecians a quiet passage, which I pray God may not only happen fortunately unto them, but also that they may return again prosperously with a glorious victory.

NUNTIO:[2] Come hither, O Clytemnestra, for I must speak with you.

CLYTEMNESTRA: Tell me, I pray you, what would you with me that you call so hastily? Is there any more mischief[3] in hand that I must hear of?

NUNTIO: I must tell you of a wonder which hath happened at the sacrificing of your daughter.

CLYTEMNESTRA: Show me, I pray you, quickly what it is!

NUNTIO: As we went unto the place where the sacrifice should be, and passed through the pleasant fields where the whole host waited for your daughter, Agamemnon seeing her brought unto her death began to lament and weep. But she, perceiving what moan her father made, said unto him these words, "O father, I am come hither to offer my body willingly for the wealth of my country. Wherefore seeing that I shall be sacrificed for the commodity of all Greece, I do desire you that none of the Grecians may slay me privily,[4] for I will make no resistance against you." And when she had spoken these words, all they which were present were wonderfully astonied[5] at the stoutness of her mind. So after this, Achilles with the rest of the whole host began to desire the goddess Diana, that she would accept the sacrifice of the virgin's blood, and that she would grant them a prosperous success of their journey. And when they had made an end, the priest, taking the sword in his hand, began to look for a place convenient, where he might slay your daughter; suddenly there chanced a great wonder, for although all the people heard the voice[6] of the stroke, yet she vanished suddenly away. And when all they marvelling at it began to give a great scritch,[7] then there appeared unto them a white hart lying before the altar, strudgeling[8] for life. And Calchas, being then present and seeing what had happened, did wonderfully rejoice, and told the captains that this hart was sent of the goddess, because she would not have her altar defiled with the blood of your daughter. Moreover he said that this was a token of good luck, and that their journey should chance prosperously unto them. Wherefore he willed that

1 by and by soon, shortly.

2 Nuntio Latin, "messenger."

3 mischief evil, misfortune, trouble.

4 privily privately (as opposed to publicly).

5 astonied surprised, amazed, astonished.

6 As Child notes, this word is possibly "uoice" or "noice" and thus "noise" (p. ix).

7 scritch screech, shriek, loud cry.

8 strudgeling struggling.

they should tarry no longer here. And when this was so finished, Agamemnon willed me to show all these things unto you, because that I myself was present there. Wherefore I shall desire you to think no unkindness in the king your husband, for surely the secret power of the gods will save them whom they love, for this day your daughter hath been both alive and dead.

CHORUS: Surely, O Clytemnestra, you ought to rejoice of this news, that your daughter is taken up into Heaven.

CLYTEMNESTRA: But I am in doubt whether I should believe that thou, O daughter, art amongst the gods, or else that they have feigned it to comfort me.

CHORUS: Behold, yonder cometh Agamemnon, who can tell the truth of all this matter.

AGAMEMNON: Truly, wife, we are happy for our daughter's sake, for surely she is placed in Heaven. But now I think it best that you go home, seeing that we shall take our journey so shortly unto Troy. Wherefore now fare you well. And of this matter I will commune more at my return, and in the mean season I pray God send you well to do, and your heart's desire.

CHORUS: O happy Agamemnon, the gods[1] grant thee a fortunate journey unto Troy, and a most prosperous return again.

Finis.

—c. 1554

[1] Walker and at least one other modern translator omit any reference here to the gods: "With joy, son of Atreus, sail on / To the Phrygian land, / With joy return, / Bringing glorious spoil from Troy!" (trans. C.R. Walker, Appendix, lines 1628-31, p. 387).

Richard Tottel

b. in or before 1528-d. 1593

Richard Tottel's Songs and Sonnets was first published 5 June 1557 and was an immediate success: another edition appeared within seven weeks and seven further editions were published during the reign of Queen Elizabeth. The collection marks the early stages of the move from manuscript circulation of poetry to the printed text; in his preface, "The Printer to the Reader," Tottel criticizes authors who limit the circulation of their poetry—"the ungentle hoarders up of such treasure"—and envisions his collection providing "profit and pleasure" for a much larger audience. By connecting his publication with such a noble purpose as "the honour of the English tongue" and the "profit of the studious of English eloquence," Tottel raises the status of the author and claims a humanist and nationalist function for poetry.

Tottel's first edition differs significantly from the second and subsequent editions. The first edition included forty poems by Nicholas Grimald (b. 1519/20-d. in or before 1562), the same number as the Earl of Surrey; the second edition includes only ten of Grimald's poems and his name is reduced to his initials; it is unclear why his status was thus diminished. The remaining poems were rearranged, and 39 additional poems by "Uncertain Authors" were added. In all editions, the poetry of Henry Howard, earl of Surrey (1516/17-47) and Sir Thomas Wyatt (c. 1503-42) takes precedence. The selections here are based on the second edition.

Surrey was a soldier and courtier, and his family was descended from and associated with royalty: his first cousin was Catherine Howard, fifth wife of Henry VIII, and in his youth Surrey himself was the companion of Henry's illegitimate son, Henry Fitzroy, duke of Richmond, who married Surrey's sister. Surrey was accused of a number of minor offences such as striking a courtier. In 1547 he was executed for treason, for quartering part of the royal arms on his own coat of arms. Surrey's poetry examines some of the tensions of court life, and also reveals a devotion to the elder poet Wyatt: four of Surrey's poems on Wyatt are included in Tottel's collection.

Wyatt also examines the power struggles within Henry VIII's Court. He was involved in international diplomacy and held a number of court positions. Rumours that he was Anne Boleyn's lover cannot be substantiated, although in 1536 he was arrested along with five others for adultery with her. No official charges were laid against Wyatt, and he was released shortly thereafter. Anne Boleyn and the other men were not so lucky. Scholars have noted a number of poems which may refer to Boleyn, but Tottel, sensitive to the political climate, did not include these in his collection. The most famous of these excluded poems are "Whoso List to Hunt" and "Who List His Wealth and Ease Retain"; the former can be found in the Wyatt selection immediately following Tottel.

Although Wyatt was the poetic forerunner, Surrey's name graces the title page of Tottel's collection; Surrey's aristocratic heritage provided a certain authority for the publication, and in 1557 Tottel may have been wary of including Wyatt's name on the front cover, as his son, Sir Thomas Wyatt, the younger, had been executed for rebelling against Mary Tudor in 1554. The Italian influence, and particularly the influence of Petrarch's sequence of poems to Laura, can be seen in the many adaptations and translations by both Wyatt and Surrey. The poets, however, are careful to reshape their Italian originals to apply to English and topical concerns. Many of the poems use the tensions and oppositions experienced by the Petrarchan lover to examine life as a courtier. Wyatt introduced the sonnet into English verse, and Surrey helped to establish what would become the Shakespearean form of the sonnet, as well as introducing blank verse (unrhymed iambic pentameter). Both authors thus exercised a huge influence over the development of both the form and content of English poetry.

Tottel provided titles to the poems in his collection and these have been retained here, as they give a sense of the general thematic structures into which the poems were placed: love, the simple life, riddles, etc. These titles also provided some important information for a larger audience, many of whom would not know the original context of the poems; however, some of Tottel's titles limit the possible interpretations of the poems, perhaps to diffuse potentially dangerous political readings. For example, Wyatt's "The Pillar Perished" is presented as a generic Petrarchan love poem

["The Lover Laments the Death of His Love"], although it may originally have been written on the death of Wyatt's patron, Thomas Cromwell, who was executed in 1540. To demonstrate the extent to which Tottel (or the printer of the collection) edited some of the lines, often smoothing out the meter, major variations between different manuscripts are indicated in footnotes. Wyatt's well-known poem "Whoso List to Hunt," which does not appear in Tottel, and the Egerton MS version of "They Flee from Me," which has major variations from Tottel, can be found in the Wyatt section immediately following this one.

EDITION: Songes and sonettes. London: Richard Tottel, 1557. STC 13862.

from Songs and Sonnets Written by the Right Honourable Lord Henry Howard Late Earl of Surrey, and Others.[1]

The Printer to the Reader

That to have well written in verse, yea and in small parcels, deserveth great praise, the works of divers[2] Latins, Italians, and other do prove sufficiently. That our tongue is able in that kind to do as praiseworthily as the rest, the honourable style of the noble Earl of Surrey and the weightiness of the deep-witted Sir Thomas Wyatt the elder's verse, with several graces in sundry good English writers, do show abundantly. It resteth now (gentle reader) that thou think it not evil done to publish, to the honour of the English tongue and for profit of the studious of English eloquence, those works which the ungentle hoarders up of such treasure have heretofore envied thee. And for this point (good reader), thine own profit and pleasure, in these presently and in more hereafter, shall answer for my defence. If perhaps some mislike the stateliness of style removed from the rude skill of common ears, I ask help of the learned to defend their learned friends, the authors of this work. And I exhort the unlearned by reading to learn to be more skilful and to purge that swine-like grossness that maketh the sweet marjoram not to smell to their delight.

HENRY HOWARD, EARL OF SURREY (1516/17-47)

Description of Spring, Wherein Each Thing Renews, Save Only the Lover.[3]

The soote[4] season, that bud and bloom forth brings,
With green hath clad the hill and eke[5] the vale,
The nightingale with feathers new she sings,
The turtle to her make[6] hath told her tale.
Summer is come, for every spray[7] now springs,
The hart hath hung his old head on the pale,[8]
The buck in brake[9] his winter coat he flings,
The fishes float[10] with new-repaired scale,
The adder all her slough[11] away she slings,
The swift swallow pursueth the flies smale,[12]
The busy bee her honey now she mings,[13]

[1] After the publication of Edward Arber's edition, Tottel's Miscellany (London, 1870), the Songs and Sonnets has familiarly been called Tottel's Miscellany. The best discussion of Tottel's editions is Paul Marquis's Richard Tottel's Songes and Sonettes: The Elizabethan Version. Tempe, Arizona, 2007.

[2] divers various.

[3] This poem is a version of Petrarch's Rime 310.

[4] soote sweet.

[5] eke also.

[6] turtle turtledove; make mate.

[7] spray slender shoots or twigs.

[8] pale fence; the deer has shed his antlers.

[9] brake bracken, thicket.

[10] float The original spelling "flete" might also infer the idea of speed.

[11] slough outer skin.

[12] smale small.

[13] mings mixes.

Winter is worn that was the flowers' bale.[1]
And thus I see among these pleasant things
Each care decays, and yet my sorrow springs.

Complaint of a Lover Rebuked.[2]

Love that liveth and reigneth in my thought,[3]
That built his seat within my captive breast,
Clad in the arms wherein with me he fought,
Oft in my face he doth his banner rest.
She that me taught to love and suffer pain,
My doubtful hope and eke my hot desire,
With shamefast cloak[4] to shadow and refrain,
Her smiling grace converteth straight to ire.[5]
And coward love then to the heart apace
Taketh his flight, whereas he lurks and plains,[6]
His purpose lost, and dare not show his face.
For my lord's guilt thus faultless bide I pains.
Yet from my lord shall not my foot remove.
Sweet is his death that takes his end by love.

Description and Praise of His Love Geraldine.[7]

From Tuscan[8] came my lady's worthy race,
Fair Florence was sometime her ancient seat,
The western isle, whose pleasant shore doth face
Wild Camber's[9] cliffs, did give her lively heat.
Fostered she was with milk of Irish breast,
Her sire an earl, her dame of princes' blood.[10]
From tender years in Britain she doth rest
With king's child, who tasteth ghostly food.[11]
Hunsdon[12] did first present her to mine eyne,
Bright is her hue, and Geraldine she hight.[13]
Hampton[14] me taught to wish her first for mine,
And Windsor,[15] alas, doth chase me from her sight.
Her beauty of kind, her virtues from above,
Happy is he that can obtain her love.

A Complaint by Night of the Lover Not Beloved.[16]

Alas, so all things now do hold their peace,
Heaven and earth disturbed in nothing;
The beasts, the air, the birds their song do cease,
The night's char[17] the stars about doth bring.
Calm is the sea; the waves work less and less.
So am not I, whom love alas doth wring,
Bringing before my face the great increase
Of my desires, whereat I weep and sing,
In joy and woe, as in a doubtful ease:
For my sweet thoughts sometime do pleasure bring,
But by and by the cause of my disease
Gives me a pang that inwardly doth sting,
When that I think what grief it is again,
To live and lack the thing should rid my pain.

---

[1] Winter ... bale i.e., winter, the flowers' foe or sorrow, is over.

[2] This poem is a version of Petrarch's Rime 140. See Wyatt's poem "The Lover for Shamefastness"/"The Long Love" for another version, p. 194.

[3] The Harington MS begins "Love that doth reign and live within my thought."

[4] cloak The Harington MS reads "look."

[5] ire anger.

[6] plains complains; whereas ... plains The Harington MS reads "where he doth lurk and plain."

[7] Geraldine Elizabeth Fitzgerald, a maid to Catherine Howard, provided the material for the romanticizing of Surrey, though as editor H.E. Rollins points out, Elizabeth would have been nine years old in 1537, when this poem was supposed to have been written (Tottel's Miscellany [Cambridge, MA, 1965] 2:74). The Fitzgeralds, an Irish family, traced their line to the Geraldi family of Florence.

[8] Tuscan Tuscany, formerly a grand duchy (a territory ruled by a duke or duchess), had Florence as its capital.

[9] Camber Wales; the land facing Wales would be Ireland.

[10] her dame of princes' blood Geraldine's mother was the granddaughter of Elizabeth Woodville, queen of Edward IV and cousin of Henry VIII.

[11] who tasteth ... food In the first edition, this reads "where she tasteth costly food."

[12] Hunsdon location of the household of Princess Mary, which Geraldine joined in 1537.

[13] hight called.

[14] Hampton location of the royal household, which Geraldine joined later in 1537.

[15] Windsor Surrey was briefly imprisoned in Windsor in 1537 for striking a courtier.

[16] This poem is a version of Petrarch's Rime 164.

[17] night's char The Italian carro indicates this is a reference to Ursa Major, or the Great Bear; also the night's chariot, here drawn across the sky by the stars.

How Each Thing, Save the Lover, in Spring Reviveth to Pleasure.

When Windsor[1] walls sustained my wearied arm,
My hand my chin, to ease my restless head:
The pleasant plot revested[2] green with warm,
The blossomed boughs with lusty ver yspred,[3]
The flowered meads, the wedded birds so late Mine eyes discover: and to my mind resort
The jolly woes, the hateless short debate,
The rakehell life that longs to love's disport.[4]
Wherewith (alas) the heavy charge of care
Heaped in my breast breaks forth against my will
In smoky sighs that overcast the air.
My vapoured eyes[5] such dreary tears distil,
The tender spring which quicken[s][6] where they fall,
And I half bent to throw me down withal.

Vow to Love Faithfully Howsoever He Be Rewarded.[7]

Set me whereas the sun doth parch the green,
Or where his beams do not dissolve the ice,
In temperate heat where he is felt and seen,
In presence pressed of people mad or wise.[8]
Set me in high or yet in low degree,
In longest night or in the shortest day,
In clearest sky or where clouds thickest be,[9]
In lusty youth or when my hairs are gray.
Set me in heaven, in earth, or else in hell,
In hill or dale, or in the foaming flood,
Thrall or at large, alive whereso I dwell,
Sick or in health, in evil fame or good,
Hers[10] will I be and only with this thought
Content myself, although my chance be naught.[11]

Prisoned in Windsor, He Recounteth His Pleasure There Passed.

So cruel prison how could betide,[12] alas,
As proud Windsor? Where I in lust[13] and joy
With a king's son[14] my childish years did pass,
In greater feast than Priam's sons of Troy:[15]
Where each sweet place returns a taste full sour,
The large green courts where we were wont to hove,[16]
With eyes cast up into the maidens' tower,
And easy sighs, such as folk draw in love.
The stately seats, the ladies bright of hue,
The dances short, long tales of great delight,
With words and looks that tigers could but rue,[17]
Where each of us did plead the other's right;
The palm play where, despoiled[18] for the game,
With dazed eyes oft we by gleams of love
Have missed the ball, and got sight of our dame,
To bait her eyes which kept the leads above;[19]
The gravel ground, with sleeves tied on the helm,[20]
On foaming horse with swords and friendly hearts,

---

1 Windsor See p. 190, note 15.

2 revested re-clothed, re-invested.

3 ver springtime; yspred past participle of "spread."

4 rakehell immoral, dissolute; longs belongs; disport entertainment.

5 vapoured eyes i.e., eyes misted over with tears.

6 quicken[s] grows.

7 This poem is a version of Petrarch's Rime 145.

8 In … wise The Harington MS reads "With proud people, in presence sad and wise."

9 In … be The Harington MS reads "In clear weather or where mists thickest be."

10 Hers The Harington MS reads "yours."

11 The Harington MS ends with the line "Comfort myself, when that my hap is naught."

12 betide become; this first sentence asks how Windsor, a place of such fond memories, could have become the poet's prison.

13 lust pleasure.

14 a king's son Henry Fitzroy, duke of Richmond (1519-1536), was Henry VIII's illegitimate son; he married Surrey's sister, Mary Howard.

15 Priam's sons of Troy The king of Troy in the Iliad, Priam had fifty sons.

16 hove linger.

17 tigers could but rue that even fierce tigers would regard with pity or compassion.

18 palm play a game resembling tennis, where the ball is struck with the hand instead of a racket; despoiled unclothed.

19 bait feast; leads above the lead walks along the roofs.

20 sleeves tied on the helm Sleeves or strips of material worn as a lady's token or favour are tied onto the helmet; these lines describe a tournament on horseback.

With cheer as though one should another whelm,[1]
Where we have fought and chased oft with darts;
With silver drops the mead yet spread for ruth,[2]
In active games of nimbleness and strength,
Where we did strain, trained with[3] swarms of youth,
Our tender limbs that yet shot up in length.
The secret groves which oft we made resound
Of pleasant plaint[4] and of our ladies' praise,
Recording oft what grace each one had found,
What hope of speed, what dread of long delays.
The wild forest, the clothed holts[5] with green,
With reins availed and swift ybreathed[6] horse,
With cry of hounds and merry blasts between,
Where we did chase the fearful hart of force.[7]
The wild vales[8] eke that harboured us each night,
Wherewith (alas) reviveth in my breast
The sweet accord, such sleeps as yet delight,
The pleasant dreams, the quiet bed of rest,
The secret thoughts imparted with such trust,
The wanton talk, the divers[9] change of play,
The friendship sworn, each promise kept so just,
Wherewith we past the winter night away.
And with this thought the blood forsakes the face,
The tears berain my cheeks of deadly hue,
The which as soon as sobbing sighs (alas)
Up-supped[10] have, thus I my plaint renew:
"O place of bliss, renewer of my woes,
Give me accompt, where is my noble fere,[11]
Whom in thy walls thou dost each night enclose,
To other lief,[12] but unto me most dear."
Echo (alas) that doth my sorrow rue
Returns thereto a hollow sound of plaint.
Thus I alone, where all my freedom grew,
In prison pine with bondage and restraint,
And with remembrance of the greater grief
To banish the less, I find my chief relief.

Complaint of the Absence of Her Lover Being upon the Sea.[13]

O happy dames that may embrace
The fruit of your delight,
Help to bewail the woeful case,
And eke the heavy plight
Of me, that wonted[14] to rejoice
The fortune of my pleasant choice:
Good ladies, help to fill my mourning voice.
In ship, freight with remembrance
Of thoughts and pleasures past,
He sails that hath in governance
My life, while it will last;
With scalding sighs, for lack of gale,
Furthering his hope, that is his sail,
Toward me, the sweet port of his avail.[15]
Alas, how oft in dreams I see
Those eyes that were my food,
Which sometime so delighted me
That yet they do me good;
Wherewith I wake with his return,
Whose absent flame did make me burn,
But when I find the lack, Lord how I mourn.
When other lovers in arms across
Rejoice their chief delight,
Drowned in tears to mourn my loss
I stand the bitter night

---

[1] whelm overwhelm, overturn.

[2] mead meadow; ruth compassion. The meadows are spread with dew.

[3] trained with The Harington MS reads "trailed by."

[4] plaint complaint, lament.

[5] holts woods.

[6] swift ybreathed swiftly breathing.

[7] the fearful hart of force The hart or the hunters could be associated with "force" or strength.

[8] vales valleys, dales. The Harington MS reads "void walls" for "wild vales"; the word "wide" for "wild" also appears in some editions.

[9] divers various.

[10] Up-supped i.e., his tears are drawn up by his sighs, just as the wind dries up rain.

[11] accompt account; fere companion, here the Duke of Richmond, who in 1536 had died of consumption at age 17.

[12] lief beloved.

[13] Rollins notes that Emil Koeppel has shown this poem is an adaptation of the fifth epistle of the Italian poet Serafino d'Aquilano (1466-1500), itself an adaptation of Phyllis's complaint in Ovid's Heroides (2:143).

[14] wonted was accustomed.

[15] avail The OED defines "avail" as "disembarkation"; in this instance, though, it may still have the sense of "assistance."

In my window, where I may see
Before the winds how the clouds flee.
Lo, what a mariner love hath made me.
And in green waves when the salt flood
Doth rise by rage of wind,
A thousand fancies in that mood
Assail my restless mind;
Alas, now drencheth my sweet foe,
That with the spoil of my heart did go,
And left me, but (alas) why did he so?
And when the seas wax calm again,
To chase from me annoy,
My doubtful hope doth cause me plain,
So dread cuts off my joy.
Thus is my wealth mingled with woe,
And of each thought a doubt doth grow:
Now he comes. Will he come? Alas, no, no.

The Means to Attain Happy Life.[1]

Martial, the things that do attain
The happy life be these, I find:
The riches left, not got with pain;
The fruitful ground; the quiet mind;
The equal friend; no grudge, no strife;
No charge[2] of rule, nor governance;
Without disease the healthful life;
The household of continuance;[3]
The mean diet, no delicate[4] fare;
True wisdom joined with simpleness;[5]
The night discharged of all care,
Where wine the wit may not oppress;[6]
The faithful wife,[7] without debate;
Such sleeps as may beguile the night;
Contented with thine own estate;
Ne wish for death, ne[8] fear his might.

[1] This poem is a version of Epigram 10.47 by the Roman poet Martial.

[2] charge burden.

[3] household of continuance an enduring, lasting household.

[4] mean moderate; delicate luxurious.

[5] True … simpleness The Harington MS reads "Wisdom joined with simplicity."

[6] Where … oppress The Harington MS reads "Where wine may bear no sovereignty."

[7] The faithful wife The Harington MS reads "The chaste wife, wise."

[8] Ne ... ne neither ... nor.

Of the Same
[Of the Death of Sir T.W.][9]

W[yatt] resteth here that quick[10] could never rest,
Whose heavenly gifts increased by disdain,[11]
And virtue sank the deeper in his breast,
Such profit he by envy could obtain.

A head where wisdom mysteries did frame,
Whose hammers beat still in that lively brain
As on a stith,[12] where that some work of fame
Was daily wrought to turn to Britain's gain.

A visage stern and mild, where both did grow
Vice to contemn, in virtue to rejoice;
Amid great storms whom grace assured so
To live upright and smile at fortune's choice.

A hand that taught what might be said in rhyme,
That reft[13] Chaucer the glory of his wit,
A mark the which (unparfited[14] for time)
Some may approach, but never none shall hit.

A tongue that served in foreign realms his king,
Whose courteous talk to virtue did inflame
Each noble heart: a worthy guide to bring
Our English youth by travail[15] unto fame.

An eye whose judgement none affect could blind,[16]
Friends to allure, and foes to reconcile,
Whose piercing look did represent a mind
With virtue fraught, reposed, void of guile.

[9] Of the Same Tottel's title refers to the previous poem, "Of the Death of the Same Sir T.W."—or Thomas Wyatt—which itself refers to the poem before that, "Praise of Certain Psalms of David Translated by Sir T.W. the Elder."

[10] W[yatt] Tottel includes the initial letter only; quick alive.

[11] disdain the "envy" of line 4, or Wyatt's own disdain of his earthly gifts, which increases his heavenly ones.

[12] stith stithy or anvil.

[13] reft bereft.

[14] unparfited unperfected.

[15] travail labour.

[16] none affect could blind could be blinded by no dissembling.

A heart where dread was never so impressed
To hide the thought that might the truth advance;
In neither fortune loft[1] nor yet repressed,
To swell in wealth or yield unto mischance.

A valiant corps[2] where force and beauty met,
Happy, alas, too happy, but for foes;
Lived and ran the race that nature set,
Of manhood's shape, where she the mould did lose.

But to the heavens that simple soul is fled,
Which left, with such as covet Christ to know,
Witness of faith that never shall be dead,
Sent for our health, but not received so.

Thus for our guilt[3] this jewel have we lost:
The earth his bones, the Heavens possess his ghost.

SIR THOMAS WYATT (c. 1503-42)

The Lover for Shamefastness Hideth His Desire within His Faithful Heart.[4]

The long love that in my thought I harbour,
And in my heart doth keep his residence,
Into my face presseth with bold pretence,
And there campeth, displaying his banner.[5]
She that me learns to love, and to suffer,
And wills that my trust and lust's negligence
Be reined by reason, shame and reverence,
With his hardiness takes displeasure.
Wherewith love to the heart's forest he fleeth,[6]
Leaving his enterprise with pain and cry,
And there him hideth, and not appeareth.
What may I do, when my master feareth,
But in the field with him to live and die,
For good is the life ending faithfully.

Description of the Contrarious Passions in a Lover.[7]

I find no peace, and all my war is done;
I fear and hope; I burn and freeze like ice;
I fly aloft,[8] yet can I not arise,
And naught I have, and all the world I season.[9]
That locks nor loseth,[10] holdeth me in prison,
And holds me not, yet can I scape no wise,
Nor lets me live nor die at my devise,[11]
And yet of death it giveth me occasion.
Without eye I see, without tongue I plain,
I wish to perish, yet I ask for health,
I love another and I hate myself.
I feed me in sorrow and laugh in all my pain.
Lo, thus displeaseth me both death and life,
And my delight is causer of this strife.

The Lover Compareth His State to a Ship in Perilous Storm Tossed on the Sea.[12]

My galley charged[13] with forgetfulness,
Through sharp seas, in winter nights doth pass
'Tween rock and rock, and eke my foe[14] (alas),
That is my lord, steereth with cruelness,
And every hour[15] a thought in readiness

---

1 loft lofty, elevated.

2 corps body, being.

3 guilt The original "gilte" might also allude to "gilt" or gilding, or money.

4 This poem, like Surrey's "Complaint of a Lover Rebuked" or "Love That Liveth," is a version of Petrarch's Rime 140; shamefastness modesty, bashfulness.

5 And … banner The Egerton MS reads "And therein campeth, spreading his banner."

6 Wherewith … fleeth The Egerton MS reads "Wherewithal unto the heart's forest he fleeth."

7 This poem is a version of Petrarch's Rime 134.

8 aloft The Egerton MS reads "above the wind."

9 season seizen, to seize upon.

10 That locks nor loseth "That" refers to the "contrarious passions" or simply "love," which neither "locks" or imprisons, nor "loseth" or frees the speaker. The idea is repeated in the subsequent section.

11 devise contrivance, will.

12 This poem is a version of Petrarch's Rime 189.

13 charged burdened, or perhaps commissioned, since it is forgetfulness that the speaker desires.

14 foe His foe is his love (which fits with the Petrarchan oppositions). The Egerton MS reads "enemy."

15 hour Tottel has printed "hour," but the manuscript reads "owre" or "oar."

As though that death were light in such a case.
An endless wind doth tear the sail apace
Of forced sighs and trusty fearfulness.[1]
A rain of tears, a cloud of dark disdain,
Have done the wearied cords great hinderance,[2]
Wreathed with error and with ignorance.
The stars be hid that lead me to this pain.
Drowned is reason that should be my comfort,[3]
And I remain despairing of the port.

The Lover Showeth How He Is Forsaken of Such as He Sometime Enjoyed.

They flee from me that sometime did me seek
With naked foot stalking within my chamber.
Once have I seen them gentle, tame and meek,
That now are wild, and do not once remember
That sometime they have put themselves in danger
To take bread at my hand, and now they range,
Busily seeking in continual change.

Thanked be fortune, it hath been otherwise
Twenty times better; but once especial,[4]
In thin array, after a pleasant guise,
When her loose gown did from her shoulders fall,
And she me caught in her arms long and small,
And therewithal so sweetly did me kiss,
And softly said, "Dear heart,[5] how like you this?"

It was no dream, for I lay broad awaking.
But all is turned now, through my gentleness,
Into a bitter fashion of forsaking,
And I have leave to go of her goodness,
And she also to use newfangledness.
But, since that I unkindly so am served,
How like you this? What hath she now deserved?

To His Love Whom He Had Kissed against Her Will.[6]

Alas, madam, for stealing of a kiss
Have I so much your mind therein offended?
Or have I done so grievously amiss
That by no means it may not be amended?
Revenge you then. The readiest way is this:
Another kiss my life it shall have ended.
For to my mouth the first my heart did suck,
The next shall clean out of my breast it pluck.

The Lover Compareth His Heart to the Overcharged Gun.[7]

The furious gun, in his most raging ire,
When that the boule is rammed in too sore,[8]
And that the flame cannot part from the fire,
Cracks in sunder, and in the air do roar
The shivered[9] pieces. So doth my desire,
Whose flame increaseth aye from more to more;
Which to let out, I dare not look nor speak,
So inward force my heart doth all to break.

The Lover Complaineth the Unkindness of His Love.

My lute awake, perform the last
Labour that thou and I shall waste,
And end that I have now begun;
And when this song is sung and past,
My lute be still for I have done.
As to be heard where ear is none,
As lead to grave in marble stone,[10]
My song may pierce her heart as soon.
Should we then sigh? Or sing, or moan?
No, no, my lute, for I have done.
The rocks do not so cruelly
Repulse the waves continually
As she my suit and affection,

---

1 trusty fearfulness fear of trusting.
2 hinderance hindrance, lengthened for the metre.
3 be my comfort The Egerton MS reads "me consort" (i.e., accompany).
4 especial particularly, specifically.
5 heart Tottel reads "hart," a common spelling and pun in these poems.
6 This poem is a version of a strambotto by Serafino (Rollins 2:171).
7 This poem is a version of a strambotto by Serafino (Rollins 2:184).
8 boule ball or bullet; sore fiercely or tightly.
9 shivered shattered.
10 As lead ... stone when lead (a soft metal) is able to engrave marble.

So that I am past remedy,
Whereby my lute and I have done.
Proud of the spoil that thou hast got
Of simple hearts through love's shot,
By whom unkind thou hast them won,
Think not he hath his bow forgot,
Although my lute and I have done.
Vengeance shall fall on thy disdain
That makest but game on[1] earnest pain.
Think not alone under the sun
Unquit to cause thy lovers plain,[2]
Although my lute and I have done.
May chance[3] thee lie withered and old,
In winter nights that are so cold,
Plaining in vain unto the moon;
Thy wishes then dare not be told.
Care then who list,[4] for I have done.
And then may chance thee to repent
The time that thou hast lost and spent
To cause thy lovers sigh and swoon.
Then shalt thou know beauty but lent,
And wish and want as I have done.
Now cease my lute, this is the last
Labour that thou and I shall waste,
And ended is that we begun.
Now is this song both sung and past,
My lute be still, for I have done.

How by a Kiss He Found Both His Life and Death.

Nature that gave the bee so feat[5] a grace
To find honey of so wondrous fashion,
Hath taught the spider out of the same place
To fetch poison by strange alteration.
Though this be strange, it is a stranger case
With one kiss, by secret operation,
Both these[6] at once in those your lips to find,
In change whereof, I leave my heart behind.

[1] on of.
[2] Unquit unpaid, unrevenged; plain to complain.
[3] May chance The Egerton MS reads "Perchance."
[4] list wishes.
[5] feat fitting, becoming.
[6] both these i.e., honey and poison.

The Lover Laments the Death of His Love.[7]

The pillar perished is whereto I lent,
The strongest stay[8] of mine unquiet mind;
The like of it no man again can find,
From east to west still seeking though he went.
To mine unhap, for hap away hath rent[9]
Of all my joy the very bark and rind,
And I (alas) by chance am thus assigned
Daily[10] to mourn till death do it relent.
But since that thus it is by destiny,
What can I more but have a woeful heart,
My pen in plaint, my voice in careful[11] cry,
My mind in woe, my body full of smart,
And I myself, myself always to hate,
Till dreadful death do ease my doleful state.

That Pleasure Is Mixed with Every Pain.[12]

Venomous thorns that are so sharp and keen,
Bear flowers we see full fresh and fair of hue;
Poison is also put in medicine,
And unto man his health doth oft renew.
The fire that all things eke consumeth clean
May hurt and heal. Then if that this be true,
I trust sometime my harm may be my health,
Since every woe is joined with some wealth.

Description of a Gun.[13]

Vulcan begat me; Minerva[14] me taught;
Nature my mother; craft nourished me year by year.

[7] This poem is a version of Petrarch's Rime 269.
[8] stay support.
[9] unhap misfortune; hap fortune; rent rend or tear.
[10] Daily The Harington MS reads "dearly."
[11] careful The Harington MS reads "woeful."
[12] This poem is a version of a strambotto by Serafino (Rollins 2: 315).
[13] This poem is a rendition of a Latin poem of Pandulpho (fl. 1500) (Rollins 2:210). Tottel's title gives away the riddle.
[14] Vulcan god of fire and metal working; Minerva goddess of wisdom.

Three bodies are my food; my strength is in naught;
Anger, wrath, waste, and noise are my children dear.
Guess, friend, what I am, and how I am wrought,
Monster of sea, or of land, or of elsewhere.
Know me, and use me, and I may thee defend;
And if I be thine enemy, I may thy life end.

Wyatt Being in Prison, to Bryan.[1]

Sighs are my food, my drink are my tears;
Clinking of fetters would such music crave;
Stink and close air away my life it wears;
Poor innocence is all the hope I have.
Rain, wind or weather judge I by mine ears.
Malice assaults that[2] righteousness should have.
Sure am I, Bryan, this wound shall heal again,
But yet, alas, the scar shall still remain.

The Courtier's Life.

In court to serve, decked with fresh array,
Of sugared meats filling the sweet repast,
The life in banquets and sundry kinds of play,
Amid the press of worldly[3] looks to waste,
Hath with it joined oft times such bitter taste
That who so joys such kind of life to hold
In prison joys, fettered with chains of gold.

Of the Courtier's Life Written to John Poins.[4]

Mine own John Poins, since ye delight to know
The causes why that homeward I me draw,
And flee the press of courts, whereso they go,
Rather than to live thrall under the awe
Of lordly looks, wrapped within my cloak,
To will and lust[5] learning to set a law;
It is not that because I scorn or mock
The power of them, whom fortune here hath lent
Charge over us, of right to strike the stroke.
But true it is that I have always meant
Less to esteem them than the common sort
Of outward things, that judge in their intent,
Without regard, what inward doth resort.[6]
I grant sometime of glory that the fire
Doth touch my heart. Me list not to report
Blame by honour, and honour to desire.[7]
But how may I this honour now attain
That cannot dye the colour black a liar?
My Poins, I cannot frame my tune to feign,
To cloak the truth, for praise without desert,
Of them that list[8] all vice for to retain.
I cannot honour them that set their part
With Venus and Bacchus[9] all their life long,
Nor hold my peace of them, although I smart.[10]
I cannot crouch nor kneel to such a wrong,
To worship them like God on earth alone,
That are as wolves these silly[11] lambs among.
I cannot with my words complain and moan
And suffer nought, nor smart without complaint,
Nor turn the word that from my mouth is gone.
I cannot speak and look like as a saint,
Use wiles for wit and make deceit a pleasure,

---

[1] This poem is addressed to Sir Francis Bryan (d. 1550), courtier and writer. Wyatt was imprisoned 17 January-21 March 1541 on charges from which he had already been cleared in 1538 (meeting with a traitor). He was pardoned again with the help of Queen Catherine Howard (Surrey may have influenced Howard, who was his first cousin).

[2] that that which.

[3] worldly also appears as "lordly."

[4] This poem is a version of the tenth satire of the Italian poet and statesman Luigi Alamanni (1495-1556) (Rollins 2:216). Little is known of John Poins—or Poynz—part of an Essex family, some of whose members had important roles in government. Wyatt wrote this while exiled to Kent in 1536; the court which he satirizes is therefore one in which he is not permitted to participate.

[5] lust pleasure.

[6] I have always meant ... doth resort The speaker states he has always esteemed men of court or power less than the common people do, because the "common sort" judge others on their appearances rather than on inner virtues or merits.

[7] Me list ... desire i.e., I do not wish to call honour blameful, or desire honourable.

[8] list please, choose.

[9] Venus especially in her role as goddess of sensual love; Bacchus god of wine.

[10] smart suffer.

[11] silly innocent.

Call craft counsel, for lucre[1] still to paint.
I cannot wrest the law to fill the coffer,
With innocent blood to feed myself fat,
And do most hurt where that most help I offer.
I am not he that can allow the state
Of high Caesar, and damn Cato to die,
That with his death did scape out of the gate
From Caesar's hands, if Livy doth not lie,[2]
And would not live where liberty was lost,
So did his heart the common wealth[3] apply.
I am not he, such eloquence to boast,
To make the crow in singing as the swan,
Nor call the lion of coward beasts the most,
That cannot take a mouse as the cat can.
And he that dieth for hunger of the gold,
Call him Alexander, and say that Pan
Passeth Apollo[4] in music manifold;
Praise Sir Topas for a noble tale,
And scorn the story that the knight told;[5]
Praise him for counsel that is drunk of ale;
Grin when he laughs that beareth all the sway,[6]
Frown when he frowns, and groan when he is pale;
On others' lust to hang both night and day.
None of these points would ever frame[7] in me.
My wit is naught; I cannot learn the way;
And much the less of things that greater be,
That asken help of colours to devise,[8]
To join the mean with each extremity,
With nearest virtue aye to cloak the vice.
And, as to purpose likewise it shall fall,
To press the virtue that it may not rise,
As drunkenness good fellowship to call;
The friendly foe, with his fair double face,
Say he is gentle and courteous therewithal;
Affirm that favell[9] hath a goodly grace
In eloquence; and cruelty to name
Zeal of justice; and change in time and place.
And he that suffereth offence without blame,
Call him pitiful, and him true and plain
That raileth reckless unto each man's shame.
Say he is rude that cannot lie and feign,
The lecher a lover, and tyranny
To be the right of a prince's reign.
I cannot, I; no, no, it will not be.
This is the cause that I could never yet
Hang on their sleeves that weigh (as thou mayest see)
A chip of chance more than a pound of wit.
This maketh me at home to hunt and hawk,
And in foul weather at my book to sit;
In frost and snow then with my bow to stalk.
No man doth mark whereso I ride or go;
In lusty leas[10] at liberty I walk,
And of these news I feel nor weal nor woe,
Save that a clog doth hang yet at my heel.[11]
No force for that, for it is ordered so
That I may leap both hedge and dike[12] full well.
I am not now in France to judge the wine,
With sav'ry sauce those delicates[13] to feel;
Nor yet in Spain where one must him incline,
Rather than to be, outwardly to seem.
I meddle not with wits that be so fine,
Nor Flanders' cheer lets not my sight to deem[14]
Of black and white, nor takes my wits away
With beastliness: such do those beasts esteem.

---

[1] lucre The Devonshire MS reads "profit."

[2] Rollins points out that the section of Livy or Titus Livius' history of Rome which tells this story is lost; Cato committed suicide after the battle of Thapsus (46 BCE), a more noble end than being captured by Caesar (2:218).

[3] common wealth common good, also "commonwealth" or state.

[4] he that dieth ... Alexander Alexander the Great (356-323 BCE) wished to conquer other worlds, apparently for gold; Pan presided over shepherds and flocks and delighted in rural music (the pan pipes); Apollo the sun god, patron of music and poetry. The section is structured by oppositions.

[5] Sir Topas ... the knight told two stories from Chaucer's The Canterbury Tales; unlike the ridiculous tale of Sir Topas, the knight's tale is dignified and courtly.

[6] sway power.

[7] frame prosper.

[8] of colours to devise to colour them differently than they appear.

[9] favell fallow; a fallow horse was used proverbially as the type of fraud or duplicity.

[10] lusty leas pleasant meadows, pastures.

[11] Wyatt was exiled to Kent and therefore not free to go where he chose.

[12] dike ditch, the boundary of a field.

[13] delicates delicacies.

[14] Flanders' cheer Flanders, the name of an ancient countship now divided between Belgium, France, and Holland, was known for its drinking; lets prevents; deem distinguish between.

Nor I am not where truth is given in prey
For money, poison and treason, of some[1]
A common practice, used night and day.
But I am here in Kent and Christendom,
Among the Muses,[2] where I read and rhyme,
Where if thou list, mine own John Poins, to come,
Thou shalt be judge how I do spend my time.

UNCERTAIN AUTHORS

Comparison of Life and Death.

The life is long that loathsomely doth last,
The doleful days draw slowly to their date,
The present pangs and painful plagues forepast[3]
Yield grief aye green to stablish[4] this estate,
So that I feel in this great storm and strife
The death is sweet that endeth such a life.

Yet by the stroke of this strange overthrow,
At which conflict in thraldom[5] I was thrust,
The Lord be praised; I am well taught to know
From whence man came and eke whereto he must,
And by the way upon how feeble force
His term doth stand, till death doth end his course.

The pleasant years that seem, so swift that run
The merry days to end, so fast that fleet,[6]
The joyful nights, of which day daweth[7] so soon,
The happy hours, which more do miss than meet,
Do all consume, as snow against the sun,
And death makes end of all that life begun.

Since death shall dure[8] till all the world be waste,
What meaneth man to dread death then so sore?
As man might make, that life should alway[s] last;
Without regard, the Lord hath led before
The dance of death, which all must run on row,[9]
Though how or when the Lord alone doth know.

If man would mind what burdens life doth bring,
What grievous crimes to God he doth commit,
What plagues, what pangs, what perils thereby spring,
With no sure hour in all his days to sit,
He would sure think, as with great cause I do,
The day of death were better of the two.

Death is a port whereby we pass to joy;
Life is a lake that drowneth all in pain.
Death is so dear it ceaseth all annoy;
Life is so lewd that all it yields is vain.
And as by life to bondage man is brought,
Even so likewise by death was freedom wrought.

Wherefore with Paul[10] let all men wish and pray
To be dissolved of this foul fleshly mass,
Or at the least be armed against the day,
That they be found good soldiers, pressed to pass
From life to death, from death to life again,
To such a life as ever shall remain.

Upon Consideration of the State of This Life, He Wisheth Death.[11]

The longer life, the more offence,
The more offence, the greater pain,
The greater pain, the less defence,

---

1 truth ... of some In the Egerton MS, for "prey" the MS reads "Christ," and for "of some" the MS reads "at Rome." Tottel's first edition appeared while the Catholic Mary Tudor was on the throne, and so is careful to change these.

2 Muses nine sister goddesses, regarded as inspirers of the arts, especially music and poetry.

3 forepast past.

4 grief aye green still fresh grief; stablish establish.

5 thraldom bondage or slavery.

6 fleet fly.

7 daweth dawneth.

8 dure endure.

9 dance of death In a common allegorical representation of the danse macabre, Death is shown leading people of all classes and ages to the grave; run on row run in succession or together.

10 with Paul 2 Corinthians 5:1-2; Timothy 2:3 and 4:6-8.

11 This is an example of an "echo" or repeating poem.

The less defence, the lesser gain.
The loss of gain long ill doth try,
Wherefore come death and let me die.
The shorter life, less count I find,
The less account, the sooner made,
The count soon made, the merrier mind,
The merry mind doth thought evade.
Short life in truth this thing doth try,
Wherefore come death and let me die.
Come gentle death, the ebb of care,
The ebb of care, the flood of life,
The flood of life, the joyful fare,
The joyful fare, the end of strife.
The end of strife, that thing wish I,
Wherefore come death and let me die.

Of a New Married Student That Played Fast and Loose.

A student at his book so placed
That wealth he might have won,
From book to wife did fleet in haste,
From wealth to woe to run.
Now who hath played a feater[1] cast
Since juggling first begun?
In knitting of himself so fast,
Himself he hath undone.

A Praise of Petrarch and of Laura His Lady.[2]

O Petrarch, head and prince of poets all,
Whose lively gift of flowing eloquence
Well may we seek, but find not how or whence
So rare a gift with thee did rise and fall,
Peace to thy bones, and glory immortal
Be to thy name, and to her excellence
Whose beauty lighted in thy time and sense
So to be set forth as none other shall.
Why hath not our pens rhymes so perfect wrought,
Ne why our time forth bringeth beauty such
To try our wits as gold is by the touch,
If to the style the matter aided aught?
But there was never Laura more than one,
And her had Petrarch for his paragon.

That Petrarch Cannot Be Passed, but Notwithstanding That Laura Is Far Surpassed.

With Petrarch to compare there may no wight,[3]
Nor yet attain unto so high a style,
But yet I wot full well where is a file[4]
To frame a learned man to praise aright.
Of stature mean, of seemly form and shape,
Each line of just proportion to her height,
Her colour fresh and mingled with such slight
As though the rose sat in the lily's lap.
In wit and tongue to show what may be said,
To every deed she joins a perfect grace.
If Laura lived she would her clean deface.
For I dare say and lay my life to wed,
That Momus[5] could not, if he down descended,
Once justly say "Lo, this may be amended."

The Lady Forsaken of Her Lover Prayeth His Return or the End of Her Own Life.

To love, alas, who would not fear
That seeth my woeful state,
For he to whom my heart I bear
Doth me extremely hate,
And why therefore I cannot tell,
He will no longer with me dwell.
Did you not sue and long me serve
Ere I you granted grace?
And will you thus now from me swerve
That never did trespass?
Alas poor woman, then alas,
A weary life here must I pass.
And shall my faith have such refuse

[1] feater fitter, smarter.
[2] This and the next poem, "That Petrarch cannot be passed," comprise a pair.
[3] wight person.
[4] wot know; file girl or woman.
[5] Momus god of ridicule, a fault-finder.

In deed and shall it so,
Is there no choice for me to choose
But must I leave you so?
Alas poor woman, then alas,
A weary life hence must I pass.
And is there now no remedy
But that you will forget her?
There was a time when that perdy[1]
You would have heard her better.
But now that time is gone and past,
And all your love is but a blast.
And can you thus break your behest[2]
In deed and can you so?
Did you not swear you loved me best,
And can you now say no?
Remember me poor wight in pain,
And for my sake turn once again.
Alas, poor Dido, now I feel
Thy present painful state,
When false Aeneas did him steal
From thee at Carthage gate,[3]
And left thee sleeping in thy bed,
Regarding not what he had said.
Was never woman thus betrayed,
Nor man so false forsworn,
His faith and truth so strongly tied,
Untruth hath all to-torn,[4]
And I have leave for my good will
To wail and weep alone my fill.
But since it will not better be,
My tears shall never blin[5]
To moist the earth in such degree
That I may drown therein,
That by my death all men may say,
Lo, women are as true as they.
By me all women may beware
That see my woeful smart,
To seek true love let them not spare,
Before they set their heart.
Or else they may become as I,
Which for my truth am like to die.

[1] perdy [par dieu] or "by God"; verily, certainly.

[2] behest vow, promise.

[3] poor Dido ... Carthage gate When Aeneas left Carthage and Dido, his lover, she committed suicide. The story is told in Virgil's Aeneid, Book IV.

[4] all to-torn torn all.

[5] blin cease.

N[ICHOLAS] G[RIMALD]
(b. 1519/20-d. in or before 1562)

Description of Virtue[6]

What one art thou, thus in torn weed yclad?[7]
"Virtue, in price[8] whom ancient sages had."
Why poorly rayed?[9] "For fading goods past care."
Why double-faced? "I mark each fortune's fare."
This bridle, what? "Mind's rages to restrain."
Tools why bear you? "I love to take great pain."
Why wings? "I teach above the stars to fly."
Why tread[10] you death? "I only cannot die."

Praise of Measure-Keeping.[11]

The ancient time commended, not for naught,
The mean. What better thing can there be sought?
In mean is virtue placed; on either side,
Both right and left, amiss a man shall slide.
Icar, with sire hadst thou the mid-way flown,
Icarian beck by name had no man known.[12]
If middle path kept had proud Phaeton,
No burning brand this earth had fall'n upon.[13]
Ne cruel power, ne[14] none too soft can reign;

[6] This poem is a version of an epigram by Theodore Beza (1519-1605), French Protestant scholar and humanist (Rollins 2:235), and is in dialogue format.

[7] yclad clothed.

[8] price honour.

[9] rayed arrayed, dressed.

[10] tread tread under foot, crush.

[11] This poem is a version of an elegy by Beza (Rollins 2:235).

[12] Icar ... no man known Icarus, the son of Daedalus, attempted to fly by means of artificial wings fastened with wax; when he flew too near the sun, the wax melted and Icarus plunged into what became known as the Icarian Sea (part of the Aegean Sea near Crete); beck brook.

[13] proud Phaeton ... fall'n upon The son of Helios, the sun, Phaeton lost control of the horses drawing his father's sun chariot and plunged near the earth; Zeus intervened and hurled a thunderbolt at Phaeton, who fell into a river.

[14] Ne ... ne neither ... nor.

That[1] keeps a mean, the same shall still remain.
Thee, Julie,[2] once did too much mercy spill;
Thee, Nero[3] stern, rigor extreme did kill.
How could August[4] so many years well pass?
Nor over-meek, nor over-fierce he was.
Worship not Jove[5] with curious fancies vain,
Nor him despise: hold right atween[6] these twain.
No wasteful wight, no greedy groom[7] is praised.
Stands largess just, in equal balance payzed.[8]
So Cato's meal surmounts Antonius' cheer,[9]
And better fame his sober fare hath here.
Too slender building, bad; as bad, too gross;
One an eyesore, the t'other falls to loss.
As medicines help in measure, so (God wot)[10]
By overmuch, the sick their bane have got.
Unmeet[11] me seems to utter this more ways:
Measure forbids unmeasurable praise.

—1557

[1] That who.

[2] Julie Julius Caesar pardoned his enemies Gaius Cassius and Marcus Brutus; they later murdered Caesar.

[3] Nero To escape public execution for his brutality, Nero committed suicide.

[4] August Augustus Caesar reigned from 27 BCE to 14 CE.

[5] Jove the highest deity.

[6] atween between.

[7] wight person; groom generally, a male person (often applied to shepherds).

[8] payzed peised or weighed.

[9] So Cato's meal ... cheer Cato may refer to a Roman statesman known as "Cato the Censor" who advocated strict living. Antonius may refer to Marc Anthony, Roman general and reputed sensualist, whose "cheer" would be more luxurious than Cato's.

[10] wot knows.

[11] Unmeet improper.

Sir Thomas Wyatt

c. 1503-1542

Many of Wyatt's poems were published posthumously in Tottel's Songs and Sonnets, and can be found in that selection in this anthology. A number of his pieces did not appear in Tottel, but are preserved in manuscript collections. The composition dates of the Wyatt poems in the Egerton manuscript are uncertain; the earliest dates to around 1526.

EDITIONS: The following poems are based on the versions in Richard Harrier, ed. The Canon of Sir Thomas Wyatt's Poetry. Cambridge, MA: Harvard UP, 1975, except "Blame not my lute," from G.F. Nott, ed. The Works of Sir Thomas Wyatt. Vol. 2. Oxford, 1815.

The Long Love[1]

The long love that in my thought doth harbour,
and in mine heart doth keep his residence,
Into my face presseth with bold pretence,
and therein campeth, spreading his banner.
She that me learneth to love and suffer,
and wills that my trust and lust's negligence
be reined by reason, shame, and reverence,
with his hardiness taketh displeasure.
Wherewithall, unto the heart's forest he fleeth,
leaving his enterprise with pain and cry,
and there him hideth and not appeareth.
What may I do when my master feareth,
but in the field with him to live and die?
For good is the life ending faithfully.

They Flee from Me[2]

They flee from me that sometime did me seek
With naked foot, stalking in my chamber.
I have seen them gentle, tame, and meek,
That now are wild, and do not remember
That sometime they put themself in danger
To take bread at my hand; and now they range,
Busily seeking with a continual change.

Thankèd be fortune it hath been otherwise,
Twenty times better; but once in special,
In thin array, after a pleasant guise,
When her loose gown from her shoulders did fall,
And she me caught in her arms long and small,
Therewithal sweetly she did me kiss,
And softly said, "Dear heart, how like you this?"

It was no dream; I lay broad waking;
But all is turned, thorough my gentleness,
Into a strange fashion of forsaking;
And I have leave to go of her goodness,
And she also to use new fangleness:[3]
But since that I so kindely[4] am served,
I would fain know what she hath deserved.

—1557

Whoso List to Hunt[5]

Whoso list[6] to hunt, I know where is an hind,
But as for me, alas, I may no more;
The vain travail hath wearied me so sore,
I am of them that farthest cometh behind.
Yet may I by no means my wearied mind

---

[1] from the Egerton MS. See Tottel's Songs and Sonnets, p. 194, for a version of this poem edited by Tottel. This poem is a version of Petrarch's Rime 140.

[2] from the Egerton MS. This poem has been interpreted as a discussion of Wyatt's rumoured relationship with Anne Boleyn. See "Whoso List to Hunt," below, p. 203, note 5.

[3] fangleness fangledness or fashion.

[4] kindely kindly (can be taken either seriously or ironically).

[5] from the Egerton MS. This poem is often seen as a comment on the end of Wyatt's rumoured romantic relationship with Anne Boleyn, who became "Caesar's"—or Henry VIII's—second wife.

[6] list wishes.

Draw from the deer, but as she fleeth afore
Fainting I follow. I leave off, therefore,
Sithens[1] in a net I seek to hold the wind.
Who list her hunt I put him out of doubt,
As well as I may spend his time in vain,
And graven with diamonds in letters plain,
There is written her fair neck round about:
"Noli me tangere[2] for Caesar's I am,
And wild for to hold, though I seem tame."

Blame Not My Lute[3]

Blame not my lute, for he must sound
Of this or that as liketh me;
For lack of wit the lute is bound
To give such tunes as pleaseth me;
Though my songs be somewhat strange,
And speak such words as touch thy change,
Blame not my lute.

My lute, alas, doth not offend
Though that perforce he must agree
To sound such tunes as I intend,
To sing to them that heareth me:
Then though my songs be somewhat plain,
And toucheth some that use to feign,
Blame not my lute.

My lute and strings may not deny,
But as I strike they must obey;
Break not them then so wrongfully,
But wreak[4] thyself some wiser way;
And though the songs which I endight[5]
To quit thy change with rightful spite,
Blame not my lute.

Spite asketh spite and changing, change,
And falsèd faith must needs be known,
The fault so great, the case so strange,
Of right it must abroad be blown;
Then since that by thine own desert,
My songs do tell how true thou art,
Blame not my lute.

Blame but thyself that hast misdone
And well deservèd to have blame;
Change thou thy way, so evil begone
And then my lute shall sound that same;
But if till then my fingers play,
By thy desert, their wonted[6] way,
Blame not my lute.

Farewell, unknown, for though thou break
My strings in spite with great disdain,
Yet have I found out for thy sake
Strings for to string my lute again;
And if perchance this foolish rhyme
Do make thee blush at any time,
Blame not my lute.

---

1 Sithens since.
2 Noli me tangere Latin "Touch me not" (John 20:17).
3 from the Devonshire MS.
4 wreak revenge.
5 endight indite, put into words.
6 wonted usual.

John Knox
c. 1514-1572

The Scottish John Knox was a supporter of the reformed religion in Scotland and then England, and became chaplain for Edward VI. The debate over the nature and roles of women—always a popular topic in the period—grew particularly heated during the extended illness of Edward VI, when it became clear that a woman would soon rule England. Although Edward attempted to name the married and Protestant Lady Jane Gray his heir, the unmarried Catholic Mary Tudor succeeded her half-brother on the throne. She soon married Philip, the heir to the Spanish throne. Knox went abroad when Mary Tudor succeeded to the throne. His The First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women (1558) addresses the difficulties raised by Mary's reign in particular and by female authority in general, drawing on the Bible, classical texts, and "nature" to support his condemnation of women's rule. Knox emphasizes the problems raised by Mary's gender as well as her religion, and thus questions the reign of any female monarch. The First Blast is an example of misogynistic statements limiting the nature and roles of women, and indeed although the majority of people might have preferred male authority, they still accepted Mary's inherited legitimacy. This piece of vituperation appears to be an anomaly even for Knox, who later accepted Elizabeth's government (which suggests that his criticism of Mary was prompted as much by her religion as her gender). The First Blast was published in Geneva and is his only writing to appear anonymously; the pamphlet was denounced by royal proclamation.

EDITION: The first blast of the trumpet against the monstruous regiment of women. [Geneva: J. Poullain and A. Rebul], 1558. STC 15070.

from The First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women

The Preface
The Kingdom Appertaineth to Our God.

Wonder it is, that amongst so many pregnant wits as the isle of Great Britain hath produced, so many godly and zealous preachers as England did sometime nourish, and amongst so many learned and men of grave judgement, as this day by Jezebel are exiled,[1] none is found so stout of courage, so faithful to God, nor loving to their native country, that they dare admonish the inhabitants of that isle, how abominable before God is the empire or rule of a wicked woman, yea, of a traitoress and bastard; and what may a people or nation, left destitute of a lawful head, do by the authority of God's word in electing and appointing common rulers and magistrates. That isle (alas), for the contempt and horrible abuse of God's mercies offered, and for the shameful revolting to Satan from Christ Jesus and from his Gospel once professed, doth justly merit to be left in the hands of their own counsel, and so to come to confusion and bondage of strangers. But yet I fear that this universal negligence of such as sometimes were esteemed watchmen shall rather aggravate our former ingratitude than excuse this our universal and ungodly silence in so weighty a matter. We see our country set forth for a prey to foreign nations, we hear the blood of our brethren, the members of Christ Jesus, most cruelly to be shed, and the monstrous empire of a cruel woman (the secret counsel of God excepted) we know to be the only occasion of all those miseries, and yet with silence we pass the time, as though the matter did nothing appertain to us.

[...]

[1] Knox is referring to the Protestants exiled to Europe during Roman Catholic Mary Tudor's reign. Here Mary is associated with Jezebel, a worshipper of idols and a plotting queen. See 1 Kings 16:31ff.

I am assured that God hath revealed to some in this our age that it is more than a monster in nature that a woman shall reign and have empire above man. And yet with us all there is such silence, as if God therewith were nothing offended. The natural man,[1] enemy to God, shall find, I know, many causes why no such doctrine ought to be published in these our dangerous days. First, for that it may seem to tend to sedition. Secondarily, it shall be dangerous not only to the writer or publisher, but also to all such as shall read the writings or favour this truth spoken. And last, it shall not amend the chief offenders, partly because it shall never come to their ears, and partly because they will not be admonished in such cases. I answer, if any of these be a sufficient reason that a truth known shall be concealed, then were the ancient prophets of God very fools, who did not better provide for their own quietness than to hazard their lives for rebuking of vices, and for the opening of such crimes as were not known to the world. [...] If any think that the empire of women is not of such importance that for the suppressing of the same any man is bound to hazard his life, I answer that to suppress it is in the hand of God alone. But to utter the impiety and abomination of the same, I say, it is the duty of every true messenger of God to whom the truth is revealed in that behalf. For the especial duty of God's messengers is to preach repentance, to admonish the offenders of their offenses, and to say to the wicked, "Thou shalt die the death, except thou repent." This I trust will no man deny to be the proper office of all God's messengers, to preach (as I have said) repentance and remission of sins. But neither of both can be done except the conscience of the offenders be accused and convicted of transgression. For how shall any man repent, not knowing wherein he hath offended? And where no repentance is found, there can be no entry to grace. And therefore I say that of necessity it is that this monstriferous[2] empire of women (which amongst all enormities that this day do abound upon the face of the whole earth, is most detestable and damnable) be openly revealed and plainly declared to the world, to the end that some may repent and be saved.

[...]

The First Blast, to Awake Women Degenerate.

To promote a woman to bear rule, superiority, dominion, or empire above any realm, nation, or city, is repugnant to nature; contumely to God, a thing most contrarious to his revealed will and approved ordinance; and finally, it is the subversion of good order, of all equity and justice.

In the probation of this proposition, I will not be so curious as to gather whatsoever may amplify, set forth, or decore the same; but I am purposed, even as I have spoken my conscience in most plain and few words, so to stand content with a simple proof of every member, bringing in for my witness God's ordinance in nature, his plain will revealed in his word, and by the minds of such as be most ancient amongst godly writers.

And first, where that I affirm the empire of a woman to be a thing repugnant to nature, I mean not only that God, by the order of his creation, hath spoiled woman of authority and dominion, but also that man hath seen, proved, and pronounced just causes why that it so should be. Man, I say, in many other cases blind, doth in this behalf see very clearly. For the causes be so manifest that they cannot be hid. For who can deny but it [is] repugnant to nature that the blind shall be appointed to lead and conduct such as do see? That the weak, the sick, and impotent persons shall nourish and keep the whole and strong? And finally, that the foolish, mad, and frenetic shall govern the discreet, and give counsel to such as be sober of mind? And such be all women, compared unto man in bearing of authority. For their sight in civil regiment is but blindness; their strength, weakness; their counsel, foolishness; and judgement, frenzy, if it be rightly considered.

[1] natural man The person in a "state of nature" is without spiritual enlightenment, and thus an enemy of God.

[2] monstriferous monstrous (Knox's own coinage).

I except such as God, by singular privilege, and for certain causes known only to himself, hath exempted from the common rank of women, and do speak of women as nature and experience do this day declare them. Nature, I say, doth paint them further to be weak, frail, impatient, feeble, and foolish; and experience hath declared them to be unconstant, variable, cruel, and lacking the spirit of counsel and regiment. And these notable faults have men in all ages espied in that kind, for the which not only they have removed women from rule and authority, but also some have thought that men subject to the counsel or empire of their wives were unworthy of all public office. For thus writeth Aristotle in the Second of his Politics:[1] "What difference shall we put," saith he, "whether that women bear authority, or the husbands that obey the empire of their wives be appointed to be magistrates? For what ensueth the one, must needs follow the other, to wit, injustice, confusion, and disorder." [...] What would this writer (I pray you) have said to that realm or nation where a woman sitteth crowned in Parliament amongst the middest[2] of men? Oh fearful and terrible are thy judgements (O Lord) which thus hast abased man for his iniquity! I am assuredly persuaded that if any of those men which, illuminated only by the light of nature, did see and pronounce causes sufficient why women ought not to bear rule nor authority, should this day live and see a woman sitting in judgement, or riding from Parliament in the middest of men, having the royal crown upon her head, the sword and sceptre borne before her, in sign that the administration of justice was in her power: I am assuredly persuaded, I say, that such a sight should so astonish them that they should judge the whole world to be transformed into Amazons,[3] and that such a metamorphosis and change was made of all the men of that country as poets do feign was made of the companions of Ulysses,[4] or at least that albeit the outward form of men remained, yet should they judge that their hearts were changed from the wisdom, understanding, and courage of men, to the foolish fondness and cowardice of women. Yea, they further should pronounce that where women reign or be in authority, that there must needs vanity be preferred to virtue; ambition and pride to temperancy and modesty; and finally, that avarice, the mother of all mischief, must needs devour equity and justice.

[...]

For God, first by the order of his creation and after by the curse and malediction pronounced against the woman, by the reason of her rebellion,[5] hath pronounced the contrary. First, I say, that woman in her greatest perfection was made to serve and obey man, not to rule and command him. As Saint Paul doth reason in these words: "Man is not of the woman, but the woman of the man. And man was not created for the cause of the woman, but the woman for the cause of man; and therefore ought the woman to have a power upon her head" (that is, a coverture in sign of subjection).[6] Of which words it is plain that the Apostle meaneth that woman in her greatest perfection should have known that man was lord above her, and therefore that she should never have pretended any kind of superiority above him, no more than do the angels above God the creator, or above Christ Jesus their head. So I say that in her greatest perfection, woman was created to be subject to man. But after her fall and rebellion committed against God, there was put upon her a new necessity, and she was made subject to man by the irrevocable sentence of God, pro-

[1] Aristotle in the Second of his Politics i.e., the second book of Aristotle's Politics, written c. 335 BCE.

[2] middest in the midst, in the middle.

[3] Amazons a mythical race of female warriors.

[4] the companions of Ulysses The enchantress Circe turned Ulysses' companions into swine.

[5] Women's authority is first denied because the creation story of Genesis 2 states that God first made man, and then made woman as man's helper. Eve's rebellion—her disobedience in eating of the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge and her temptation of Adam—along with God's punishment are explained in Genesis 3.

[6] 1 Corinthians 11:8-10. See also verses 3-7.

nounced in these words: "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception. With sorrow shalt thou bear thy children, and thy will shall be subject to thy man, and he shall bear dominion over thee."[1] Hereby may such as altogether be not blinded plainly see that God by his sentence hath dejected all women from empire and dominion above man.

[...]

I remember that I have made the nobility both of England and Scotland inferior to brute beasts for that they do to women which no male amongst the common sort of beasts can be proved to do to their females; that is, they reverence them and quake at their presence; they obey their commandments, and that against God. Wherefore I judge them not only subjects to women, but slaves of Satan and servants of iniquity. If any man think these my words sharp or vehement, let him consider that the offense is more heinous than can be expressed by words. For where all things be expressedly concluded against the glory and honour of God, and where the blood of the saints of God is commanded to be shed, whom shall we judge, God or the Devil, to be president of that council? Plain it is that God ruleth not by his love, mercy, nor grace in the assembly of the ungodly. Then it resteth that the Devil, the prince of this world, doth reign over such tyrannies. Whose servants, I pray you, shall then be judged such as obey and execute their tyranny? God, for his great mercy's sake, illuminate the eyes of men that they may perceive into what miserable bondage they be brought by the monstriferous empire of women!

[...]

But to repress the raging of woman's madness, I will descend somewhat deeper into the matter, and not fear to affirm that as we find a contrary spirit in all these most wicked women that this day be exalted into this tyrannous authority to the spirit that was in those godly matrons,[2] so I fear not, I say, to affirm that their condition is unlike and that their end shall be divers.[3] In those matrons, we find that the spirit of mercy, truth, justice, and of humility did reign. Under them we find that God did show mercy to his people, delivering them from the tyranny of strangers, and from the venom of idolatry, by the hands and counsel of those women. But in these of our ages, we find cruelty, falsehood, pride, covetousness, deceit, and oppression. In them we also find the spirit of Jezebel and Athaliah;[4] under them we find the simple people oppressed, the true religion extinguished, and the blood of Christ's members most cruelly shed. And, finally, by their practices and deceit we find ancient realms and nations given and betrayed into the hands of strangers, the titles and liberties of them taken from the just possessors. Which one thing is an evident testimony, how unlike our mischievous Marys[5] be unto Deborah, under whom were strangers chased out of Israel, God so raising her up to be a mother and deliverer to his oppressed people. But (alas!) he hath raised up these Jezebelles[6] to be the uttermost of his plagues, the which man's unthankfulness hath long deserved. But his secret and most just judgement shall neither excuse them, neither their maintainers, because their counsels be divers.

But to prosecute my purpose, let such as list[7] to defend these monsters in their tyranny prove, first, that their sovereign mistresses be like to Deborah in godliness and pity; and secondarily, that the same success doth follow their tyranny which did

[1] Genesis 3:16.

[2] Knox has just briefly discussed Biblical examples of women in positions of authority, such as Deborah, who was a prophetess who inspired her people to victory in battle. See Judges 4 and 5.

[3] divers different.

[4] Jezebel's daughter, Athaliah, ruled Judah for 6 years after slaying the heirs to the throne. She was overthrown and killed. See 2 Kings 11:1-16.

[5] Marys Mary Tudor of England, Mary Stuart of Scotland and probably Marie de Guise, Mary Stuart's mother, who was regent of Scotland from 1554 to 1560.

[6] Knox's pluralisation of Jezebel—"belles"—incorporates her feminine seductive qualities, very unlike the "mother and deliverer" Deborah.

[7] list wish.

follow the extraordinary regiment of that godly matron. Which thing, although they were able to do (as they never shall be, let them blow till they burst), yet shall her example profit them nothing at all. For they are never able to prove that either Deborah, or any other godly woman (having the commendation of the Holy Ghost within the Scriptures), hath usurped authority above any realm or nation by reason of their birth and blood; neither yet did they claim it by right or inheritance;[1] but God by his singular privilege, favour, and grace, exempted Deborah from the common malediction given to women in that behalf, and against nature he made her prudent in counsel, strong in courage, happy in regiment, and a blessed mother and deliverer to his people. The which he did partly to advance and notify the power of his majesty, as well to his enemies as to his own people, in that, that he declared himself able to give salvation and deliverance by means of the most weak vessels; and partly he did it to confound and ashame all men of that age, because they had for the most part declined from his true obedience. And therefore was the spirit of courage, regiment, and boldness taken from them for a time, to their confusion and further humiliation.

[...]

I fear not to say that the day of vengeance which shall apprehend that horrible monster Jezebel of England, and such as maintain her monstrous cruelty, is already appointed in the counsel of the Eternal; and I verily believe that it is so nigh,[2] that she shall not reign so long in tyranny as hitherto she hath done, when God shall declare himself to be her enemy, when he shall pour forth contempt upon her according to her cruelty, and shall kindle the hearts of such as sometimes did favour her with deadly hatred against her, that they may execute his judgements. And therefore let such as assist her take heed what they do, for assuredly her empire and reign is a wall without foundation: I mean the same of the authority of all women. It hath been underpropped this blind time that is past with the foolishness of people, and with the wicked laws of ignorant and tyrannous princes. But the fire of God's word is already laid to those rotten props (I include the Pope's law with the rest), and presently they burn, albeit we espy not the flame.[3] When they are consumed (as shortly they will be, for stubble and dry timber cannot long endure the fire), that rotten wall, the usurped and unjust empire of women, shall fall by itself in despite of all men to the destruction of so many as shall labour to uphold it. And therefore let all men be advertised,[4] for the trumpet hath once blown.

Praise God ye that fear him.

—1558

[1] right or inheritance Knox does not accept a woman's claim to authority through bloodlines, unlike many Protestants who supported Mary's direct inheritance from her father Henry VIII above her gender and her Catholic religion.

[2] Coincidentally, Mary died in November 1558, a few months after the first publication of this text.

[3] Knox is speaking metaphorically here, but probably has in mind retaliation for the martyrdom of Protestants under Mary.

[4] advertised advised or warned.

Anne (Vaughan) Locke [Lok]
c. 1530-1590/1607

Anne Vaughan Locke Dering Prowse lived a life that was fascinating for its religio-political and literary activity. Born in Cheapside (London), the daughter of Stephen Vaughan, a London mercer (merchant) who worked also as an envoy for Henry VIII, and Margery Guinet,[1] a silkwoman to Anne Boleyn, Locke had links from childhood to both Reformation circles and the royal Court. Between 1529 and 1532, her father was examined several times by Thomas More for suspected heresy because of both his own reformist leanings, and those of his second wife; reformist sympathies were common among merchants given their trade contacts in the strongly Protestant Low Countries (now the Netherlands and Belgium). Locke's marriages reflect both the social world in which she was raised and her religious stance, for her three husbands represent the staunchly mercantile and reformist world of her youth: Henry Locke was a Cheapside mercer, Edward Dering a London Puritan preacher, and Richard Prowse a mercer from Exeter, where Locke spent the last part of her life.

Locke herself wielded considerable power among English reformists through strong connections to both landed and Protestant elites. Her connections to powerful reformist aristocratic women, including Katherine Bertie, duchess of Suffolk, Katherine Killigrew, Anne Cooke Bacon, and Anne Herbert, countess of Warwick, allowed her to defend her second husband, Edward Dering, when he was examined by the Star Chamber for preaching sermons against bishops in 1573. Evidence of her position within the international reformist community can be found in correspondence with John Knox, who lived with the Lockes for part of 1553. Unusually, Knox's letters are addressed to Locke, rather than to her husband. Equally unusual is the degree of independence Locke displayed in her pursuit of reformist religio-political goals. In 1557 she left England with her two children, but without her husband, and travelled to Geneva[2] to join the Protestant expatriate community that had formed around John Calvin.

In her two years in Geneva, Locke spent part of her time translating Calvin's four sermons on the song of Hezekiah from Isaiah 38.[3] Locke's sense of agency as a member of a reformist community intent upon creating a Protestant utopia emerges in the preface to the work. It is to this work, published in 1560, that the sonnet sequence, "Meditation of a Penitent Sinner," is appended. The sequence is significant for several reasons. First, it refines the sonnet form introduced to English by Wyatt and Surrey and popularized by Tottel's Miscellany (1557). Second, it is the first sonnet sequence in English, predating the flowering of the series of narratively linked poems in the 1580s and 1590s. Third, it is the first poetry by an early modern English woman.[4] Some question has been raised about its authorship, however, because of a curious comment that prefaces the sequence: "I have added this meditation following unto the end of this book, not as parcel of Master Calvin's work, but for that it well agreeth with the same argument, and was delivered me by my friend with whom I knew I might be so bold to use and publish as it pleased me." While various candidates for the role of "friend" have been considered, including Locke's son Henry (a known religious poet), and even John Knox—who is not known to have written poetry—it is now generally agreed that Locke wrote the sequence and employs a fairly typical humility topos by way of introduction.

The sequence translates and adapts Psalm 51, one of the seven penitential psalms (the others are 6, 32, 38, 102, 130, and 143), in a series of 21 English-style sonnets. Psalm 51 was particularly significant to reformers because of its evo-

---

1 P. Collinson, "Locke [née Vaughan; other married names Dering, Prowse], Anne," DNB online.

2 For an account of the correspondence between Locke and Knox, see P. Collinson, "The Role of Women in the English Reformation Illustrated by the Life and Friendships of Anne Locke," Studies in Church History 2 (1965): pp. 258-72 and S.M. Felch, "'Deir Sister': The Letters of John Knox to Anne Vaughan Locke," Renaissance and Reformation 19.4 (1995): pp. 47-68.

3 Collinson, "The Role of Women," p. 265.

4 See S. Woods, "The Body Penitent: A 1560 Calvinist Sonnet Sequence," American Notes and Queries, 5:2-3 (1992): pp. 137-40 and R. Greene, "Anne Locke's Meditation: Invention Versus Dilation and the Founding of Puritan Poetics," Form and Reform: Essays in Honour of Barbara Kiefer Lewalski, ed. A. Boesky and M.T. Crane (Newark, 2000), pp. 153-70.

cation of original sin and stress on the importance of faith over works.[1] Indeed, the five prefatory sonnets construct the anguished persona of the spiritually blind and confused soul in need of God's mercy that is explored in the sonnets that follow. Over the course of the sequence, the destruction of the body functions as a symbol for the fallenness of the soul and the torments that accompany its correction.

EDITION: Sermons of Iohn Calvin, upon the songe that Ezechias made after he had bene sicke. London: John Day, 1560. STC 4450.

from Sermons of John Calvin, Upon the Song that Hezekiah Made.

To the Right Honourable, and Christian Princess, the Lady Katharine, Duchess of Suffolk.

It often falleth out in experience (my gracious and singular good lady) that some men being oppressed with poverty, tossed with worldly adversity, tormented with pain, soreness, and sickness of body, and other such common matters of grief, as the world counteth miseries and evils, yet having their minds armed and furnished with prepared patience, and defence of inward understanding, all these calamities cannot so far prevail as to make them fall, nor yet once stoop into the state of men to be accompted[2] miserable, but they bear with them such constaunce,[3] as if afflictions were not of such nature as other[4] commonly do feel them, or as if those men were such upon whom those troubles could not work their natural property.[5] On the other side we see some that, flowing in earthly wealth and suffisance,[6] free from fortune's cruelty, healthy in body, and every way to the world's seeming[7] blessed, yet with mind not well instructed, or with conscience not well quieted, even upon such small chances[8] as other can lightly bear, are vexed above measure with reasonless extremity. Whereby appeareth that the griefs of the body and calamities of fortune do so far only extend to afflict, or make a man miserable, as they approach to touch the mind and assail the soul. Which proveth that the pains and diseases of mind and soul are not only the most grievous, and most dangerous, but also they only are painful and perilous, and those of the body and fortune are such as the mind useth,[9] and maketh them. So as to a sick stomach of mind, all bodily matters of delight and worldly pleasures are loathsome and displeasant, as on the other side the power of a healthy soul easily digesteth and gathereth good nouriture[10] of the hard pains and bitter torments of the body and fortune. He then, that cureth the sick mind, or preserveth it from disease, cureth or preserveth not only mind, but body also, and deserveth so much more praise and thanks than the body's physician as the soul excelleth the body, and as the curing or preservation of them both is to be preferred before the cure of the body alone, [...] What then deserveth he, that teacheth such a receipt,[11] whereby health both of body and mind is preserved, and whereby if health be appaired[12] it may be restored, yea whereby sickness and common miseries continuing shall not have so much power to trouble a man as to make him sick or miserable? This receipt God the heavenly physi-

[1] M.P. Hannay, "'Wisdome the Wordes': Psalm Translation and Elizabethan Women's Spirituality," Religion and Literature 23.3 (1991): p. 69.

[2] accompted accounted, reckoned, considered.

[3] constaunce constancy.

[4] other others.

[5] natural property essential, special, or distinctive quality.

[6] suffisance sufficiency, adequate supply.

[7] seeming appearance.

[8] chances accidents, mishaps.

[9] useth makes, puts into practice.

[10] nouriture nourishment, sustenance, food.

[11] receipt recipe.

[12] appaired injured, impaired.

cian hath taught, his most excellent apothecary Master John Calvin hath compounded, and I your Grace's most bounden and humble[1] have put into an English box[2] and do present unto you. My thanks are taken away and drowned by the great excess of duty that I owe you. Master Calvin thinketh his pains recompensed if your Grace or any Christian take profit of it because how much soever is spent, his store is never the less. And for God, recompensed he cannot be, but how he is continually to be thanked, your Grace's profession of his word, your abiding in the same, the godly conversation that I have seen in you, do prove that your self do better understand and practice than I can admonish you.

And that you may be assured that this kind of medicine is not hurtful, two most excellent kings, Hezekiah and David, beside an infinite number have tasted the like before you, and have found health therein, such health as hath cured them forever, and not as common or natural reasons[3] of philosophy do cure a sick or sore mind, which with easy and weak, not well-drawing, or cleansing plasters so overheal the wound that it festereth and breaketh out afresh with renewed and doubly increased danger.

Such remedy as here is contained can no philosopher, no infidel, no papist minister [...] This physic resteth only among true believing Christians, who are persuaded that, whatsoever betideth unto us, his high wisdom that sent it, and that seeth all things, sent it of his good pleasure and decreed purpose, and that for our benefit it we love and believe him, though our weak understanding knoweth not how it should be profitable,[4] but naturally judgeth it hurtful and unpleasant. And necessary it was that he, which by understanding of God's hatred of sin and feeling of his justice is subject to fall into the most perilous pain and torment of conflict with sin and desperation, should by conceiving of God's mercy, and believing of his providence, have help of the most and only perfect and effectually working medicine.

[...] Woe is (I say) to them, for their disease is dangerous and hard to be cured. For when the wretched man, finding all help of man not able to uphold him from perishing, being stricken with the mighty hand of God, feeleth himself unable to stand, no soundness in his body, no strength in his limbs, no help of nature to resist the violence of that disease that God's displeasure hath laid upon him, seeth no sign of God's grace in his soul, but the deep wounds that God's anger hath left in his conscience, perceiveth no token to argue him the elect of God and partaker of the death of his Saviour, hearing pronounced that the soul which sinneth shall die, knowing himself to have sinned, and feeling himself dying, alas what help remaineth in this extremity? If we think the help of papists, to beg and borrow other virgins' oil[5] that have none to spare, to buy the superfluous works of those men that say they have done more than suffiseth to satisfy God's law and to deserve their own salvation, to appease God with such extraordinary devised service as he never commanded, and such like unwholesome stuff as papistical soul-slayers have ministered to Christian patients, if (I say) we think these good and sufficient medicines, alas, we do nothing thereby, but plant untrue security, promise health, and perform death, the pangs thereof when the deceived sick man feeleth, he too late espyeth[6] the falsehood of the murderous physician. [...] They which taught him to seek health any other where than in the determined purpose of God, that hath sent his own Son for our redemption, have spoiled him of

[1] bounden obliged, beholden, indebted; humble lowly. The phrase "bounden and humble" was used in letters to address a person regarded as a superior.

[2] put into an English box translated from the French of Calvin's original. Note the use of the metaphor of the apothecary's packaging of a medicine.

[3] natural reasons native intellectual power unaided by spirit.

[4] profitable beneficial, useful, valuable.

[5] virgins' oil Matthew 25:1-13 tells the parable of the maidens who went to meet Christ, the wise virgins with oil for their lamps and the foolish without, so that the foolish had to leave to buy oil, while the wise went into the marriage feast. The final line warns "Watch therefore, for you know neither the day nor the hour" of Christ's coming.

[6] espyeth watch for, detect, discern.

all benefit of redemption. He feeleth at length all too late how, by fault of ill diet and through poisonous potions which his ignorant, corrupted, and traitorous physician suffered him to use, and bade[1] him to take, he lieth dead eternally.

But on the other side, when the believing Christian falleth (as God hath made none to stand whereby they should not need his mercy to raise them when they are fallen) he knoweth whither to reach his hand to be raised up again. Being stung with the sting of the scorpion he knoweth how with oil of the same scorpion to be healed again; being wounded with the justice of God that hateth sin, he knoweth how with the mercy of the same God that pardoneth sin to have his pain assuaged and hurt amended. [...] This medicine is in this little book brought from the plentiful shop and storehouse of God's Holy Testament, where God's everabiding purpose from beyond beginning is set forth, to the everlasting salvation of some, and eternal confusion of other. Beside that, this book hath not only the medicine, but also an example of the nature of the disease, and the means how to use and apply the medicine to them that be so diseased. For when a man languishing in corporal sickness heareth his neighbour report unto him, or himself hath before time seen in another the same cause of sickness [...] it giveth him assurance, and maketh him to know that he is sick of the same disease that the other was, whereby knowing how the other was healed, what diet he kept, what physic[2] he took, he doeth with the greater boldness, confidence of mind, and desire call for, taste, and greedily receive that healthful and lifeful medicine whereby he saw and knew his neighbour healed, and with the greater care keepeth the same diet wherewith he saw and knew the other preserved. So here this good soul's physician hath brought you where you may see lying before your face the good King Hezekiah, sometime chilling and chattering with cold, sometime languishing and melting away with heat, now freezing, now frying, now speechless, now crying out, with other such piteous pangs and passions wrought in his tender afflicted spirit, by guilty conscience of his own fault, by terrible consideration of God's justice, by cruel assaults of the tyrannous enemy of man's salvation, vexing him in much more lamentable wise than any bodily fever can work, or bodily flesh can suffer. On the other side for his help, you see him sometime throw up his ghastly eyes, staring with horror, and scant discerning for pain and for want of the lively moisture[3] to feed the brightness of their sight. You see him sometime yieldingly stretch out, sometime strugglingly throw his weakened legs, not able to sustain his feeble body; sometime he casteth[4] abroad, or holdeth up his white and bloodless hand toward the place whither his soul longeth; sometime with falling chaps,[5] he breatheth out unperfect sounds, gasping rather than calling for mercy and help. These things being here laid open to sight and remaining in remembrance (as the horror and piteous spectacle cannot suffer it to fall out of a Christian tender mind) if we feel ourselves in like anguish, we find that the disease is the same that Hezekiah had, and so by convenience of reason must by the same mean be healed. Then behoveth us to remember or to be be informed by our diligent physician or charitable neighbour, how we saw Hezekiah healed [...] and this medicine being offered us, we are bold to take it, because we know it will heal us [...] And for his faithful minister, Master Calvin, I beseech your Grace with me, to wish him God's benefit of eternal happy life for his reward, even as I wish your Grace continual health of life and soul for your preservation, not only for this new year, but also for the time that shall exceed all extent of years, beseeching you to accept both my work and prayer.

Concerning my translation of this book, it may please you to understand that I have rendered it so near as I possibly might, to the very words of his[6]

[1] bade begged, prayed, commanded.

[2] physic mental, moral, or spiritual remedy.

[3] lively moisture tears.

[4] casteth throws, flings about.

[5] chaps jaws.

[6] his i.e., Calvin's.

text, and that in so plain English[1] as I could express. Such as it is, I beseech your Grace to take it [in] good part.

[...]

I have added this meditation following unto the end of this book, not as parcel of Master Calvin's work, but for that it well agreeth with the same argument, and was delivered me by my friend with whom I knew I might be so bold to use and publish it as pleased me.

A MEDITATION OF A PENITENT SINNER: WRITTEN IN MANNER OF A PARAPHRASE UPON THE 51. PSALM OF DAVID

The Preface, Expressing the Passioned Mind of the Penitent Sinner.

P1[2]

The heinous[3] guilt of my forsaken ghost
So threats, alas, unto my feebled sprite
Deserved death, and (that me grieveth most)
Still stand so fixed before my dazzled sight
The loathsome filth of my distained life,
The mighty wrath of mine offended Lord,
The Lord whose wrath is sharper than the knife,
And deeper wounds than double-edged sword,
That, as the dimmed and foredulled eyen,[4]
Full fraught[5] with tears and more and more oppressed
With growing streams of the distilled brine
Sent from the furnace of a grateful breast,
Cannot enjoy the comfort of the light,
Nor find the way wherein to walk aright.

P2

So I, blind wretch, whom God's inflamed ire
With piercing stroke hath thrown unto the ground,
Amid my sins still grovelling in the mire,
Find not the way that others oft have found,
Whom cheerful glimpse of God's abounding grace[6]
Hath oft relieved and oft with shining light
Hath brought to joy out of the ugly place,
Where I in dark of everlasting night
Bewail my woeful and unhappy case,
And fret[7] my dying soul with gnawing pain,
Yet blind, alas, I grope about for grace.
While blind for grace I grope about in vain,
My fainting breath I gather up and strain,
Mercy, mercy to cry and cry again.

P3

But mercy while I found with shrieking cry
For grant of grace and pardon while I pray,
Even then despair before my ruthful[8] eye
Spreads forth my sin and shame, and seems to say
In vain thou brayest forth thy bootless[9] noise
To him for mercy, O refused wight,[10]
That hears not the forsaken sinner's voice.
Thy reprobate and foreordained sprite,[11]
Fore-damned vessel of his heavy wrath
(As self witness of thy beknowing heart,
And secret guilt of thine own conscience saith)
Of his sweet promises can claim no part:
But thee, caitiff,[12] deserved curse doth draw
To Hell, by justice, for offended law.

P4

This horror when my trembling soul doth hear,
When marks and tokens of the reprobate,

---

1 so plain English A concern of mid-century translation was the development of a powerful, yet transparent, prose style that would both show the richness of the English language and convey as closely as possible the sense of the original.

2 "P" indicates a prefatory sonnet.

3 heinous hateful, wicked, atrocious.

4 eyen eyes.

5 fraught laden.

6 abounding grace See headnote, pp. 210-11.

7 fret consume, torment.

8 ruthful lamentable, piteous, rueful.

9 bootless useless, unprofitable.

10 wight creature, human.

11 reprobate depraved, rejected by God; sprite spirit, soul.

12 caitiff captive, prisoner.

My growing sins, of grace my senseless cheer,
Enforce the proof of everlasting hate,
That I conceive the Heaven's King to bear
Against my sinful and forsaken ghost,
As in the throat of Hell, I quake for fear,
And then in present peril to be lost
(Although by conscience wanteth to reply,
But with remorse enforcing mine offence,
Doth argue vain my not availing cry)
With woeful sighs and bitter penitence
To him from whom the endless mercy flows
I cry out for mercy to relieve my woes.

P5

And then not daring with presuming eye
Once to behold the angry Heaven's face,
From troubled sprite I send confused cry,
And crave the crumbs of all-sufficing[1] grace.
With faltering knee I, falling to the ground,
Bending my yielding hands to Heaven's throne,
Pour forth my piteous plaint and woeful sound,
With smoking sighs and oft-repeated groan,
Before the Lord, the Lord, whom sinner I,
I cursed wretch, I have offended so,
That dreading, in his wreakful[2] wrath to die,
And damned down to depth of Hell to go,
Thus tossed with pangs and passions of despair,
Thus crave I mercy with repentant cheer.

A Meditation of a Penitent Sinner, upon the 51. Psalm.

1[3]

Have mercy, God, for thy great mercy's sake,
O God, my God, unto my shame I say,
Being fled from thee, so as I dread to take Thy name in wretched mouth, and fear to pray
Or ask the mercy that I have abused.
But, God of mercy, let me come to thee,
Not for justice, that justly am accursed,
Which self word "justice" so amazeth me,
That scarce I dare thy mercy sound again.
But mercy, Lord, yet suffer me to crave.
Mercy is thine, let me not cry in vain,
Thy great mercy for my great fault to have.
Have mercy, God, pity my penitence
With greater mercy than my great offence.

2[4]

My many sins in number are increased,
With weight whereof in sea of deep despair
My sinking soul is now so sore oppressed,
That now in peril and in present fear,
I cry: sustain me, Lord, and Lord I pray,
With endless number of thy mercies take
The endless number of my sins away.
So by thy mercy, for thy mercy's sake,
Rue on me, Lord, relieve me with thy grace.
My sin is cause that I so need to have
Thy mercy's aid in my so woeful case;
My sin is cause that scarce I dare to crave
Thy mercy manifold,[5] which only may Relieve my soul, and take my sins away.

3[6]

So foul is sin and loathsome in thy sight,
So foul with sin I see myself to be,
That till from sin I may be washed white,
So foul I dare not, Lord, approach to thee.
Oft hath thy mercy washed me before,
Thou madest me clean, but I am foul again.
Yet wash me, Lord, again, and wash me more.
Wash me, O Lord, and do away the stain
Of ugly sins that in my soul appear.
Let flow thy plenteous streams of cleansing grace.
Wash me again, yea wash me everywhere,
Both leprous body and defiled face.
Yea wash me all, for I am all unclean.
And from my sin, Lord, cleanse me once again.

---

1 all-sufficing sufficient.

2 wreakful vengeful.

3 Psalm 51:1a: "Have mercy on me, O God, according to thy steadfast love."

4 Psalm 51:1b: "According to thy abundant mercy blot out my transgressions."

5 manifold varied, complex.

6 Psalm 51:2: "Wash me thoroughly from my iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin!"

4[1]

Have mercy, Lord, have mercy, for I know
How much I need thy mercy in this case.
The horror of my guilt doth daily grow,
And growing wears my feeble hope of grace.
I feel and suffer in my thralled[2] breast
Secret remorse and gnawing of my heart.
I feel my sin, my sin that hath oppressed
My soul with sorrow and surmounting smart.
Draw me to mercy, for so oft as I
Presume to mercy to direct my sight,
My Chaos[3] and my heap of sin doth lie
Between me and thy mercy's shining light.
Whatever way I gaze about for grace,
My filth and fault are ever in my face.

5[4]

Grant thou me mercy, Lord; thee, thee alone
I have offended, and offending thee,
For mercy lo, how I do lie and groan.
Thou with all-piercing eye beheldest me,
Without regard, that sinned in thy sight.
Behold again how now my spirit it rues,
And wails the time, when I with foul delight
Thy sweet forbearing mercy did abuse.
My cruel conscience with sharpened knife
Doth splat[5] my ripped heart, and lays abroad
The loathsome secrets of my filthy life,
And spreads them forth before the face of God.
Whom shame from deed shameless could not restrain,
Shame for my deed is added to my pain.

6[6]

But mercy, Lord, O Lord some pity take,
Withdraw my soul from the deserved Hell,
O Lord of glory, for thy glory's sake,
That I may saved of thy mercy tell,
And show how thou, which mercy hast behight
To sighing sinners, that have broke thy laws,
Performest mercy, so as in the sight
Of them that judge the justice of thy cause
Thou only just be deemed, and no moe,[7]
The world's unjustice wholly to confound,[8]
That damning me to depth of during woe
Just in thy judgement shouldest thou be found,
And from thy deserved flames relieving me,
Just in thy mercy mayest thou also be.

7[9]

For lo, in sin, Lord, I begotten was,
With seed and shape my sin I took also,
Sin is my nature and my kind alas,
In sin my mother me conceived; lo
I am but sin, and sinful ought to die,
Die in his wrath that hath forbidden sin.
Such bloom and fruit lo sin doth multiply,
Such was my root, such is my juice within.
I plead not this as to excuse my blame,
On kind or parents mine own guilt to lay,
But by disclosing my sin, my shame,
And need of help, the plainer to display
Thy mighty mercy, if with plenteous grace
My plenteous sins it please thee to deface.

8[10]

Thou lovest simple sooth,[11] not hidden face
With truthless visor of deceiving show.
Lo simply, Lord, I do confess my case,
And simply crave thy mercy in my woe.
This secret wisdom hast thou granted me,
To see my sins and whence my sins do grow;
This hidden knowledge have I learned of thee,
To feel my sins, and how my sins do flow

---

1 Psalm 51:3: "For I know my transgressions, and my sin is ever before me."

2 thralled enslaved.

3 Chaos the "formless void" of primordial matter, the "great deep" or "abyss" out of which the cosmos or order of the universe was evolved.

4 Psalm 51:4a: "Against thee only have I sinned, and done that which is evil in thy sight."

5 splat cut up, split open

6 Psalm 51:4b: "So that thou art justified in thy sentence and blameless in thy judgement."

7 moe more.

8 confound overthrow, defeat, confuse.

9 Psalm 51:5: "Behold, I was brought forth in iniquity and in sin did my mother conceive me."

10 Psalm 51:6: "Behold, thou desirest truth in the inward being; therefore teach me wisdom in my secret heart."

11 sooth truth.

With such excess, that with unfeigned heart,
Dreading to drown, my Lord, lo how I flee,
Simply with tears bewailing my desert,
Relieved simply by thy hand to be.
Thou lovest truth, thou taughtest me the same.
Help, Lord of truth, for glory of thy name.

9[1]

With sweet hyssop[2] besprinkle thou my sprite,
Not such hyssop, nor so besprinkle me,
As law, unperfect shade of perfect light,
Did use as an appointed sign to be Foreshowing figure of thy grace behight.[3]
With death and bloodshed of thine only son,
The sweet hyssop, cleanse me defiled wight.
Sprinkle my soul. And when thou so hast done,
Bedewed with drops of mercy and of grace,
I shall be clean as cleansed of my sin.
Ah, wash me Lord, for I am foul alas,
That only canst, Lord, wash me well within,
Wash me, O Lord; when I am washed so,
I shall be whiter than the whitest snow.

10[4]

Long have I heard, and yet I hear the sounds
Of dreadful threats and thunders of the law,
Which echo of my guilty mind resounds,
And with redoubled horror doth so draw
My listening soul from mercy's gentle voice,
That louder, Lord, I am constrained to call:
Lord, pierce mine ears, and make me to rejoice,
When I shall hear and when thy mercy shall Sound in my heart the gospel of thy grace.
Then shalt thou give my hearing joy again,
The joy that only may relieve my case.
And then my bruised bones, that thou with pain
Hast made too weak my feebled corpse to bear,
Shall leap for joy, to show mine inward cheer.

11[5]

Look on me, Lord, though trembling I beknow
That sight of sin so sore offendeth thee,
That seeing sin, how it doth overflow
My whelmed soul, thou canst not look on me,
But with disdain, with horror and despite.
Look on me, Lord, but look not on my sin.
Not that I hope to hide it from thy sight,
Which seest me all without and eke[6] within.
But so remove it from thy wrathful eye,
And from the justice of thine angry face,
That thou impute[7] it not. Look not how I Am foul by sin, but make me by thy grace
Pure in thy mercy's sight, and, Lord, I pray,
That hatest sin, wipe all my sins away.

12[8]

Sin and despair have so possessed my heart,
And hold my captive soul in such restraint,
As of thy mercies I can feel no part,
But still in languor[9] do I lie and faint.
Create a new pure heart within my breast;
Mine old can hold no liquor[10] of thy grace.
My feeble faith with heavy load oppressed
Staggering doth scarcely creep a reeling[11] pace,
And fallen it is too faint to rise again.
Renew, O Lord, in me a constant sprite,
That stayed with mercy may my soul sustain,
A sprite so settled and so firmly pight[12]
Within my bowels, that it never move,
But still uphold th' assurance of thy love.

13[13]

Lo prostrate, Lord, before thy face I lie,
With sighs deep drawn deep sorrow to express.

---

1 Psalm 51:7: "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow."

2 hyssop a small bushy aromatic herb, native to Southern Europe, used medicinally. Its twigs were used for sprinkling in Jewish rites and for ceremonial purification.

3 behight vowed, promised.

4 Psalm 51:8: "Fill me with joy and gladness; let the bones which thou hast broken rejoice."

5 Psalm 51:9: "Hide thy face from my sins, and blot out all mine iniquities."

6 eke also.

7 impute accuse.

8 Psalm 51:10: "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and put in a new and right spirit within me."

9 languor sickness, mental suffering, exhaustion.

10 liquor matter in a liquid state, solution.

11 reeling staggering.

12 pight pitched, placed.

13 Psalm 51:11: "Cast me not away from thy presence, and take not thy holy Spirit from me."

O Lord of mercy, mercy do I cry.
Drive me not from thy face in my distress,
Thy face of mercy and of sweet relief,
The face that feeds angels with only sight,
The face of comfort in extremest grief.
Take not away the succour[1] of thy sprite,
The Holy Sprite, which is mine only stay,
The stay that when despair assaileth me,
In faintest hope yet moveth me to pray,
To pray for mercy, and to pray to thee.
Lord, cast me not from presence of thy face,
Nor take me from the spirit of thy grace.

14[2]

But render me my wonted joys again,
Which sin hath reft, and planted in their place
Doubt of thy mercy, ground of all my pain.
The taste that thy love whilom[3] did embrace
My cheerful soul, the signs that did assure
My feeling ghost[4] of favour in thy sight,
Are fled from me, and wretched I endure
Senseless of grace, the absence of thy sprite.
Restore my joys, and make me feel again
The sweet return of grace that I have lost,
That I may hope I pray not all in vain.
With thy free sprite confirm my feeble ghost
To hold my faith from ruin and decay
With fast affiance[5] and assured stay.

15[6]

Lord, of thy mercy if thou me withdraw
From gaping throat of deep devouring Hell,
Lo, I shall preach the justice of thy law.
By mercy saved, thy mercy shall I tell.
The wicked I will teach thine only way,
Thy ways to take, and man's devise[7] to flee,
And such as lewd delight hath led astray,
To rue their error and return to thee.
So shall the proof of mine example preach
The bitter fruit of lust and foul delight;
So shall my pardon by thy mercy teach
The way to find sweet mercy in thy sight.
Have mercy, Lord, in me example make
Of law and mercy, for thy mercy's sake.

16[8]

O God, God of my health, my saving God,
Have mercy Lord, and show thy might to save,
Assoil[9] me, God, from guilt of guiltless blood,
And eke from sin that I ingrowing have
By flesh and blood and by corrupted kind.
Upon my blood and soul extend not, Lord,
Vengeance for blood, but mercy let me find,
And strike me not with thy revenging sword.
So Lord, my joying tongue shall talk thy praise,
Thy name my mouth shall utter in delight,
My voice shall sound thy justice, and thy ways,
Thy ways to justify thy sinful wight.
God of my health, from blood I saved so
Shall spread thy praise for all the world to know.

17[10]

Lo straining cramp of cold despair again
In feeble breast doth pinch my pining heart,
So as in greatest need to cry and plain
My speech doth fail to utter thee my smart.
Refresh my yielding heart, with warming grace,
And loose my speech, and make me call to thee.
Lord, open thou my lips to show my case,
My Lord, for mercy lo to thee I flee.
I cannot pray without thy moving aid,
Ne can I rise, ne can I stand alone.
Lord, make me pray, and grant when I have prayed.
Lord loose my lips, I may express my moan,
And finding grace with open mouth I may
Thy mercies praise, and holy name display.

---

1 succour aid, help.

2 Psalm 51:12: "Restore to me the joy of thy salvation, and uphold me with a willing spirit."

3 whilom some time before or ago.

4 ghost spirit.

5 affiance confidence, faith.

6 Psalm 51:13: "Then I will teach transgressors thy ways, and sinners will return to thee."

7 devise contriving, or planning.

8 Psalm 51:14: "Deliver me from bloodguiltiness, O God, thou God of my salvation, and my tongue will sing aloud of thy deliverance."

9 Assoil absolve from sin, grant absolution to, pardon, forgive.

10 Psalm 51:15: "O Lord, open thou my lips, and my mouth shall show forth thy praise."

18[1]

Thy mercies' praise, instead of sacrifice,
With thankful mind so shall I yield to thee,
For if it were delightful in thine eyes,
Or hereby might thy wrath appeased be,
Of cattle slain and burnt with sacred flame
Up to the heaven the vapoury smoke to send;
Of guiltless beasts, to purge my guilt and blame,
On altars broiled the savour should ascend,
To pease[2] thy wrath. But thy sweet Son alone,
With one sufficing sacrifice for all
Appeaseth thee, and maketh thee at one
With sinful man, and hath repaired our fall.
That sacred host is ever in thine eyes,
The praise of that I yield for sacrifice.

19[3]

I yield myself, I offer up my ghost,
My slain delights, my dying heart to thee.
To God a troubled sprite is pleasing host.
My troubled sprite doth dread like him to be,
In whom tasteless languor with lingering pain
Hath feebled[4] so the starved appetite,
That food too late is offered all in vain,
To hold in fainting corpse the fleeing sprite.
My pining[5] soul for famine of thy grace
So fears alas the faintness of my faith,
I offer up my troubled sprite; alas,
My troubled sprite refuse not in thy wrath.
Such offering likes thee,[6] ne wilt thou despise
The broken humble heart in angry wise.

20[7]

Show mercy, Lord, not unto me alone,
But stretch thy favour and thy pleased will,
To spread thy bounty and thy grace upon
Sion,[8] for Sion is thy holy hill,
That thy Jerusalem with mighty wall
May be enclosed under thy defence,
And builded so that it may never fall
By mining fraud[9] or mighty violence.
Defend thy Church, Lord, and advance it so,
So in despite of tyranny to stand,
That trembling at thy power the world may know
It is upholden by thy mighty hand,
That Sion and Jerusalem may be
A safe abode for them that honour thee.

21[10]

Then on thy hill, and in thy walled town,
Thou shalt receive the pleasing sacrifice,
The bruit[11] shall of thy praised name resound
In thankful mouths, and then with gentle eyes
Thou shalt behold upon thine altar lie
Many a yielden[12] host of humbled heart,
And round about then shall thy people cry:
"We praise thee, God, our God; thou only art
The God of might, of mercy, and of grace."
That I then, Lord, may also honour thee,
Relieve my sorrow, and my sins deface;
Be, Lord of mercy, merciful to me;
Restore my feeling of thy grace again;
Assure my soul, I crave it not in vain.

FINIS.

—1560

[1] Psalm 51:16: "For thou hast no delight in sacrifice; were I to give a burnt offering, thou wouldst not be pleased."

[2] pease appease, make peace.

[3] Psalm 51:17: "The sacrifice acceptable to God is a broken spirit; a broken and contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise."

[4] feebled weakened.

[5] pining exhausted, consumed.

[6] likes thee you like.

[7] Psalm 51:18: "Do good to Zion in thy good pleasure; rebuild the walls of Jerusalem."

[8] Sion the name of one of the hills of Jerusalem, on which the city of David was built, and which became the centre of Jewish life and worship.

[9] mining undermining, weakening; fraud deceit.

[10] Psalm 51:19: "Then wilt thou delight in right sacrifices, in burnt offerings and whole burnt offerings; then bulls will be offered on thy altar."

[11] bruit noise, din.

[12] yielden yielded, surrendered.

John Foxe
1516/1517-1587

John Foxe was one of many Protestants who fled to the Continent during the reign of the Catholic Mary Tudor. While there, he collected accounts of the testimonies and persecutions of Protestants under Queen Mary. When Elizabeth I ascended the throne, many exiles returned, Foxe in 1559.

Foxe was committed to the reform of the Church to the "true faith," and his most influential contribution to this cause was his doctrinal and didactic history of Protestant martyrs, first published by the Protestant printer John Day in 1563. Acts and Monuments of these Latter and Perilous Days was extremely popular and became commonly known as "Foxe's Book of Martyrs." Four editions were printed during Foxe's lifetime, each edition enlarging the history until it reached almost six thousand folio pages. The second edition of 1570 found an official place in English cathedrals alongside the Bible. Although Foxe based his compilation on apparently authentic eyewitness accounts—to which he often refers—his sense of the dramatic and disturbing certainly shapes his narrative, as do the various authorial comments and woodcuts. The selections chosen here are examples of the varied stories from the reign of Mary I.

EDITION: Actes and monuments of these latter and perillous dayes touching matters of the Church, wherein ar comprehended and de[s]cribed the great persecutions [and] horrible troubles, that have bene wrought and practised by the Romishe prelates, speciallye in this realme of Englande and Scotlande, from the yeare of our Lorde a thousande, unto the tyme nowe present. London: John Day, 1563. STC 11222.

from Acts and Monuments of These Latter and Perilous Days

The Behaviour of Dr. Ridley and Master Latimer, at the Time of Their Death.[1]

Upon the north side of the town, in the ditch over against Baily College,[2] the place of execution was appointed, and for fear of any tumult that might arise to let[3] the burning of them, my Lord Williams was commanded, by the Queen's letters and the householders of the city, to be their assistant sufficiently appointed. And when everything was in a readiness, they were brought to the stake by the mayor and bailiffs: Master Ridley in a fair black gown, such as he was wont to wear when he was bishop, with a tippet[4] of sables about his neck nothing undressed.

Master Latimer in a poor Bristol frieze frock[5] all worn, with his buttoned cap, and a kerchief on his head, all ready to the fire, a new long shroud[6] hanging over his hose, down to the feet, which at first sight stirred men's hearts to rue upon them, beholding on the one side the honour they sometime had, and on the other the calamity whereunto they were then descended.

[...] Then Master Ridley, looking back, espied Master Latimer coming after, unto whom he said, "Oh, be ye there?" "Yea," said Master Latimer, "have after, as fast as I can follow." So he, following a pretty way off, at length they came both to the stake one after the other, where first Dr. Ridley entering the place, marvellous earnestly holding

[1] Ridley and Latimer were two Protestant reformers, executed during the reign of Mary Tudor, on 16 October 1555.

[2] Baily College Balliol, one of the colleges of Oxford, founded 1263.

[3] let hinder.

[4] tippet cape or short cloak.

[5] Bristol frieze frock Bristol was a centre of trade and manufacture; frieze is coarse woolen cloth.

[6] shroud can refer to clothing generally, but may be a winding sheet, in which corpses were laid out for burial.

up both his hands, looked towards heaven, and with a glimpse of his eye aside espying Master Latimer, with a wonderful cheerful look ran unto him, and embraced and kissed him and, as they that stood near reported, comforted him, saying, "Be of good heart, brother, for God will either assuage the fury of the flame, or else strengthen us to abide it."

With that went he to the stake, kneeled down by it, kissed it, most effectuously[1] prayed, and behind him Master Latimer kneeled, as earnestly calling upon God as he. After they arose, the one talked with the other a little while, till they which were appointed to see the execution removed themselves out of the sun. What they said I can learn of no man.

Then Dr. Smith[2] began his sermon to them upon this text of St. Paul in the thirteenth chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians [...]: "If I yield my body to the fire to be burnt and have not charity, I shall gain nothing thereby."[3] Wherein he alleged that the goodness of the cause, nor the holiness of the person should not be judged by the order of the death, which he confirmed by the examples of Judas[4] and of a woman in Oxford that of late hanged herself, for that then they and such like (as he or two or three others recited) might be adjudged righteous, which desperately sundered their lives from their bodies, as he feared that those men that stood before him would do. But he cried still to the people to beware of them, for they were heretics and died out of the Church. And on the other side, he declared their diversity in opinions, as Lutherans, Oecolampadians, Zwinglians,[5] of which sect they were, he said, and that was the worst. But the old Church of Christ and the Catholic faith believed far otherwise. At which place they lifted up both hands and their eyes to Heaven, as it were calling God to witness of the truth. The which countenance they made in many other places of his sermon, whereas they thought he spoke amiss. He ended with a very short exhortation to them to recant and come home again to the Church, and save their lives and souls, which else were condemned. His sermon was scant, in all a quarter of an hour.

Dr. Ridley said unto Master Latimer, "Will you begin to answer the sermon, or shall I?" Master Latimer said, "Begin you first, I pray you." "I will," said Master Ridley.

Then, the wicked sermon being ended, Dr. Ridley and Master Latimer kneeled down upon their knees towards my Lord Williams of Thame, the vice-chancellor of Oxford, and divers other commissioners appointed for that purpose, who sat upon a form[6] thereby, unto whom Master Ridley said, "I beseech you, my lord, even for Christ's sake, that I may speak but two or three words." And whilst my lord bent his head to the mayor and vice-chancellor, as it appeared, to know whether he might give him leave to speak, the bailiffs and Dr. Marshall, vice-chancellor, ran hastily unto him, and with their hands stopped his mouth, and said, "Master Ridley, if you will revoke your erroneous opinions and recant the same, you shall not only have liberty so to do, but also the benefit of a subject: that is, have your life."

"Not otherwise?" said Master Ridley. "No," quoth Dr. Marshall. "Therefore, if you will not do so, then there is no remedy but you must suffer for your deserts." "Well," quoth Master Ridley, "so long as the breath is in my body, I will never deny my Lord God and his known truth. God's will be done in me!" And with that he rose up and said with a loud voice, "Well, then I commit our cause to almighty God, which shall indifferently judge all." To whose saying, Master Latimer added his old posy,[7] "Well, there is nothing hid, but it shall be opened." And he said he could answer Smith

---

1 effectuously effectually, earnestly.

2 Dr. Smith Richard Smith (1500-63), professor of divinity.

3 See 1 Corinthians 13:3.

4 Judas Judas Iscariot, the disciple who betrayed Jesus Christ.

5 Lutherans, Oecolampadians, Zwinglians Lutherans were followers of the German religious reformer Martin Luther; Oecolampadians were followers of German religious reformer John Oecolampadius; Zwinglians were followers of the Swiss religious reformer Ulrich Zwinglian.

6 form bench.

7 posy motto.

well enough, if he might be suffered.[1] Incontinently they were commanded to make them ready, which they with all meekness obeyed. Master Ridley took his gown and his tippet, and gave it to his brother-in-law Master Shipside, who all his time of imprisonment, although he might not be suffered to come to him, lay there at his own charges to provide him necessaries, which from time to time he sent him by the sergeant that kept him. Some other of his apparel that was little worth he gave away; other the bailiffs took.

He gave away besides divers other small things to gentlemen standing by, and divers of them pitifully weeping, as to Sir Henry Lee he gave a new groat,[2] and to divers of my Lord Williams' gentlemen some napkins, some nutmegs, and rasins[3] of ginger, his dial[4] and such other things as he had about him, to everyone that stood next him. Some plucked the points[5] off his hose. Happy was he that might get any rag of him.

Master Latimer gave nothing, but very quietly suffered his keeper to pull off his hose and his other array, which to look unto was very simple. And being stripped into his shroud, he seemed as comely[6] a person to them that were there present as one should lightly[7] see; and whereas in his clothes he appeared a withered and crooked, silly[8] old man, he now stood bolt upright, as comely a father as one might lightly behold.

Then Master Ridley, standing as yet in his truss,[9] said to his brother, "It were best for me to go in my truss still." "No," quoth his brother, "it will put you to more pain, and the truss will do a poor man good." Whereunto Master Ridley said, "Be it, in the name of God," and so unlaced himself. Then, being in his shirt, he stood upon the foresaid stone,[10] and held up his hand and said, "O heavenly Father, I give unto thee most hearty thanks, for that thou hast called me to be a professor of thee, even unto death. I beseech thee, Lord God, take mercy upon this realm of England, and deliver the same from all her enemies."

Then the smith[11] took a chain of iron and brought the same about both Dr. Ridley's and Master Latimer's middles, and, as he was knocking in a staple, Dr. Ridley took the chain in his hand and shaked the same, for it did gird in[12] his belly, and looking aside to the smith, said, "Good fellow, knock it in hard, for the flesh will have his course." Then his brother[13] did bring him gunpowder in a bag, and would have tied the same about his neck. Master Ridley asked what it was. His brother said, "Gunpowder." "Then," said he, "I take it to be sent of God. Therefore I will receive it as sent of him. And have you any," said he, "for my brother," meaning Master Latimer. "Yea, sir, that I have," quoth his brother. "Then give it unto him," said he, "betime,[14] lest ye come too late." So his brother went and carried the same gunpowder unto Master Latimer.

The meantime, Dr. Ridley spoke unto my Lord Williams and said, "My lord, I must be a suitor unto your lordship in the behalf of divers poor men, and especially in the cause of my poor sister. I have made a supplication to the Queen's Majesty in their behalfs. I beseech your lordship, for Christ's sake, to be a mean to[15] her grace for them. My brother here hath the supplication and will resort to your lordship to certify you hereof. There is nothing in all the world that troubleth my conscience (I praise God), this only excepted. Whiles I was in the see[16] of London, divers poor men took leases of me, and agreed with me for the 1 suffered allowed.

---

2 groat a small coin.
3 rasins roots.
4 dial timepiece.
5 points the laces or cords attaching the hose to the doublet.
6 comely becoming, pleasing, proper.
7 lightly readily or commonly.
8 silly helpless, weak.
9 truss a close-fitting garment or jacket worn by men and women.
10 the foresaid stone upon which the stake stands.
11 smith blacksmith, metalworker.
12 gird in encircle.
13 brother brother-in-law, Mr. Shipside.
14 betime early, quickly.
15 mean to means to reach.
16 see a diocese or territory under the jurisdiction of a bishop.

same. Now I hear say the bishop that now occupieth the same room will not allow my grants unto them made, but contrary unto all law and conscience, hath taken from them their livings, and will not suffer them to enjoy the same. I beseech you, my lord, be a mean for them. You shall do a good deed, and God will reward you."

Then brought they a faggot[1] kindled with fire, and laid the same down at Dr. Ridley's feet and when he saw the fire flaming up towards him, he cried with a wonderful loud voice, "In manus tuas, Domine, commendo spiritum meum. Domine recipe spiritum meum."[2] And after repeated this latter part often in English, "Lord, Lord, receive my spirit." Master Latimer crying as vehemently on the other side, "O Father of Heaven, receive my soul," who received the flame as it were embracing of it. After, as he had stroked his face with his hands, and as it were bathed them a little in the fire, soon died as it appeareth with very little pain or none.

But Master Ridley, by reason of the evil making of the fire unto him, because the wooden faggots were laid above the gorse,[3] and over-high built, the fire burned first beneath, being kept down by the wood, which when he felt, he desired them for Christ's sake to let the fire come unto him. Which when his brother-in-law heard, but not well understood, intending to rid him out of his pain (for the which cause he gave attendance), as one in such sorrow not well advised what he did, heaped faggots upon him, that he clean covered him, which made the fire more vehement beneath, that it burned clean all his nether parts before it once touched the upper, and that made him leap up and down under the faggots, and often desire them to let the fire come unto him, saying, "I cannot burn," which indeed appeared well. For after his legs were consumed, by reason of his struggling with the pain (whereof he had no release, but only his contentation[4] in God), he showed that side toward us clean, shirt and all untouched with flame. Yet in all this torment he forgot not to call unto God still, having in his mouth, "Lord have mercy upon me," intermeddling this cry, "Let the fire come unto me; I cannot burn." In which pangs he laboured till one of the standers-by with his bill[5] pulled off the faggots above, and where he espied the fire flame up, he wrested himself unto that side. And when the flame touched the gunpowder, he was seen [to] stir no more, but [was] espied burning on the other side by Master Latimer, which some said happened by reason that the chain loosed; others said that he fell over the chain by reason of the poise[6] of his body and the weakness of the nether limbs.

Some said that before he was like to fall from the stake, he desired them to hold him to it with their bills. Howsoever it was, surely it moved hundreds to tears to behold the horrible sight, for I think there was none that had not clean exiled all humanity and mercy which would not have lamented to behold the fury of the fire so rage upon their bodies. Signs there were of sorrow on every side. Some took it grievously to see their deaths, whose lives they held full dear. Some pitied their persons, that thought their souls had no need thereof. His brother moved many men, seeing his miserable case, seeing (I say) him compelled to such infelicity that he thought then to do him best service, when he hastened his end. Some cried out [on] fortune to see his endeavour, who most dearly loved him and sought his release, turn to his greater vexation and increase of pain. But whoso considered their preferments in time past, the places of honour that they sometime occupied in this commonwealth, the favour they were in with their princes, and the opinion of learning they had in the university they studied, could not choose but sorrow with tears to see so great dignity, honour, and estimation, so necessary members sometimes accounted, so many godly virtues, the

[1] faggot bundle of sticks.

[2] In manus tuas ... recipe spiritum meum Latin, "Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit. O Lord, receive my spirit." The first sentence is from the Vulgate (St. Jerome's Latin translation of the Bible); these are Christ's last words before he dies on the cross (Luke 23:46). The second sentence is Ridley's own exclamation.

[3] gorse a prickly shrub.

[4] contentation contentment, satisfaction.

[5] bill a long wooden handle with a blade or spear at the end.

[6] poise heaviness.

study of so many years, such excellent learning, to be put into the fire and consumed in one moment. Well, dead they are, and the reward of this world they have already.

A Lamentable Example of Cruelty Showed upon John Bolton, a Man of Reading,[1] Imprisoned for the True Testimony of a Christian Conscience

The Lent following the coronation of Queen Mary, which Lent was in anno.[2] 1554, there was a writing set upon the church door at Reading in Berkshire, containing matter against the Mass, but the author thereof then and a long time after was unknown, although now certainly known to be indeed one John Moyer, who afterward confessed the fact, recanted, and is now made minister. Great inquisition was in every place thereabouts, but nothing, as I said, could be found certainly. Amongst many others one John Bolton was suspected, and being asked his mind of the Mass, answered that he took it to be against the word of God and contumelious[3] to Christ. Upon the which words, he was by the mayor (whose name was Boyer, and by science a tanner), with other officers, committed to the jail about three weeks before Easter, where being kept by the space of a week or a fortnight in the under-prison or dungeon, afterwards was had up to a chamber of the jailor's (whose name was Welch), having his bed and other necessaries to help himself withal, and so continued until Gardiner, the bishop of Winchester, came through the town with King Philip and Queen Mary, straight upon their marriage at Winchester.

Then the said Bishop, hearing of the said John Bolton, sent for him to talk with him persuading him what he could to relent from the truth. But he stood steadfast and most boldly reproved the said Bishop to his face, and replied most earnestly against his persuasions, whereby the Bishop, being greatly moved, commanded he should be had to prison again, there to be kept with bread and water and nothing else, charging further that whosoever came to him should, in anywise, immediately be set by him.[4]

Well, John Bolton thereupon was carried again to the jail and put into the dungeon or under-prison where he was before, which is under the ground about twelve feet deep, compassed about with most thick walls, without any light saving that only which cometh down at the entry, but (which is the best) both above the head and underfoot it is boarded. And (alas) to no purpose, poor John Bolton might say, for he was not once suffered to walk any part therein, but [was] most cruelly stocked and chained, as hereafter followeth.

In the said dungeon is a marvellous evil scent or odour, and the whole proportion most terrible to see. In the midst thereof be a huge pair of stocks, of a great height, wherein they did put both his hands and his feet; on the other side of the stocks were his legs tied with a great chain of iron, being surely fastened to a great mighty block unmoveable. And hanging on this sort by the hands and feet sometimes a day and a night together, his body not touching any part of the ground, the jailor often would ease him and loose his hands sometimes at night, but his feet he would keep in the stocks still, whole three or four days together.

And being in this woeful and most miserable case, the jailor and his family would wickedly in the night season oftentimes (to trouble the good poor man) cast squibs[5] of fire into the dungeon, whereby his empty and careful head might be troubled with vain and fond fantasies, which came to pass, as hereafter shall be showed.

Now his honest good neighbours, hearing of his perplexity, were not a little careful for him[6] and sent their benevolence liberally to him, as whole-

---

1 Reading is a town in Berkshire, just west of London.

2 anno the year.

3 contumelious contemptuous, insolent.

4 be set by him i.e., join him in prison.

5 squibs small explosives or fireworks.

6 were not a little careful for him i.e., were full of care or concern for him.

some meats and drinks to comfort his weak body, which always was either eaten up by the jailor and his household, or else brought to the grate of the prison and there given to dogs before his face, so cruel and unmerciful was this wicked jailor. Whereby the said poor John Bolton was enforced (alas the pity) to eat his own excrements for very hunger, some thinketh for the space of six days, some thinketh more, some less; but although how long the time is uncertain, yet that he did it is most true.

Thus was he in the lower prison just twelve months and ten weeks, having sometimes his hands and feet in the stocks, sometimes his feet only, sometimes neither; sometimes having checks, taunts, scornings, threatenings and mockings; otherwhiles having meat, otherwhiles his own ordure; until at the last, with terrible torments, solitary sighings, lack of liberty, meat, drink, with such like, and also eating that which nature most abhorreth, and that never was heard of before in any tyrant's days, began, I say, at the last, to be full of ravings and strange fantasies, in such sort that men took him as one without reason and distract of mind. Which being once known unto Sir Francis Englefield, he, with his bloody brother the parson of Englefield, thought good to rid the prison of him, and so he was discharged.

It is not to be forgotten, amongst so many troubles, that in prison was laid awhile, for fornication, a collar-maker by his science, who being of nature very tender and feeling not one quarter of John Bolton's troubles and miserable torments, fell mad. And through friendship of them who were more mad than he, liberty was given him to sit at the grate of the dungeon, to work for his living and to have the benefit of light, which is (as prisoners say) no small benefit. This madman having his tools, that is to say an awl and a stretcher, and his liberty therewith, used the same almost to the destruction of his own wife and the said John Bolton. For she coming to visit him, being great with child and thinking of no danger (poor woman) towards her, the wretched madman ungraciously thrust his awl in her body, and slew the little babe within her womb. And yet not content therewith, but to increase his mischief more and more, he also with the same instruments did in divers places hurt the said John Bolton sitting in the stocks, to the great peril of his life, and no less danger of the same continually while the said collar-maker remained in prison, as it appeareth evidently at this present upon his body, for them that list to see.

Such cruelty, and so greatly was truth hated and whoredom maintained by this wicked jailer, that the evil person could have liberty to do his mischief when he would, where the poor simple John Bolton (laid in for conscience sake to Godward) might not once have so much favour as to be free from the stocks and to walk a little for his comfort. This is the truth of this story, approved by sufficient and credible testimonies, as well of the inhabitors of the said town of Reading, whose letters, at this present, for the certification thereof we have to show, dated to us the twelfth day of May, as also by the confirmation of the party himself on whom this cruelty was showed, being although, through the same their extreme handling, weak and feeble, yet (God be praised) a man alive.

—1563

Lady Jane Grey
1537-1554

Lady Jane Grey's short life was dominated by the political desires of others. The daughter of Henry Grey, duke of Suffolk, and Frances Grey (whose mother was Henry VIII's sister, Mary), Jane was closely related to the Tudor monarchs, Edward VI, Mary I, and Elizabeth I.[1] Close to the throne by birth, Jane's position as a pawn in the game of Tudor power politics was assured by two realities: (1) Henry VIII's will, which stipulated that the children of his younger sister Mary, and not his older sister Margaret, should be next in line of succession if his own children failed to produce heirs of their own; and (2) the ambitions of her father as well as John Dudley, duke of Northumberland, her father-in-law, who was the power behind the throne of Edward VI. Northumberland's attempts to circumvent the true succession in favour of this young Protestant woman were grounded in personal and family ambition: he had earlier secured a marriage between Jane and his youngest son, Guildford, which placed his own family in the line of royal succession.[2] The attempted coup was a failure and Jane Grey, already resident in the Tower awaiting her coronation, remained there as a prisoner, as Mary I was declared Queen of England. She was executed in 1554 for her unwilling involvement in this attempted coup.

Lady Jane Grey is perhaps the sixteenth-century woman who has most thoroughly taken up a position in popular consciousness, through representations of her in movies, plays, and novels. Although her romantic representation as the doomed, innocent pawn of powerful men is the one which has become dominant, her writings testify to a woman of stalwart Protestant belief, one whom some nineteenth- and early twentieth-century critics have had difficulty dealing with on her own terms.[3] There has been some debate, for example, about whether she is really the author of "Lady Jane to a Learned Man [her early tutor Master Harding] ...," implicitly because the letter's invective is unlady-like. Her more recent critics, such as Carole Levin, have focused instead on her education, which was remarkably thorough even for a young woman of royal aspirations. By the age of seven, Harding had begun instructing her in Greek and Latin, and she seems to have acquired as well some acquaintance with Italian, French, and Spanish.[4] Apart from the usual training in dancing and music, she also received a thorough grounding in Scripture and theology. These studies led to her development of strong Protestant views from an early age. They also led to her correspondence with some of the Continent's most famous reformers, such as Heinrich Bullinger.[5] While resident in the household of Katherine Parr—Henry VIII's widowed queen who soon married Thomas Seymour, lord admiral and Edward VI's uncle, during an abortive attempt by Seymour to arrange Jane's marriage to the nine year old Edward VI—Jane Grey found scope to pursue her religious and intellectual interests. Katherine Parr, long a friend of the reformers and a firm advocate of justification by faith and the necessity of individual Bible study, was an enormous influence on the young Jane Grey.[6] The most famous portrayal of Jane Grey at study occurs in Roger Ascham's The Schoolmaster (1570), where he recounts a chance meeting with Jane while on a visit to one of the Greys' homes at Bradgate. That the rest of the household was out hunting while she was engaged in "reading Phaedon Platonis in Greek" caused Ascham some surprise. Jane Grey's response to his query provides an intimate glimpse into her position within her family and the treatment of her scholarly bent:

> One of the greatest benefit that ever God gave me is that he sent me so sharp and severe parents and so gentle a schoolmaster. For when I am in the presence of father or mother, whether I speak, keep silent, sit, stand, or go, eat, drink, be merry or sad, be sewing, playing, dancing, or doing anything else, I must do it [...] even so per-

---

1 C. Levin, "Lady Jane Grey," DLB 132, p. 149.

2 C. Levin, "Lady Jane Grey: Protestant Queen and Martyr," Silent But for the Word: Tudor Women as Patrons, Translators, and Writers of Religious Works, ed. M.P. Hannay (Kent, 1985), p. 96.

3 Ibid., p. 92.

4 Ibid., p. 93.

5 A. Plowden, "Grey [married name Dudley], Lady Jane (1537-1554)," DNB online.

6 Levin, "Lady Jane Grey," pp. 149-50.

> fectly as God made the world, or else I am so sharply taunted, so cruelly threatened [...] that I must think myself in hell till time come that I must go to Master Ayler, who teacheth me so gently, so pleasantly, with such fair allurements to learning, that I think all the time nothing while I am with him. And when I am called from him, I fall on weeping because whatsoever I do else but learning is full of grief, trouble, fear, and wholly misliking unto me.

While many of Lady Jane's works remained in manuscript, and most were written in the genre of the letter, we need to be wary about classifying these writings as strictly personal and private. She wrote most of her letters, prayers, and verses while awaiting her execution; she knew that they would be widely circulated and copied. She may also have suspected that they would make their way into print. They are in this sense public writings and are carefully shaped as a contribution to Protestant didactic and polemical literature.

Lady Jane's most important writings went into print almost immediately. Her letter to her sister Katherine, written on the eve of her execution (see below), was appended to a volume entitled A Most Fruitful, Pithy and Learned Treatise, How a Christian Man Ought to Behave Himself in the Danger of Death: and How They Are to Be Relieved and Comforted, Whose Dear Friends are Departed out of This World, Most Necessary for This, Our Unfortunate Age and Sorrowful Days. Undated (although probably written early in 1555), and with no declared author, publisher, or bookseller, this book's Protestant bent—along with its appended letter by Lady Jane Grey—perhaps made it an understandably dangerous work to produce early in the reign of the Roman Catholic queen, Mary I. However, both this letter and some of Grey's important statements about Protestantism also appeared in 1554, published by John Day, in an uncompromisingly titled book, An Epistle of the Lady Jane, a Right Virtuous Woman, to a Learned Man of the Late Fallen from the Truth of God's Most Holy Word, for Fear of the Worlde. Read it, to Thy Consolation. Whereunto is Added the Communication that She Had with Master Feckenham upon Her Faith and Belefe of the Sacraments. Also Another Epistle to Her Sister, with the Words She Spoke upon the Scaffold before She Suffered. Grey's works, however, were most effectively popularized and she herself represented earliest as a Protestant martyr in John Foxe's encyclopaedic account of Protestant martyrdom, Acts and Monuments of These Latter and Perilous Days (1563).

EDITIONS: "Lady Jane Grey to Her Father" in Foxe's Book of Martyrs. Ed. J. Cumming. London: G. Virtue, 1838. John Foxe, Actes and monuments of these latter and perilous days. London: John Day, 1563. STC 11222.

Letter

Lady Jane Grey to Her Father,[1] 9 February 1554

Father, although it hath pleased God to hasten my death by you, by whom my life should rather have been lengthened; yet can I so patiently take it, that I yield God more hearty thanks for shortening my woeful days, than if the world had been given unto my possession, with life lengthened at my own will, and albeit I am very well assured of your impatient dolours, redoubled in many ways, both in bewailing your own woe, and especially, as I am informed, my woeful state, yet, my dear father, if I may without offence rejoice in my own mishaps, herein I may account myself blessed, that, washing my hands with the innocence of my fact,[2] my

[1] Father This letter is found in Harleian MSS. 2194.f.23. While Henry Grey, duke of Suffolk, was pardoned by Mary when he surrendered his claim to the English throne for his daughter Jane, he was later executed for treason in 1554, when he took part in the uprisings against Mary's marriage to the fanatical Roman Catholic prince, Philip of Spain.

[2] fact crime, wrongdoing.

guiltless blood may cry before the Lord, "Mercy to the innocent."

And yet though I must needs acknowledge that being constrained, and, as you know well enough, continually assayed, yet in taking upon me I seemed to consent, and therein grievously offended the queen and her laws; yet do I assuredly trust that this my offence towards God is so much the less, in that, being in so royal estate as I was, mine enforced honour blended never with mine innocent heart. And thus, good father, I have opened unto you the state wherein I at present stand; my death at hand, although to you perhaps it may seem woeful, yet to me there is nothing that can be more welcome than from this vale of misery to aspire to that heavenly throne of all joy and pleasure, with Christ our Saviour; in whose steadfast faith, if it may be lawful for the daughter so to write to the father, the Lord that hitherto hath so strengthened you, so continue to keep you, that at the last we may meet in Heaven with the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

I am,

Your obedient daughter till death,

JANE DUDLEY

—1554

from John Foxe, Acts and Monuments of These Latter and Perilous Days

In November the Archbishop Cranmer[1] (not withstanding he had earnestly refused to subscribe to the King's will in disinheriting his sister Mary, alleging many and pithy reasons for her legitimation[2]) was in the Guildhall of London arraigned and attainted of high treason, with the Lady Jane, and three of the Duke of Northumberland's sons, which all at the entreaty of certain persons were had again to the Tower.[3]

In this meanwhile Cardinal Pole,[4] being sent for by Queen Mary, was by the Emperor[5] requested to stay with him, to the intent (as some think) that his presence in England should not be a let[6] to the marriage, which he intended between Philip his son and Queen Mary;[7] for the making whereof, he sent a most ample ambassade,[8] with full power to make up the marriage betwixt them, which took such success, that after they had commoned[9] of the matter a few days, they knit up the knot.

This was done about the beginning of January, and was very evil taken of the people, and of many of the nobility, who for this and for religion, conspiring among themselves, made a rebellion, whereof Sir Thomas Wyatt, knight, was one of the chief beginners, who being in Kent, said, as many else perceived that the Queen and the Council would by foreign marriages bring upon this realm most miserable servitude, and establish popish religion. About the 25 of January, news came to London of this stir in Kent, and shortly after of the Duke of Suffolk, who was fled into Warwickshire and Leicestershire, there to gather a

---

1 Archbishop Cranmer Thomas Cranmer (1489-1556), archbishop of Canterbury, who supported Henry VIII's attempts to break away from Rome and papal authority; although Cranmer recanted his Protestant views under the Roman Catholic monarch, Mary I, he was ordered burnt at the stake in 1556, at which time he returned to his former religious stance (DNB).

2 Mary ... legitimation Henry VIII's will attempted to disinherit Mary, Henry's daughter by Katharine of Aragon, by declaring her illegitimate, a move which Cranmer vigorously resisted.

3 the Tower the Tower of London, a prison usually reserved for noble prisoners who were usually under charges of treason.

4 Cardinal Pole Reginald Pole (1500-58); although one of Henry VIII's favoured humanists and a near kinsman, Pole eventually sided with Rome in the quarrel between his King and his Pope, writing an attack on Henry's attempt to be declared "Supreme Head of the Church." This piece so enraged Henry that he attempted to have Pole extradited from Italy to stand trial for treason; this attempt as well as various more covert attempts to have him assassinated failed. Returning to England in 1554, Pole was instrumental in Mary I's program of Roman Catholic restoration, and she made him archbishop of Canterbury in 1556. He died in 1558, the same year as Mary herself, and in fact within hours of her death.

5 the Emperor Charles V, king of Spain.

6 let hindrance, obstacle.

7 Philip ... Mary Mary seems to have also been persuaded by Philip to bar Pole, who had been appointed papal legate to England, from entering the country until the status of the Church's seized, secularized property had been decided upon.

8 ambassade ambassadorial entourage.

9 commoned conversed, talked.

power. The Queen, therefore, caused them both with the two Carews of Devonshire to be proclaimed traitors, and sent into Kent against Wyatt, Thomas, duke of Norfolk, who, being about Rochester bridge forsaken of them that went with him, returned safe again to London, without any harm done unto him, and without bloodshed of either party. After the Duke of Norfolk was sent the Earl of Huntington in post,[1] who entering the city of Coventry before the Duke, disappointed him of his purpose. Wherefore the Duke in great distress committed himself to the keeping of a servant of his own in a Park, who like a false traitor bewrayed[2] him. And so he was brought up to the Tower of London.

In the meanwhile Peter Carew, hearing of that was done, fled into France, but the others were taken, and Wyatt came towards London in the beginning of February, from whom the Emperor's ambassadors sped themselves away in haste all by water. The Queen, hearing of Wyatt's coming, came into the city into the Guildhall, where she made a vehement oration against Wyatt, declaring that she neither had, nor would consent to marry otherwise than should seem to the Council to be for the wealth[3] of the realm. Wherefore she desired them of the city to stick to her in the suppressing of rebellious traitors, and defending her royal estate.

As concerning Wyatt, after that he, coming to Southwark,[4] could not be received that way into London, returning another way by Kingston with his army, he came up through the streets to Ludgate, whereas returning thence, was resisted at Temple bar[5] and there apprehended, which was upon Ash Wednesday,[6] at what time at the apprehension of the said Wyatt there was a general pardon by the herald proclaimed, promising generally pardon of life. Yet that not withstanding, gallows and gibbets were erected in all parts of the city and suburbs of London to the number of twenty or thereabouts (three being set up in Cheapside[7]). Whereupon, diverse[8] of the captains and soldiers of Wyatt were hanged, and he himself afterward executed at Tower Hill and then quartered,[9] whose head after being set up upon the gallows at Hayhill, was there stolen away, and great search made for the same, concerning whose cause and matter I partly refer them to the English chronicles, such as list[10] more fully to be satisfied therein, and partly hereafter more shall be touched among other things done in the month of April.

The 12 day of February was beheaded the Lady Jane, to whom was sent Master Feckenham, alias Howman, from the Queen, two days before her death, to common[11] with her, and to reduce her from the doctrine of Christ to Queen Mary's religion, the effect of which communication here followeth.

The Communication Had Between the Lady Jane and Feckenham

FECKENHAM: Madam, I lament your heavy case, and yet I doubt not but that you bear out this sorrow of yours with a constant and patient mind.

JANE: You are welcome unto me, sir, if your coming be to give Christian exhortation. And as for my heavy case, (I thank God) I do so little lament it, that rather I accompt[12] the same for a more manifest declaration of God's favour toward me than ever he showed me any time before. And therefore there is no cause why either you or other which bear me good will should lament or be grieved with this my case, being a thing so profitable for my soul health.

---

1 in post with all speed.

2 bewrayed betrayed, revealed.

3 wealth well-being, good.

4 Southwark a district or suburb of London.

5 Ludgate one of the gates of London, which leads into the precinct of Westminster and Fleet street; Temple bar another of London's gates which separated Westminster from London proper.

6 Ash Wednesday the first day of Lent, the forty day period of fasting and repentance which precedes the feast of Easter.

7 Cheapside the market district on the W side of London.

8 diverse many.

9 quartered "the prescribed punishment for male traitors was to be hung, drawn and quartered" (Hist. Dict. Tudor England, p. 505).

10 list desire, wish.

11 common converse.

12 accompt account.

FECKENHAM: I am here come to you at this present sent from the Queen and her Council, to instruct you in the true doctrine of the right faith, although I have so great confidence in you, that I shall have (I trust) little need to travail[1] with you much therein.

JANE: Forsooth, I heartily thank the Queen's Highness, which is not unmindful of her humble subject, and I hope likewise that you no less will do your duty therein both truly and faithfully, according to that you were sent for.

FECKENHAM: What is then required of a Christian?

JANE: That he should believe in God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, three persons and one God.[2]

FECKENHAM: What? Is there nothing else to be required or looked for in a Christian, but to believe in God?

JANE: Yes, we must believe in him, we must love him with all our heart, with all our soul, and with all our mind, and our neighbour as ourself.[3]

FECKENHAM: Why,[4] then faith justifieth not, nor saveth not.

JANE: Yes verily, faith (as Saint Paul sayeth) only justifieth.[5]

FECKENHAM: Why, Saint Paul sayeth, if I have all faith without love, it is nothing.[6]

JANE: True it is, for how can I love him whom I trust not, or how can I trust him whom I love not? Faith and love goeth both together, and yet love is comprehended in faith.

FECKENHAM: How shall we love our neighbour?

JANE: To love our neighbour is to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, and give drink to the thirsty, and to do to him as we would do to ourselves.[7]

FECKENHAM: Why, then it is necessary unto salvation to do good works also, and it is not sufficient only to believe.

JANE: I deny that, and I affirm that faith only saveth, but it is meet[8] for a Christian, in token that he doth follow his master Christ, to do good works, yet may we not say that they profit to salvation. For when we have done all, yet we be unprofitable servants, and faith only in Christ's blood saveth.

FECKENHAM: How many sacraments are there?

JANE: Two. The one, the sacrament of Baptism, and the other the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

FECKENHAM: No, there are seven.[9]

JANE: By what Scripture find ye that?

FECKENHAM: Well, we will talk of that hereafter, but what is signified by your two sacraments?

JANE: By the sacrament of Baptism, I am washed with water, and regenerated by the Spirit, and that washing is a token to me that I am the child of God. The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper offered unto me is a sure seal and testimony that I am by the blood of Christ, which he shed for me on the cross, made partaker of the everlasting Kingdom.

FECKENHAM: Why, what do you receive in that sacrament? Do you not receive the very body and blood of Christ?[10]

---

[1] travail labour.

[2] three persons and one God i.e., the doctrine of the Trinity, or triune nature of God, which both Catholics and Protestant reformers accepted.

[3] we must ... ourself Christ's words to the scribe (e.g., Mark 12:30-31).

[4] Why here and elsewhere in the conversation, an interjection indicating surprise, and sometimes disagreement, with the previous statement.

[5] faith ... only justifieth a reference to the justification by faith which Paul speaks of in his Letter to the Romans and in his Letter to the Galatians, partly in the context of the early Church's controversy over the necessity for circumcision for converts from non-Jewish cultures (see especially, Romans 3-11; Galatians 2:16-21; Galatians 3:11-29). For a full discussion of justification by faith, see Hugh Latimer, "Sermon on the Ploughers," p. 115, note 6.

[6] if I have ... it is nothing "And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could move mountains, and have not charity [i.e., love], I am nothing" (1 Corinthians 13:2).

[7] To love our neighbour ... do to ourselves These works of corporal mercy are recommended by Christ. See Matthew 25:35-40.

[8] meet appropriate, befitting.

[9] seven In Roman Catholicism there are seven sacraments: Baptism, Communion (the Lord's Supper), Confession, Confirmation, Marriage, Extreme Unction (the Anointing of the Dying), and Holy Orders (consecration of priests and the taking of vows of other religious). Protestant reformers rejected all but Baptism and the Lord's Supper as having no justification or grounding in Scripture.

[10] very body ... of Christ the crux of the Protestant-Catholic debate over the nature of the body and blood of Christ in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; put simply, Catholics asserted that the bread and wine is mystically transformed during the ceremony of the Mass into

JANE: No surely I do not so believe. I think that in the Supper, I neither receive flesh nor blood, but only bread and wine, which bread when it is broken, and the wine when it is drunken, putteth me in remembrance how that for my sins the body of Christ was broken, and his blood shed on the cross. And with that bread and wine I receive the benefits that cometh by the breaking of his body, and shedding of his blood for our sins on the cross.

FECKENHAM: Why, doth not Christ speak these words: "Take, eat, this is my body"?[1] Require we any plainer words? Doth he not say it is his body?

JANE: I grant he sayeth so, and so he sayeth, "I am the vine, I am the door,"[2] but he is never the more for that the door nor the vine. Doth not Saint Paul say[3] that he calleth things that are not, as though they were? God forbid that I should say that I eat the very natural body or blood of Christ. For then either I should pluck away my redemption, either else there were two bodies, or two Christs, or else twelve bodies. One body was tormented on the cross. And then if they did eat another body, then either he had two bodies, either else if his body were eaten, then it was not broken upon the cross, or else if it were broken upon the cross, it was not eaten of his disciples.

FECKENHAM: Why, is it not as possible that Christ by his power could make his body both to be eaten and broken, as to be born of a woman without seed of a man, and as to walk upon the sea having a body, and other such like miracles as he wrought by his power only?

JANE: Yes verily. If God would have done at his supper any miracle he might have done so: but I say that then he minded no work nor miracle, but only to break his body and shed his blood on the cross for our sins. But I pray you answer me to this one question: where was Christ when he said, "Take, eat, this is my body"? Was he not at table when he said so? He was at that time alive, and suffered not till the next day. Well, what took he but bread, what broke he but bread, and what gave he but bread? Look what he took, he broke, and look what he broke, he gave, and look what he gave, they did eat, and yet all this while he himself was alive and at supper before his disciples, or else they were deceived.

FECKENHAM: You ground your faith upon such authors as say and unsay both with a breath, and not upon the Church to whom ye ought to give credit.

JANE: No, I ground my faith on God's word, and not upon the Church, for if the Church be a good Church, the faith of the Church must be tried by God's word, and not God's word by the Church, neither yet my faith. Shall I believe the Church because of antiquity,[4] or shall I give credit to the Church that taketh away from me the half part of the Lord's Supper,[5] and will not let any layman receive it in both kinds but themselves, which thing if they deny to us, then deny they to us part of our salvation. And I say that is an evil Church, and not the spouse of Christ, but the spouse of the Devil that altereth the Lord's Supper, and both taketh from it and addeth to it. To that Church (say I) God will add plagues, and from that Church will he take their part out of the book of life. Do they learn that of St. Paul when he ministered to the Corinthians in both kinds? Shall I believe this Church? God forbid.

FECKENHAM: That was done for a good intent of the Church, to avoid an heresy that sprung on it.[6]

---

the real presence of Christ, into his actual body and blood, while the Protestant reformers asserted that the bread and wine are not so transformed and are simply a sign, seal, or testament of Christ's sacrifice and the believer's salvation.

1 Take, eat ... body Matthew 26:26-27.

2 I am ... door "I am the door: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture" (John 10:9); "I am the true vine, and my Father is the husbandman" (John 15:1).

3 St. Paul say Romans 4:17.

4 Shall I believe ... antiquity i.e., shall I believe what the Church declares because it is an ancient institution?

5 half part of the Lord's Supper Laypeople were allowed at this time to receive communion only in the form of the bread; the priest would consecrate both the bread and wine but only he and his fellow religious could receive both the bread and wine.

6 heresy ... on it The Synod of Lambeth in 1291 restricted the consecrated wine to the celebrant of the Mass, but allowed unconsecrated wine to be consumed by the laity. The heresy to which Feckenham refers remains obscure.

JANE: Why, shall the Church alter God's will and ordinance for a good intent? How did King Saul?[1] God the Lord defend.

With these and such like persuasions he would have had her leaned to the Church, but it would not be. There were many more things whereof they reasoned, but these were the chiefest.

These Words Following Were Spoken Openly.

FECKENHAM: After this Feckenham took his leave saying that he was sorry for her. "For I am sure," quod he, "that we two shall never meet."

JANE: "True it is," said she, "that we shall never meet, except God turn your heart. For I am assured, unless you repent and turn to God, ye are in an evil case, and I pray God in the bowels of his mercy to send you his Holy Spirit, for he hath given you his great gift of utterance, if it please him to open the eyes of your heart.

A Letter Written by the Lady Jane in the End of the New Testament in Greek, the Which She Sent unto Her Sister Lady Katherine, Immediately before She Suffered

I have here sent you (good sister, Katherine) a book, which although it be not outwardly trimmed with gold, yet inwardly it is more worth than precious stones. It is the book, dear sister, of the law of the Lord. It is his testament and last will, which he bequeathed unto us wretches, which shall lead you to the path of eternal joy. And if you with a good mind read it, and with an earnest mind do follow it, it shall bring you to an immortal and everlasting life. It will teach you to live, and learn you to die. It shall win you more, than you should have gained by the possession of your woeful father's lands.[2] For as if God had prospered him you should have inherited his lands, so if you apply diligently this book, seeking to direct your life after it, you shall be an inheritor of such riches as neither the covetous shall withdraw from you, neither the thief shall steal, neither yet the moths corrupt.

Desire with David,[3] good sister, to understand the law of the Lord your God. Live still to die, that you (by death) may purchase eternal life. And trust not that the tenderness of your age shall lengthen your life. For as soon (if God call) goeth the young, as the old: and labour always to learn to die, defy the world, deny the Devil, and despise the flesh, and delight yourself only in the Lord. Be penitent for your sins, and yet despair not. Be strong in faith, and yet presume not. And desire with Saint Paul to be dissolved and to be with Christ, with whom even in death there is life. Be like the good servant, and even at midnight be waking, lest when death commeth and stealeth upon you like a thief in the night, you be with the evil servant found sleeping, and lest for lack of oil ye be found like the five foolish women,[4] and like him that had not on the wedding garment, and then ye be cast out from the marriage. Rejoice in Christ, as I trust I do. Follow the steps of your master Christ, and take up your cross, lay your sins on his back, and always embrace him. And as touching my death, rejoice as I do (good sister) that I shall be delivered of this corruption, and put on incorruption. For I am assured, that I shall for losing of a mortal life, win an immortal life. The which I pray God grant you, send you of his grace to live in his fear, and to die in the true Christian faith, from the which (in God's name) I exhort you, that you never swerve, neither for hope of life, nor fear of death. For if ye will deny

[1] How did King Saul a reference to Saul's reservation of certain oxen after a great victory, even though the Lord, through the prophet Samuel, had directed Saul to destroy everything that remained, including the enemies' cattle (1 Samuel 9-11).

[2] your woeful father's lands Her father, Henry Grey, duke of Somerset, had his lands confiscated when he was condemned for treason in 1554 (DNB).

[3] David King David, traditionally the author of the Psalms and a faithful Jewish king.

[4] good servant … five foolish women For the reference to the thief in the night, see Matthew 24:42-44; for the parable of the five wise and five foolish virgins, see Matthew 25:1-13.

his truth to lengthen your life, God will deny you, and yet shorten your days. And if you will cleave unto him, he will prolonge your days to your comfort and his glory, to the which glory God bring me now, and you hereafter, when it pleaseth him to call you. Fare you well (good sister) and put your only trust in God, who only must help you.

A Certain Prayer of the Lady Jane in the Time of Her Trouble

O Lord thou God and Father of my life, hear me poor and desolate woman, which fleeth unto thee only in all troubles and miseries. Thou O Lord art the only defender and deliverer of those that put their trust in thee. And therefore, I, being defiled with sin, encumbered with afflictions, unquieted with troubles, wrapped in cares, overwhelmed with miseries, vexed with temptations, and grievously tormented with the long imprisonment of this vile mass of clay, my body and blood, do come unto thee, O merciful Saviour, craving thy mercy and help, without the which so little hope of deliverance is left that I may utterly despair of any liberty. Albeit, it is expedient, that seeing our life standeth upon trying,[1] we should be visited some time with some adversity, whereby we might both be tried whether we be of thy flock or no, and also know thee and ourselves the better, yet thou that saidst thou wouldst not suffer us to be tempted above our power,[2] be merciful unto me, now a miserable wretch, I beseech thee, which, with Solomon, do cry unto thee, humbly desiring thee, that I may neither be too much puffed up with prosperity, neither too much pressed down with adversity,[3] lest I, being too full, should deny thee, my God, or being too low brought, should despair and blaspheme thee, my Lord and Saviour. O merciful God, consider my misery, best known unto thee, and be thou now unto me a strong tower of defence. I humbly require thee, suffer me not to be tempted, above my power, but either be thou a deliverer unto me out of this great misery, or else give me grace patiently to bear thy heavy hand and sharp correction. It was thy right hand that delivered the people of Israel out of the hands of Pharaoh, which for the space of four hundred years did oppress them, and keep them in bondage.[4] Let it therefore likewise seem good to thy fatherly goodness, to deliver me, sorrowful wretch, for whom thy son Christ shed his precious blood on the cross, out of this miserable captivity and bondage, wherein I am now. How long wilt thou be absent? Forever? Oh, Lord hast thou forgotten to be gracious, and hast thou shut up thy loving kindness in displeasure? Wilt thou be no more entreated? Is thy mercy clean gone forever, and thy promise come utterly to an end forevermore? Why dost thou make so long tarrying? Shall I despair of thy mercy?[5] Oh God, far be that from me; I am thy workmanship, created in Christ Jesus. Give me grace therefore to tarry thy leisure, and patiently to bear thy works, assuredly knowing, that as thou canst, so thou wilt deliver me, when it shall please thee, nothing doubting or mistrusting thy goodness towards me, for thou wottest better what is good for me than I do. Therefore do with me in all things what thou wilt, and plague me what way thou wilt. Only, in the meantime, arm me, I beseech thee, with thy armour, that I may stand fast, my loins being girded with verity, having on the breast-plate of righteousness, and shod with the shoes prepared by the Gospel of peace, above all things, taking to me the shield of faith, wherewith I may be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked, and taking the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the spirit, which is thy most holy word, praying always, with all manner of prayer and supplication, that I may refer myself to thy will, abiding thy pleasure, and comforting myself with those troubles that it shall please thee to send me,[6]

[1] trying testing.

[2] tempted above our power i.e., 1 Corinthians 10:13.

[3] with Solomon … adversity See 1 Kings 3:6-9.

[4] the people of Israel … bondage See Exodus 3-15.

[5] How long … thy mercy an echo of several exclamations in Psalms. See Psalms 89:46, 90:13, and 13:1.

[6] with thy armour … to send me This description of the Christian armed for combat against the world, the flesh, and the Devil is from Ephesians 6:13-18.

seeing such troubles be profitable for me, and seeing I am assuredly persuaded that it cannot be but well all that thou doest. Hear me, O merciful Father, for his sake, whom thou wouldst should be a sacrifice for my sins, to whom with thee and the Holy Ghost, be all honour and glory. Amen!

Certain Pretty Verses Written by the Said Lady Jane with a Pin.

Non aliena putes homini quae obtingere possunt,
Sors hodierna mihi, tunc erit illa tibi.

Do never think it strange,
Though now I have misfortune
For if that fortune change,
The same to thee may happen.

Jane Dudley.

Deo iuvante nil nocet livor malus.
Et non iuvante nil juvat labor gravis;
Post tenebras spero lucem.

If God do help thee,
Hate shall not hurt thee.
If God do fail thee,
Then shall not labour prevail thee.

—1563

William Baldwin

d. in or before 1563

While William Baldwin is best known for his role as editor of A Mirror for Magistrates (1559), he was also the author of other moral and controversial tracts. While the popular and frequently reprinted A Treatise of Moral Philosophy (1547) was largely a compendium of ancient philosophy, more typical of his oeuvre are Baldwin's virulently anti-Catholic tracts, such as his translation of the satirical Latin text Wonderful News of the Death of Paul III, which features the narrator following the soul of the late Pope into Hell, and his inventive and original prose narrative, Beware the Cat (1570). Baldwin's early life and family connections are unknown, although he seems to have come from the West Country (perhaps Wales) and may be the same William Baldwin who attended Oxford University and later petitioned for a master's degree in 1533. In 1547, Baldwin entered the service of the printer Edward Whitchurch, serving as a corrector of the press until 1553. Whitchurch, a London merchant who took up his career as a printer because of his deeply held Protestant beliefs, joined with Richard Grafton to produce a stream of Protestant and anti-Catholic tracts, as well as "the earliest editions of the English Bible."[1] In this milieu, Baldwin published his first works, including A Treatise of Moral Philosophy (1547) and Canticles or Ballads of Solomon in English Meters (1549). In 1554 he prepared the first edition of what later became A Mirror for Magistrates. This early forerunner of the 1559 Mirror was an edition of John Lydgate's Fall of Princes—with added material by Baldwin and others—entitled A Memorial of Such Princes, as since the Time of King Richard the Second, Have Been Unfortunate in the Realm of England. Suppressed by the government almost immediately after it was offered for sale in September of 1554, Baldwin did not dare revise and publish the work again until 1559, when it became A Mirror for Magistrates. Similarly, while Beware the Cat was written early in 1553,[2] it was not published until seven years after Baldwin's death. It was initially suppressed for the same reasons that spurred its composition in the first place: the ascension of Mary I to the throne of England, and her public commitment to the restoration of Roman Catholicism and the eradication of Protestantism. As Ringler and Flachmann note, Beware the Cat's first edition coincided with a time of increased religious tension, since the Northern Rebellion (1569) and the Pope's excommunication of Elizabeth I (1570) created increasing demand for anti-Catholic satire.[3]

Although Baldwin was a strident Protestant reformer and deeply engaged in Whitchurch's project of Protestant publishing, he also seems to have been a survivor in the deeply troubled transitions between the reigns of Edward VI, Mary I, and Elizabeth I. His Court employment under Edward VI consisted of assisting George Ferrers, the master of the King's pastimes, with the Christmas festivities; Baldwin prepared at least one masque and a play for presentation before the King, although it is unclear whether they were ever actually performed. After the death of Edward and the accession of the Roman Catholic Mary I, Baldwin found himself suddenly associated with the pro-Catholic printer, John Wayland, who held the initial licence to print A Mirror for Magistrates. Although Baldwin continued to work in this new atmosphere, he later showed his continuing dedication to the Protestant faith, becoming a deacon in 1559, later a minister and vicar, and finally a rector in 1561. Continuing his interest in print, Baldwin agreed

---

[1] W.A. Ringler, Jr. and M. Flachmann, eds., Beware the Cat by William Baldwin: The First English Novel (San Marino, CA, 1988), p. xv.

[2] Ibid., p. xiv.

[3] Ibid., p. xxix.

to help John Stow prepare an abridged version of his English chronicles. He was unable to proceed with this project, however, since in 1563, after having delivered a highly inflammatory public sermon which recommended the hanging of all remaining bishops and papists, he succumbed to the plague, dying in an outbreak which would finally claim more than 17,000 people in London.

EDITION: Excerpts from the text and notes of William Baldwin's Beware the Cat. Ed. William A. Ringler, Jr. and Michael Flachmann (San Marino, CA, 1988) are reprinted with the permission of the Henry E. Huntington Library.

Beware the Cat

As Ringler and Flachmann, Baldwin's modern editors have pointed out, although Beware the Cat draws on a number of different genres—the beast fable, the jest book, and the Tudor polemic, among others—it is a uniquely unified and coherent narrative, where "sober fact" is combined with "outrageous fiction."[1] Largely a religious satire, Beware the Cat attacks many of the same Roman Catholic abuses which appear also in the works of Hugh Latimer, Anne Askew, John Bale, John Foxe, and Lady Jane Grey. These include the veneration of saints; the belief in transubstantiation; the use of auricular confession; the celibacy of the clergy; the saying of the mass in Latin rather than local vernaculars; the mass itself, and particularly its characterization of the Lord's Supper as a sacrifice; the sale of indulgences; and the fees attached to all kinds of ecclesiastical services, both spiritual and temporal. The reformist charges that Roman Catholicism had replaced the true worship of Christ and the study of Scripture with superstitious rites that were idolatrous, smacked of magic, and had no grounding in the Bible underlie Baldwin's frequent and less-than-flattering representation of priests and their relationship with their former parishioners. Many of the episodes in Beware the Cat, from the exchange of stories about Grimalkin in "The First Part of Master Streamer's Oration" to the bawdy deception the old widow practises upon the credulous merchant's wife in "The Third Part," play upon the reformist condemnation of Roman Catholic explanations for the rituals and rites of the mass, the veneration of the saints, etc. While Catholic defenders emphasized the ability of church tradition to authorize practices which are not specifically referred to in Scripture, reformists struck back with satires like Baldwin's, which ridiculed unwritten traditions. Baldwin often shows "the fantastic grounds upon which oral reports came to be credited and accepted as 'unwritten verities.'"[2]

More recent criticism has turned its attention to Baldwin's contribution to the art of English prose narrative, and has focused on his two narrators: one, an unreliable narrator, Master Streamer; the other, the narrator of the text's frame, and perhaps also of its argumentative and complex marginal annotation. Baldwin allows Streamer to reveal his own limitations (mainly, his pomposity and pedantry) through the style of his narration, which is full of "Latin quotations and esoteric bits of learning that are often ludicrously incorrect."[1] Ringler and Flachmann demonstrate that the marginalia, in particular, helps Baldwin accomplish his larger goals, by allowing him to comment satirically and often pointedly on the absurdities of Master Streamer's ideas and methods of argument. The marginalia and its contribution to Baldwin's narrative has attracted the most attention from critics, with E.T. Bonahue arguing that "the hermeneutic signals produced by prefatory and conclusory components, and by the marginal gloss framing Master Streamer's oration, confront, interrogate, and to some extent deconstruct the work's narrative authority."[2] In the tradition of marginalia as interpretive frame, Baldwin's comments do more than simply explain and summarize the main points of the argument or narrative. Instead they require the reader to engage in an ongoing dialectic between text and margin, an engagement which Bonahue traces to "the growing willingness among Renaissance readers to engage and interrogate ecclesiastical as well as literary authorities previously held inviolate."[3]

[1] Ibid., p. xxi.
[2] Ibid., p. xviii.

from Beware the Cat[4]

T.K. to the Reader [1584][5]

This little book, Beware the Cat,
most pleasantly compiled,
In time obscured was, and so since that hath been exiled.

Exiled because, perchance at first,
it showed the toys and drifts[6]
Of such as then, by wiles and wills, maintained popish shifts.[7]

Shifts such as those, in such a time, delighted for to use,
Whereby full many simple souls
they did full sore abuse.

---

[1] Ibid., p. xxiii.

[2] "'I Know the Place and the Persons': The Play of Textual Frames in Baldwin's Beware the Cat," Studies in Philology 91.3 (Summer 1994): 286.

[3] Ibid., p. 293.

[4] The full title and subtitle reads: A Marvellous History Entitled, Beware the Cat. Containing diverse wonderful and incredible matters. Very pleasant and merry to read.

[5] Ringler and Flachmann suggest that T.K. may be Thomas Knell, the younger (fl. 1560-81); Knell was a clergyman who wrote a number of Protestant broadsides and pamphlets, some in verse, and many expressing decidedly anti-Catholic opinions (DNB). The most accessible of his works is "A Pithy Note to Papists" (in verse, 1570; reprinted in Illustrations of Early English Popular Literature, 2 vols., ed. J.P. Collier [London, 1863; reissued, New York, 1966], 1.1-20); these verses are not Baldwin's and their addition to the 1584 edition aims at explaining "why it was withheld earlier from publication" and at pointing to the contemporary fears of Catholic plotting in the 1580s (p. 57).

[6] toys and drifts foolish or idle fancies and schemes or plots.

[7] shifts stratagems, evasions, subterfuges.

Abuse? Yea sure, and that with spight,[1] whenas the Cat gan[2] tell
Of many pranks of popish priests
both foolish, mad, and fell.[3]

Fell? Sure, and vain, if judgment right appear to be in place,
And so as fell in pleasant wise[4]
this fiction shows their grace.

Grace? Nay sure, ungraciousness of such and many mo,
Which may be told in these our days
to make us laugh also.

Also to laugh? Nay, rather weep to see such shifts now used,
And that in every sort of men
true virtue is abused.

Abused? Yea, and quite down cast,
let us be sure of that;
And therefore now, as hath been said,
I say, "Beware the Cat."

The Cat full pleasantly will show some sleights that now are wrought,[5]
And make some laugh which unto mirth to be constrained[6] are loath.

Loath? Yea, for over-passing grief that much bereaves[7] their mind,
For such disorder as in states
of every sort they find.

Find? Yea, who can now boast but that the Cat will him disclose?[8]
Therefore, in midst of mirth I say,
"Beware the Cat" to those.
Vale.[9]

---

1 spight i.e., spite.
2 gan i.e., began.
3 fell savage, cruel, ruthless.
4 wise manner, way, fashion.
5 sleights cunning tricks, ruses; wrought created, fashioned.
6 to be constrained to be forced, compelled.
7 bereaves despoils, afflicts.
8 disclose reveal, expose.
9 Vale Latin, "Farewell."

THE EPISTLE DEDICATORY

Love and Live.[1]
To the Right Worshipful Esquire
Master John Young,[2]
Grace and Health.

I have penned for your mastership's pleasure one of the stories which Master Streamer[3] told the last Christmas, and which you so fain[4] would have heard reported by Master Ferrers[5] himself. And although I be unable to pen or speak it so pleasantly as he could, yet have I so nearly used both the order and words of him that spoke them (which is not the least virtue of a reporter) that I doubt not but that he and Master Willot[6] shall in the reading think they hear Master Streamer speak, and he himself in the like action shall doubt whether he speaketh or readeth. I have divided his oration into three parts, and set the argument before them and an instruction after them, with such notes[7] as might be gathered thereof, so making it book-like,[8] and entitled Beware the Cat.

But because I doubt whether Master Streamer will be contented that other men plow with his oxen (I mean pen such things as he speaketh, which perhaps he would rather do himself to have, as he deserveth, the glory of both), therefore I beseech you to learn his mind herein, and if he agree it pass in such sort, yet that he peruse it before the printing and amend it if in any point I have mistaken him. I pray you likewise to ask Master Ferrers his judgement herein,

---

[1] Love and Live According to Ringler and Flachmann, this was Baldwin's personal motto (perhaps derived from Matthew 5:44-45), which appeared at the beginning of all of his works (p. 57).

[2] John Young "[P]robably the courtier who in 1551 attended the Marquess of Northampton on his embassy to France and who was knighted by Elizabeth during her 1574 visit to Bristol" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 57).

[3] Master Streamer According to the narrative which follows, Master Streamer was a priest, a learned man (who knew four ancient languages), and a writer. However, although the Register of the University of Oxford shows a Gregory Streamer at the institution between 1529 and 1531, we know nothing more about him. Baldwin's Streamer is clearly a fictional character: the name "Streamer" does not appear in the Revels Accounts for the period ("no author named Streamer is recorded"); neither of the two books of which he claims authorship seems to have existed; "and John Day did not print any 'Greek alphabets' during the reign of Edward VI" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 58). In short, although at least one contemporary respondent to Baldwin's book assumed Streamer was a real person, none of the biographical "facts" that Baldwin gives about this man can be verified (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 58).

[4] fain gladly, willingly, with pleasure.

[5] Master Ferrers George Ferrers (?1500-79), master of the King's pastimes (1551-53), courtier, soldier, lawyer, and poet; one of Baldwin's collaborators on A Mirror for Magistrates.

[6] Master Willot identity uncertain; Ringler and Flachmann note the existence of a Thomas Willett (a sub-almoner to Edward VI), but he is not mentioned in the Revels Accounts (p. 58).

[7] notes the side notes or marginalia; on the marginalia, see the headnote, above. For another example of intertextually challenging marginalia, see Spenser's The Shepheardes Calender (1579); pp. 784-85, 788-91, 794-97, 801-02.

[8] his oration into three parts ... book-like E.T. Bonahue suggests that this is an acknowledgement by G.B. that he is not simply a reporter, but an editor, actively shaping the text; according to Bonahue, "book-like" refers to the editor's goal of "transform[ing] an oral discourse into writing and identify[ing] it as a volume worthy of respect" ("'I Know the Place and the Persons,'" p. 293). Baldwin, however, as a long-time corrector of the press, also points to Beware the Cat's status as a relatively new cultural object—the printed book—with new methods of presenting and disseminating knowledge. Aspects of the book which we accept as commonplace, such as the title pages, running heads, marginal notes, indexes, and the like, were originally introduced into the printed book as a means of encouraging sales among a public for whom books were still relatively novel objects. See E. Eisenstein, The Printing Press as an Agent of Change, 2 vols. (Cambridge, 1970), 1.1 and pp. 88-159; and T. Bowers, "The Production and Communication of Knowledge in William Baldwin's Beware the Cat," Criticism 33 (1991): 1-29.

and show him that the Cure of the Great Plague,[1] of Master Streamer's translation out of the Arabic which he sent me from Margate, shall be imprinted as soon as I may conveniently.

And if I shall perceive by your trial that Master Streamer allow my endeavours in this kind, I will hereafter, as Plato did by Socrates,[2] pen out such things of the rest of our Christmas communications as shall be to his great glory, and no less pleasure to all them that desire such kinds of knowledge. In the meanwhile I beseech you to accept my good will, and learn to "Beware the Cat." So shall you not only perform that I seek, but also please the Almighty, who always preserve you. Amen.

Yours to his power,[3]
G[ulielmus][4] B[aldwin].

THE ARGUMENT

It chanced that at Christmas last I was at court with Master Ferrers, then master of the King's Majesty's pastimes, about setting forth of certain interludes, which for the King's recreation we had devised and were in learning.[5] In which time, among many other exercises among ourselves, we used nightly at our lodging to talk of sundry things for the furtherance of such offices wherein each man as then served. For which purpose it pleased Master Ferrers to make me his bedfellow,[6] and upon a pallet cast upon the rushes in his own chamber to lodge Master Willot and Master Streamer, the one his astronomer, the other his divine.[7] And among many other things too long to rehearse, it happened on a night (which I think was the twenty-eighth of December), after that Master Ferrers was come from the court and in bed, there fell a controversy between Master Streamer, who with Master Willot had already slept his first sleep, and me, that was newly come unto bed, the effect whereof was whether birds and beasts had reason.[8]

The occasion thereof was this: I had heard that the King's players were learning a play of Aesop's Crow[9] wherein the most part of the actors were birds, the device whereof I discommended, saying it was not comical to make either speechless things to speak or brutish things to common[10] reasonably; and although in a tale it were sufferable to imagine and tell

---

1 Cure of the Great Plague No such book is listed in the Stationers' Register.

2 as Plato did by Socrates Without Plato's (c. 429-347 BCE) early dialogues, as well as his Apology and Phaedo, we would have little notion of the Greek philosopher Socrates' (469-399 BCE) teachings since he wrote nothing himself.

3 his power i.e., the power of God.

4 G[ulielmus] the Latin form of "William."

5 certain interludes … in learning According to Ringler and Flachmann, the Revels Accounts for 1552/53 show that Baldwin was preparing a number of court entertainments or "interludes," including a "Mask [i.e., a masque] of Cats" and "An Irish Play of the State of Ireland," both of which have obvious bearing on Beware the Cat (p. xvi).

6 his bedfellow It was not unusual for individuals of the same sex to share a bed in this period.

7 divine priest.

8 whether birds and beasts had reason a debate which features in classical texts, such as in Plutarch's "Beasts are rational" (Moralia, trans. Henry Iden [1557], 985D-992E) and in contemporary Continental works, such as Giovanni Bastiti's La Circe (1548).

9 Aesop's Crow Ringler and Flachmann note that although some literary historians have used Baldwin's comments here as evidence that such a play was indeed performed before Edward VI, the Revels Accounts list "no such play, nor costumes appropriate to it" (p. 58); "the fable concerns an ugly crow ridiculed for strutting in feathers plucked from other birds" (p. 58).

10 to common to communicate, converse.

of something by them spoken or reasonably done (which kind Aesop[1] laudably used), yet it was uncomely,[2] said I, and without example of any author, to bring them in lively personages to speak, do, reason and allege authorities out of authors.[3] Master Streamer, my lord's divine, being more divine in this point than I was ware of, held the contrary part, affirming that beasts and fowls had reason, and that as much as men, yea, and in some points more.

Master Ferrers himself and his astronomer wakened with our talk and harkened to us, but would take part on neither side. And when Master Streamer had for proof of his assertion declared many things (of elephants that walked upon cords,[4] hedgehogs that knew always what weather would come,[5] foxes and dogs that after they had been all night abroad killing geese and sheep would come home in the morning and put their necks into their collars, parrots that bewailed their keepers' deaths, swallows that with celandine open their young ones' eyes,[6] and a hundred things more), which I denied to come of reason, and to be but natural kindly[7] actions, alleging for my proof authority of most grave and learned philosophers.

"Well," quoth[8] Master Streamer, "I know what I know, and I speak not only what by hearsay of some philosophers I know, but what I myself have proved."

"Why," quoth I then, "have you proof of beasts' and fowls' reason?"

"Yea," quoth he, "I have heard them and understand them both speak and reason as well as I hear and understand you."

At this Master Ferrers laughed. But I, remembering what I had read in Albertus' works,[9] thought there might be somewhat more than I did know; wherefore I asked him what beasts or fowls he had heard, and where and when. At this he paused awhile, and at last said: "If that I thought you could be content to hear me, and without any interruption till I have done mark[10] what I say, I would tell you such a story of one piece of mine own experimenting as should both make you wonder and put you out of doubt concerning this matter; but this I promise you afore, if I do tell it, that as soon as any man curiously interrupteth me, I will leave off and not speak one word more." When we had promised quietly to hear, he, turning himself so in his bed as we might best hear him, said as followeth.

---

1 Aesop early sixth-century BCE writer of Greek fables, famous for his animal tales, each of which ends with a humorous and/or telling point.

2 uncomely improper, unseemly.

3 allege authorities out of authors The citing of passages and ideas from widely acknowledged, highly respected authors was an indispensable argumentative strategy in the Middle Ages and Renaissance.

4 elephants … cords reference obscure. In his Natural History, Pliny states that elephants can "mount up and climb against a rope"; he also records a story of elephants that, required to disembark a ship by means of a narrow, makeshift bridge, conquered their fear and made the crossing by walking backwards with their tails to the bank and their heads towards the sea (1.93).

5 hedgehogs … come "Hedgehogs foresee a coming storm" (Bodenham, Garden of the Muses [1600], p. 153).

6 swallows that with celandine … eyes See Pliny, Natural History, 1.210. The juice of the celandine plant was a common remedy for weak eyes.

7 kindly appropriate to the species or kind of animal.

8 quoth said.

9 Albertus' works Albertus Magnus, thirteenth-century philosopher, to whom was mistakenly attributed a "collection of unbelievable marvels" and "magical formulas," the Liber Aggregationis seu Liber Secretorum ("The Book of Secrets of the Virtues of Herbs, Stones, and Certain Beasts," 1477; translated from Latin into English, c. 1550). Baldwin's contemporaries viewed the book as a "work of entertainment rather than information," and "did not take [it] seriously." Baldwin later quotes one of the book's formulae (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 58). See p. 254.

10 mark consider, give heed or attention to.

THE FIRST PART OF MASTER STREAMER'S ORATION

Being lodged (as, I thank him, I have been often) at a friend's house of mine, which, more roomish within than garish without, standeth at Saint Martin's Lane end and hangeth partly upon the town wall that is called Aldersgate[1] (either of one Aldrich, or else of elders, that is to say ancient men of the city which among them builded it—as bishops did Bishopsgate; or else of eldern trees, which perchance as they do in the gardens now thereabout, so while the common[2] there was vacant grew abundantly in the same place where the gate was after builded, and called thereof Elderngate—as Moorgate took the name of the field without it, which hath been a very moor; or else, because it is the most ancient gate of the city, was thereof in respect of the other, as Newgate, called the Eldergate; or else, as Ludgate taketh the name of Lud who builded it—so most part of heralds, I know, will soonest assent that Aluredus builded this; but they are deceived, for he and his wife Algay builded Aldgate, which thereof taketh the name as Cripplegate doth of a cripple, who begged so much in his life, as put to the silver weather cock which he stole from Paul's steeple, after his death builded it).[3] But whereofsoever this gate Aldersgate took the name (which longeth chiefly to historiers to know), at my friend's house, which, as I said, standeth so near that it is over it, I lay oftentimes, and that for sundry causes, sometime for lack of other lodging, and sometime as while my Greek alphabets were in printing to see that it might truly be corrected.[4] And sure it is a shame for all young men that they be no more studious in the tongues; but the world is now come to that pass, that if he can prate[5] a little Latin and handle a racquet and a pair of six-square bowls,[6] he shall sooner obtain any living[7] than the best learned in a whole city; which is the cause that learning is so despised and baggagical[8] things so much advanced.

Why Aldersgate was so named.

Bishops builded Bishopsgate.

Why Moorgate.

Why Newgate.

Why Ludgate.

Why Aldgate.

Why Cripplegate.

Paul's weathercock was silver.

Against young men's negligence.

Against unlawful games.

---

[1] According to Ringler and Flachmann, "contemporaries would recognize this as the printing shop and dwelling of the well-known publisher John Day, who occupied premises over Aldersgate from 1548 until 1553" (p. 59). John Stowe confirms this fact, noting that "John Day, stationer, a late famous printer of many good books, in our time, dwelt in this gate, and built much upon the wall of the city towards the parish church of St. Anne" (Survey London, 1598, I, 34). Like Baldwin's employer, Whitchurch, Day "was a radical Protestant who devoted his printing almost entirely to religious works in furtherance of the Reformation" (p. 59).

[2] common common or public land.

[3] (either of one Aldrich … after his death builded it) "Streamer's irrelevant and pompous explanations of the names of seven of the ten principal gates of London have little or no basis in fact. Aldrich, Aluredus (Alfred), and Algay appear to be made-up names; King Lud is a fiction of Geoffrey of Monmouth; the cripple who stole the weathercock (which was copper, not silver) from St. Paul's Cathedral is pure fabrication," although this tale soon turns up in Thomas Deloney, popular prose writer, and John Davies, poet. John Stow commented on this absurdly muddled history, setting the record straight on the origins of the name "Aldersgate": "so called not of Aldrich or of elders, that is to say, ancient men, builders thereof; not of eldern trees growing there more abundantly than in other places, as some have fabled (in a book called Beware the Cat), but for the antiquity of the gate itself, as being one of the first four gates of the city ..." (Survey London, 1598, I, 34 ; quoted in Ringler and Flachmann, p. 59).

[4] my Greek alphabets were in printing to see that it might truly be corrected It was relatively common practice for authors to reside with their printers to help prepare their books for the press.

[5] prate to speak insolently or boastfully; to chatter.

[6] six-square bowls "six-sided bowling balls, i.e., dice" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 59).

[7] living an ecclesiastical position, usually one with a specified income and (sometimes) a residence attached.

[8] baggagical worthless; the complaint that learning is undervalued in comparison to other things that guarantee worldly advancement is an ancient one.

While I lay at the foresaid house for the causes aforesaid, I was lodged in a chamber hard by the printing house, which had a fair bay window opening into the garden, the earth whereof is almost as high as Saint Anne's Church top, which standeth thereby. At the other end of the printing house, as you enter in, is a side door and three or four steps which go up to the leads[1] of the gate, whereas sometime quarters of men, which is a loathly and abominable sight, do stand up upon poles.[2] I call it abominable because it is not only against nature but against Scripture; for God commanded by Moses that, after the sun went down, all such as were hanged or otherwise put to death should be buried, lest if the sun saw them the next day His wrath should come upon them and plague them, as He hath done this and many other realms for the like transgression.[3] And I marvel where men have learned it or for what cause they do it, except it be to feed and please the devils. For sure I believe that some spirits, Misanthropi or Molochitus, who lived by the savour of man's blood, did, after their sacrifices failed (in which men were slain and offered unto them), put into butcherly heathen tyrants' heads to mangle and boil Christian transgressors and to set up their quarters for them to feed upon.[4] And therefore I would counsel all men to bury or burn all executed bodies, and refrain from making such abominable sacrifice as I have often seen, with ravens or rather devils feeding upon them, in this foresaid leads—in the which every night many cats assembled, and there made such a noise that I could not sleep for them.

God plagueth abomination.

Evil spirits live by the savour of man's blood.

Good ghostly[5] counsel of Master Streamer.

Wherefore, on a time as I was sitting by the fire with certain of the house,[6] I told them what a noise and what a wawling the cats had made there the night before from ten o'clock till one, so that neither I could sleep nor study for them; and by means of this introduction we fell in communication of[7] cats. And some affirming, as I do now (but I was against it then), that they had understanding, for confirmation whereof one of the servants told this story.

A wise man may in some things change his opinion.

"There was in my country," quod[8] he, "a man" (the fellow was born in Staffordshire) "that had a young cat which he had brought up of a kitling,[9] and would nightly dally and play with it; and on a time as he rode through Kankwood[10] about certain business, a cat,

---

1 leads the roof, so-called because roofs were partly constructed out of sheets or strips of lead.

2 quarters of men … do stand up upon poles "The penalty for treason was to be hanged, cut down while still alive, disembowelled, and cut into quarters; the head was set on a pike on London Bridge, and the quarters were placed on various gates of the city. A priest had been quartered in July 1548; three Norfolk rebels in August 1549; and four Devonshire rebels in January 1550 (Wriothesley's Chronicle, Camden Society, n.s. 20 [1877]: 4, 32; quoted in Ringler and Flachmann, p. 59).

3 for God commanded by Moses ... the like transgression Deuteronomy 21:22-23.

4 Misanthropi or Molochitus … to feed upon In Leviticus 18:21, Moloch is a heathen idol delighting in human sacrifice; Misanthropi is an invented demonic spirit, from the Greek word meaning "hater of man."

5 ghostly spiritual.

6 certain of the house There are an additional four persons residing with Streamer in the house, each of whom contributes to the series of fireside tales, some autobiographical, others not, concerning the question of whether or not animals have reason and can discourse. They are (in the order in which they speak): (1) the man from Staffordshire, who tells the tale of another man meeting a cat in Kankwood, forty years before; (2) Thomas, who tells the tale of Grimalkin, which he in turn heard from a churl, as well as a tale about a friend who roasted a cat and a tale about werewolves; (3) another man, unnnamed, who ridicules Thomas's story, saying it is unreasonable; and (4) Master Sherry, who tells the tale of the Bishop of Alexandria, who is able to understand birds (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 59).

7 in communication of into conversation about.

8 quod said.

9 kitling kitten.

10 Kankwood also known as Cank Wood, in north-west Staffordshire.

A cat spoke to a man in Kankwood.

as he thought, leaped out of a bush before him and called him twice or thrice by his name. But because he made none answer nor spoke (for he was so afraid that he could not), she spoke to him plainly twice or thrice these words following: 'Commend me unto Titton Tatton and to Puss thy Catton, and tell her that Grimalkin[1] is dead.' This done she went her way, and the man went forward about his business. And after that he was returned home, in an evening sitting by the fire with his wife and his household, he told of his adventure in the wood. And when he had told them all the cat's message, his cat, which had harkened unto the tale, looked upon him sadly, and at the last said, 'And is Grimalkin dead? Then farewell dame,' and therewith went her way and was never seen after."

A wonderful wit of a cat.

When this tale was done, another of the company, which had been in Ireland, asked this fellow when this thing which he had told happened. He answered that he could not tell well, howbeit, as he conjectured, not passing forty years, for his mother knew both the man and the woman which ought[2] the cat that the message was sent unto. "Sure," quod the other, "then it may well be; for about that same time, as I heard, a like thing happened in Ireland where, if I conjecture not amiss, Grimalkin of whom you spoke was slain."

Grimalkin was slain in Ireland.

"Yea sir," quod I, "I pray you how so?"

Experience is an infallible persuader.

"I will tell you, Master Streamer," quod he, "that which was told me in Ireland, and which I have till now so little credited, that I was ashamed to report it. But hearing that[3] I hear now, and calling to mind my own experience when it was, I do so little misdoubt it that I think I never told, nor you ever heard, a more likely tale. While I was in Ireland, in the time that Mac Murrough and all the rest of the wild lords were the King's enemies, what time also mortal war was between the Fitz Harrises and the prior[4] and convent[5] of the abbey of Tintern, who counted them the King's friends and subjects, whose neighbour was Cahir Mac Art, a wild Irishman then the King's enemy and one which daily made inroads into the county of Wexford and burned such towns and carried away all such cattle as he might come by, by means whereof all the country from Clonmines to Ross became a waste wilderness and is scarce recovered until this day.[6] In this time, I say, as I was on a night at coshery[7] with one of Fitz Harris' churls, we fell in talk (as we have done now) of strange adventures, and of cats. And there, among other things, the churl (for so they call all farmers and husbandmen) told me as you shall hear.[8]

Civil war between the King's subjects.

The fashion of the Irish wars.

---

1 Grimalkin The OED notes that this common cat's name finally came to mean "cat"; it is derived from "grey" and "malkin," and the latter can mean a female spirit or spectre. The first time "greymalkin" is used as the name of a devil or demon is in Shakespeare's Macbeth (1605).

2 ought owned.

3 that i.e., that which.

4 prior the superior or head of this monastery.

5 convent the body of monks who comprised this abbey's religious community.

6 whose neighbour was Cahir Mac Art … until this day "Thomas' syntax is contorted. His meaning is that the Fitz Harrises and the prior of Tintern, the king's friends, were at war with the wild Irish Mac Murrough and Cahir Mac Art" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 60).

7 coshery Irish, "feast."

8 Mac Murrough and all … as you shall hear "In 1336, Mac Morrough, chief of the clan Kavanagh, defeated the Englishmen of Wexford under Sir Matthew Fitz Henry; in 1525, Nicholas Fitz Henry and others, pursued by Irishmen, fled to the town of Ross, but the inhabitants closed the gates against them and they were slain (H.F. Hore, History of Wexford [1900], pp. 63, 233). The priory of Tintern, founded by Welsh monks in the thirteenth century, was dissolved in 1538. The Fitz Henrys (Fitz Harrises in the text) and the Butlers were families of Anglo-Norman descent who sided with the English and carried on local warfare against the native Irish. Mac Morrough was the name or title of descendants of the ancient kings of Leinster. The

A churl's tale.

"There was, not seven years past, a kern[1] of John Butler's dwelling in the fassock[2] of Bantry called Patrick Apore, who minding to make a prey in the night upon Cahir Mac Art, his master's enemy, got him with his boy (for so they call their horse-keepers be they never so old knaves) into his country,[3] and in the night time entered into a town of two houses, and broke in and slew the people, and then took such cattle as they found, which was a cow and a sheep, and departed therewith homeward. But doubting[4] they should be pursued (the cur dogs made such a shrill barking), he got him into a church, thinking to lurk there till midnight was past, for there he was sure that no man would suspect or seek him—for the wild Irishmen have had churches in such reverence (till our men taught them the contrary) that they neither would, nor durst, either rob ought thence or hurt any man that took the churchyard for sanctuary, no, though he had killed his father.[6]

This was an Irish town.

Irish curs bark sore.[5]

The wild Irishmen were better than we in reverencing their religion.

"And while this kern was in the church he thought it best to dine, for he had eaten little that day. Wherefore he made his boy go gather sticks, and strake fire with his feres,[7] and made a fire in the church, and killed the sheep, and after the Irish fashion laid it thereupon and roasted it. But when it was ready, and that he thought to eat it, there came in a cat and set her by him, and said in Irish, 'Shane foel,' which is, 'Give me some meat.' He, amazed at this, gave her the quarter[9] that was in his hand, which immediately she did eat up, and asked more till she had consumed all the sheep; and, like a cormorant[10] not satisfied therewith, asked still for more. Wherefore they supposed it were the Devil, and therefore thinking it wisdom to please him, killed the cow which they had stolen, and when they had flayed[11] it gave the cat a quarter, which she immediately devoured. Then they gave her two other quarters; and in the meanwhile, after their country fashion, they did cut a piece of the hide and pricked it upon four stakes which they set about the fire, and therein they sod[12] a piece of the cow for themselves, and with the rest of the hide they made each of them laps to wear about their feet like brogues,[13] both to keep their feet from hurt all the next day,

The old Irish diet was to dine at night.

A malapert guest that cometh unbidden.[8]

A cat eat a sheep.

The woodkern's cookery.

---

historical Cahir Mac Art Kavanagh (d. 1554), assumed the title of Mac Murrough from 1547 to 1550. The land had been laid waste from Clonmines, on Barrow Bay near Tintern Abbey, inland to Ross (a Mac Murrough stronghold) about fifteen miles north on the Barrow River. The fassock of Bantry lay between this area and the English town of Wexford to the east" (Ringler and Flachmann, pp. 60-61).

1 kern Irish term for a light-armed Irish foot soldier.

2 fassock Irish, "fassagh, wilderness area (not in OED)" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 61).

3 got him with his boy … into his country i.e., Patrick Apore, John Butler's kern, went with his horse-keeper into the country of Cahir Mac Art.

4 doubting suspecting, fearing.

5 sore very much, a great deal.

6 he got him into a church … killed his father the Roman Catholic practice of designating some churches and other holy sites as places of sanctuary for those fleeing the king's law; one of the many traditional powers of the pre-Reformation English church which drew reformist criticism in this period (see headnote).

7 feres flints, materials for sparking a fire.

8 A malapert guest that cometh unbidden a variation on the proverb, "An unwelcome guest is welcome when gone" (Tilley G475); malapert presumptuous, impudent, saucy.

9 quarter When butchered, animals like cows and deer were traditionally divided into four pieces or quarters, each containing a leg.

10 cormorant a large sea-bird traditionally thought voracious and greedy.

11 flayed skinned.

12 sod boiled.

13 laps wrappings; brogues crude shoes made usually of untanned hide and worn by the people in the wilder parts of Ireland and Scotland.

and also to serve for meat the next night, if they could get none other, by broiling them upon coals.

Kerns for lack of meat eat their shoes roasted.

"By this time the cat had eaten three quarters and called for more. Wherefore they gave her that which was a-seething; and doubting lest, when she had eaten that, she would eat them too because they had no more for her, they got them out of the church and the kern took his horse and away he rode as fast as he could hie.[1] When he was a mile or two from the church the moon began to shine, and his boy espied the cat upon his master's horse behind him and told him. Whereupon the kern took his dart,[2] and turning his face toward her, flung it and struck her through with it. But immediately there came to her such a sight[3] of cats that, after long fight with them, his boy was killed and eaten up, and he himself, as good and as swift as his horse was, had much to do to scape.[4]

A kern killed Grimalkin.

Cats did kill and eat a man.

"When he was come home and had put off his harness (which was a corslet of mail made like a shirt, and his skull covered over with gilt leather and crested with otter skin), all weary and hungry he set him down by his wife and told her his adventure, which, when a kitling which his wife kept, scarce half a year old, had heard, up she started and said, 'Hast thou killed Grimalkin!' And therewith she plunged in his face, and with her teeth took him by the throat, and ere that she could be plucked away, she had strangled him. This the churl told me now about thirty-three winters past; and it was done, as he and divers[5] other creditable men informed me, not seven years before. Whereupon I gather that this Grimalkin was it which the cat in Kankwood sent news of unto the cat which we heard of even now."

The kern's armour.

A kitling killeth the kern that slew Grimalkin.

A very strange conjecture.

"Tush," quod another that sat by, "your conjecture is too unreasonable; for to admit that cats have reason and that they do in their own language understand one another, yet how should a cat in Kankwood know what is done in Ireland?"

"How?" quod he, "even as we know what is done in the realms of France, Flanders, and Spain, yea, and almost in all the world beside. There be few ships but have cats belonging unto them, which bring news unto their fellows out of all quarters."

Each realm knoweth what is done in all other.

Cats carry news.

"Yea," quod the other, "but why should all cats love to hear of Grimalkin, or how should Grimalkin eat so much meat as you speak of, or why should all cats so labour to revenge her death?"

"Nay, that passeth my cunning," quod he, "to show in all; howbeit in part conjectures may be made, as thus. It may be that Grimalkin and her line[6] is as much esteemed and hath the same dignity among cats, as either the humble[7] or master bee hath among the whole hive, at whose commandment all bees are obedient, whose succour and safeguard they seek, whose wrongs they all revenge;[8] or as the Pope hath had ere[9] this over all Christendom, in whose cause all his clergy would not only scratch and bite, but kill and burn to Bees love and obey their governor.

The Pope's clergy are crueller than cats.

---

1 hie strive, exert himself.

2 dart generally, a light pointed weapon; here possibly a spear or lance.

3 sight multitude, crowd.

4 scape i.e., escape.

5 divers various.

6 line i.e., bloodline, lineage.

7 humble bumble.

8 humble or master bee … all revenge The beehive became in the Renaissance a common metaphor for the well-ordered monarchy. Pliny's Natural History (1.319-20) describes the absolute obedience of hive bees to their bumble bee or king.

9 ere before, prior to.

powder (though they knew not why) whomsoever they thought to think but once against him—which Pope, all things considered, devoureth more at every meal than Grimalkin did at her last supper."

The Pope a great waster.

"Nay," said I then, "although the Pope, by exactions[1] and other baggagical trumpery,[2] have spoiled all people of mighty spoils,[3] yet (as touching[4] his own person) he eateth and weareth as little as any other man, though peradventure[5] more sumptuous and costly, and in greater abundance provided. And I heard a very proper saying in this behalf[6] of King Henry VII:[7] When a servant of his told him what abundance of meat he had seen at an abbot's[8] table, he reported him to be a great glutton; he asked if the abbot eat up all, and when he answered no, but his guests did eat the most part, 'Ah,' quod the King, 'thou callest him glutton for his liberality to feed thee and such other unthankful churls.' Like to this fellow are all ruffians,[9] for let honest, worshipful men of the city make them good cheer or lend them money as they commonly do, and what have they for their labour? Either foul, reproachful names (as 'dunghill churls,'[10] 'cuckold knaves'[11]), or else spiteful and slanderous reports, as to be usurers and decayers of the common weal.[12] And although that some of them be such indeed, yet I abhor to hear other of whom they deserve well, so lewdly[14] to report them. But now, to return to your communication, I marvel how Grimalkin (as you term her), if she were no bigger, could eat so much meat at once."

A little sufficeth him that hath enough.

Such jests a man may have enough.

The wisdom of King Henry VII.

The unthankful are to be abhorred.[13]

"I do not think," quod he that told the tale, "that she did eat all (although she asked all), but took her choice and laid the rest by, as we see in the feeding of many things. For a wolf, although a cony[15] be more than he can eat, yet will he kill a cow or twain[16] for his breakfast—likewise all other ravenous beasts. Now, that love and fellowship and a desire to save their kind is among cats, I know by experience. For there was one that hired a friend of mine, in pastime, to roast a cat alive, and promised him for his labour twenty

Ravenours spoil more than they occupy.[17]
Like loveth the like.[18]

---

1 exactions illegal or exorbitant demands, extortion; there may be a buried reference to tithes.

2 baggagical trumpery nonsensical or worthless deceits, impostures, trickery; "trumpery" is also used to refer contemptuously to religious ceremonies and practices considered to be superstitious, as is the case with Baldwin's Protestant contempt for the Catholic Mass and the practices of the Catholic Church in general.

3 have spoiled all people of mighty spoils have plundered or robbed people of great or extensive goods/possessions; "spoils" often refers to goods or possessions seized by force, especially in war: loot, booty, or plunder.

4 touching concerning.

5 peradventure perhaps, not improbably.

6 in this behalf in this respect.

7 Henry VII "No other version of this anecdote has been found" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 61).

8 abbot the spiritual and financial head of an abbey or monastery.

9 ruffians low-born individuals, given to violent and brutish acts.

10 churls boors, base-born fellows.

11 cuckold knaves "cuckold": cheating; also a man whose wife has been unfaithful; "knaves": deceitful, unprincipled men.

12 usurers and decayers of the common weal Usurers were individuals who lent money at a specified, and usually very high, rate of interest; in the Renaissance, usury was considered unchristian, being explicitly condemned by Scripture, the Church Fathers, and numerous sermons. Until the late sixteenth-century, usury was a crime, and even once legalized (in the act of 1571) it was subject to severe social and cultural disapproval; common weal common good; also, the commonwealth, the nation.

13 The unthankful are to be abhorred a variation on the proverb, "Ingratitude comprehends (is the worst of) all fault (vices)" (Tilley M435).

14 lewdly ignorantly.

15 cony rabbit.

16 twain two.

17 occupy use.

18 Like loveth the like Proverb, "Like will to like" (Tilley L286).

shillings. My friend, to be sure, caused a cooper[1] to fasten him into a hogshead,[2] in which he turned a spit, whereupon was a quick cat.[3] But ere he had turned a while, whether it was the smell of the cat's wool that singed, or else her cry that called them, I cannot tell, but there came such a sort[4] of cats that if I and other hardy men (which were well scrat[5] for our labour) had not behaved us the better, the hogshead, as fast as it was hooped,[7] could not have kept my cousin from them."

A quick cat roasted.

Cat will to kind.[6]

"Indeed," quod a well-learned man and one of excellent judgement that was then in the company, "it doth appear that there is in cats, as in all other kinds of beasts, a certain reason and language whereby they understand one another. But, as touching this, Grimalkin I take rather to be an hagat[9] or a witch than a cat. For witches have gone often in that likeness—and thereof hath come the proverb, as true as common, that a cat hath nine lives (that is to say, a witch may take on her a cat's body nine times)."[10]

Some think this was Master Sherry.[8]

Witches may take upon them the likeness of other things.

"By my faith, sir, this is strange," quod I myself, "that a witch should take on her a cat's body. I have read that the Pythonesses could cause their spirits to take upon them dead men's bodies,[11] and the airy spirits which we call demons (of which kind are incubus and succubus,[12]

Airy spirits take on them dead men's bodies.

---

1 cooper a craftsman who makes and repairs wooden vessels made out of staves, like barrels.

2 hogshead a large cask for liquids, usually liquor.

3 to roast a cat alive … quick cat "As part of the midsummer festivities at Paris in 1572, a fox and live cats were suspended in a bag over a bonfire (James M. Osborn, Young Philip Sidney, New Haven, 1972, p. 43, quoted in Ringler and Flachmann, pp. 61-62). Although cats were often burned alive as witches' familiars, or accompanying spirits, there are few references to cats being burned as a normal part of English holiday entertainments. However, bear-baiting and cock-fighting were both popular blood-sports in the period; quick alive.

4 sort great number.

5 scrat scratched.

6 Cat will to kind Proverb, "Cat (kit) after kind" (Tilley C135).

7 as fast as it was hooped "as tightly or securely as it was fastened together": casks were made out of staves of wood, bound together with circles (hoops) of wood or flattened metal.

8 Master Sherry "Probably Richard Sherry, an Oxford M.A. and former headmaster of Magdalen College School, whose translation of J. Brentius's Exposition upon the Sixth Chapter of St. John (the miracles of the loaves and fishes and of Christ walking upon the water) was printed by John Day on 9 April 1550, and whose Treatise of Schemes and Tropes was printed by Day in December 1550, only a few months before June 1551, the supposed date of the events told to Streamer in Day's printing house" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 62).

9 hagat demonic spirit in female form; also a synonym for "witch," a woman who associates with and serves Satan.

10 that a cat hath nine lives … nine times Proverb (Tilley C154); the belief that witches could take on other forms was widespread, and the form of the cat is one of the most frequently mentioned in texts of the period. See, for example, A Rehearsal both strange and true … at Windsor (1579) in Barbara Rosen, ed. Witchcraft in England, 1558-1618 (Amherst, 1969, p. 83, note 92). For two skeptical accounts, see George Mora, gen. ed., Witches, Devils, and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De praestigiis daemonum (Binghamton, 1991) pp. 192-94, 337-42, 548-49, and Reginald Scot, The Discovery of Witchcraft (1584; Dover, 1984), p. 6.

11 the Pythonesses … dead men's bodies The Pythonesses (or the Pythian woman) are "equated with the witch of Endor ... in 1 Samuel 28:7-15," who is supposed to have raised Samuel from the dead at the urging of King Saul, so that the prophet might foretell Saul's future. "The Geneva [Bible] sidenote explains that the form of Samuel appeared to Saul, 'To his imagination, albeit was Satan, who to blind his eyes took upon him the form of Samuel'" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 62). For similar accounts of this Scriptural episode see Mora, Witches, Devils, and Doctors, pp. 127-33 and Scot, Discovery, Book VII, chapters 8-14.

12 incubus and succubus "incubus": an evil spirit or demon which descends upon people in their sleep, especially women with whom they seek sexual intercourse; "succubus": a demon in female form which has sex with men while they sleep. For an account of the tradition behind these two demons, see Mora, Witches, Devils, and Doctors, pp. 231-33 and 249-51; and Scot, Discovery, Book IV.

Robin Goodfellow the fairy,[1] and goblins, which the miners call telchines[2]) could at their pleasure take upon them any other sorts. But that a woman, being so large a body, should strain her into the body of a cat (or into that form either), I have not much heard of, nor can well perceive how it may be, which maketh me (I promise you) believe it the less."

Wise men dissemble their cunning.

"Well, Master Streamer," quod he, "I know you are not so ignorant herein as you make yourself; but this is your accustomed fashion,[3] always to make men believe that you be not so well learned as you be. Sapiens enim celat scientiam, which appeared well by Socrates.[4] For I know, being skilled as you be in the tongues (chiefly the Calde,[6] Arabic, and Egyptian) and having read so many authors therein, you must needs be skillful in these matters; but where you spoke of instrusion of a woman's body into a cat's, you either play Nichodem[7] or the stubborn popish conjurer:[8] whereof one would creep into his mother's belly again, the other would bring Christ out of Heaven to thrust him into a piece of bread[9] (but as the one of them is gross[10] and the other perverse, so in this point I must place you with one of them). For although witches may take upon them cats' bodies, or alter the shape of their or other bodies, yet this is not done by putting their own bodies thereinto, but either by bringing their souls for the time out of their bodies and putting them in the other, or by deluding the sight and fantasies[11] of the seers. As when I make a candle with the brain of a horse and brimstone, the light of the candle maketh all kinds of heads appear horseheads, but yet it altereth the form of no head, but deceiveth the right conception of the eye (which, through the false light, receiveth a like form)."[12]

Master Streamer is well seen in tongues.[5]

Transubstantiationers destroy Christ's manhood.

How witches transform their shape.

One kind of magic consisteth in deceiving the senses.

Then quod he that had been in Ireland, "I cannot tell, sir, by what means witches do change their own likeness and the shapes of other things, but I have heard of so many and seen so much myself, that I am sure they do it. For in Ireland, as they have been ere this in England, witches are for fear had in high reverence. They be so cunning that they can

Witches are reverenced for fear.

---

1 Robin Goodfellow the fairy a sportive or capricious elf or goblin believed to haunt the English countryside in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; also called Hobgoblin or Puck; appears most famously as a character in Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream.

2 telchines "metal-working magicians of Rhodes who kill with a glance" (Metamorphoses, 7.365; Ringler and Flachmann, p. 62). For a natural explanation of this ability see Mora, Witches, Devils, and Doctors, p. 266.

3 accustomed fashion customary habit.

4 Sapiens enim celat scientiam, which appeared well by Socrates Latin, "For the wise hide their knowledge." According to Plato, "Socrates is wise because he knows he has no wisdom" (Apology 21, quoted in Ringler and Flachmann, p. 62).

5 Master Streamer is well seen in tongues i.e., he is skilled in languages.

6 Calde "Chaldean, the biblical Aramaic" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 62).

7 Nichodem Nichodemus. "Jesus said, 'Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.' Nichodemus asked, 'How can a man be born which is old? Can he enter into his mother's womb again, and be born?'" (John 3:3-4).

8 the stubborn popish conjurer i.e., the Roman Catholic priest whose consecration of the bread and wine during the Mass was dismissed by reformers as superstition and magic.

9 the other would … bread The Roman Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation asserts that during the sacrament of the Eucharist or the Lord's Supper the priest's consecration of the bread and wine transforms them miraculously into the actual flesh and blood of Christ; the bread and wine are not symbols or tokens of Christ's sacrifice as Protestant reformers contended.

10 gross monstrous; obviously in error.

11 fantasies "fantasy": the mental faculty which allows one to apprehend an object of perception.

12 As when I make a candle … a like form "When thou wilt that they which be in a place seem without heads, take smart brimstone, with oil, and put it in a lamp and make light with it, and put it in the midst of men, and thou shalt see a marvellous thing" (Albertus Magnus, Book of Secrets, ed. Best and Brightman, pp. 89-90, quoted in Ringler and Flachmann, p. 62).

change the shapes of things as they list[1] at their pleasure and so deceive the people thereby that an act was made in Ireland that no man should buy any red swine.[2] The cause whereof was this: The witches used to send to the markets many red swine, fair and fat to see unto as any might be, and would in that form continue long; but if it chanced the buyers of them to bring them to any water, immediately they found them returned either into wisps of hay, straw, old rotten boards, or such like trumpery, by means whereof they lost their money or such other cattle as they gave in exchange for them.

An act forbidding to buy red swine.

Sorcerers make swine of hay and other baggage.

"There is also, in Ireland, one nation whereof some one man and woman are at every seven years' end turned into wolves, and so continue in the woods the space of seven years. And if they hap to live out the time, they return to their own form again, and other twain are turned for the like time into the same shape—which is a penance (as they say) enjoined that stock by Saint Patrick for some wickedness of their ancestors.[3] And that this is true witnessed a man whom I left alive in Ireland who had performed this seven years' penance, whose wife was slain while she was a wolf in her last year. This man told to many men, whose cattle he had worried and whose bodies he had assailed while he was a wolf, so plain and evident tokens and showed such scars of wounds which other men had given him, both in his man's shape before he was a wolf and in his wolf's shape since, which all appeared upon his skin, that it was evident to all men (yea, and to the bishop, too, upon whose grant it was recorded and registered[4]) that the matter was undoubtedly past all peradventure.[5]

Men turned into wolves.

Saint Patrick's plague.

A man proved himself to have been a wolf seven years.

A Bishop confirmeth Saint Patrick's plague.

"And I am sure you are not ignorant of the hermit whom, as St. Augustine writeth, a witch would in an ass's form ride upon to market.[6] But now how these witches made their swine, and how these folk were turned from shape to shape, whether by some ointment

---

[1] as they list as they like or desire.

[2] act … Ireland … red swine According to Ringler and Flachmann, the story of the red swine, as well as the story of the werewolves, and the witch and the hermit (below), can all be found in Giraldus Cambrensis's Topographia Hibernica. Since this work was not published until 1603 in William Camden's Anglica, Normannica, Hibernica, Cambrica, a Veteribus Scripta ("England, Normandy, Hibernia, Cambria, from Old papers"), Ringler and Flachmann speculate that Baldwin used a manuscript version of it. They note further that there was apparently no such law made concerning red swine in Ireland (pp. 62-63) and print an "abbreviated paraphrase" of the stories in their edition.

[3] Saint Patrick … wickedness of their ancestors "In the printed text of Giraldus, St. Natalis delivered the curse. Patrick may have appeared in the manuscript Baldwin had access to, but if so the reference would be to the eleventh-century Patrick, bishop of Dublin" (ibid, p. 63).

[4] upon whose grant it was recorded and registered "grant": consent, permission; perhaps a reference to Giraldus's version where he recounts being asked by the bishop of Meath what he (the bishop) should do about the matter of the werewolves, and Giraldus "advised him to send an account of it to the pope attested under [the bishop's] seal, which he did" (quoted in Ringler and Flachmann, p. 63). Giraldus's main point, and that which probably drew Baldwin to the stories, is (as Ringler and Flachmann note) the contrast which Giraldus draws between human-animal transformation (either it is a punishment from God, the result of a demonic curse, or simply an illusion occasioned by trickery and deception) with the truly miraculous transformation of the bread and wine into the true body and blood of Christ in the Roman Catholic sacrament of the Eucharist (p. 63). That Giraldus concludes his anecdotes about supernatural transformation by referring to the mystical transformation of bread and wine in the Roman Catholic mass is significant since, "the fundamental fictional construct of Beware the Cat [is] that belief in the physical efficacy of the mass is as absurd as belief in animals having power of speech " (p. 63).

[5] past all peradventure out of the realm of uncertainty, beyond question.

[6] the hermit whom, as St. Augustine writeth, a witch would in an ass's form ride upon to market based on Augustine's City of God 18.18, which Giraldus quotes, concerning "stablewomen, who had learned evil arts, [and] who fed travellers something in cheese that transformed them into beasts and made them bear burdens" (quoted in Ringler and Flachmann, p. 63).

whose clearness deceived men's sights till either the water washed away the ointment, or else that the clearness of the water excelled the clearness of the ointment (and so betrayed the operation of it), I am as uncertain as I am sure that it were the spirits called demons, forced by enchantments, which moved those bodies till shame of their shape discovered caused them to leave them. But as for the transformation of the wolves, [it] is either miraculous as Naaman's leprosy in the stock of Gehesie,[1] or else [due] to shameful, crafty, malicious sorcery. And as the one way is unsearchable, so I think there might means be found to guess how it is done the other way. For witches are by nature exceeding malicious, and if it chance that some witch, for displeasure taken with this wolvish nation, gave her daughter charge in her deathbed when she taught her the science (for till that time witches never teach it, nor then but to their eldest and best-loved daughter) that she should, at every seven years' end, confect some ointment which seven years' space might be in force against all other clearness to represent unto men's eyes the shape of a wolf; and in the night season to go herself in likeness either of the mare or some other night form and anoint therewith the bodies of some couple of that kindred which she hated; and that after her time she should charge her daughter to observe the same, and to charge her daughter after her to do the like forever, so that this charge is given always by tradition with the science, and so is continued and observed by this witch's offspring, by whom two of this kindred (as it may be supposed) are every seven years' space turned into wolves."

How sorcerers may make swine.

Demons are the souls of counterfeit bodies.

Witches are by nature malicious.

When and to whom witches teach their science.

How men are changed into wolves.

Witchcraft is kin to unwritten verities, for both go by traditions.

When I had heard these tales and the reason of the doing showed by the teller, "Ah, Thomas," quod I (for that was his name; he died afterwards of a disease which he took in Newgate,[3] where he lay long for suspicion of magic[4] because he had desired a prisoner to promise him his soul after he was hanged), "I perceive now the old proverb is true: 'The still sow eateth up all the draff.'[5] You go and behave yourself so simply that a man would think you were but a fool, but you have uttered such proof of natural knowledge in this your brief talk, as I think (except myself and few more the best-learned alive) none could have done the like."

Many shrewd[2] diseases do breed in Newgate.

The best learned are not the greatest boasters.[6]

"You say your pleasure, Master Streamer," quod he. "As for me, I have said nothing but that[7] I have seen, and whereof any man might conjecture as I do."

That a man seeth, he may boldly say.

"You have spoken full well," quod he that gave occasion of this tale, "and your conjectures are right reasonable. For like as by ointments (as you suppose) the Irish witches do make the form of swine and wolves appear to all men's sight, so think I that by the like power English witches and Irish witches may and do turn themselves into cats. For I heard it told while I was in the university, by a credible clerk[8] of Oxford, how that in the days

A woman was found in a cat's likeness and punished.

---

1 Naaman's leprosy in the stock of Gehesie The prophet Elisha cured Naaman of leprosy, but when Naaman tried to reward Elisha, the prophet refused to accept anything in return. However, when Elisha found that his own servant, Gehazi, had secretly accepted the offered gifts, Elisha cursed Gehazi and his descendants (i.e., his "stock") with Naaman's leprosy (2 Kings 5).

2 shrewd serious.

3 Newgate famous London prison for felons.

4 for suspicion of magic on suspicion of having practised magic or sorcery.

5 'The still sow eateth up all the draff' "the quiet sow eateth up all the swill," meaning that an unassuming, demure person is best at committing and getting away with mischievous acts, or at getting his or her own way (Tilley S681).

6 The best learned are not the greatest boasters a variation on the proverb, "The greatest boasters are not the greatest doers" and "great boast and small roast" (in these and related expressions the contrast is generally between "talking" and "acting" [Tilley B489; B488]).

7 but that i.e., but that which.

8 clerk scholar; also, an ordained minister.

when he was a child an old woman was brought before the official and accused for a witch, which (in the likeness of a cat) would go into her neighbours' houses and steal thence what she listed.[1] Which complaint was proved true by a place of the woman's skin, which her accusers (with a firebrand that they hurled at her) had singed while she went a-thieving in her cat's likeness.[2] So that, to conclude as I began, I think that the cat which you call Grimalkin, whose name carrieth in it matter to confirm my conjecture (for Malkin is a woman's name, as witnesseth the proverb 'there be more maids than Malkin'[3]), I think, I say, that it was a witch in a cat's likeness; and that for the wit and craft of her, other natural cats[4] that were not so wise have had her and her race in reverence among them, thinking her to be but a mere cat as they themselves were—like as we silly fools long time, for his sly and crafty juggling,[5] reverenced the Pope, thinking him to have been but a man (though much holier than we ourselves were), whereas indeed he was a very incarnated devil, like as this Grimalkin was an incarnate witch."

Witches never use their art but to evil.

It is to be thought that Grimalkin was a witch.

Cats may be deceived as well as Christian folk.

"Why then, sir," said I, "do you think that natural cats have wit and that they understand one another?" "What else, Master Streamer?" quod he. "There is no kind of sensible[6] creatures but have reason and understanding; whereby, in their kind, each understandeth other and do therein in some points so excel that the consideration thereof moved Pythagoras (as you know) to believe and affirm that after death men's souls went into beasts and beasts' souls into men, and every one according to his desert in his former body.[7] And although his opinion be fond and false, yet that which drew him thereto is evident and true—and that is the wit and reason of diverse beasts, and again the dull, beastly, brutish ignorance of diverse men.

All sensible creatures have reason and understanding.

Pythagoras' opinion concerning souls.

Some beasts are wiser than men.

"But that beasts understand one another, and fowls likewise, beside that we see by daily experience in marking[8] them, the story of the bishop of Alexandria by record doth prove. For he found the means, either through diligence so to mark them, or else through magic natural so to subtiliate his sensible powers, either by purging his brain by dry drinks and fumes, or else to augment the brains of his power perceptible by other natural medicines,[9] that he understood all kind of creatures by their voices. For being on a time sitting at dinner

A bishop understood all kind of creatures' voices.

The brain is the organ of understanding.

---

1 listed desired, wanted.

2 For I heard it told while I was in the university … in her cat's likeness The precise episode is difficult to pinpoint but the elements of the anecdote are common in accounts of witchcraft trials in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The injuring or wounding of a suspicious cat or some other animal and then finding a wound of similar size and shape on the accused witch turns up in a number of the different accounts. See Rosen, Witchcraft in England, 1558-1618, p. 95.

3 'there be more maids than Malkin' i.e., "there are more unmarried girls than Malkin (a common girl's name in the period, a familiar diminutive of Matilda or Maude)"; thus, "there's more than one available girl" (Tilley M39).

4 natural cats as opposed to the supernatural variety—witches' familiars or the witch herself transformed into a cat.

5 juggling trickery, deception.

6 sensible capable of feeling or perceiving.

7 the consideration thereof moved Pythagoras … in his former body Pythagoras (fl. c. 530 BCE), the Greek philosopher who taught that souls transmigrated between animal and man in a process of purification through reincarnation, with each soul rising (or sinking) to its appropriate level.

8 marking observing, watching.

9 For he found the means … through magic natural so to subtiliate his sensible powers … by other natural medicines According to Rosen, "natural magic ... was thought of as the working of secret correspondences in the nature of things to produce automatic results not understood by the science of the day, but accepted as scientific," such as medicine, wherein an illness would respond to a particular herb which resembled in some way a symptom of the illness (Witchcraft in England, 1558-1618, p. 4). Here, the bishop uses unnamed herbs, taking them in the form of dry drinks (medicinal potions made out of herbs and other natural elements which were thought naturally dry, according to the traditional method of classifying the properties of in a house among his friends, he harkened diligently to a sparrow that came fleeing[1] and chirping to other that were about the house, and smiled to himself to hear her. And when one of the company desired to know why he smiled, he said 'At the sparrow's tale. For she telleth them,' quod he, 'that in the highway, not a quarter of a mile hence, a sack of wheat is even now fallen off a horseback and broken, and all the wheat run out, and therefore biddeth them come thither to dinner.' And when the guests, musing[2] hereat, sent to prove the truth, they found it even so as he had told them."

A sparrow called her fellows to a banquet.

When this tale was ended, the clock struck nine; whereupon old Thomas, because he had far to his lodging, took his leave and departed. The rest of the company got them also either to their business or to their beds. And I went straight to my chamber (before remembered) and took a book in my hand to have studied, but the remembrance of this former talk so troubled me that I could think of nothing else, but mused still and, as it were, examined more narrowly what every man had spoken.

Master Streamer is always given much to study.

THE SECOND PART OF MASTER STREAMER'S ORATION

Ere I had been long in this contemplation, the cats, whose crying the night before had been occasion of all that which I have told you, were assembled again in the leads which I spoke of, where the dead men's quarters were set up; and after the same sort[3] as they did the night before, one sang in one tune, another in another, even such another service as my lord's chapel upon the scaffold sang before the King.[4] They observed no musical chords, neither diatesseron, diapente, nor diapason;[5] and yet I ween[6] I lie, for one cat, groaning as a bear doth when dogs be let slip to him,[7] trolled out so low and so loud a bass that, in comparison of another cat which, crying like a young child, squealed out the shrieking treble, it might be well counted a double diapason.[8] Wherefore, to the intent I might perceive the better the cause of their assembly, and by their gestures perceive part of their meaning, I went softly and fair[9] into a chamber which hath a window into the same leads,[10] and in the dark

Cats assembled in the leads.

Cats have sundry voices.

The diligence of the author to understand all things.

---

animals, vegetables and minerals in terms of their relative levels of heat, coldness, dryness, and moistness) and fumes (such dry herbs or other natural elements could not simply be put together in a potion and drunk, but could also be burned and the resulting fumes inhaled or otherwise absorbed by the body), in order to subtiliate (refine or purify) his sensible powers (the abilities of his five senses). Streamer also speculates that the bishop may be aiming at using other natural medicines to augment his intellectual and perceptive powers ("the brains of his power perceptible"). On the classification of natural elements in terms of Galenic medicine, see C. Rawcliffe, Medicine and Society in Later Medieval England (Phoenix Mill, 1995, pp. 53-54).

1 fleeing i.e., flying.

2 musing wondering or marvelling.

3 after the same sort in the same way.

4 even such another service as my lord's chapel upon the scaffold sang before the King "probably a reference to a company of choristers kept by some great nobleman" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 64); scaffold stage or platform for performance.

5 no musical chords, neither diatesseron, diapente, nor diapason "musical intervals of a fourth, a fifth, and an octave, respectively" (ibid., p. 64).

6 ween think, suppose, believe.

7 groaning as a bear doth when dogs be let slip to him The Tudor sport of bear-baiting involved tying a bear to a stake and setting dogs upon it; let slip unleashed.

8 double diapason "probably two-part harmony of base and treble (not in OED)" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 64).

9 fair gently or quietly, without haste.

10 a window into the same leads possibly an attic window set into the roof.

standing closely,[1] I viewed through the trellis,[2] as well as I could, all their gestures and behaviour.

And I promise you it was a thing worth the marking to see what countenances,[3] what becks,[4] yea and what order[5] was among them. For one cat, which was a mighty big one, grey-haired, bristle-bearded, and having broad eyes which shone and sparkled like two stars, sat in the midst, and on either side of her sat another. And before her stood three more, whereof one mewed continually, save when the great cat groaned. And ever when the great cat had done, this mewing cat began again, first stretching out her neck and, as it were, making 'beisance[6] to them which sat. And oftentimes, in the midst of this cat's mewing, all the rest would suddenly each one in his tune bray[7] forth and incontinently[8] hush again, as it were laughing at somewhat which they heard the other cat declare. And after this sort I beheld them from ten till it was twelve o'clock, at which time, whether it were some vessel in the kitchen under or some board in the printing house hard by I cannot tell, but somewhat fell with such a noise that all the cats got them up upon the house; and I, fearing lest any arose to see what was fallen they would charge me with the hurling down of it if they found me there, I whipped into my chamber quickly and, finding my lamp still burning, I set me down upon my bed and devised[10] upon the doings of these cats, casting[11] all manner of ways what might be conjectured thereof to know what they meant.

Cats keep order among themselves.

Cats make courtesy with their necks and tails.

Note here the painfulness[9] of the author.

The good housewife's candle never goeth out.

And by and by I deemed that the grey cat which sat in the midst was the chief and sat as judge among the rest, and that the cat which continually mewed declared some matter or made account to her of somewhat. By means whereof I was straight caught with such a desire to know what she had said that I could not sleep of all that night, but lay devising by what means I might learn to understand them. And calling to mind that I had read in Albertus Magnus' works a way how to be able to understand birds' voices, I made no more to do, but sought in my library for the little book entitled De Virtutibus Animalium, etc., and greedily read it over. And when I came to "Si vis voces avium intelligere, etc.,"[12] Lord how glad I was. And when I had thoroughly marked the description of the medicine, and considered with myself the nature and power of everything therein and how and upon what it wrought,[13] I devised thereby how, with part of those things and additions of other of like virtue and operation, to make a philter[14] for to serve my purpose.

Earnest desire banisheth sleep.

Albertus Magnus teacheth many wonders.

A philosopher searcheth the nature of all things.

---

1 closely secretly.

2 trellis window screen.

3 countenances behaviour, conduct.

4 becks mute gestures, indicating assent or notifying another of a command; sometimes a gesture of salutation or respect.

5 order i.e., specifically what ranks, classes or other social divisions existed among them.

6 'beisance i.e., obeisance; a gesture of respect, such as a bow or curtsey.

7 bray cry out loudly and harshly.

8 incontinently immediately.

9 painfulness the quality of being painstaking, laborious, or careful.

10 devised meditated, deliberated.

11 casting considering, pondering.

12 Albertus Magnus' works ... "Si vis voces avium intelligere, etc." from Albertus Magnus's Liber Secretorum de Virtutibus Herbarum Lapidum et Animalium ...; Streamer translates the section to which he refers, below. See p. 241, note 9; p. 249, note 12.

13 wrought worked, operated.

14 philter here, a magical potion.

A description of the resurrection of the sun.

And as soon as restless Phoebus was come up out of the smoking sea and, with shaking his golden-coloured beams which were all the night long in Thetis'[1] moist bosom, had dropped off his silver sweat into Hera's dry lap,[2] and kissing fair Aurora with glowing mouth had driven from her the advouterer[3] Lucifer,[4] and was mounted so high to look upon Europa[5] that, for all the height of Mile-End steeple,[6] he spied me through the glass window lying upon my bed, up I arose and got me abroad to seek for such things as might serve for the earnest business which I went about.

Nothing may be hid from friends.

How to understand birds.

And because you be all my friends that are here I will hide nothing from you, but declare from point to point how I behaved myself both in making and taking my philter. "If thou wilt understand," sayeth Albert, "the voices of birds or of beasts, take two in thy company, and upon Simon and Jude's day early in the morning, get thee with hounds into a certain wood, and the first beast that thou meetest take, and prepare with the heart of a fox, and thou shalt have thy purpose; and whosoever thou kissest shall understand them as well as thyself."

Men and dogs 'fraid out of their wits in proving an experiment.

An hedgehog is one of the planetical beasts, and therefore good in magic.[9]

Medicine for the gout.

Because his writing here is doubtful,[7] because he sayeth "quoddam nemus," a certain wood, and because I knew three men not many years past which, while they went about this hunting were so 'fraid, whether with an evil spirit or with their own imagination I cannot tell, but home they came with their hair standing on end, and some of them have been the worse ever since, and their hounds likewise; and seeing it was so long to St. Jude's Day,[8] therefore I determined not to hunt at all. But conjecturing that the beast which they should take was an hedgehog (which at that time of the year goeth most abroad), and knowing by reason that the flesh thereof was by nature full of natural heat—and therefore, the principal parts being eaten, must needs expulse gross matters and subtile[10] the brain (as by the like power it engendreth fine blood and helpeth much both against the gout and the cramp)—I got me forth towards St. John's Wood,[11] whereas not two days before I had seen one. And see the lucky and unlucky chance! By the way as I went I met with hunters who had that morning killed a fox and three hares, who (I thank them) gave me an hare and the fox's whole body (except the case[12]) and six smart lashes with a slip,[13] because (wherein I did mean no harm) I asked them if they had seen anywhere a hedgehog that morning.

The liberality of hunters.

Superstitious hunters are kin to the papists.

And here, save that my tale is otherwise long, I would show you my mind of these wicked, superstitious observations of foolish hunters, for they be like (as me seemeth) to

---

1 Thetis one of the Greek sea goddesses, daughter of Nereus and Doris; thus, the sea itself.

2 Hera's dry lap "Streamer apparently means the earth, though Hera, as wife of Zeus, is queen of the heavens, and fruitful rather than dry (barren)" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 64).

3 advouterer adulterer, presumably because Aurora, the goddess of the dawn, is more properly the consort of Phoebus, the sun god, than of Lucifer, the morning star.

4 As soon as restless Phoebus … Lucifer Streamer's pompous imitation of classical epics and their descriptions of the rising sun. See Homer, Virgil, and Chaucer, The Franklin's Tale, V, 1016-18 (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 64).

5 Europa Europe.

6 Mile-End steeple "located approximately a mile outside Aldgate, the eastern gate of London; Aldersgate, where Streamer is, lies to the north-west of Aldgate" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 65).

7 doubtful ambiguous.

8 St. Jude's Day "28 October—Streamer prepared his philter about 11 June" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 65).

9 An hedgehog … magic Ringler and Flachmann found no connection "between the hedgehog and any planet" (p. 65).

10 subtile rarefy, purify.

11 St. John's Wood "northwest of Aldersgate, outside the city walls, near Islington" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 65).

12 case skin, hide.

13 slip "leash, used as a whip" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 65).

the papists, which for speaking of good and true words punish good and honest men. Are not apes, owls, cuckoos, bears, and urchins[1] God's good creatures? Why, then, is it not lawful to name them? If they say it bringeth ill luck in the game,[2] then are they unlucky, idolatrical, miscreant infidels and have no true belief in God's providence. I beshrew[3] their superstitious hearts, for my buttocks did bear the burden of their mischief.

All creatures are good.

To observe times, days, or words argueth infidelity.

And yet I thank them again for the fox and the hare which they gave me; for with the two hounds at my girdle[4] I went a-hunting, till indeed under an hedge in a hole of the earth by the root of an hollow tree I found an hedgehog with a bushel of crabs[5] about him, whom I killed straight with my knife, saying "Shavol swashmeth, gorgona Iiscud," and with the other beasts, hung him at my girdle, and came homeward as fast as I could hie.[7] But when I came in the close besides Islington, commonly called St. John's Field, a kite,[8] belike very hungry, spied at my back the skinless fox, and thinking to have a morsel strake at it, and that so eagerly that one of his claws was entered so deep that, before he could loose it, I drew out my knife and killed him, saying "Javol sheleg hutotheca Iiscud,"[9] and to make up the mess[10] brought him home with the rest.

He that seeketh findeth.[6]

Albertus sayeth if a man when he prepareth any medicine tell aloud why he maketh it, it will be of more force.

[...]

Then took I the galls[11] of all these beasts, and the kite's toe, and served them likewise, keeping the liquor[12] that dropped from them. At twelve of the clock, what time the sun began his planetical dominion,[13] I went to dinner. But meat I ate none, save the boiled urchin; my bread was the cake mentioned before; my drink was the distillation of the urchin's broth, which was exceeding strong and pleasant both in taste and savour.

Master Streamer varieth from the astronomers in his planet hours.

---

1 urchins hedgehogs; Ringler and Flachmann note that Scot, Nashe, and Shakespeare associate hedgehogs with fairies (p. 65).

2 game hunt, chase.

3 beshrew curse, blame greatly.

4 girdle a belt worn round the waist to secure or confine garments; also employed as a means of carrying light articles, especially a weapon or purse.

5 crabs i.e., crab apples.

6 He that seeketh findeth Matthew 7:8. Proverb, "He that seeks finds" (Tilley S213).

7 hie hurry.

8 kite a bird of prey.

9 Shavol swashmeth, gorgona Iiscud ... Iiscud according to Ringler and Flachmann, not in Albertus's Liber Secretorum.

10 mess a prepared dish (of a specified kind of food).

11 galls the gallbladders.

12 liquor liquid.

13 planetical dominion Most of the ideas which underlie Streamer's comments about the sun, moon, and Mercury in these next paragraphs, come from Albertus Magnus's Discourse of the Nature and Qualities of the Seven Planets (appended to his Liber Secretorum). In this treatise, Albertus advises that "every true act must be done under his planet; and it is better if it be done in the proper day of the planet, and in his own proper hour, as for an example ... under Mercury, loss, debt, fear." As Ringler and Flachmann note, Streamer had only partially read Albertus's instructions, and certainly did not understand them, since he proceeds to get a great deal wrong, particularly when he assumes solar or "clock" hours are the same as planetary hours in Albertus's scheme. As a result he is also mistaken when he talks of the dominant times of the sun and Mercury, which accounts for G.B.'s sly remark in the margin. As Ringler and Flachmann conclude, Streamer's errors suggest "he knew a few terms, but was entirely confused about both astronomical and astrological systems. He attempts to parade his learning, but instead reveals his ignorance." For a detailed account of Albertus's scheme and Streamer's ignorant variations from it, see Ringler and Flachmann, pp. 66-67. On the relationship between astrology and the preparation of medicines, see Rawcliffe, Medicine and Society in Later Medieval England, pp. 98-99.

The intelligible diet.

After that I had dined well, my head waxed[1] so heavy that I could not choose but sleep. And after that I waked again, which was within an hour. My mouth and my nose purged exceedingly such yellow, white, and tawny matters as I never saw before, nor thought that any such had been in man's body. When a pint of this gear[2] was come forth my rheum[3] ceased, and my head and all my body was in exceeding good temper, and a thousand things which I had not thought of in twenty years before came so freshly to my mind as if they had been then presently done, heard, or seen. Whereby I perceived that my brain (chiefly the nuke memorative[5]) was marvellously well purged. My imagination also was so fresh that by and by I could show a probable reason what, and in what sort, and upon what matter, everything which I had taken wrought, and the cause why.

There be many strange humours in many men's heads.
The remembrance lieth in the noodle[4] of the head.

A good philosopher.

[...]

Mercury furthereth all fine and subtle practices.[7]

And at six o'clock at night, what time the sun's dominion began again,[6] I supped with the rest of the meat which I left at dinner. And when Mercury's reign approached, which was within two hours after, I drank a great draught of my stilled water,[8] and anointed my head all over with the wine and oil before described, and with the water which came out of the galls I washed mine eyes. And because no humours should ascend into my head by evaporation of my reins through the chine bone,[9] I took an ounce of Alkakengi[10] in powder, which I had for a like purpose not two days afore bought at the 'pothecaries,[11] and therewith rubbed and chafed my back from the neck down to the middle, and heated in a frying pan my pillows[12] afresh, and laid them to mine ears, and tied a kercher[13] about my head, and with my lozenges and trochisks[14] in a box, I went out among the servants [...] I took a lozenge in my mouth and kept it under my tongue [...] While this pastime endured, methought I heard one cry with a loud voice, "What Isegrim, what Isegrim";[15] and there-

The chiefest point of wisdom is to prevent inconveniencies.

Heat augmenteth the virtue of outward plasters.

---

1 waxed grew, gradually became.

2 gear corrupt and foul matter; pus (although OED records first instance in 1562).

3 rheum watery matter secreted by the mucus glands or membranes (into the nose, eyes, mouth, etc); when abnormal, rheums were supposed to cause or indicate disease.

4 noodle i.e., noddle, the back of the head.

5 nuke memorative The "nuke" is the nape of the neck, and "the seat of memory was supposed to be in the back part of the brain" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 67). In late medieval anatomy texts, the brain is represented as having separate chambers for each faculty.

6 sun's dominion began again Ringler and Flachmann point out that according to Albertus's scheme "if the Sun was dominant at noon, it would not become dominant again until the second hour of the night, which would be eight o'clock according to Streamer's improper method of equating solar and planetary time" (p. 67).

7 Mercury furthereth all fine and subtle practices The god and thus the planet named after him were both thought characterized by craftiness, deceitful trickery, and subtle schemes.

8 great draught of my stilled water "draught": the quantity of drink swallowed at one "pull" or gulp; "stilled": i.e., distilled.

9 no humours should ascend into my head by evaporation of my reins through the chine bone "chine bone": the vertebral column, the spine, the backbone; "evaporation of my reins": excretions from my kidneys.

10 Alkakengi variation of Alkekengi: a plant also called winter-cherry from its ornamental scarlet fruit.

11 'pothecaries i.e., apothecary's: one who prepared and sold drugs for medicinal purposes.

12 pillows pads of cloth which Streamer has soaked in his medicinal concoction, as a method of delivering the mixture into his ears.

13 kercher a cloth used to cover the head, formerly a woman's headdress.

14 trochisks medicated tablets or disks (pastilles or lozenges).

15 Isegrim an appellation applied, after the manner of a proper name, to the wolf; rare in English use.

fore I asked whose name was Isegrim, saying that one did call him. But they said they knew none of that name, nor heard any that did call. "No," quod I (for it called still), "Hear you nobody? Who is that called so loud?"

"We hear nothing but a cat," quod they, "which meweth above in the leads."

Good success of things maketh men joyous. Saturn is a cold, old planet.

When I saw it was so indeed, and that I understood what the cat said, glad was I as any man alive. And taking my leave of them as though I would to bed straight, I went into my chamber (for it was past nine of the clock). And because the hour of Saturnus' cold dominion[1] approached, I put on my gown and got me privily[2] to the place in the which I had viewed the cats the night before. And when I had settled myself where I might conveniently hear and see all things done in the leads where this cat cried still for Isegrim, I put into my two nostrils two trochisks and into my mouth two lozenges, one above my tongue the other under; and put off my left shoe, because of Jupiter's appropinquation;[3] and laid the fox tail under my foot.[4] And to hear the better, I took off my pillows which stopped mine ears; and then listened and viewed as attentively as I could.

There is great cunning in due applying of medicines.

The cause of hearing.

But I warrant you the pellicle, or filmy rime, that lyeth within the bottom of mine ear hole, from whence little veins carry the sounds to the senses,[5] was with this medicine in my pillows so purged and parched, or at least dried, that the least moving of the air, whether struck with breath of living creatures, which we call voices, or with the moving of dead (as winds, waters, trees, carts, falling of stones, etc.), which are named noises, sounded so shrill in my head by reverberation of my 'fined films,[6] that the sound of them altogether was so disordered and monstrous that I could discern no one from other, save only the harmony of the moving of the spheres,[7] which noise excelled all other as much both in pleasance

The difference between voices and noises.

The harmony of Heaven excelleth all other.

---

[1] the hour of Saturnus' cold dominion according to Ringler and Flachmann, one of Streamer's correct astrological calculations based on Albertus's treatise. See p. 256, note 13.

[2] privily stealthily, craftily.

[3] put off my left shoe, because of Jupiter's appropinquation again, a reference to Streamer's astrological calculations, correct here (according to Ringler and Flachmann, p. 67). The correctness of the calculation is undermined by Baldwin's sly presentation of Streamer's absurd methods of taking his medicines under Jupiter's appropinquation or approach. Clearly aimed at increasing the potency of the medication itself, these methods (as G.B.'s sardonic marginal note indicates) only serve to make Streamer appear ridiculous.

[4] laid the fox tail under my foot The source of this superstitious practice remains a mystery, although traditionally the fox-tail is one of the accoutrements of the professional fool or jester (see Brewer's Dict. Phrase and Fable, 1894).

[5] the pellicle … the senses Streamer's explanation of the anatomy of the ear and the way the medicine in the pads has essentially cleared them out so that his hearing is preternaturally sensitive is essentially accurate for the period. A "pellicle" is more usually defined as a membrane, cuticle or thin skin, but it can also be a thin substance (rime) covering another surface. According to Thomas Vicary, the ear has "sinews that are the Organs or Instruments of hearing, [which] spring each from the Brain, from whence the seven pairs of sinews do spring" (The Anatomy of the Body of Man, 1548; ed. F.J. Furnivall et al. [Oxford, 1888], p. 38). Each sinew has a "teat" which receives sound and conveys it to the other senses.

[6] 'fined refined, rendered especially sensitive; films membranes.

[7] harmony of the moving of the spheres In Renaissance cosmology (derived largely from Aristotle and Ptolemy) the heavens were represented as orderly, eternal, and unchanging, while the earth was disordered, fallen, finite, and mutable. The heavens were arranged as series of concentric spheres, with earth at the centre; outward from the earth, one would encounter the spheres of water, air, fire, the moon (which marked the boundary between the perfection of the heavens and the fallen nature of the earth), and finally the aether. Seven spheres were reserved for the planets, and one each for the fixed stars or firmament, the crystalline sphere and finally the Primum Mobile, the outermost sphere which gives motion to all the others. God existed above and beyond these spheres. Although Aristotle objected that the spheres moved soundlessly, according to Pythagoras, the friction between the spheres leads each to give off a particular note, thus producing the "music of the spheres" that Streamer refers to. This music was believed normally inaudible to human hearing. See Rivers, Classical and Christian Ideas in English Renaissance Poetry: A Student's Guide, 2nd ed. (London, 1996), pp. 68-87.

and shrill highness of sound as the Zodiac[1] itself surmounteth all other creatures in altitude of place. For in comparison of the basest of this noise, which is the moving of Saturn by means of his large compass,[2] the highest voices of birds and the straitest whistling of the wind, or any other organ pipes whose sounds I heard confused together, appeared but a low bass. And yet was those an high treble to the voice of beasts, to which as a mean the running of rivers was a tenor; and the boiling of the sea and the cataracts or gulfs thereof a goodly bass; and the rushing, brising,[3] and falling of the clouds a deep diapason.[4]

The harmony of elemental mixtures.

While I harkened to this broil,[5] labouring to discern both voices and noises asunder, I heard such a mixture as I think was never in Chaucer's House of Fame;[6] for there was nothing within an hundred mile of me done on any side (for from so far, but no farther, the air may come because of obliquation[7]) but I heard it as well as if I had been by it, and could discern all voices, but by means of noises understand none. Lord what ado women made in their beds—some scolding; some laughing; some weeping; some singing to their sucking children, which made a woeful noise with their continual crying. And one shrewd[8] wife a great way off (I think at St. Albans[10]) called her husband "cuckold" so loud and shrilly that I heard that plain; and would fain have heard the rest, but could not by no means for barking of dogs, grunting of hogs, wawling of cats, rumbling of rats, gaggling of geese, humming of bees, rousing of bucks, gaggling of ducks, singing of swans, ringing of pans, crowing of cocks, sewing of socks, cackling of hens, scrabbling of pens, peeping of mice, trulling[12] of dice, curling[13] of frogs, and toads in the bogs, chirking of crickets, shutting of Chaucer's House of Fame.

At every hundred mile the air reflecteth by means of the roundness of the world.

The cart and cucking stool groveth for such.[9]

Here the poetical fury[11] came upon him. Many noises in the night which all men hear not.

---

1 Zodiac the astrological organization of the sky into twelve houses, and seven planets, the arrangement of which at birth and at other crucial points in life, could govern the health and constitution of a person's body, the formation of his/her character, and the prospects of his/her career.

2 the moving of Saturn by means of his large compass The planet Saturn is, in terms of the cosmology discussed above (p. 258, note 7), moving in the sphere which is farthest away from the earth, and thus is situated in the largest of the planetary spheres; its size made it seem likely that it would have a deep and thunderous musical note (Rivers, Classical and Christian Ideas, pp. 78-79).

3 brising crushing.

4 deep diapason See p. 253, note 8.

5 broil confused disturbance or tumult.

6 Chaucer's House of Fame In the poem of the same name, Chaucer has a dream wherein he visits the House of Fame as the guest of Jupiter who wants to reward the poet for all his services to literature and especially love poetry; there, the poet encounters a press of people, including some thousands of famous musicians playing music on a bewildering variety of instruments, rich ladies and gentlemen, and famous authors; because the House of Fame is so high in the heavens, each noise made on earth is heard there greatly magnified. See Book II, ll.711-852.

7 obliquation a bending aside or in an oblique direction; a twisting awry.

8 shrewd shrewish.

9 The cart and cucking stool groveth for such The "cart" (used for the public exposure and punishment of various offenders, but especially lewd and uncontrollable women) and the "cucking stool" (a chair in which the offender was fastened and exposed to the jeers of bystanders, or conveyed to a pond or river and dunked) were traditional punishments for the obstinate woman or shrewish wife in Renaissance England; groveth means "comes into existence" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 69).

10 St. Albans a town in Hertfordshire, 21 miles north of London.

11 fury inspired frenzy of one possessed by a god; often applied to poets and the source or inspiration of their work in the period (cf. Sidney, Defence of Poesy, pp. 716-19).

12 trulling throwing.

13 curling calling, rumbling.

wickets,[1] shriking[2] of owls, flittering of fowls, routing[3] of knaves, snorting[4] of slaves, farting of churls, fizzling[5] of girls, with many things else—as ringing of bells, counting of coins, mounting of groins, whispering of lovers, springling of plovers,[6] groaning and spewing, baking and brewing, scratching and rubbing, watching and shrugging—with such a sort of commixed noises as would a-deaf anybody to have heard; much more me, seeing that the pannicles[7] of mine ears were with my medicine made so fine and stiff, and that by the temperate heat of the things therein, that like a tabor[8] dried before the fire or else a lute string by heat shrunk nearer, they were incomparably amended in receiving and yielding the shrillness of any touching sounds.

Over much noise maketh one deaf.

Heat shrilleth all moist instruments.

While I was earnestly harkening, as I said, to hear the woman, minding nothing else, the greatest bell in St. Botolph's steeple, which is hard by,[9] was tolled for some rich body that then lay in passing,[10] the sound whereof came with such a rumble into mine ear that I thought all the devils in Hell had broken loose and were come about me, and was so afraid therewith that, when I felt the foxtail under my foot (which through fear I had forgot), I deemed it had been the Devil indeed. And therefore I cried out as loud as ever I could, "The Devil, the Devil, the Devil!" But when some of the folks, raised with my noise, had sought me in my chamber and found me not there, they went seeking about, calling one to another, "Where is he? Where is he? I cannot find Master Streamer." Which noise and stir of them was so great in mine ears and passing man's common sound, that I thought they had been devils indeed which sought and asked for me.

All sudden things astonish us.

Fertilitas sibi ipsi nocus.[11]

Wherefore I crept close into a corner in the chimney and hid me, saying many good prayers to save me from them. And because their noise was so terrible that I could not abide it, I thought best to stop mine ears, thinking thereby I should be the less afraid. And as I was thereabout, a crow, which belike was nodding asleep on the chimney top, fell down into the chimney over my head, whose flittering in the fall made such a noise that, when I felt his feet upon my head, I thought that the Devil had been come indeed and seized upon me. And when I cast up my hand to save me, and therewith touched him, he called me "knave" in his language, after such a sort that I swooned[13] for fear. And by that[14] I was come to myself again, he was flowen from me into the chamber roof, and there he sat all night.

Danger maketh men devout.

How evil haps[12] run together.

A man may die only by imagination of harm.

---

1 wicket a small door or gate made in, or placed beside, a large one.

2 shriking i.e., shrieking.

3 routing snoring; belching.

4 snorting snoring.

5 fizzling "fizzle": to break wind silently.

6 springling of plovers springing, or rising up of small birds.

7 pannicles membranes.

8 tabor small drum.

9 hard by close by.

10 St. Botolph's … in passing St. Botolph's church on the west side of Aldersgate street, about a mile east of the gate; the church bells were traditionally tolled for the passing of a parish's wealthy and respected members.

11 Fertilitas sibi ipsi nocus Latin, "fertility is harmful to itself."

12 evil haps bad or unlucky occurrences. Proverb, "One misfortune comes on the neck of another" (Tilley M1013); see also M1004, M1012, and Hamlet, 4.5.78-79 ("When sorrows come, they come not single spies, / But in battalions").

13 swooned fainted.

14 by that i.e., by the time.

Then took I my pillows to stop mine ears; for the rumble that the servants made I took for the devils, it was so great and shrill. And I had no sooner put them on, but by and by I heard it was the servants which sought for me, and that I was deceived through my clearness of hearing, for the bell which put me in all this fear (for which I never loved bells since) tolled still, and I perceived well enough what it was. And seeing that the servants would not leave calling and seeking till they found me, I went down to them and feigned that a cat had been in my chamber and 'fraid me. Whereupon they went to bed again, and I to mine old place.

We hate forever whatsoever hath harmed us.

THE THIRD PART OF MASTER STREAMER'S ORATION

By this time waning Cynthia, which the day before had filled her growing horns, was come upon our hemisphere and freshly yielded forth her brother's light, which the reverberation of Thetis' trembling face, now full by means of spring, had fully cast upon her,[1] whereof she must needs lose every day more and more, by means the neap abasing Thetis' swollen face would make her to cast beyond her those rades,[2] which before the full the spring had caused her to throw short—like as, with a crystal glass a man may, by the placing of it either high or low, so cast the sun or a candlelight upon any round glass of water that it shall make the light thereof both in waxing and waning to counterfeit the moon. For you shall understand—chiefly you, Master Willot, that are my lord's astronomer—that all our ancestors have failed in knowledge of natural causes; for it is not the moon that causeth the sea to ebb and flow, neither to neap and spring, but the neaping and springing of the sea is the cause of the moon's both waxing and waning. For the moonlight is nothing save the shining of the sun cast into the element[3] by opposition of the sea; as also the stars are nothing else but the sunlight reflected upon the face of rivers and cast upon the crystalline heaven,[4] which because rivers always keep like course, therefore are the stars always of one bigness. As for the course of the stars, from east to west is natural by means of the sun's like moving; but in that they ascend and descend (that is, sometime come northward and sometime go southward), that is caused also by the sun's being either on this side or on the other side his line like-nightical.[5] The like reason followeth for the poles[6] not moving, and that is

The description of the moon as full.

How to counterfeit the moon.

Astronomers are deceived.

The spring and neaping of the sea causeth the moon to wax and wane.

What the moon and stars be.

The sun's moving is cause of divers moving of the stars.

Why the poles do not move.

---

1 By this time waning Cynthia … had fully cast upon her Like his description of the sunrise, this description is pompous and "ostentatiously learned" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 69); Cynthia is one of the names of Diana, goddess of the moon and the hunt. Here, the moon has, the day before, achieved fullness (her horns have been filled); she is described as reflecting the light of her brother, the Sun, which has been reflected itself in the wavering surface of the sea (the trembling face of Thetis, one of the sea deities and here a personification of the sea itself). Streamer presents the moon as going through the portion of its cycle called the waning of the moon, where from being full it begins to wane, becoming smaller and smaller each day, in conjunction with the cycle of the tides. The moon is full during the time of the spring tide, "when the high water-level [of the sea] reaches its maximum after the full moon," and it begins to wane during the neap tide, "after the first and third quarters of the moon when the water level is lowest" (p. 69).

2 rades "radiations, rays (not in OED)" (ibid. p. 69).

3 element air.

4 crystalline heaven "Streamer confuses this with the firmament, the sphere of the fixed stars" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 69). See p. 258, note 7.

5 like-nightical a coined word, not in the OED; "Streamer's literal Englishing of 'equinoctial,'" which refers to the celestial or terrestrial equator (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 69).

6 poles i.e., the North and South poles.

the situation of those rivers or dead seas which cast[1] them and the roundness and egg-form of the firmament.[2] But to let this pass, which in my Book of Heaven and Hell[3] shall be plainly not only declared but both by reason and experience proved, I will come again to my matter.[4]

I take this book to be it that is entitled Of the Great Egg.

When Cynthia, I say, as following her brother's steps, had looked in at my chamber window and saw me neither in my bed nor at my book, she hied her apace[5] into the south, and at a little hole in the house roof peeped in and saw me where I was set to harken to the cats. And by this time all the cats which were there the night before were assembled with many other, only the great grey one excepted. Unto whom, as soon as he was come, all the rest did their 'beisance[6] as they did the night before. And when he was set, thus he began in his language (which I understood as well as if he had spoken English).

The man is studious. Light searcheth all things.

Good manners among cats.

"Ah my dear friends and fellows, you may say I have been a lingerer this night and that I have tarried long; but you must pardon me for I could come no sooner. For when this evening I went into an ambry[8] where was much good meat to steal my supper, there came a wench not thinking I had been there and clapped the lid down, by means whereof I have had much to do to get forth. Also, in the way as I came hither over the housetops, in a gutter were thieves breaking in at the window, who 'fraid me so that I lost my way and fell down into the street and had much to do to escape the dogs. But seeing that by the grace of Hagat and Heg I am now come, although I perceive by the tail of the Great Bear and by Alhabor,[9] which are now somewhat southward, that the fifth hour of our night approacheth; yet, seeing this is the last night of my charge[10] and that tomorrow I must again to my lord Cammoloch (at this all the cats spread along their tails and cried, 'Hagat and Heg save him'), go to now[11] good Mouse-slayer," quod he, "and that time which my misfortune hath lost, recover again by the briefness of thy talk."

The strange hap of Grisard.

Sweet meat must have sour sauce.[7]

Cats are afraid of thieves.

Hagat and Heg are witches which the cats do worship.

Cats are skilled in astronomy.

Cammoloch is chief prince among cats.

Gentleness becometh officers.

"I will, my lord," quod Mouse-slayer, which is the cat which as I told you stood before the great cat the night before continually mewing; who in her language, after that with her tail she had made courtesy,[12] shrunk in her neck and said, "Whereas by virtue of your commission from my lord Cammoloch (whose life Hagat and Heg defend), who by inheritance and our free election enjoyeth the empire of his traitorously murdered mother the goddess

Mouse-slayer telleth on her story.

Grimolochin is the same that was late called Grimalkin.

---

1 cast reflect.

2 the roundness and egg-form of the firmament In The Kalender of Shepherdes (1506) the world is compared to a round apple: "The elements which be in it composed, is closed with the first heaven like as the yolk of an egg is closed within the white of an egg" (quoted in Ringler and Flachmann, p. 70).

3 Book of Heaven and Hell like Of the Great Egg, an imaginary book (no Stationers' Register or STC entry).

4 For you shall understand—chiefly you, Master Willot, that are my lord's astronomer … I will come again to my matter Ringler and Flachmann comment that "Streamer reverses Ptolemaic astronomical theories with somewhat less success than Copernicus, who had not yet been heard of in England" (p. 69).

5 hied her apace hurried herself immediately.

6 'beisance i.e., obeisance.

7 Sweet meat must have sour sauce Proverb, "He deserves not the sweet that will not taste of the sour" (Tilley S1035). For related proverbs, see S1036, S1038, and H556.

8 ambry store-closet, pantry.

9 by the tail of the Great Bear and by Alhabor the Great Bear is the constellation Ursa Major (also known as the Big Dipper); Alhabor refers to "the dog star Sirius (Kalender of Shepherdes)" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 70).

10 charge commission; an office entrusted to one.

11 go to now an exhortation: "carry on, now!"

12 made courtesy bowed or made an obeisance in a ritual fashion.

Grimolochin, you his greffier[1] and chief counsellor, my lord Grisard,[2] with Isegrim[3] and Pol-noir[4] your assistants, upon a complaint put up in your high dais by that false accuser Catch-rat, who beareth me malice because I refused his lecherously offered delights, have caused me, in purging of myself before this honourable company, to declare my whole life since the blind days of my kitlinghood. You remember, I trust, how in the two nights passed I have declared my life for four years' space, wherein you perceive how I behaved me all that time.

She purgeth herself by declaring her life.

"Wherefore, to begin where I left last, ye shall understand that my lord and lady, whose lives I declared unto you last yesternight, left the city and went to dwell in the country, and carried me with them. And being there strange[5] I lost their house, and with Bird-hunt my mate, the gentlest in honest venery[6] that ever I met with, went to a town where he dwelt called Stratford—either Stony, upon Tine, or upon Avon,[7] I do not well remember which—where I dwelled half a year—and this was in the time when preachers had leave to speak against the mass, but it was not forbidden till half a year after.[8] In this time I saw nothing worthy to certify[9] my lord of, save this.

Mouse-slayer was by her mistress carried into the country.

Bird-hunt was Mouse-slayer's mate.

"My dame, with whom I dwelt, and her husband were both old, and therefore hard to be turned from their rooted belief which they had in the mass, which caused divers young folk, chiefly their sons and a learned kinsman of theirs, to be the more earnest to teach and persuade them. And when they had almost brought the matter to a good point,[11] I cannot tell how it chanced, but my dame's sight failed her, and she was so sick that she kept her bed two days. Wherefore she sent for the parish priest, her old ghostly father;[12] and when all were voided[13] the chamber save I and they two, she told him how sick she was and how blind, so that she could see nothing, and desired him to pray for her and give her good counsel. To whom he said thus, 'It is no marvel though you be sick and blind in body which suffer your soul willingly to be blinded. You send for me now, but why send you not for me when these new heretics teach you to leave the Catholic belief of Christ's flesh in the Old errors are hard to be removed.[10]

A sudden disease.

Cats are admitted to all secrets.
A jolly, persuading knave.

---

1 greffier registrar, clerk, or notary.

2 Grisard as an adjective = "greyish."

3 Isegrim See p. 257, note 15.

4 Pol-noir literally, "black head."

5 being there strange being unfamiliar or unacquainted with (the area).

6 honest venery "venery": the sport of hunting; here, more probably, the practice or pursuit of sexual pleasure; indulgence of sexual desire.

7 Stratford—either Stony, upon Tine, or upon Avon Stratford Stony is in Buckinghamshire; Stratford-upon-Tine is in Northumberland; Stratford-upon-Avon is in Warwickshire.

8 and this was in the time when preachers … till half a year after "Neither the government nor the church officially encouraged attacks on the Mass, but they were condoned. The number of pulpit attacks is unrecorded, but in 1547 five books and pamphlets were published against the mass, in 1548 twenty-three, and in 1549 three. The first Edwardian Act of Uniformity (2 & 3 Edw. VI, c. 1, 1549), which abolished the Latin mass and established the English Communion Service, passed both Houses of Parliament by 21 January, received royal assent on 14 March, but was not ordered into effect nationally until Whitsunday (9 June) 1549—though some parishes in London and elsewhere in England used the new Communion Service from early March onwards" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 70).

9 to certify to inform (with the added sense of guaranteeing the certainty/truth of the information).

10 Old errors are hard to be removed playing on the proverb, "Custom (use) is another (a second) nature" (Tilley C932).

11 good point good juncture; the precise moment for decision or action.

12 ghostly father a confessor or spiritual director.

13 voided absent from.

sacrament?'[1] 'Why sir,' quod she, 'I did send for you once, and when you came they posed[2] you so with Holy Writ[3] and saints' writings that you could say nothing but call them "heretics," and that they had made the New Testament themselves.'

Railing and slandering are the papists' Scriptures.

"'Yea,' quod he, 'but did I not bid you take heed then, and told you how God would plague you?' 'Yes, good sir,' quod she, 'you did, and now to my pain I find you too true a prophet. But I beseech you forgive me and pray to God for me, and whatsoever you will teach me, that will I believe unto the death.' 'Well,' quod he, 'God refuseth no sinners that will repent,[5] and therefore in any case believe that Christ's flesh, body, soul, and bone is as it was born of our Blessed Lady in the consecrated host, and see that therefore you worship it, pray, and offer to it. For by it any of your friends' souls may be brought out of Purgatory[6] (which these new heretics say is no place at all—but when their souls fry in it, they shall tell me another tale). And that you may know that all I say is true, and that the mass can deliver such as trust in it from all manner of sins, I will by and by[7] say you a mass that shall restore your sight and health.'

A true coal prophet.[4]

Ghostly counsel of a popish confessor.

No such persuasion as miracles chiefly in helping one from grief.

"Then took he out of his bosom a wafer cake[8] and called for wine. And then, shutting the door unto him, revised himself in a surplice,[10] and upon a table set before the bed he laid his porteous,[11] and thereout he said mass. And when he came to the elevation,[12] he lifted up the cake and said to my dame (which in two days afore saw nothing), 'Wipe thine eyes, thou sinful woman, and look upon thy Maker.' With that she lifted up herself and saw the cake, and had her sight and her health as well as ever she had before. When mass was done she thanked God and him exceedingly, and he gave charge that she should tell to no

Veritas quaerit angulos.[9]

A young knave made an old woman's maker.

---

[1] Christ's flesh in the sacrament the belief in transubstantiation. See p. 249, note 9 and p. 250, note 4.

[2] posed confused or perplexed (with questions about). As Ringler and Flachmann note, "the Reformers were shocked at the ignorance of some of the clergy. Bishop Hooper, on a visitation in 1551, found that half the clergy he examined could not repeat the Ten Commandments, and more than a tenth did not know where the Lord's Prayer appeared in the Bible" (p. 70). However, for a more balanced appraisal of the actual extent of clerical ignorance before the English Reformation, see C. Haigh, English Reformations: Religion, Politics, and Society under the Tudors (Oxford, 1993), pp. 40-44.

[3] Holy Writ the Bible.

[4] A true coal prophet not in OED; perhaps a "coal-black" or "evil" prophet.

[5] God refuseth no sinners that will repent Catholics believed that confession, contrition, and penance could reduce divine punishment for sin, while the reformers held that one could do nothing to win salvation, that it was a gift from God to the elect.

[6] Purgatory in Catholic doctine, that median place between Heaven and Hell, where the faithful pay the penalties for their forgiven sins, being purged before they can ascend to Heaven; Catholics believed that the prayers of the living could speed the departed souls through Purgatory.

[7] by and by immediately, at once.

[8] wafer cake the thin disk of unleavened bread used at the Eucharist in the Western Church before the Reformation, and subsequently in the rituals of Roman Catholics, Lutherans, and some Anglicans; the compound "wafer-cake" carries with it connotations of hostility and contempt, since it was the term which reformers used when challenging and dismissing the Catholic doctrines surrounding the Eucharist.

[9] Veritas quaerit angulos Latin, "truth seeks out corners."

[10] revised himself in a surplice "revised": dressed himself (not in OED); "surplice": a loose vestment of white linen having wide sleeves and, in the amplest form, reaching to the feet, worn (usually over a cassock) by clerics and others taking part in church services.

[11] porteous a portable breviary in the medieval church; a breviary is the book containing the "Divine office" for each day—consisting of psalms, collects, and lections or readings from Scripture and the lives of saints—which those who are in religious orders (i.e., priests, monks, etc.) are bound to recite.

[12] the elevation During the Roman Catholic mass, the consecrated host is lifted up so it may be adored by the congregation; once again, a practice thought idolatrous by the reformers.

young folks how she was holp,[1] for his bishop had throughout the diocese forbidden them to say or sing any mass, but commanded her that secretly unto old honest men and women she should at all times most devoutly rehearse[3] it. And by reason of this miracle, many are so confirmed in that belief that, although by a common law all masses upon penalty were since forbidden,[4] divers[5] have them privily and nightly said in their chambers until this day.

Old folk are lighter of credit than young.[2]

Cats hear many privy night masses.

"'Marry sir,' quod Pol-noir, 'this was either a mighty miracle or else a mischievous subtlety of a magistical[6] minister. But sure if the priest by magical art blinded her not afore, and so by like magical sorcery cured her again, it were as good for us to hire him or other priests at our delivery to sing a mass before our kitlings, that they might in their birth be delivered of their blindness.[7] And sure, if I knew the priest, it should scape me hard but I would have one litter of kitlings in some chamber where he useth now to say his privy night masses.' 'What need that?' quod Mouseslayer, 'it would do them no good. For I myself, upon like consideration, kittened since in another mistress's chamber of mine where a priest every day said mass; but my kitlings saw naught the better, but rather the worse.'

Sorcerers may make folk blind.

Why masses may serve well.

Devout kitlings that heard mass so young.

"But when I heard that the lord with whom I went into the country would to London to dwell again, I kept the house so well[8] for a month before that my lady when she went carried me with her. And when I was come to London again, I went in visitation to mine old acquaintance. And when I was great with kitling, because I would not be unpurveyed[9] of a place to kitten in, I got in favour and household with an old gentlewoman, a widow, with whom I passed out this whole year.

Flatters are diligent when they spy a profit.

"This woman got her living by boarding young gentlemen, for whom she kept always fair wenches in store, for whose sake she had the more resort.[10] And to tell you the truth of her trade, it was fine and crafty, and not so dangerous as deceitful. For when she had soaked from young gentlemen all that they had, then would she cast them off, except they fell to cheating. Wherefore many of them in the nighttime would go abroad and bring the next morning home with them sometimes money, sometime jewels (as rings or chains), sometime apparel; and sometime they would come again cursing their ill fortune, with nothing save peradventure dry blows or wet wounds. But whatsoever they brought, my dame would take it and find the means either so to gage[12] it that she would never fetch it again, or else melt it and sell it to the goldsmiths.

The trade of an old gentlewoman.

Whores, gaming, and good hostesses make many gentlemen make shameful shifts.

All is fish that cometh to the net.[11]

---

1 holp i.e., helped.

2 Old folk are lighter of credit than young i.e., the old are more gullible than the young.

3 rehearse repeat.

4 by a common law all masses upon penalty were since forbidden See p. 263, note 8.

5 divers here an indefinite numeral word expressing multiplicity, without committing the speaker to "many" or "few."

6 magistical not in OED; perhaps derived from "mage" meaning magician; or from "magic."

7 at our delivery to sing a mass before our kitlings … blindness Pol-noir suggests that the cat community should hire priests to say the mass while females give birth, since the old blind woman's experience offers the hope that the natural "blindness" of newborn kittens would be instantly remedied.

8 kept the house so well either she protected or guarded the house so well; or she stayed indoors, or confined herself to the house, often figuratively used to mean "stayed in the house for the purpose of guarding it."

9 unpurveyed unfurnished, unsupplied (with something).

10 resort access to.

11 All is fish that cometh to the net proverb, referring to people who turn all circumstances to their advantage or profit (Tilley A136).

12 gage pawn.

"And notwithstanding that she used these wicked practices, yet was she very holy and religious. And therefore, although that all images were forbidden,[1] yet kept she one of Our Lady in her coffer.[3] And every night, when everybody were gone to bed and none in her chamber but she and I, then would she fetch Her out, and set Her upon her cupboard, and light up two or three wax candles afore Her, and then kneel down to Her, sometime an whole hour, saying over her beads[4] and praying Her to be good unto her and to save her and all her guests both from danger and shame, and promising that then she would honour and serve Her during all her life.

A Catholic queen.[2]

Images cannot see to hear, except they have much light.

Our Lady is hired to play the bawd.[5]

"While I was with this woman I was always much cherished and made of, for on nights while she was a-praying, I would be playing with her beads and always catch them as she let them fall, and would sometime put my head in the compass of them and run away with them about my neck, whereat many times she took great pleasure, yea and so did Our Lady too. For my dame would say sometimes to Her, 'Yea, Blessed Lady, I know thou hearest me by thy smiling at my cat.'

Old women love their cats well.

The image laughed to see the cat play with her dame's beads.

"And never did my dame do me any hurt save once, and that I was even with her for; and that was thus. There was a gentleman, one of her boarders, much enamoured in the beauty of a merchantman's wife in the city, whom he could by no means persuade to satisfy his lust. Yea, when he made her great banquets, offered her rich apparel and all kind of jewels precious which commonly women delight in, yea and large sums of money which corrupt even the gods themselves, yet could he by no means alter her mind, so much she esteemed her good name and honesty. Wherefore, forced through desire of that which he could not but long for, and so much the more because it was most earnestly denied him, he broke[7] his mind to my dame, and entreated her to aid him to win this young woman's favour, and promised her for her labour whatsoever she would require.

Love is loiterers' occupation.

An honest wife.

Quid non mortalia pectora cogis, auri sacra fames?[6]

"Whereupon my dame, which was taken for as honest as any in the city, found the means to desire this young woman to a dinner. And against she should come,[9] my dame gave me a piece of pudding which she had filled full of mustard, which as soon as I had eaten wrought so in my head that it made mine eyes run all the day after; and to mend this she blew pepper in my nose to make me neese.[10] And when the young wife was come, after that my dame had showed her all the commodities of her house (for women delight much to show forth what they have), they set them down together at the table, none save only

All is not gold that glistereth.[8]

Mustard purgeth the head and pepper maketh one neese.

Women are glorious.

---

1 all images were forbidden The Royal Injunctions of 1547 ordered the removal of "abused" images (statues, crosses, and the like) from all churches; it was the injunction which caused the most popular opposition in that year at the parish-level.

2 A Catholic queen more often spelled "quean": harlot, strumpet, whore.

3 Our Lady in her coffer "Our Lady": Mary, the mother of Jesus Christ; "coffer": a strong box in which money or valuables were kept.

4 saying over her beads i.e., praying the Rosary, a Roman Catholic devotion dedicated to the Virgin Mary (Our Lady), which consists of a set number of "Hail Marys" and "Our Fathers"; the user keeps track of the number he or she has said by counting them out on a series of small perforated balls threaded on a string or chain. The reformers attacked the Rosary as another example of Roman Catholic idolatry and superstition.

5 bawd a procuress or madam.

6 Quid non mortalia pectora cogis, auri sacra fames? Latin, "To what dost thou not drive the hearts of men, O accursed hunger for gold!" (Virgil, Aeneid, 3.56-57).

7 broke revealed.

8 All is not gold that glistereth Proverb (Tilley A146).

9 against she should come i.e., in preparation or anticipation of her arrival.

10 neese i.e., sneeze.

they two. And while they were in gossips' talk about the behaviours of this woman and that, I came as I was accustomed and sat by my dame. And when the young woman, hearing me cough and seeing me weep continually, asked what I ailed, my dame, who had tears at her commandment, sighed and, fallen as it were into a sudden dump, brast[2] forth a-weeping and said: 'In faith, mistress, I think I am the infortunatest woman alive, upon whom God hath at once poured forth all his plagues. For my husband, the honestest man that lived, He hath taken from me; and with him mine heir and only son, the most towardly[3] young man that was alive; and yet, not satisfied herewith, lo here my only daughter, which (though I say it) was as fair a woman and as fortunately married as any in this city, He hath, for her honesty[4] or cruelty I cannot tell whether, turned into this likeness, wherein she hath been above this two months, continually weeping as you see and lamenting her miserable wretchedness.'[5]

Gossips' common chat.

Women can weep when they will.[1]

There is no deceit to the cheat of an old bawd.

A shameful lie shamefully set forth.

"'The young woman, astonished at this tale, and crediting it by means of my dame's lachrymable[6] protes[ta]tion and deep dissimulation, asked her the more earnestly how and by what chance, and for what cause as she thought, she was so altered. 'Ah,' quod my dame, 'as I said before, I cannot tell what I should think; whether excuse my daughter and accuse God, or else blame her and acquit Him. For this my daughter, being as I said fortunately married, and so beloved of her husband and loving again to him as now we both too late do and forever I think shall rue, was loved exceedingly of another young man, who made great suit and labour unto her. But she, as I think all women should, esteeming her honesty and promise made to her husband the day of their marriage, refused still his desire. But because he was importunate, she came at last and told me it. And I, thinking that I did well, charged her in any case (which full oft since I have repented) that she should not consent unto him, but to shake him off with shrewd words and threatening answers. She did so; alas, alas the while. And the young man, seeing none other boot,[9] went home and fell sick; and loving so honestly and secretly that he would make none other of his counsel, forpined[10] and languished upon his bed the space of three days, receiving neither meat nor drink. And then, perceiving his death to approach, he wrote a letter, which I have in my purse, and sent it by his boy to my daughter. If you can read you shall see it; I cannot, but my daughter here could very well, and write too.' Herewith my dame wept apace, and took the letter out of her purse and gave it this young woman, who read it in form following.

Tears move young minds lightly.

Women are orators by nature.[7]

All women ought above all things to esteem their honesty.[8]

Sharp words and threatening answers will soon cool adulterers.

It is as much pity to see a woman weep as to see a goose go barefoot.[11]

---

1 Women can weep when they will playing on the proverb, "Trust not a woman when she weeps" (Tilley W638) and "Women have tears of dissimulations as well as sorrow" (Tilley W701).

2 brast northern form of "burst."

3 towardly promising.

4 honesty chastity.

5 There are many sources for this "widely disseminated story of the weeping bitch ... but, as Holden pointed out, Baldwin's immediate source is 'The Fables of Alfonce,' No. 11, in William Caxton's Fables of Aesop (1483), where 'chienne' (bitch) is translated 'cat'"(Ringler and Flachmann, pp. 71-72).

6 lachrymable tearful.

7 Women are orators by nature Proverb, "Women are great talkers" (Tilley W701).

8 All women ought above all things to esteem their honesty cf. "She that loses her modesty and honesty has nothing else worth losing (never finds them again)" (Tilley M1033).

9 none other boot no other alternative.

10 forpined wasted, pined away.

11 It is as much pity to see a woman weep as to see a goose go barefoot Proverb (Tilley P365).

The Nameless Lover to the Nameless Beloved, in whose love, sith[1] he may not live, he only desireth license to die.

Cursed be the woeful time wherein mutual love first mixed the mass of my miserable carcass. Cursed be the hour that ever the fatal destinies have ought for me purveyed. Yea, cursed be the unhappy hour, may I say, in which I first saw those piercing eyes which, by insensible and unquenchable power inflaming my heart to desire, are so blind of all mercy as will rather with rigour consume my life than rue[2] my grief with one drop of pity. I sue not to you, my dear unloving love, for any kind of grace, the doubtful hope whereof despair hath long since with the pouring showers of cruel words utterly quenched. But thus much I desire, which also by right me thinketh my faithful love hath well deserved, that sith your fidelity in wedlock (which I can and must needs praise, as would to God I could not) will suffer my pined corpse no longer to retain the breath through cold cares wholly consumed, yet at the least, which is also an office of friendship before the gods meritorious, come visit him, who if ought might quench love should not love, whose mouth these three days hath taken no food, whose eyes the like time have taken no rest, whose heart this three weeks was never merry, whose mind these three months was never quiet, whose bed this seven nights was never made, and who (to be brief) is in all parts so enfeebled that living he dieth and dead awhile he liveth. And when this silly ghost[3] shall leave this cruel and miserable prison, in recompense of his love, life, and death, let those white and tender hands of yours close up those open windows[4] through which the uncomfortable light of your beauty shone first into his heart. If you refuse this to do, I beseech the gods immortal, to whom immediately I go, that as without any kind of either love or kindness you have caused me to die, so that none other caught with your beauty do likewise perish; I beseech (I say) the just gods that either they change that honest stony heart, or else disfigure that fair merciless favour.[5] Thus, for want of force either to endite[6] or write any more, I take my leave, desiring you either to come and see me die, or if I be dead before, to see me honestly buried.

Yours unregarded alive. G.S.[7]

A tender heart is easily pierced.

"When the young woman had read this letter, she took it again to my dame, and with much to do to withhold her swelling tears, she said, 'I am sorry for your heaviness,[8] much more for this poor man's, but most of all for your daughter's. But what did she after she saw this letter?' 'Ah,' quod my dame, 'she esteemed it as she did his suits before. She sent him a rough answer in writing; but or ever the boy came home with it, his master was dead.

Women's answers are never to seek.[9]

---

1 sith since.

2 rue pity, feel sorrow for.

3 silly deserving of pity, compassion or sympathy; ghost spirit.

4 those open windows i.e., his eyes.

5 favour face.

6 endite obsolete form of "indict," meaning "to condemn or reproach."

7 G.S. "the initials of the reporter, Gregory Streamer" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 73).

8 heaviness sorrow, grief.

9 Women's answers are never to seek Proverb, "A woman's answer is never to seek" (Tilley W670); cf. "A woman is never without an excuse" (W654).

Within two days after, my son-in-law (her husband) died suddenly. And within two days after, as she sat here with me lamenting his death, a voice cried aloud, "Ah, flinty heart, repent thy cruelty." And immediately (oh, extreme rigor!) she was changed as you now see her. Whereupon I gather that though God would have us keep our faith to our husbands, yet rather than any other should die for our sakes, we should not make any conscience[1] to save their lives. For it fareth[2] in this point as it doth in all other; for as all extremities are vices, so is it a vice, as appeareth plainly by the punishment of my daughter, to be too extreme in honesty, chastity, or any other kind of virtue.'

Note the craft of a bawd.

All extremities are to be forsaken.[3]

"'This, with other talk of my dame in the dinner time, so sank into the young woman's mind that the same afternoon she sent for the gentleman whom she had erst[5] so constantly refused and promised him that, if he would appoint her an unsuspected place, she would be glad to meet him to fulfill all his lust, which he appointed to be the next day at my dame's house. Where, when they were all assembled, I, minding to acquit my dame for giving me mustard, caught a quick[6] mouse, whereof my dame always was exceedingly afraid, and came with it under her clothes and there let it go, which immediately crope[7] up upon her leg. But Lord, how she bestirred her then; how she cried out; and how pale she looked. And I, to amend the matter, making as though I leaped at the mouse, all to-bescrat[8] her thighs and her belly, so that I dare say she was not whole again in two months after. And when the young woman, to whom she showed her pounced[9] thighs, said I was an unnatural daughter to deal so with my mother, 'Nay, nay,' quod she, 'I cannot blame her, for it was through my counsel that she suffered all this sorrow. And yet I dare say she did it against her will, thinking to have caught the mouse, which else I dare say would have crept into my belly.' By this means was this innocent woman, otherwise invincible, brought to consent to commit whoredom.

Evil communication confoundeth good virtues.[4]

Cats are malicious. Women are afraid of their own shadows. The cat payeth her dame for her mustard.

It is an unnatural child that will hurt the mother.

Let young women take heed of old bawds.

"Shortly after, this young woman begged me of my dame; and to her I went, and dwelled with her all that year. In which year, as all the cats in the parish can tell, I never disobeyed or transgressed our holy law in refusing the concupiscential[10] company of any cat nor the act of generation, although sometimes it were more painful to me than pleasant, if it were offered in due and convenient time. Indeed, I confess I refused Catch-rat, and bit him and scrat him, which our law forbiddeth. For on a time this year when I was great with kitlings, which he of a proud stomach refused to help to get,[11] although I earnestly wooed him thereto; what time he loved so much his own daughter Slick-skin that all other seemed

Cats have laws among them which they keep better than we do ours.

He that despiseth those that love him shall be despised of them that he loveth.

---

1 make any conscience "make it a matter of [any] conscience; have [any] scruples about"; "not allow scruples to prevent saving" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 73).

2 it fareth it happens, turns out.

3 All extremities are to be forsaken a variation on the proverb, "The golden mean [i.e., the middle path or way] is best" (Tilley M792).

4 Evil communication confoundeth good virtues Proverb, "Evil communications (words) corrupt good manners" (Tilley C558; cf. 1 Corinthians 15:33).

5 erst earlier.

6 quick living.

7 crope i.e., crept.

8 to-bescrat i.e., bescratch: covered with scratches, scratched all over.

9 pounced beaten or bruised.

10 concupiscential lustful.

11 to help to get to help conceive through sexual intercourse.

vile in his sight, which also esteemed him as much as he did the rest—that is, never a whit. In this time (I say) when I was great with kitling, I found him in a gutter eating a bat which he had caught that evening; and as you know not only we, but also women in our case, do oft long for many things, so I then longed for a piece of the reremouse,[1] and desired him, for saving of my kitten, to give me a morsel, though it were but of the leather-like wing. But he, like an unnatural, ravenous churl, eat it all up and would give me none. And as men do nowadays to their wives, he gave me bitter words, saying we longed for wantonness and not for any need. This grieved me so sore, chiefly for the lack of that I longed for, that I was sick two days after, and had not it been for good dame Isegrim, who brought me a piece of a mouse and made me believe it was of a back,[2] I had lost my burden by kittening ten days before my time.

Cats do long while they be with kitten.

There be churls among cats as well as among Christian folk.

It is the conceit of a thing and not the thing itself that is longed for.

"When I was recovered and went abroad again, about three days, this cruel churl met me and needs would have been doing[3] with me. To whom, when I had made answer according to his deserts, and told him withal, which he might see too by my belly what case I was in, tush, there was no remedy (I think he had eaten savoury[4]), but for all that I could say, he would have his will. I, seeing that, and that he would ravish me perforce,[5] I cried out for help as loud as ever I could squawl, and to defend myself till succour came I scrat and bit as hard as ever I could. And this notwithstanding, had not Isegrim and her son Lightfoot come the sooner (who both are here and can witness), he would have marred[6] me quite. Now, whether I might in this case refuse him, and do as I did without breach of our holy law, which forbiddeth us females to refuse any males not exceeding the number of ten in a night, judge you, my lords, to whom the interpretation of the laws belongeth.

Churls must be churlishly served.

Savoury is an hot herb provoking lust in cats.

A law for adultery among cats.

"'Yes, surely,' quod Grisard, 'for in the third year of the reign of Glascalon, at a court holden in Catwood, as appeareth in the records, they decreed upon that exception, forbidding any male in this case to force any female, and that upon great penalties. But to let this pass, whereof we were satisfied in your purgation the first night, tell us how you behaved you with your new mistress, and that as briefly as you can; for lo where Corleonis is almost plain west, whereby ye know the goblins' hour approacheth.'[7]

Glascalon was chief prince of the cats after Grimolochin.

After one o'clock at midnight the goblins go abroad, and as soon as any cock croweth, which is their hour, that is at three, they return homeward.

"After I was come to my young mistress," quod Mouse-slayer, "she made much of me, thinking that I had been my old dame's daughter, and many tales she told thereof to her gossips. My master also made much of me, because I would take meat in my foot and therewith put it in my mouth and feed. In this house dwelt an ungracious fellow who, delighting much in unhappy turns,[9] on a time took four walnut shells and filled them full of soft pitch, and put them upon my feet, and then put my feet into cold water till the pitch

Divers men delight in divers fond[8] things.
A cat was shoed.

---

1 reremouse bat.

2 back i.e., bat.

3 doing having sex.

4 savoury "the herb satureia, considered an aphrodisiac by Ovid (Ars Amatoria 2.415) and Martial (3.75.4)" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 73).

5 ravish me perforce seize upon me, or rape me forcibly, violently.

6 marred mangled, disfigured.

7 where Corleonis … goblins' hour approacheth according to Ringler and Flachmann, Corleonis is "a fixed star in the constellation Leo" (p. 73); in reference to the "goblins' hour," Ringler and Flachmann say that "the superstition is as old as the fourth century AD. Cf. Hamlet 1.1.152" (p. 73).

8 fond foolish.

9 turns tricks or practical jokes.

was hardened, and then he let me go. But Lord, how strange it was to me to go in shoes, and how they vexed me, for when I ran upon any steep thing they made me slide and fall down. Wherefore all that afternoon, for anger that I could not get off my shoes, I hid me in a corner of the garret which was boarded, under which my master and mistress lay. And at night when they were all in bed, I spied a mouse playing in the floor; and when I ran at her to catch her, my shoes made such a noise upon the boards that it waked my master, who was a man very fearful of spirits. And when he with his servants harkened well to the noise, which went pit-pat, pit-pat, as it had been the trampling of a horse, they waxed[2] all afraid and said surely it was the Devil.

Natural delight expelleth melancholy.

The fearful are always suspicious.[1]

"And as one of them, a hardy fellow (even he that had shoed me), came upstairs to see what it was, I went downward to meet him and made such a rattling that, when he saw my glistering eyes, he fell down backward and broke his head, crying out, 'The Devil, the Devil, the Devil.' Which his master and all the rest hearing, ran naked as they were into the street and cried the same cry.

Wickedness is a scourge itself to such as invent it.

"Whereupon the neighbours arose and called up, among other, an old priest, who lamented much the lack of holy water which they were forbidden to make.[3] Howbeit,[4] he went to church and took out of the font some of the christening water, and took his chalice and therein a wafer unconsecrate,[5] and put on a surplice, and his stole[6] about his neck, and fet[7] out of his chamber a piece of holy candle which he had kept two year. And herewith he came to the house, and with his candle-light in the one hand and a holy-water sprinkle[8] in the other hand, and his chalice and wafer in sight of his bosom, and a pot of font-water at his girdle, up he came praying towards the garret, and all the people after him.

Holy water was good for conjurers.

This fellow thought to beguile the Devil.

A conjurer can have no better apparel.

"And when I saw this, and thinking I should have seen some mass that night, as many nights before in other places I had, I ran towards them thinking to meet them. But when the priest heard me come, and by a glimpsing had seen me, down he fell upon them that were behind him, and with his chalice hurt one, with his water pot another, and his holy candle fell into another priest's breech beneath (who, while the rest were hawsoning[9] me, was conjuring[10] our maid at the stair foot) and all to-besinged[11] him, for he was so afraid

Cats hear mo[re] masses than all men hear of.

Priests have been good conjurers of such kind of spirits.

---

1 The fearful are always suspicious Cf. the proverb, "Who is in fault (guilty) suspects everybody" (Tilley F117).

2 waxed grew.

3 holy water which they were forbidden to make The Royal Injunctions of 1547 also forbade certain customary ceremonies of the Roman Catholic church, such as the blessing of water in preparation for its use in being poured or sprinkled over people and/or objects in a ritual blessing.

4 Howbeit nevertheless.

5 chalice and therein a wafer unconsecrate "chalice": the cup in which the wine is contained, consecrated, and then administered in the Roman Catholic celebration of the Eucharist or Lord's Supper; here, it is holding the wafer of unleavened bread; the bread is "unconsecrate," meaning that it has not yet been transformed through the sacrifice of the Eucharist into the body of Christ. See p. 249, note 9.

6 surplice, and his stole "surplice": see p. 264, note 10; "stole": a vestment consisting of a narrow strip of silk or linen, worn over the shoulders and hanging down to the knee or lower; often referred to as the vestment worn by a priest when he is engaged in exorcism or conjuration.

7 fet fetched.

8 holy-water sprinkle device for sprinkling holy water.

9 hawsoning "exorcizing" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 73); not in OED.

10 conjuring beseeching, imploring (Baldwin implies that the priest takes the opportunity to tempt the household's maid to sexual incontinence). But cf. p. 274, note 6.

11 to-besinged completely singed, burned.

with the noise of the rest which fell that he had not the power to put it out. When I saw all this business, down I ran among them where they lay on heaps. But such a fear as they were all in then I think was never seen afore; for the old priest, which was so tumbled among them that his face lay upon a boy's bare arse, which belike was fallen headlong under him, was so astonished that, when the boy, which for fear had beshit himself, had all to-rayed[1] his face, he neither felt nor smelt it, nor removed from him.

Fear taketh away the senses.

"Then went I to my dame, which lay among the rest God knoweth very madly, and so mewed and curled about her that at last she said, 'I ween[3] it be my cat.' That hearing the knave that had shoed me, and calling to mind that erst he had forgot, said it was so indeed and nothing else. That hearing the priest, in whose holy breech the holy candle all this while lay burning, he took heart a grace,[4] and before he was spied rose up and took the candle in his hand, and looked upon me and all the company, and fell a-laughing at the handsome lying of his fellow's face. The rest, hearing him, came every man to himself and arose and looked upon me, and cursed the knave which had shoed me, who would in no case be aknown of it. This done, they got hot water and dissolved the pitch and plucked off my shoes. And then every man (after they desired each other not to be aknown of this night's work) for shame departed to their lodgings, and all our household went to bed again."

A liar and a doer of shrewd turns ought to have a good memory.[2]

One hardy man encourageth many cowards.

Silence is the best friend that shame hath.

When all the cats, and I too for company, had laughed at this space, Mouse-slayer proceeded and said, "After this about three-quarters of a year, which was at Whitsuntide[5] last, I played another prank, and that was this. The gentleman, who by mine old dame's lying and my weeping was accepted and retained of my mistress, came often home to our house, and always in my master's absence was doing with my dame. Wherefore, desirous that my master might know it (for they spent his goods so lavishly between them that, notwithstanding his great trade of merchandise, they had, unweeting[6] to him, almost undone[7] him already), I sought how I might bewray[8] them. Which as hap would,[9] at the time remembered afore, came to pass thus. While this gentleman was doing with my dame, my master came in—so suddenly that he had no leisure to pluck up his hose,[11] but with them about his legs ran into a corner behind the painted cloth,[12] and there stood (I warrant you) as still as a mouse. As soon as my master came in, his wife, according to her old wont,[13] caught him about his neck and kissed him, and devised many means to have got him forth again. But he, being weary, sat down and called for his dinner. And when she saw there was none

The author laughed in a cat's voice.

Adulterers are diligent in waiting their times.

A wanton wife and a back door will soon make a rich man poor.[10]

Chance oftentimes betrayeth evil.

None seem outwardly so loving as whores.

---

1 to-rayed completely soiled.

2 A liar and a doer of shrewd turns ought to have a good memory Proverb, "A liar should have a good memory" (Tilley L219).

3 ween think, believe.

4 he took heart a grace i.e., he plucked up his courage.

5 Whitsuntide Whit Sunday and the days immediately following it. Whit Sunday is the seventh Sunday after Easter, observed as a festival of the Christian Church in commemoration of the descent of the Holy Spirit upon the apostles on the day of Pentecost.

6 unweeting unknowing.

7 undone ruined.

8 bewray betray; expose (a person) by divulging a secret to his or her discredit.

9 as hap would i.e., as fortune willed it, as it chanced.

10 A wanton wife and a back door will soon make a rich man poor Proverb, "A nice wife and a back door do often make a rich man poor" (Tilley W370; cf. B21 and D48).

11 hose breeches, stockings, or leggings.

12 painted cloth a tapestry, a hanging for a room painted or worked with figures, mottoes, or texts.

13 wont custom, habit.

other remedy, she brought it him, which was a mess of potage[1] and a piece of beef, whereas she and her franion[3] had broke their fast with capons,[4] hot venison, marrow bones, and all other kind of dainties.

Sine Baccho et cetera friget Venus.[2]

"I, seeing this, and minding to show my master how he was ordered, got behind the cloth, and to make the man speak I all to-pawed him with my claws upon his bare legs and buttocks. And for all this, he stood still and never moved. But my master heard me and, thinking I was catching a mouse, bade my dame go help me. Who, knowing what beast was there, came to the cloth and called me away, saying, 'Come puss, come puss,' and cast me meat into the floor. But I, minding another thing, and seeing that scratching could not move him, suddenly I leaped up and caught him by the genitals with my teeth, and bit so hard that, when he had restrained more than I thought any man could, at last he cried out, and caught me by the neck thinking to strangle me. My master, not smelling but hearing such a rat as was not wont to be about such walls, came to the cloth and lift it up, and there found this bare-arst gentleman strangling me who had his stones[7] in my mouth. And when I saw my master I let go my hold, and the gentleman his. And away I ran immediately to the place where I now dwell, and never came there since. So that how they agreed among them I cannot tell, nor never durst[9] go see for fear of my life.

Fear overcometh smart.[5]

All are not mice that are behind painted cloths.

It is justice to pun[i]sh those parts that offend.[6]

Whoredom will be known be it never so warily hid.[8]

"'Thus have I told you, my good lords, all things that have been done and happened through me, wherein you perceive my loyalty and obedience to all good laws, and how shamelessly and falsely I am accused for a transgressor. And I pray you, as you have perceived, so certify my liege great Cammoloch (whose life both Hagat and Heg preserve) of my behaviour."

There be false accusers among all kind of creatures.

When Grisard, Isegrim, and Pol-noir, the commissioners, had heard this declaration and request of Mouse-slayer, they praised her much. And after that they had commanded her, with all the cats there, to be on St. Catherine's day[12] next ensuing at Caithness where, as they said, Cammoloch would hold his court, they departed. And I, glad to have heard that I heard, and sorry that I had not understood what was said the other two nights before, got me to my bed and slept a-good.

Justices should cherish the innocents accused.[10]

Travail and watching maketh sound sleeping.[11]

And the next morning, when I went out into the garden, I heard a strange cat ask of our cat what Mouse-slayer had done before the commissioners those three nights. To whom 1 mess of potage a portion of a kind of liquid, partly liquid or pulpy food, such as milk, broth, porridge, boiled vegetables, etc.

---

2 Sine Baccho et cetera friget Venus Proverb, "Without Ceres and Bacchus, Venus grows cold" (Tilley C211). Ceres is the classical goddess of the harvest; Bacchus the god of wine; and Venus the goddess of love and desire.

3 franion gallant or paramour.

4 capons castrated cocks (considered a delicacy in the period).

5 smart sharp, physical pain.

6 It is justice to pun[i]sh those parts that offend a variation on Matthew 18:8-9: "And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee." Cf. Tilley E226, F225, and T419.

7 stones testicles.

8 Whoredom will be known be it never so warily hid a variation on the proverb, "Murder will out" (Tilley M1315; cf. T591), indicating that there is no crime or sin, no matter how well concealed, that will not eventually be exposed.

9 durst dared.

10 Justices should cherish the innocents accused not in Tilley.

11 Travail and watching maketh sound sleeping "travail": labour; "watching": staying awake.

12 St. Catherine's day "November 25th, in the northernmost county in Scotland, used in this sentence for its alliterative effect" (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 74). Caithness is in north-east Scotland (Topographical Dict., p. 89).

our cat answered, that she had purged herself of a crime that was laid to her charge by Catch-rat, and declared her whole life for six years' space. "Whereof in the first two years as she said," said she, "she had five masters: a priest, a baker, a lawyer, a broker,[1] and a butcher; all whose privy deceits which she had seen she declared the first night. In the next two years she had seven masters: a bishop, a knight, a pothecary, a goldsmith, an usurer, an alchemist,[2] and a lord; whose cruelty, study, craft, cunning, niggishness,[3] folly, waste, and oppression she declared the second night, wherein this doing was notable. Because the knight, having a fair lady to his wife, gave his mind so much to his book that he seldom lay with her, this cat, pitying her mistress and minding to fray[4] him from lying alone, on a night when her master lay from her, got to his mouth and drew so his breath that she almost stifled him. A like part she played with the usurer, who, being rich and yet living miserably and feigning him poor, she got one day, while his treasure chest stood open, and hid her therein; whereof he not knowing locked her in it. And when at night he came thither again and heard one stirring there, and thinking it had been the Devil, he called the priest and many other persons to come and help him to conjure.[6] And when in their sight he opened his chest, out leaped she and they saw what riches he had and cessed[7] him thereafter. As for what was done and said yesternight, both of my lord Grisard's hard adventure and of Mouse-slayer's bestowing her other two last years, which is nothing in comparison of any of the other two years before, I need not tell you for you were present and heard it yourself."

Mouse-slayer was six year old.

Cats change their dwellings often.

Men ought to lie with their wives.

A niggard[5] is neither good to his self nor to any other.

The Devil delighteth to dwell among money.
All in this book is nothing in comparison of that the cat told before.

This talk, lo, I heard between these two cats. And then I got me in, and broke my fast with bread and butter, and dined at noon with common meat,[8] which so repleted my head again and my other powers in the first digestion, that by nighttime they were as gross as ever they were before. For when I harkened at night to other two cats, which as I perceived by their gestures spoke of the same matter, I understood never a word.

Gross meats make gross wits.

Lo, here have I told you all (chiefly you, my lord[9]) a wonderful matter, and yet as incredible as it is wonderful. Notwithstanding, when I may have convenient time, I will tell you other things which these eyes of mine have seen and these ears of mine have heard, and that of mysteries so far passing this, that all which I have said now shall in comparison thereof be nothing at all to be believed.[10] In the meanwhile, I will pray you to help to get me some money to convey me on my journey to Caithness, for I have been going thither these five years and never was able to perform my journey.

Wonders are incredible.

In comparison of a diamond, crystal hath no colour.
Poverty hindreth many excellent attempts.

---

1 broker pawnbroker or agent; sometimes also a procurer or pimp.

2 alchemist a person who studies and practises alchemy, the chemistry of the Middle Ages and sixteenth century.

3 niggishness niggardliness; stinginess.

4 fray frighten, scare [him] away from.

5 niggard stingy, miserly person.

6 to conjure to summon (a devil or spirit) to appear or do one's bidding, by using a magic spell; although it seems here to mean "exorcize," to purify a place of demons or evil spirits through the use of sacred ritual or magic spells, the OED assigns the first use of "conjure" in this sense to 1862.

7 cessed taxed; the process of officially estimating the taxable value of (property, land, etc.).

8 common meat ordinary or usual food for a noonday meal.

9 my lord Master Ferrers. See p. 239, note 5.

10 I will tell you … nothing at all to be believed Baldwin plays here on 1 Corinthians 2:9: "But as it is written, eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."

When Master Ferrers had promised that he would, every man shut up his shop windows,[1] which the fore-said talk kept open two hours longer than they should have been.

AN EXHORTATION

I know these things will seem marvellous to many men, that cats should understand and speak, have a governor among themselves, and be obedient to their laws. And were it not for the approved authority of the ecstatical[2] author of whom I heard it, I should myself be as doubtful as they. But seeing I know the place[3] and the persons with whom he talked of these matters before he experimented his wonderful and strange confections, I am the less doubtful of any truth therein. Wherefore, seeing he hath in his oration proved that cats do understand us and mark our secret doings, and so declare them among themselves; that through help of the medicines by him described any man may, as he did, understand them; I would counsel all men to take heed of wickedness, and eschew secret sins and privy mischievous counsels, lest, to their shame, all the world at length do know thereof. But if any man, for doubt hereof, do put away[4] his cat, then shall his so doing testify his secret naughty[5] living, which he is more ashamed his cat should see than God and His angels, which see, mark, and behold all men's closest doings.[6]

And that we may take profit by this declaration of Master Streamer, let us so live, both openly and privily that neither our own cat, admitted to all secrets, be able to declare aught of us to the world save what is laudable and honest; nor the Devil's cat, which will we or nill we[7] seeth and writeth all our ill doings, have ought to lay against us afore the face of God, who not only with shame but with everlasting torment will punish all sin and wickedness. And ever when thou goest about anything, call to mind this proverb, Beware the Cat;[8] not to tie up thy cat till thou have done, but to see that neither thine own nor the Devil's cat (which cannot be tied up) find anything therein whereof to accuse thee to thy shame.

Thus doing, thou canst not do amiss; but shalt have such good report through the cat's declaration, that thou shalt, in recompence of Master Streamer's labour who giveth thee this warning, sing unto God this hymn of his making.

---

1 shop windows i.e., eyes (to cease the business of the day; go to sleep).

2 ecstatical i.e., ecstatic; to be in an extreme emotional or psychological state, to be in a frenzy or stupor caused by astonishment, fear or passion; it is possible that the narrator is also referring sardonically to the word's spiritual meaning, where an ecstatic state was one of rapture, a kind of "out-of-body" experience where a person becomes unaware of bodily sensation in the contemplation of things divine. However, the OED does not cite a use of this kind before 1652; likewise, the application to states of poetic frenzy and rapture are later than Beware the Cat.

3 place John Day's printing house. See p. 242, note 1.

4 put away dispose of, drive away.

5 naughty evil, wicked.

6 closest doings most concealed actions.

7 nill we will we not.

8 this proverb, Beware the Cat Although "Beware the Cat" is not listed as a proverbial expression in Tilley, there are a number of expressions that refer to the cat's intense gaze and its awareness of everything that goes on in a person's household. See Tilley C128, C169, C175, and C180.

THE HYMN

Who givest wit to whales, to apes, to owls;
And kindly speech to fish, to flesh, to fowls;
And spirit to men in soul and body clean,
To mark and know what other creatures mean;

Which hast given grace to Gregory,[1] no pope,
No king, no lord; whose treasures are their hope;
But silly priest, which like a streamer[2] waves
In ghostly good, despised of foolish knaves.

Which hast, I say, given grace to him to know
The course of things above and here below,[3]
With skill so great in languages and tongues
As never breathed from Mithridates'[4] lungs.

To whom the hunter of birds, of mice and rats,
Did speak as plain as Kate that thrummeth hats;[5]
By mean of whom is openly bewrayed
Such things as closely were both done and said.

To him grant, Lord, with healthy wealth and rest,
Long life to unload to us his learned breast;
With fame so great to overlive his grave,
As none had erst, nor any after have.

FINIS

Imprinted at London by John Allde,[6] Anno Domini 1570, and are to be sold by John Arnold at the North Door of Paul's.

—1570

---

[1] Gregory Master Streamer's first name; the last Pope named Gregory (Gregory XII, 1380-1417) was deposed in 1409 (Ringler and Flachmann, p. 74) during the complicated Western schism when there were two rival popes, one in Rome and one in Avignon.

[2] silly innocent, but perhaps also foolish, or ignorant; streamer obviously a play on the central narrator's last name, but also a long, narrow flag; Bonahue suggests that the name "Streamer" describes "both the volubility of his talk and its tendency to meander over the textual landscape" ("'I Know the Place and the Persons,'" p. 289).

[3] above and here below in Heaven and on earth.

[4] Mithridates Mithridates VI (the Great, 120-63 BCE), king of Pontos, ruler of Asia Minor, famous for his grasp of 24 languages (Dict. Ancient Hist., pp. 418-19; Classical Dict., p. 418).

[5] as Kate that thrummeth hats "thrummeth": decorates with tufts, tassels, or fringes of thread; "Kate" a common girl's name in the period.

[6] John Allde also spelled Aldaye and Aldye (fl. 1555-92); he was a stationer and printer, and from 1560 to 1567 he was largely a printer of ballads and broadsides, although soon after he widened his offerings to include other popular books.

from A Mirror for Magistrates

A Mirror for Magistrates (1559, censored; 2nd ed., 1563) is a verse anthology of de casibus tragedies (i.e., those concerning the "fall" of persons usually of exalted rank or status) edited by William Baldwin, but composed by a number of writers (including Thomas Churchyard, Thomas Phaer, Thomas Sackville, Thomas Chaloner, George Ferrers, and Baldwin himself). There is a strong anti-Catholic and pro-Protestant strain in some of these pieces which was probably the reason for the government's suppression of Mirror's early progenitor: the 1554 edition of John Lydgate's Fall of Princes (1494)—itself a translation of Boccaccio's De Casibus Virorum Illustrium—with new tragedies aimed at updating Lydgate's account. Suppressed under the Catholic monarch Mary I (crowned, 1553), the extent of this volume's offensiveness—it does after all show the public and private flaws of England's powerful governing elites, addressing implicitly Mary I's own government through its less than flattering representation of kings and noblemen[1]—may perhaps be indicated by the unusually thorough nature of this suppression: of this work all that remains are two pages of text and some title pages. Although Baldwin and his collaborators' new additions to Lydgate's popular work focus on what might seem to us safely distanced historical events, generally that period of civil unrest in England known as The Wars of the Roses (1455-85), for his contemporaries (especially for those in power) this focus allowed for a dangerous critique of the present government and its Catholic religious commitments.[2] A Mirror for Magistrates' historical sources are, as Baldwin himself indicates in the text, Fabyan, Hall, and Sir Thomas More, with Hall taking precedence in certain cases when these writers disagree. Although Mirror is a set of de casibus tragedies and although Baldwin's two prefaces indicate that it is aimed largely at exposing, reproving, and correcting the failings of those in authority, a significant number of these tragedies deal with individuals of far less lofty rank than kings, noblemen, and gentlemen.[3]

[1] P. Budra, A Mirror for Magistrates and the De Casibus Tradition (Toronto, 2000), pp. 22-23.

[2] Ibid., pp. 22-24.

[3] In our annotations, we have used the following editions of Fabyan, Hall, and More: Robert Fabyan, The New Chronicles of England and France (Pynson's edition, 1516), ed. H. Ellis, London, 1811; Edward Hall, Hall's Chronicle [The Union of the Two Noble and Illustrious Families of Lancaster and York (1548; 1550)], London, 1809; Thomas More, The History of King Richard the Third, ed., R.S. Sylvester, The Complete Works of St. Thomas More, vol. 2 (New Haven, 1963).

EDITION: A Mirrour For Magistrates. London: [Imprinted] by Thomas Marsh, 1563. STC 1248.

ADDITIONAL ONLINE TEXT: William Baldwin, et al., "How Collingbourne Was Cruelly Executed for Making a Foolish Rhyme" in "The Second Part of the Mirror for Magistrates," Mirror for Magistrates (1563).

A Mirror for Magistrates.[4]

Love and Live[5]

To the Nobility and All Other in Office, God Grant Wisdom and All Things Needful for the Preservation of Their Estates. Amen.

Plato among many other of his notable sentences[6] concerning the government of a commonweal hath this: "Well is that realm governed in which the ambitious desire not to bear office."[7] Whereby you may perceive, Right Honourable, what offices are where they be duly executed: not gainful spoils for the greedy to hunt for, but painful toils for the heedy to be charged with.[8] You may perceive also [4] The subtitle reads: "Wherein may be seen by example of other, with how grievous plagues vices are punished: and how frail and unstable worldly prosperity is found, even of those, whom fortune seemeth most highly to favour." It is followed by the Latin epigram Foelix quem faciunt aliena pericula cautum ("Happy is he whom the dangers of others makes cautious"). The London printer Thomas Marsh (Marshe, Marche) (active, 1554-87) produced not just Mirror but an influential collection of tragedies by the Roman playwright Seneca. Budra notes that while Marsh's output was prolific and eclectic, ranging from religious works to cookbooks, he favoured later in his career the genres of tragedy and history, perhaps on account of the success of Mirror (A Mirror for Magistrates, p. 11).

[5] Love and Live See Baldwin's Beware the Cat, p. 239, note 1.

[6] sentences pithy wise sayings; maxims.

[7] See Republic 1.347 in The Dialogues of Plato, trans. B. Jowett, 2 vols. (New York, 1920), p. 612.

[8] to be charged with to have a task, duty, or responsibility laid upon.

by this sentence that there is nothing more necessary in a commonweal than that officers be diligent and trusty in their charges. And sure in whatsoever realm such provision is made that officers be forced to do their duties, there is it as hard a matter to get an officer, as it is in other places to shift off[1] and put by those that with flattery, bribes and other shifts, sue and preace[2] for offices. For the ambitious (that is to say, prollers[3] for power or gain) seek not for offices to help other,[4] for which cause offices are ordained, but with the undoing of other, to prank up[5] themselves. And therefore bar them once of this bait, and force them to do their duties, and they will give more to be rid from their charges than they did at the first to buy them, for they seek only their commodity[6] and ease. And therefore, where the ambitious seek no office, there no doubt offices are duly ministered; and where offices are duly ministered, it cannot be chosen but the people are good, whereof must needs follow a good commonweal. For if the officers be good, the people cannot be ill. Thus the goodness or badness of any realm lieth in the goodness or badness of the rulers. And therefore not without great cause do the holy apostles so earnestly charge us to pray for the magistrates:[7] for indeed the wealth and quiet of every commonweal, the disorder also and miseries of the same, come specifically through them. I need not go either to the Romans or Greeks for proof hereof, neither yet the Jews or other nations, whose commonweals have always flourished while their officers were good, and decayed and ran to ruin when naughty men had the regiment. Our own country stories (if we read and mark them) will show us examples enow;[8] would God we had not seen more than enow. I purpose not to stand here upon the particulars, because they be in part set forth in the tragedies. Yet by the way this I note, wishing all others to do the like: namely, that as good governors have never lacked their deserved renown, so have not the bad escaped infamy, besides such plagues as are horrible to hear of.

For God (the ordainer of offices) although he suffer[9] them for punishment of the people to be often occupied of such as are rather spoilers and Judases[10] than toilers or justices (whom the Scripture therefore calleth hypocrites), yet suffereth he them not to 'scape unpunished, because they dishonour him. For it is God's own office, yea his chief office, which they bear and abuse. For as justice is the chief virtue, so is the ministration thereof the chiefest office: and therefore hath God established it with the chiefest name, honouring and calling kings, and all officers under them, by his own name: gods. Ye be all gods, as many as have in your charge any ministration of justice.[11] What a foul shame were it for any now to take upon them the name and office of God, and in their doings to show themselves devils? God cannot of justice but plague such shameless presumption and hypocrisy, and that with shameful death, diseases, or infamy. How he hath plagued evil rulers from time to time, in other nations, you may see gathered in Boccas' book entitled The Fall of Princes, translated into English by Lydgate.[12] How he hath dealt with some of our countrymen, your ancestors, for sundry vices not yet left, this [1] shift off to get rid of (a person).

---

[2] sue and preace petition and press.

[3] prollers prowlers.

[4] other i.e., other people; others.

[5] undoing ruining; destroying; prank up show off; make ostentatious show or display.

[6] commodity here, selfish or private interest, profit.

[7] Paul encourages obedience and submission to "rulers and authorities" (Titus 3:1), but specifically urges Christians to pray for "kings and all who are in high positions" in 1 Timothy 2:1.

[8] enow enough, sufficient.

[9] suffer allows, permits.

[10] Judases so-called for Judas Iscariot, the betrayer of Jesus.

[11] Psalm 82:6.

[12] John Lydgate (c. 1370-1449/50), monk and scholar. His prodigious literary output included a number of translations of continental texts. The Fall of Princes (published 1494) was a free translation of the 1409 French version of De Casibus Virorum Illustrium ("On The Falls of Famous Men"; written between 1356 and 1360; revised 1373) by the Italian poet and humanist scholar Giovanni Boccaccio (?1313-75). The Fall of Princes was Lydgate's most influential and popular work (Budra, A Mirror for Magistrates, pp. 5-7). See headnote.

book named A Mirror for Magistrates can show, which therefore I humbly offer unto your Honours, beseeching you to accept it favourably. For here as in a looking glass, you shall see (if any vice be in you) how the like hath been punished in others heretofore, whereby admonished, I trust it will be a good occasion to move you to the sooner amendment. This is the chiefest end why it is set forth, which God grant it may attain.

[1]The work was begun and part of it printed in Queen Mary's time, but hindered by the Lord Chancellor that then was. Nevertheless, through the means of my Lord Stafford,[2] the first part was licensed, and imprinted the first year of the reign of this our most noble and virtuous Queen,[3] and dedicate[d] then to your Honours with this preface.

Since which time, although I have been called to another trade of life,[4] yet my good Lord Stafford hath not ceased to call upon me, to publish so much as I had gotten at other men's hands, so that through his lordship's earnest means, I have now also set forth another part, containing as little of mine own, as the first part doth of other men's. Which in the name of all the authors, I humbly dedicate unto your Honours, instantly wishing that it may so like and delight your minds that your cheerful receiving thereof may encourage worthy wits to enterprise and perform the rest; which as soon as I may procure, I intend through God's leave, and your favourable allowance, to publish with all expedition. In the meanwhile my lords and gods, (for so I may call you) I most humbly beseech your Honours[5] favourably to accept this rude[6] mirror, and diligently to read and consider it. And although you shall find in it that some have for their virtue been envied and murdered, yet cease not you to be virtuous, but do your offices to the uttermost: suppress[7] sin boldly, both in yourselves and other, so shall God (whose officers[8] you are) either so maintain you, that no malice shall prevail, or if it do, it shall be for your good, and to your eternal glory both here and in Heaven which I beseech God you may both covet and attain. Amen.

Yours most humble,

William Baldwin.

A Brief Memorial of Sundry Unfortunate Englishmen.

William Baldwin to the Reader.

When the printer had purposed with himself to print Lydgate's book of The Fall of Princes, and had made privy thereto many both honourable and worshipful, he was counselled by divers[9] of them

---

[1] The 1st edition (1559) reads from this point instead: "The work was begun, and part of it printed four years ago, but hindered by the Lord Chancellor that then was, nevertheless, through the means of my Lord Stafford, lately perused and licensed. When I first took it in hand, I had the help of many granted, and offered of some, but of few performed, scarce of any: So that where I intended to have continued it to Queen Mary's time, I have been fain [i.e., obligated] to end it much sooner: yet so, that it may stand for a pattern, till the rest be ready: which with God's grace (if I may have any help) shall be shortly. In the meanwhile my lords and gods (for so I may call you), I most humbly beseech you, favourably to accept this rude mirror, and diligently to read and consider it. And although you shall find in it that some have for their virtue been envied and murdered, yet cease not you to be virtuous, but do your offices to the uttermost: punish sin boldly, both in yourselves and others, so shall God (whose lieutenants you are) either so maintain you that no malice shall prevail, or if it do it shall be for your good and to your eternal glory both here and in Heaven, which I beseech God you may covet and attain. Amen

Yours most humble

William Baldwin"

[2] Henry Stafford, tenth Baron Stafford (1501-63), a supporter of Henry VIII's break with Rome, although under Mary I he reconverted to Catholicism. Author of a number of translations, his efforts on behalf of Baldwin and Mirror may be connected to his interest in history and in the preservation of historical documents (C.S.L. Davis, "Henry Stafford, tenth Baron Stafford," DNB online, 2005).

[3] Queen i.e., Elizabeth I.

[4] another trade of life The available evidence suggests that Baldwin was ordained a deacon in 1559 and became vicar of Tortington (Sussex) in 1559-60; then, he became rector of St. Michael le Quern in Cheapside (London) in 1561 (N. Gutierrez, "William Baldwin," DLB 132, p. 25).

[5] your Honours "you" in 1559 Preface.

[6] rude crudely fashioned; of language and composition: lacking in elegance, polish; deficient in literary merit.

[7] suppress "punish" in 1559 Preface.

[8] officers "lieutenants" in 1559 Preface.

[9] divers various, several, sundry.

to procure to have the story continued from where as Bochas[1] left unto this present time, chiefly of such as fortune had dallied with here in this island; which might be as a mirror for all men, as well nobles as others, to show the slippery deceits of the wavering lady[2] and the due reward of all kind of vices. Which advice liked him so well, that he required me to take pains[3] therein; but because it was a matter passing my wit and skill, and more thankless than gainful to meddle in, I refused utterly to undertake it, except I might have the help of such as in wit were apt, in learning allowed, and in judgement and estimation able to wield and furnish so weighty an enterprise, thinking even so to shift my hands. But he, earnest and diligent in his affairs, procured Atlas to set under his shoulder:[4] for shortly after, divers learned men, whose many gifts need few praises, consented to take upon them part of the travail.[5] And when certain of them to the number of seven were through a general assent at an appointed time and place gathered together to devise thereupon, I resorted unto them, bearing with me the book of Bochas, translated by Dan[6] Lydgate, for the better observation of his order; which although we liked well, yet would it not comely[7] serve, seeing that both Bochas and Lydgate were dead, neither were there any alive that meddled with like argument, to whom the unfortunate might make their moan.[8]

To make therefore a state mete[9] for the matter, they all agreed that I should usurp Bochas' room,[10] and the wretched princes complain unto me: and took upon themselves every man for his part to be sundry personages, and in their behalfs to bewail unto me their grievous chances, heavy destinies, and woeful misfortunes.

This done, we opened such books of chronicles as we had there present, and Master Ferrers,[11] after he had found where Bochas left, which was about the end of King Edward III's reign, to begin the matter said thus:

"I marvel what Bochas meaneth to forget among his miserable princes such as were of our nation, whose number is as great as their adventures wonderful. For to let pass all, both Britons, Danes, and Saxons, and to come to the last Conquest,[12] what a sort are they, and some even in his own time? As for example, King Richard I, slain with a quarrel in his chief prosperity, also King John, his brother as some say, poisoned. Are not their histories rueful and of rare example? But as it should appear, he being an Italian minded most the Roman and Italic[13] story, or else perhaps he wanted[14] our country chronicles. It were therefore a goodly and notable matter to search and discourse our whole story from the first beginning of the inhabiting of the isle. But seeing the printer's mind is to have us follow where Lydgate left, we will leave that great labour to others that may intend it and (as blind bayard is always boldest[15]) I will begin at the time of Richard II, a time as

---

[1] Bochas Boccaccio. See p. 278, note 12.

[2] Fortune was often depicted as a fickle and unpredictable woman.

[3] take pains work diligently and carefully.

[4] Atlas one of the Titans, who because he assisted the giants in making war against the gods was condemned by Jupiter (Zeus), the king of the gods, to bear the burden of the heavens on his shoulders (Classical Dict., p. 100); set i.e., sit.

[5] travail labour, work.

[6] Dan an honorific, equivalent to "Master" or "Sir."

[7] comely here, properly (pleasing to aesthetic taste).

[8] In both Boccaccio's De Casibus Virorum Illustrium and Lydgate's The Fall of Princes, the fates of the fallen men are conveyed in the third person, reported by the narrative personae of Boccaccio and Lydgate themselves. In Mirror, this type of mediation is minimized, since the ghosts of the fallen tell their own stories in the first person (Budra, A Mirror for Magistrates, p. 9).

[9] mete fitting, appropriate.

[10] room an office or post (considered as pertaining to a particular person, especially by right or by inheritance).

[11] Master Ferrers George Ferrers (c. 1510-79), courtier, poet, MP, and justice of the peace, who edited and translated the compilation of legal and government documents, The Great Book of Statutes (1533). See Baldwin's Beware the Cat, p. 239, note 5.

[12] last Conquest i.e., the Norman Conquest of 1066.

[13] Italic Italian.

[14] wanted lacked, did not have.

[15] Proverb, "Who so bold (as bold) as blind bayard?" (Tilley B112), where a "bayard" is a bay horse. OED notes that the origins of this saying are obscure, but there are many proverbs that describe boldness as blind (Tilley B507; H634; M909).

unfortunate as the ruler therein. And forasmuch, friend Baldwin, as it shall be your charge to note, and pen orderly the whole process, I will so far as my memory and judgement serveth, somewhat further you in the truth of the story."

[...]

How King Richard II Was for His Evil Governance Deposed from His Seat, and Miserably Murdered in Prison[1]

Happy is the prince that hath in wealth the grace
To follow virtue, keeping vices under,
But woe to him whose will hath wisdom's place:
For who so renteth right and law asunder
On him at length, lo, all the world shall wonder.
High birth, choice fortune, force, nor princely mace[2]
Can warrant king or kaiser from the case;[3]
Shame sueth[4] sin, as rain drops do the thunder.
Let princes therefore virtuous life embrace,
That wilful pleasures cause them not to blunder.

Behold my hap, see how the seely rout[5]
Do gaze upon me, and each to other say:
"See where he lieth for whom none late might route,[6]
Lo how the power, the pride, and rich array
Of mighty rulers lightly fade away.
The King which erst[7] kept all the realm in doubt,
The veriest rascal now dare check and lout:[8]
What mould be kings made of but carrain[9] clay?
Behold his wounds, how blue[10] they be about,
Which while he lived, thought never to decay."

Methink I hear the people thus devise:
And therefore Baldwin sith[11] thou wilt declare
How princes fell, to make the living wise,
My vicious story in no point see thou spare,
But paint it out, that rulers may beware
Good counsel, law, or virtue to despise.
For realms have rules, a rulers have a size,[12]
Which if they keep not, doubtless say I dare
That either's griefs the other shall agrise[13]
Till the one be lost, the other brought to care.[14]

I am a king that ruled all by lust,[15]
That forced not of[16] virtue, right, or law,
But always put false flatterers most in trust,
Ensuing such as could my vices claw,[17]
By faithful counsel passing not a straw.[18]
What pleasure pricked,[19] that thought I to be just.
I set my mind to feed, to spoil, to just;[20]
Three meals a day could scarce content my maw,[21]
And all to augment my lecherous mind that must
To Venus' pleasures alway be in awe.[22]

---

[1] Richard II (1367-1400; reigned, 1377-99), younger son of Edward, the Black Prince of Wales.

[2] mace sceptre or staff of office.

[3] Can warrant king or kaiser from the case i.e., can guarantee the security or immunity of king or kaiser from chance, hazard, or fortune; kaiser emperor (as a ruler superior to kings); "king or kaiser" was a popular alliterative phrase from the thirteenth to the seventeenth century.

[4] sueth follows upon as a consequence or result.

[5] seely rout ignorant rabble.

[6] late might route recently might uproot (extirpate, destroy).

[7] erst earlier; not long ago.

[8] lout revile, taunt, mock.

[9] mould earth, regarded as the material of the human body; carrain carrion: decaying and corrupted flesh (applied in contempt to the human body, as no better than carrion).

[10] blue livid, swollen.

[11] sith since.

[12] a and; a size an assize for the administration of justice.

[13] agrise horrify, terrify.

[14] care burdened state of mind arising from fear or concern; anxiety.

[15] lust will, desire (especially, desire for sensual pleasure).

[16] forced not of did not care about or concern [himself] over.

[17] Ensuing following (especially, following the guidance of [a person, etc.]); claw flatter, gratify.

[18] passing not a straw caring not at all.

[19] pricked urged, incited.

[20] spoil plunder, rob; just joust: to participate in tournaments or other chivalric contests of skill and strength.

[21] maw stomach (voracious appetite).

[22] Richard's prodigality and indulgence in all manner of sensual pleasure is recorded by Fabyan in an interpolation in the 1542 and 1549 editions of his Chronicles (see p. 544, note 3). Fabyan pointedly accuses Richard of corrupting the Church by intentionally appointing like-minded bishops.

For maintenance whereof, my realm I polled[1]
Through subsidies, sore fines, loans, many a prest,[2]
Blank charters, oaths, and shifts[3] not known of old,
For which my subjects did me sore detest.[4]
I also made away the town of Brest;[5]
My fault wherein because mine uncle told
(For princes' vices may not be controlled)
I found the means the bowels to unbrest.[6]
The peers and lords that did his cause uphold,
With death, exile, or grievous fines oppressed.[7]

Neither lacked I aid in any wicked deed,
For gaping gulls[8] whom I promoted had
Would further all in hope of higher meed.[9]
A king can never imagine ought so bad
But most about him will perform it glad,
For sickness seldom doth so swiftly breed
As vicious humours[10] grow the grief to feed.
Thus kings' estates of all be worst bestad,[11]
Abused in wealth, abandoned at need,
And nearest harm when they be least adrad.[12]

My life and death the truth of this can try:[13]
For while I fought in Ireland with my foes,
Mine uncle Edmund whom I left to guide
My realm at home, right trait'rously arose
To help the Percys plying my depose,
And called from France Earl Bolenbroke, whom I
Condemned ten years in exile to lie:[14]
Who cruelly did put to death all those

---

[1] polled plundered by excessive taxation.

[2] subsidies a tax (authorized by Parliament originally for the use of the monarch), which in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries was often a tax of 4*s.* in the pound on land and 2*s* 8*d* in the pound on movables; sore oppressively heavy; loans in this period, forced contributions of money from private individuals or bodies towards the expenses of the state; prest a loan (often forced) made to a sovereign in an emergency; a forced grant.

[3] Blank charters During Richard II's reign, a "charter" was a document given to agents of the Crown with power to fill in as they pleased; shifts stratagems, dishonest tricks.

[4] See Fabyan, pp. 529, 543-44.

[5] made away the town of Brest Richard's second marriage, to Isabella, daughter of Charles VI of France, involved his ceding the town of Brest to the Duke of Britanny. Fabyan notes that on evil advice Richard surrendered this territory for a large sum of money. Fabyan gives a detailed account of Richard's angry confrontation with his uncle, Thomas, duke of Gloucester, with Gloucester stating that Richard should have first won some towns with acts of valour before he sold those that his predecessors had so achieved. The resultant poisoned relationship "ceased not till the said Duke was put to death by murder unlawfully" (p. 541).

[6] unbrest unburst; See Fabyan, pp. 542, 566-67. Holinshed notes that there is some disagreement between earlier chroniclers about the method of Gloucester's murder, although they concur in Richard's responsibility for it. The general consensus seems to be that he was smothered or strangled (Chronicles, 1586, 3.837).

[7] According to Fabyan, the Earl of Arundel was executed, the Earl of Warwick imprisoned for life, the Archbishop of Canterbury exiled, and Sir John Cobham and Sir John Cheney imprisoned for life (pp. 542-43). Fabyan does not mention those who were merely heavily fined, although the Parliament called by Richard at the time had illegally disinherited a number of persons (p. 543).

[8] gulls fools, dupes, simpletons.

[9] meed reward. According to Fabyan, the commons and the aristocracy alike were restless and unhappy with Richard's rule, not just because of excessive and extortionate taxation, but also because Richard chose favourites "of low birth and of small reputation" so that "the men of honour were kept out of favour." He chose officers whom he knew "would lean more to his weal [i.e., profit, advantage] than to the common weal of his land or of his subjects" (p. 543). Fabyan explicitly offers greed as the motivation of Richard's favourites.

[10] humours referring to the medical theory inherited from the Greeks and Romans which held that the human body was composed of four distinct liquids or humours: phlegm, blood, yellow bile or choler, and black bile or melancholy. An individual's character depended on the particular balance of these humours.

[11] bestad bestead: situated, circumstanced.

[12] adrad adread: frightened, in dread.

[13] try to put to the proof; test; prove.

[14] According to Fabyan, Edmund, duke of York, Richard's uncle, had been left in charge during Richard's campaign in Ireland. However, Fabyan does not accuse York of the kind of active treason implied here. Cf. Holinshed who presents York as attempting but failing to gather sufficient military support from the commons; on his way to meet Richard, York was met by Henry at Berkeley Castle, at which point he and many other nobles threw in their lot with the invader (Chronicles, 1586, 3.852-53). After Richard II's death, Henry Bolingbroke, duke of Hereford, became Henry IV.

According to Fabyan, Henry accused the Duke of Norfolk either of treason (for saying that Richard had essentially engineered the deaths of his own kinsmen) or embezzlement. In either case, they decided to meet in trial by combat to determine the guilt or innocence of the accused. Richard halted the combat before it had begun and exiled Henry for ten years and Norfolk for life (pp. 544-45). Cf. Holinshed's Chronicles, 3.844-45.

That in mine aid durst look but once awry,[1]
Whose number was but slender I suppose.[2]

For when I was come back this stir to stay,[3]
The Earl of Worcester whom I trusted most[4]
(Whiles we in Wales at Flint our castle lay Both to refresh and multiply mine host)
Did in my hall in sight of least and most Bebreak his staff, my household office stay,
Bad each make shift,[5] and rode himself away.
See princes, see the power whereof we boast:
Whom most we trust, at need do us betray,
Through whose false faith my land and life I lost.

For when my traitorous steward thus was goen,
My servants shrank away on every side,
That caught I was, and carried to my foen;[6]
Who for their prince a prison did provide,
And therein kept me, till Duke Henry's pride
Did cause me yield him up my crown and throne,
Which shortly made my friendly foes to groan:
For Henry seeing in me their falsehood tried
Abhorred them all, and would be ruled by none,
For which they sought to stop him strait a tide.

The chief conspired by death to drive him down,
For which exploit, a solemn oath they swore
To render me my liberty and crown,
Whereof themselves deprived me before.
But salves help seld[7] an overlong suffered sore;
To stop the breech no boot to run or rown[8]
When swelling floods have overflown the town;
Till sails be spread the ship may keep the shore,
And anchors weighed, though all the freight[9] do frown,
With stream and steer perforce to shall be bore.[10]

For though the peers set Henry in his state,
Yet could they not displace him thence again;
And where they easily put me down of late,
They could restore me by no manner pain.[11]
Things hardly mend, but may be marred amain,[12]
And when a man is fall'n in froward fate
Still mischiefs light one on another's pate;[13]
And well meant means his mishaps to restrain
Ware wretched moans, whereby his joys abate.
Due proof whereof in me appeareth plain.

For when King Henry knew that for my cause
His lords in mask would kill him if they might,[14]
To dash all doubts, he took no farther pause
But sent Sir Pierce of Exton a trait'rous knight
To Pomfret Castle, with other armed light,
Who causeless killed me there against all laws.[15]
Thus lawless life to lawless death ay[16] draws.
Wherefore bid kings be ruled and rule by right;
Who worketh his will and shunneth wisdom's saws[17]
In flattery's claws and shame's foul paws shall light.

---

1 [to look] awry to look askance or asquint; here, the meaning seems to be that Bolingbroke executed even those who merely gave him a side-long glance (i.e., indicated very covertly their dislike of his treatment of Richard).

2 Henry did indeed execute speedily some of Richard's favourites and staunchest supporters: William Scroop, earl of Wiltshire, Sir Henry Green, and Sir John Bushy (Fabyan, p. 546).

3 stir to stay insurrection to halt.

4 Sir Thomas Percy, earl of Worcester, lord steward of the King's household. For this incident, see Fabyan, p. 546.

5 Bad bade: commanded, ordered; make shift provide for his own safety or interests; depend on his own efforts.

6 foen foe.

7 seld seldom.

8 no boot it is useless, it is in vain; rown flee.

9 freight cargo.

10 With stream and steer … bore i.e., by the current and the helmsman [the ship] shall of necessity also be carried forward.

11 no manner pain no kind of effort.

12 amain violently, with great force.

13 mischiefs light evils arrive, settle on; pate head.

14 Fabyan notes that the dukes of Aumarl, Surrey, and Exeter, as well as the earls of Salisbury and Gloucester (along with unnamed others) conspired to kill Henry during a Twelfth Night entertainment ("a disguising or a mumming"). However, Aumarl revealed the conspiracy to Henry and the conspirators were all arrested and executed (pp. 567-68).

15 But sent Sir Pierce … laws According to Fabyan, Pierce was accompanied by eight others, four of whom Richard killed before he died (p. 568).

16 ay ever, always.

17 saws wise sayings.

When he had ended this so woeful a tragedy, and to all princes a right worthy instruction, we paused, having passed through a miserable time full of piteous tragedies. And seeing the reign of Henry IV ensued, a man more ware and prosperous in his doings, although not untroubled with wars both of outforth and inward enemies, we began to search what peers were fallen therein, whereof the number was not small. And yet because their examples were not much to be noted for our purpose, we passed over all the maskers (of whom King Richard's brother was chief) which were all slain and put to death for their traitorous attempt.

[...]

"It is worth the labour," said one, "to weigh the works and judgements of God, which seeing they are known most evidently by comparing contraries, I will touch the story of Jack Cade in order next following, whom King Henry with all his puissance was no more able for a while to destroy (yet was he his rebellious enemy) than he was to preserve the Duke of Suffolk his dearest friend.[1] By which two examples doth appear how notably God disposeth all things, and that no force stretcheth farther than it pleaseth him to suffer. For this Cade being but base born, of no ability, and less power—accompanied with a few naked Kentishmen—caused the King with his army, at all points appointed, to leave the field, and to suffer him to do whatsoever he lusted. In whose behalf, seeing he is one of Fortune's whelps, I will trouble you a while to hear the process of his enterprise, which he may declare in manner following."

How Jack Cade Traitorously Rebelling against His King, Was for His Treasons and Cruel Doings Worthily Punished.[2]

Shall I call it fortune or my froward[3] folly
That lifted me, and laid me down below?
Or was it courage that me made so jolly,
Which of the stars and bodies 'greement grow?
Whatever it were this one point sure I know,
Which shall be mete for every man to mark:[4]
Our lust and wills our evils chiefly wark.[5]

It may be well that planets do incline,
And our complexions[6] move our minds to ill,
But such is reason, that they bring to fine
No work unaided of our lust and will:[7]
For heaven and earth are subject both to skill.[8]
The skill of God ruleth all, it is so strong;
Man may by skill guide things that to him long.[9]

Though lust be sturdy and will inclined to nought,
This forced by mixture,[10] that by Heaven's course,
Yet through the skill God hath in reason wrought
And given man, no lust nor will so coarse

---

[1] Hall recounts how Henry VI (1421-71) was forced by the anger of the House of Commons to act against William de la Pole, the duke of Suffolk and the Queen's "chief friend and counsellor" (p. 219); the Commons blamed him for losses in France ("the release of Angeow and the deliverance of Mayne") and for the death of Humphrey, duke of Gloucester; they also believed that he and the Queen had usurped to themselves the King's authority. Although the King attempted to have Suffolk exiled, the Duke was apprehended and executed before he could leave the country. Hall calls this end "God's punishment," because Suffolk "was noted to be the very organ, engine, and deviser of the destruction of Humphrey, the good duke of Gloucester, and so the blood of the innocent man was with his dolorous death recompensed and punished" (p. 219). Fabyan's account is similar (pp. 622-23).

[2] Jack or John Cade (d. 1450), leader of a popular rebellion against the government of Henry VI and the highly unpopular and indeed extortionate taxes being collected by the King's officers (DNB, p. 623). See Hall, pp. 219-22 and Fabyan, pp. 622-25.

[3] froward perverse.

[4] mark take note of, pay particular attention to.

[5] wark work.

[6] complexions bodily habits or constitutions.

[7] But such ... will i.e., reason dictates that these forces (the planets and the humours) do not entirely bring to a fine (a conclusion, an end) any work, but that an individual's desire and will has a role in this conclusion.

[8] skill here, "conscience."

[9] long i.e., belong.

[10] forced by mixture i.e., compelled through the combination of the humours which determine a man's character or disposition.

But may be stayed or swaged[1] of the source,
So that it shall in nothing force the mind
To work our woe, or leave the proper kind.

But though this skill be given every man
To rule the will, and keep the mind aloft,
For lack of grace full few use it can,
These worldly pleasures tickle us so oft:
Skill is not weak, but will strong, flesh is soft
And yields itself to pleasure that it loveth,
And hales[2] the mind to that it most reproveth.

Now if this hap[3] whereby we yield our mind
To lust and will be Fortune, as we name her,
Then is she justly called false and blind,
And no reproach can be too much to blame her.
Yet is the shame our own when so we shame her,
For sure this hap, if it be rightly known,
Commeth of ourselves, and so the blame our own.

For who so liveth in the school of skill
And meddleth not with any world's affairs,
Forsaketh pomps and honours that do spill[4]
The mind's recourse to grace's quiet stayers,[5]
His state no fortune by no means appayers;[6]
For fortune is the folly and plague of those Which to the world their wretched wills dispose.

Among which fools (mark, Baldwin) I am one
That would not stay myself in mine estate.[7]
I thought to rule, but to obey to none,
And therefore fell I with my king at bate.[8]
And to the end I might him better mate,[9]

'John Mortimer' I caused myself be called,
Whose kingly blood the Henrys nigh had thralled.[10]

This shift[11] I used the people to persuade
To leave their prince, on my side more to stick,
Whereas indeed my father's name was Cade
Whose noble stock[12] was never worth a stick.
But touching wit I was both ripe and quick,
Had strength of limbs, large stature, comely face,
Which made men ween my linage were not base.[13]

[...]

[Cade and his army defeat the army of the Staffords that the King has sent against them and, ignoring the King's desire to parley, march into London.]

And found there all things after my desire.
I entered London, did there what I list,[14]

---

[1] stayed stopped, halted; swaged made less violent, abated.

[2] hales drags, pulls violently.

[3] hap event or occurrence which befalls one; accident, happening.

[4] spill "spile," a form of "spoil": here, to destroy or prevent the full exercise, development, or enjoyment of.

[5] stayers supporters.

[6] appayers "appairs": injures, damages, impairs.

[7] stay keep; estate rank or position in life; also, condition with respect to worldly fortune or prosperity.

[8] bate contention, strife.

[9] mate perhaps, render helpless by terror; daunt; more likely, to equal, rival; to be a match for.

[10] nigh nearly, almost; thralled enslaved. Fabyan notes that the commons of Kent chose their captain "and named him Mortimer, and cousin to the Duke of York" (p. 622). While Fabyan does not explicitly account for this renaming, he has earlier described the conflict between Richard, duke of York, and Henry VI. In contrast, Hall is quite explicit in attributing the Kentish uprising to the machinations of York and his supporters. They, however, hid their involvement by persuading "a certain youngman of goodly stature, and pregnant wit, ... to take upon him the name of John Mortimer, although his name were John Cade, and not for a small policy, thinking that by that surname, the line and lineage of the assistant house of the earl of March, which were no small number, should be to him both adherent, and favourable" (p. 220). Hall emphasizes that Cade and his followers were "suborned" by educated men ("teachers" and "privy schoolmasters") who told them "that their attempt was both honourable to God and the King, and also profitable to the commonwealth" (p. 220). Holinshed's brief account concurs with Hall (Chronicles, 1586, 3.221-23), although he simply notes that Cade's assumed name was aimed at winning the support of the earl of March.

[11] shift stratagem, subterfuge, or trick.

[12] stock source of a line of descent; a family, a kindred (with a pun on the literal meaning of "stock," a tree branch).

[13] ween surmise, believe; linage lineage; base lowly in social terms; plebeian.

[14] list desired, wished.

The treasurer, Lord Sayes,[1] I did conspire
To have condemned: whereof when I missed[2]
(For he by law my malice did resist)[3]
By force I took him in Guildhall from the heap,[4]
And headed[5] him before the cross in Cheap.

His son-in-law, James Cromer, shrive of Kent,[6]
I caught at Mile end, whereas then he lay,
Beheaded him, and on a pole I sent
His head to London, where his father's lay.
With these two heads I made a pretty play,
For pight[7] on poles I bore them through the street,
And for my sport made each kiss other sweet.[8]

Then broke I prisons, let forth whom I would,[9]
And used the city as it had been mine,
Took from the merchants money, ware,[10] and gold:
From some by force, from other some by fine.
This at the length did cause them to repine,[11]
So that Lord Scales[12] consenting with the mayor,
Forbad us to their city to repair.[13]

For all this while mine host in Southwark[14] lay,
Who when they knew our passage was denied,
Came boldly to the bridge and made a fray,[15]
For in we would, the townsmen us defied;
But when with strokes we had the matter tried,
We won the bridge and set much part on fire.
This done to Southwark back we did retire.[16]

The morrow after came the Chancellor[17]
With general pardon for my men half gone,[18]
Which heard and read, the rest within an hour

[1] James Fiennes, Baron Say (or Saye) and Sele (d. 1450), lord chamberlain, member of the King's Council and lord treasurer, was (like William de la Pole, duke of Suffolk) extremely unpopular among the commons and the nobility; he was at various times accused of extortion and poor administration of his offices, as well as of being involved in the supposed murder of Duke Humphrey. Henry VI was pressured finally to send him to the Tower for having consented to the surrender of England's French provinces. Fabyan claims that the King's own army threatened to desert to Cade unless Say was put in the Tower; the King complied (p. 623). Hall is more expansive, noting that Say's imprisonment was motivated by the unrest in the King's army and undertaken by "the King, and certain of his Council not led by favour nor corrupted by rewards (to the intent to appease the furious rage of the inconstant multitude)" (p. 220). Hall adds that if other similarly unpopular councillors had been present they would have likewise been imprisoned: "But it was necessary that one should suffer, rather than all the nobility then should perish" (p. 220).

[2] missed failed (in an attempt or enterprise).

[3] For he by law … resist Say claimed the right to be tried by his aristocratic peers, but he was ignored and hastily beheaded at the large stone cross in Cheapside (London). See Fabyan, p. 624; Hall, p. 221.

[4] Guildhall the hall of the corporation of the city of London, used for municipal meetings, state banquets, trials, etc.; Say had been taken there by Cade's men to be arraigned by the mayor and the King's justices; heap multitude, host.

[5] headed beheaded.

[6] Actually William Crowmer (d. 1450), sheriff of Kent, who was generally despised because of his role in collecting extortionate taxes. See Fabyan, p. 624; Hall, p. 221.

[7] pight fixed.

[8] The description of this macabre treatment of the heads is in both Fabyan (p. 624) and Hall (p. 221). Hall calls Cade in this context a "cruel tyrant" and "bloody butcher"; his actions met with "great detestation of all the beholders."

[9] This detail does not appear in Fabyan, but see Hall, p. 222 (where this incident happens after the battle on London Bridge, below p. 286, ll. 115-19).

[10] ware wares, goods, commodities.

[11] repine murmur discontentedly, complain; on Cade's looting of prominent aldermen and merchants, see Fabyan, p. 624; Hall, p. 221.

[12] Thomas de Scales, seventh Lord of Scales (?1399-1460). Active in the French wars, he was in charge of the Tower (along with Matthew Gough) at the time of Cade's occupation of London, and handed Say over to Cade and his men. See Fabyan, p. 624; Hall, p. 221.

[13] to repair go (to or from a place).

[14] Southwark At this time, a borough which lay outside of the city of London, on the S side of the Thames (Topographical Dict., p. 475).

[15] bridge London Bridge; fray noisy disturbance or skirmish.

[16] On 5 July, the citizens of London, concerned for the security of their property, joined a force under the command of Matthew Gough and occupied London Bridge in an attempt to bar Cade and his men from re-entering the city. In the ensuing battle, Cade's men drove the citizens and Gough's force "from the Southwark end of the bridge to the drawbridge in the centre." Having set the drawbridge on fire and killed many citizens (along with Gough), Cade's men finally retreated (J.G. "John Cade," DNB, p. 625). For accounts of the battle, see Fabyan, p. 625; Hall, pp. 221-22. Hall adds details about Gough, who had served the King as a captain in Normandy, and was "a man of great wit, [and] much experience in feats of chivalry" (p. 222).

[17] Chancellor Cardinal Kemp, archbishop of York. The chancellor was the most important and powerful member of the King's Council.

[18] half gone i.e., half of Cade's men had already deserted him.

Shrank all away, each man to shift for one.[1]
And when I saw they left me post alone,
I did disguise me like a knight of the post,
And into Sussex rode away in post.[2]

And there I lurked, till that cursed coin[3]
That restless beagle[4] sought and found me out.
For straight the King by promise did enjoin
A thousand mark to whosoever mought[5]
Apprend my corse,[6] which made men seek about.
Among the which one Alexander Iden[7]
Found out the hole wherein the fox was hidden.

But ere he took me I put him to his trumps,[8]
For yield I would not while my hands would hold,
But hope of money made him stir his stumps,[9]
And to assault me valiantly and bold.
Two hours and more our combat was not cold,
Till at the last he lent me such a stroke,
That down I fell and never after spoke.

Then was my carcass carried like a hog,
To Southwark borough where it lay a night,
And next day drawn to Newgate[10] like a dog,
All men rejoicing at the rueful[11] sight.
Then were on poles my parboiled quarters pight,[12]
And set aloft for vermin to devour,
Mete grave for rebels that resist the power.

Full little know we wretches what we do
When we presume our princes to resist.
We war with God, against his glory too,
That placeth in his office whom he list.
Therefore was never traitor yet but missed
The mark he shot and came to shameful end,
Nor never shall till God be forced to bend.

God hath ordained the power; all princes be
His lieutenants or debities[13] in realms;
Against their foes still therefore fighteth he,
And as his en'mies drives them to extremes;
Their wise devices prove but doltish dreams;
No subject ought for any kind of cause,
To force the Lord, but yield him to the laws.

And therefore, Baldwin, warn men follow reason,
Subdue their wills, and be not Fortune's slaves.
A troublous end doth ever follow treason;
There is no trust in rebels, rascal knaves,
In Fortune less, which worketh as the waves,

[1] to shift for one to look to his own safety or self-interest. Hall notes this immediate and dramatic effect of the general pardon on Cade's men (p. 222).

[2] Each of these "posts" has a slightly different meaning: left me post alone speedily or hastily abandoned me; knight of the post perhaps, simply a messenger, but the phrase also meant a perjurer or informer, one who made his living by giving false evidence; in post in the manner of a courier or bearer of dispatches; hence, at top speed, in haste. Hall notes explicitly that Cade's own flight was motivated by his perception that the aid promised by York's supporters was not forthcoming (p. 222).

[3] coin referring to the large reward offered by the King for Cade's capture, a thousand marks in Fabyan (p. 624) and Hall (p. 222).

[4] beagle a small hound used to track hares.

[5] mark 2/3 of a pound; mought obsolete past tense of "may."

[6] corse corpse.

[7] Iden was a Kentish gentleman, "who had either already been, or more probably was soon after, appointed sheriff of Kent in place of the murdered [William] Crowmer" (J.G., "John Cade," DNB, p. 625). See p. 286, note 6, above. According to Fabyan and Hall, Iden found Cade in a garden in Sussex. Fabyan simply notes that there was a struggle in which Cade was killed (p. 625). Hall declares that Iden "in his defence manfully slew the caitiff Cade" (p. 222).

[8] put ... trumps i.e., I put him to his last or final expedient.

[9] stumps humorous word for "legs"; thus, "to stir one's stumps": to move briskly, to do one's duty zealously.

[10] Newgate a famous London prison.

[11] rueful pitiful.

[12] According to Fabyan, Cade died in Sussex and his body was taken by cart to London, where it was beheaded and quartered; the head was set up on London Bridge, and his quarters were displayed in four different places in Kent (p. 625). Hall says that Iden "brought [Cade's] dead body to London, whose head was set on London Bridge" (p. 222), but says nothing about Cade being quartered and displayed in Kent. Neither speaks of the preparation of his body parts for their display. The pieces of Cade's body would have been parboiled in order to preserve them, so that they could remain an object lesson to passersby for a long time.

[13] debities deputies.

From whose assaults who list to stand at large,[1]
Must follow skill, and fly all worldly charge.[2]

"By saint Mary," quoth one, "if Jack were as well learned, as you have made his oration, whatsoever he was by birth, I warrant him a gentleman by his learning. How notably and philosopher-like hath he described Fortune and the causes of worldly cumbrance.[3] How uprightly also and how like a divine[4] hath he determined the states both of officers and rebels. For indeed officers be God's deputies, and it is God's office which they bear, and it is he which ordaineth thereto such as himself listeth: good when he favoureth the people, and evil when he will punish them. And therefore whosoever rebelleth against any ruler either good or bad, rebelleth against God, and shall be sure of a wicked[5] end, for God cannot but maintain his deputy. Yet this I note by the way concerning rebels and rebellions: although the Devil raise them, yet God always useth them to his glory, as a part of his justice. For when kings and chief rulers suffer their under-officers to misuse their subjects, and will not hear nor remedy their people's wrongs when they complain, then suffereth God the rebel to rage and to execute that part of his justice which the partial prince would not. For the Lord Sayes, a very corrupt officer, and one whom notwithstanding the King always maintained, was destroyed by this Jack, as was also the Bishop of Salisbury (a proud and covetous prelate) by other of the rebels.[6] And therefore whatsoever prince desireth to live quietly without rebellion must do his subjects right in all things, and punish such officers as grieve or oppress them; thus shall they be sure from all rebellion. And for the clearer opening hereof, it were well done to set forth this Lord Sayes' tragedy."

"What need that," quoth another, "seeing the like example is seen in the Duke of Suffolk, whose doings are declared sufficiently already? Nay, rather let us go forward, for we have a great many behind that may not be omitted, and the time as you see passeth away. As for this Lord Sayes whom Cade so cruelly killed and spitefully used after his death (I dare say) shall be known thereby what he was to all that read or hear this story, for God would never have suffered him to have been so used except he had first deserved it. Therefore, let him go, and with him the Bishop, and all others slain in that rebellion."

[...]

The Second Part of the Mirror for Magistrates.

William Baldwin to the Reader.

The time being come, when (according to our former appointment) we should meet together again to devise upon the tragical affairs of our English rulers, I, with such stories as I had procured and prepared, went to the place wherein we

[1] at large free, at liberty.

[2] skill conscience; charge responsibility, duty. While Fabyan (quite typically for his history) makes no comment on the significance of Cade's overthrow, Hall declares: "This is the success of all rebels, and this fortune chanceth ever to traitors. For where men strive against the stream, their boat never cometh to his pretenced [i.e., intended] port." He also notes that the King showed mercy to those who had participated in the uprising, "consider[ing] both their fragility and innocency, and how they with [i.e., by] perverse people were seduced and deceived: and so punished the stubborn heads, and delivered the ignorant and miserable people, to the great rejoicing of all his subjects" (p. 222). Fabyan simply records that during the trials in Kent eight men were put to death (p. 625).

[3] cumbrance trouble, distress; perhaps, also in the sense of "temptation."

[4] divine theologian.

[5] wicked in the 1559 edition, "wretched."

[6] Fabyan notes that the Bishop of Salisbury "was slain by the commons of that country" (pp. 625-26); Hall ascribes the murder to Salisbury's "own tenants and servants," and claims that it was "from thenceforth daily succeeded [by] murder, slaughter, and dissension" (pp. 222-23). While agreeing with Hall, Holinshed is more expansive, noting that Salisbury "(after he had said mass at Edington) was by his own tenants drawn from the altar, in his alb with his stole about his neck to the top of an hill, and there by them shamefully murdered, and after spoiled [i.e., robbed, pillaged] to the naked skin: they renting [i.e., rending, tearing] his bloody shirt, took every man a piece, and made boast of their wickedness" (Chronicles, 1586, 3.227).

had debated the former part. There found I the printer and all the rest of our friends and furtherers assembled and tarrying for us, save Master Ferrers, who shortly after according to his promise came thither.

When we had blamed him for his long tarrying, he satisfied us fully with this reasonable excuse:

"I have been letted,"[1] quoth he, "divers ways, but chiefly in tarrying for such tragedies as many of our friends at mine instance undertook to discourse, whereof I am sure you will be right glad, for more wits are better than one, and diversity of device[2] is always most pleasant. And although I have presently brought but a few, because no more are ready, yet shall you be sure hereafter to have all the rest, which notable men have undertaken, whereof some are half done, some more, some less, some scarce begun, which maketh me think that the diversity of brains in devising is like the sundriness of beasts in engendering: for some wits are ready and dispatch many matters speedily, like the coney[3] which littereth every month; some other are slow like the oliphant,[4] scarce delivering any matter in ten years. I dispraise neither of these births, for both be natural. But I commend most the mean, which is neither too slow nor too swift, for that is lion-like, and therefore most noble. For the right poet doth neither through haste bring forth swift, feeble rabbits,[5] neither doth he weary men in looking for his strong, jointless oliphants,[6] but in reasonable time he bringeth forth a perfect and lively lion, not a bear whelp that must be longer in licking than in breeding.[7] And yet I know many that do highly like that lumpish delivery. But every man hath his gift, and the diversity of our minds maketh everything to be liked. And therefore while the oliphants are in breeding (to whom I have therefore given the latter stories), I have brought you such as are already done to be published in the mean season,[8] wherein there needeth no further labour, but to place them in due order.

"Lo you, Baldwin, here is of mine own the Duke of Somerset slain at St. Albans with others, which I promised, whom I wish you should place last. There is also Shore's wife, trimly handled by Master Churchyard,[9] which I pray you place where you think most convenient. Here are others also of other men's, but they are rabbits. Do with them as you think best. I would tarry with a good will and help you in the order, save that my business is great and weighty, but I know you can do it well enough, and therefore, till we meet again I will leave you." Then delivered he the tragedies unto me and departed.

Divers of the rest liking his device used the like manner, for the printer delivered unto me the Lord Hastings penned by Master Dolman, and King Richard III complied by Francis Segars.[10]

Then said I, "Well, my masters, since you think it good to charge me with the order,[11] I am contented therewith, for as you have done, so have I likewise procured some of my friends to aid us in our labour. For Master Sackville hath aptly

---

1 letted hindered, prevented.

2 device manner of invention; creative approach.

3 coney rabbit.

4 oliphant elephant. Pliny notes the extraordinary length of an elephant's gestation period (Natural History, 1.197), and also that an elephant will give birth to only a single baby at a time (1.303).

5 "Rabbits" was a word often applied contemptuously to individuals, especially novices or poor performers in a sport or game.

6 That elephants have unusual joints is also in Pliny (1.350).

7 It was a Renaissance commonplace that new-born bears were not completely formed and had to be licked into shape by their mothers (Pliny, Natural History, 1.215-16).

8 mean season meantime.

9 Thomas Churchyard (?1520-1604), writer and poet, is most famous for his contribution to Mirror, "Shore's Wife" (selected below). However, he also wrote satirical broadsides, lyric verse, autobiographical verse (an account of his adventures during military service in Scotland, Ireland, the Low Countries, and France), epitaphs, war tracts, moral discourses, and a poem on the particular regions and districts of Wales (A.H.B., "Thomas Churchyard," DNB, pp. 343-46).

10 Francis Dolman is not in DNB; Francis Segar or Seager (fl. 1549-63), translator and poet. Apart from his contribution to Mirror ("How Richard Plantagenet, Duke of Gloucester, Murdered His Brother's Children, Usurping the Crown"), Segar wrote moral verse, translations of the Psalms, and a popular versified education manual (R.B., "Francis Segar or Seagar," DNB, pp. 1134-35).

11 to charge me with the order i.e., to give me the responsibility of determining the order or organization of the various pieces; perhaps (more generally) to give me the responsibility for determining how we will proceed.

ordered[1] the Duke of Buckingham's Oration, and Master Cavil the blacksmith's, and others."[2]

"I pray you," quoth one of the company, "let us hear them."

"Nay, soft,"[3] quoth I, "we will take the chronicles, and note their places, and as they come, so will we orderly read them all."

To this they all agreed. Then one took the chronicle, whom therefore we made, and call, the reader, and he began to read the story of Prince Edward, called the fifth king of that name, and when he came to the apprehending of the Lord Rivers: "Stay there, I pray you," quoth I, "for here is his complaint." [...]

[...]

When I had read this, they liked it very well. [...] [One] moved a question about a great matter, and that is the variance of the chroniclers about the Lord Thomas Gray, Marquis Dorset, whom Fabyan everywhere calleth the Queen's brother; Sir Thomas More and Hall call him the Queen's son. Fabyan sayeth he was governor of the Prince, and had the conveyance of him from Ludlow towards London. The other (whom we follow) say he was then at London with the Queen, providing for the King's coronation, and took sanctuary with her as soon as he heard of the apprehending of his uncle.[4] This disagreeing of writers is a great hindrance of the truth, and no small cumbrance[5] to such as be diligent readers, besides the harm that may happen in succession of heritages.[6] It were therefore a worthy and a good deed for the nobility to cause all the records to be sought, and a true and perfect chronicle thereout to be written, unto which we refer the deciding of this, and of all other like controversies, giving this to understand in the mean time: that no man shall think his title either better or worse by anything that is written in any part of this treatise. For the only thing which is purposed herein, is by example of others' miseries to dissuade all men from all sins and vices. If by the way we touch anything concerning titles, we follow herein Hall's chronicle. And where we seem to swerve from his reasons and causes of divers doings, there we gather upon conjecture such things as seem most probable, or at the least most convenient for the furtherance of our purpose.

[...]

When I had read this, one said it was very dark,[7] and hard to be understood, except it were diligently and very leisurely considered.

"I like it the better," quoth another, "for that shall cause it to be the oftener read and the better remembered. Considering also that it is written for the learned (for such all magistrates are or should be), it cannot be too hard so long as it is sound and learnedly written."

Then said the reader: "The next here whom I find miserable are the King Edward's two sons, cruelly murdered in the Tower of London. Have you their tragedy?"

---

1 ordered arranged, presented.

2 Thomas Sackville, first earl of Dorset and Baron Buckhurst (1536-1608), lawyer, courtier, MP, and one of Elizabeth's favourites. His most important literary works are his contributions to Mirror ("The Induction" [selected below] and the "Complaint of the Duke of Buckingham") and Gorboduc (1560/61), the first English tragedy in blank verse (written with Thomas Norton [1532-84]); Cavil Critics disagree over his identity, with the two main contenders being Nicholas Kervile [Carvell] (1527/28-66), Church of England clergyman and writer of Latin verse; and James Calfhill, later archdeacon of Colchester, also a writer of Latin poetry (B. Usher, "Nicholas Kervile [Carvell]," DNB online, 2005).

3 soft interjection: "Not so fast!"; "Wait a moment!"

4 For this disagreement between Mirror's three sources, see Fabyan, p. 670; Hall, p. 264; and More, p. 10. The prince referred to is Edward V, whose life and reign were both brought to an abrupt end by the usurping Richard III, the prince's uncle (Hall, pp. 349-51).

5 cumbrance hindrance, impediment.

6 succession of heritages a reference to succession in terms of title, land, property, and inheritance.

7 dark obscure of meaning, difficult to be understood. The company has just finished hearing the tragedy of "How the Lord Hastings Was Betrayed by the Trusting Too Much to His Evil Counsellor Catesby, and Villainously Murdered in the Tower of London by Richard, Duke of Gloucester."

"No, surely," quoth I, "the Lord Vaulx[1] undertook to pen it, but what he hath done therein I am not certain, and therefore I let it pass till I know farther. I have here the Duke of Buckingham, King Richard's chief instrument, written by Master Thomas Sackville."

"Read it, we pray you," said they.

"With a good will," quoth I, "but first you shall hear his preface or induction."

"Hath he made a preface?" quoth one. "What meaneth he thereby, seeing none other hath used the like order?"

"I will tell you the cause thereof," quoth I, "which is this: after that he understood that some of the Council would not suffer the book to be printed in such order as we had agreed and determined, he purposed with himself to have gotten, at my hands, all the tragedies that were before the Duke of Buckingham's, which he would have preserved in one volume. And from that time backward, even to the time of William the Conqueror, he determined to continue and perfect all the story himself, in such order as Lydgate (following Bocchas) had already used. And therefore to make a meet induction into the matter, he devised this poesy, which in my judgement is so well penned that I would not have any verse thereof left out of our volume. Now that you know the cause and meaning of his doing, you shall also hear what he hath done. His induction beginneth thus:

The Induction

The wrathful winter proaching[2] on apace,
With blust'ring blasts had all ybared the treen,[3]
And old Saturnus,[4] with his frosty face,
With chilling cold had pierced the tender green;
The mantles rent, wherein enwrapped been
The gladsome groves that now lay overthrown,
The tapets[5] torn, and every bloom down blown.

The soil, that erst[6] so seemly was to seen,
Was all despoiled of her beauty's hue;
And soote[7] fresh flowers (wherewith the summer's queen
Had clad the earth) now Boreas'[8] blasts down blew;
And small fowls flocking, in their song did rue
The winter's wrath, wherewith each thing defast[9]
In woeful wise[10] bewailed the summer past.

Hawthorn had lost his motley livery,[11]
The naked twigs were shivering all for cold,
And dropping down the tears abundantly,
Each thing (methought) with weeping eye me told
The cruel season, bidding me withhold
Myself within, for I was gotten out
Into the fields, whereas I walked about.

[...]

And sorrowing I to see the summer flow'rs,
The lively green, the lusty leas[12] forlorn,
The sturdy trees so shattered with the show'rs,
The fields so fade that flourished so beforn,[13]

---

[1] Lord Vaulx Thomas Vaux, second Baron Vaux of Harrowden (1510-56), lyric poet. Two of his best-known poems were printed in Tottel's Miscellany (1557). L.B. Campbell notes that since he died before the publication of the 1563 Mirror, it is likely that parts of this edition, like that of 1559, were prepared and ready for printing in the reign of Mary ("Introduction," The Mirror for Magistrates, Edited from Original Texts in the Huntington Library [Cambridge, 1938], p. 13).

[2] proaching approaching.

[3] ybared the treen stripped the trees.

[4] Saturnus In astrology, Saturn (on account of its remoteness and slowness of motion) was supposed to cause coldness, sluggishness, and gloominess of temperament in those born under its influence, and in general to have a baleful effect on human affairs.

[5] tapet a piece of figured cloth used as a hanging, table-cover, carpet or the like; here, the flowers and green plants covering the ground or (again) the trees themselves.

[6] erst earlier, formerly.

[7] soote sweet.

[8] Boreas god of the north-wind.

[9] defast defaced: ruined, spoiled.

[10] wise way.

[11] motley livery The "clothing" of the hawthorn tree was often described as "white motley."

[12] leas meadows.

[13] beforn obsolete form of "before" (previously).

It taught me well all earthly things be born
To die the death, for nought long time may last.
The summer's beauty yields to winter's blast.

Then looking upward to the heaven's leams,[1]
With night's stars thick powdered everywhere,
Which erst so glistened with the golden streams
That cheerful Phoebus spread down from his sphere,
Beholding dark oppressing day so near;
The sudden sight reduced[2] to my mind
The sundry changes that in earth we find.

That musing on this worldly wealth in thought,
Which comes and goes more faster than we see
The flickering flame that with the fire is wrought,
My busy mind presented unto me
Such fall of peers as in this realm had be:[3]
That oft I wished some would their woes descrive,[4]
To warn the rest whom Fortune left alive.

And strait forth[5] stalking with redoubled pace,
For that I saw the night drew on so fast,
In black all clad there fell before my face
A piteous wight, whom woe had all forwast;[6]
Forth from her eyen the crystal tears outbrast,[7]
And sighing sore,[8] her hands she wrung and fold,
Tare all her hair that ruth[9] was to behold.

Her body small, forwithered and forespent,[10]
As is the stalk that summer's drought oppressed;
Her wealked face with woeful tears besprent,[11]
Her colour pale, and (as it seemed her best)
In woe and plaint reposed was her rest;
And as the stone that drops of water wears,
So dented were her cheeks with fall of tears.

Her eyes swollen with flowing streams afloat;
Wherewith her looks thrown up full piteously,
Her forceless hands together oft she smote,
With doleful shrieks that echoed in the sky;
Whose plaint such sighs did straight accompany
That in my doom[12] was never man did see
A wight[13] but half so woebegone as she.

I stood aghast beholding all her plight,
'Tween dread and dolour[14] so distrained in heart
That while my hairs upstarted with the sight,
The tears outstreamed with sorrow of her smart;[15]
But when I saw no end that could apart[16]
The deadly dewle[17] which she so sore did make,
With doleful[18] voice then thus to her I spake:

"Unwrap thy woes, whatever wight thou be,
And stint betime to spill[19] thyself with plaint;
Tell what thou art, and whence, for well I see
Thou canst not dure with sorrow thus attaint."[20]
And with that word of 'sorrow' all forfaint[21]
She looked up, and prostrate as she lay,
With piteous sound lo thus she gan to say:

---

1 leams lights, gleams of light.
2 reduced brought back, recalled [to one's memory or mind] (a common sixteenth-century usage).
3 had be i.e., had been.
4 descrive describe; specifically, in the sense of "write down."
5 strait forth immediately, at once.
6 wight chiefly with (good or bad) epithet, applied to supernatural, preternatural, or unearthly beings (obsolete or rare usage); forwast forwaste: emaciated, terribly enfeebled.
7 eyen eyes; outbrast outburst.
8 sore deeply, with great grief or distress.
9 Tare tore; ruth pity.
10 forwithered withered or dried up; forespent worn out with toil, sorrow, etc.
11 wealked whelked: withered, faded, dried up; besprent besprinkled.
12 doom personal judgement or opinion.
13 wight person, living creature.
14 dolour grief, sorrow.
15 smart mental pain, suffering, affliction (physical suffering implied as well).
16 apart verb: put aside, remove.
17 dewle obsolete form of "dule, dole, dool": grief, mourning.
18 doleful full of grief; sorrowful.
19 stint cease; leave off, forbear; betime soon, forthwith; spill destroy, ruin, overthrow.
20 dure endure; attaint attainted: overcome, overpowered, exhausted.
21 all forfaint completely and extremely faint.

"Alas, I wretch whom thus thou seest distrained[1]
With wasting woes that never shall aslake,[2]
Sorrow I am, in endless torment pained,
Among the Furies in the infernal lake,[3]
Where Pluto, god of Hell, so grisly[4] black,
Doth hold his throne, and Letheus' deadly taste
Doth reave remembrance of each thing
forepast.[5]

"Whence come I am, the dreary destiny
And luckless lot for to bemoan of those Whom Fortune, in this maze of misery
Of wretched chance, most woeful mirrors chose;
That when thou seest how lightly[6] they did lose
Their pomp, their power, and that they thought most sure,
Thou mayest soon deem no earthly joy more dure."

[...]

[Sorrow leads the narrator on a Dante-esque journey to Hell, where he sees the following sights.]

An hideous hole all vast, withouten shape,
Of endless depth, o'erwhelmed with ragged
stone,
With ugly mouth and grisly jaws doth gape,
And to our sight confounds itself in one.
Here entered we, and yeding forth, anon[7]
An horrible loathly lake we might discern,
As black as pitch, that cleped is Averne.[8]

A deadly gulf where nought but rubbish grows,
With foul black swelth[9] in thickened lumps that lies,
Which up in the air such stinking vapours throws
That over there may fly no fowl but dies,
Choked with the pestilent savours that arise.
Hither we come, whence forth we still did pace,
In dreadful fear amid the dreadful place.

And first within the porch and jaws of Hell
Sat deep Remorse of Conscience, all besprent
With tears: and to herself oft would she tell
Her wretchedness, and cursing never stent[10]
To sob and sigh, but ever thus lament
With thoughtful care as she that all in vain
Would wear and waste continually in pain.

Her eyes unsteadfast rolling here and there,
Whirled on each place, as place that vengeance brought,
So was her mind continually in fear,
Tossed and tormented with the tedious thought
Of those detested crimes which she had wrought:
With dreadful cheer[11] and looks thrown to the sky,
Wishing for death, and yet she could not die.

Next saw we Dread all trembling how he shook,
With foot uncertain proffered here and there,
Benumbed of speech and with a ghastly look
Searched every place all pale and dead for fear,
His cap borne up with staring of his hear,[12]
Stonyed and amazed at his own shade for dreed,[13]
And fearing greater dangers than was need.

---

1 distrained oppressed, afflicted.

2 aslake diminish, abate.

3 Also known as the Erinyes, the Furies were supernatural beings who visited vengeance upon a person guilty of crimes, particularly blood crimes, against his or her family. Orestes murders his mother and is subsequently driven mad by the Furies.

4 grisly causing horror or terror; causing feelings usually associated with thoughts of death, "the other world," ghosts, demons, etc.

5 reave take from, tear from by force; forepast that which has previously passed.

6 lightly easily; but in early use also, "swiftly."

7 yeding A pseudo-archaism of sixteenth-century poets and their imitators, "yede" is the past tense of "go"; anon straightaway, at once.

8 cleped named, called; Averne Avernus or Hell.

9 swelth foul or troubled water.

10 stent cease, stop.

11 wrought committed, performed, done; cheer look or expression of the face.

12 staring standing up; hear hair.

13 Stonyed astonyed: stunned; shade shadow; dreed dread.

And next within the entry of this lake
Sat fell Revenge gnashing her teeth for ire,[1]
Devising means how she may vengeance take,
Never in rest till she have her desire;
But frets within so farforth[2] with the fire
Of wreaking flames, that now determines she
To die by death, or 'venged by death to be.

When fell Revenge with bloody foul pretence
Had showed herself as next in order set,
With trembling limbs we softly parted thence,
Till in our eyes another sight we met:
When from my heart a sigh forthwith I fet,[3]
Ruing alas upon[4] the woeful plight
Of Misery, that next appeared in sight.

His face was lean and somedeal pined[5] away,
And eke[6] his hands consumed to the bone,
But what his body was I cannot say,
For on his carcass raiment[7] had he none
Save clouts[8] and patches pieced one by one.
With staff in hand and scrip[9] on shoulders cast,
His chief defence against the winter's blast.

His food, for most, was wild fruits of the tree,
Unless sometime some crumbs fell to his share,
Which in his wallet, long, God wot,[10] kept he,
As on the which full daint'ly would he fare;
His drink, the running stream; his cup, the bare
Of his palm closed; his bed, the hard cold ground.
To this poor life was Misery ybound.

Whose wretched state when we had well beheld,
With tender ruth on him and on his feres,[11]
In thoughtful cares, forth then our pace we held.
And by and by another shape appears
Of greedy Care, still brushing up the breres,[12]
His knuckles knobbed, his flesh deep dented in,
With tawed[13] hands, and hard ytanned skin.

The morrow gray no sooner hath begun
To spread his light, even peeping in our eyes,
When he is up and to his work yrun,
But let the night's black misty mantles rise,
And with foul dark never so much disguise
The fair bright day, yet ceaseth he no while,
But hath his candles to prolong his toil.

By him lay heavy Sleep, the cousin of Death,
Flat on the ground, and still as any stone,
A very corpse, save yielding forth a breath;
Small keep[14] took he whom Fortune frowned on,
Or whom she lifted up into the trone[15]
Of high renown, but as a living death,
So dead alive, of life he drew the breath.

The body's rest, the quiet of the heart,
The travail's ease, the still night's fere was he,
And of our life in earth the better part;
Reaver[16] of sight, and yet in whom we see Things oft that tide,[17] and oft that never be.
Without respect esteeming equally
King Croesus' pomp and Irus' poverty.[18]

---

[1] fell fierce, savage; terrible; ire wrath, anger.
[2] farforth to such a great extent.
[3] forthwith at once, immediately; fet fetched.
[4] Ruing … upon having pity or compassion for.
[5] somedeal somewhat, partly; pined exhausted or wasted by suffering (or hunger).
[6] eke also, moreover.
[7] raiment clothing, apparel.
[8] clouts patches of cloth, leather, metal, etc., used for mending.
[9] scrip small bag or satchel, especially one carried by a pilgrim, shepherd, or beggar.
[10] wallet a bag for holding provisions, especially, for a journey on foot or horseback; wot knows.
[11] feres companions, comrades.
[12] breres briars.
[13] tawed tanned.
[14] Small keep little notice, care, or attention.
[15] trone throne.
[16] Reaver robber, plunderer.
[17] tide befall, happen (the difference here is between dreams that do and dreams that do not foretell the future).
[18] Croesus was an ancient king of Lydia (mid-6th century BCE), whose wealth was proverbial. In Homer's Odyssey, Irus is a beggar in Odysseus' island kingdom of Ithaca. Although his real name is Arnaeus, he is nicknamed Irus, "since he was at everyone's beck and call for an errand" (Bk. 18, ll. 1-7). When he tries to stop Odysseus from entering the palace, Odysseus fells him with a single blow. His poverty became proverbial (Iro pauperior: "Poorer than Irus").

And next in order sad Old Age we found,
His beard all hoar, his eyes hollow and blind,
With drooping cheer[1] still pouring on the ground,
As on the place where nature him assigned
To rest, when that the sisters had untwined
His vital thread and ended with their knife
The fleeting course of fast declining life.[2]

There heard we him with broken and hollow plaint
Rue with himself his end approaching fast,
And all for nought his wretched mind torment
With sweet remembrance of his pleasures past,
And fresh delights of lusty youth forwaste.
Recounting which, how would he sob and shriek,
And to be young again of Jove beseek.

But and the cruel Fates so fixed be
That time forepast cannot return again,
This one request of Jove yet prayed he:
That in such withered plight and wretched pain
As eld (accompanied with his loathsome train),[3]
Had brought on him, all were it woe and grief,
He might a while yet linger forth his lief,[4]

And not so soon descend into the pit,
Where death, when he the mortal corpse hath slain,
With retchless[5] hand in grave doth cover it,
Thereafter never to enjoy again
The gladsome light, but in the ground ylain,
In depth of darkness waste and wear to nought,
As he had never into the world been brought.

But who had seen him sobbing, how he stood
Unto himself and how he would bemoan
His youth forepast, as though it wrought him good
To talk of youth, all were his youth foregone,
He would have mused and marvelled much, whereon
This wretched Age should life desire so fain,[6]
And knows full well life doth but length his pain.

Crookbacked he was, tooth-shaken, and bleareyed,
Went on three feet, and sometime crept on four,[7]
With old lame bones that rattled by his side,
His scalp all pilled[8] and he with eld forlore;
His withered fist still knocking at Death's door,
Fumbling and drivelling as he draws his breath;
For brief, the shape and messenger of Death.

And fast by him pale Malady was placed,
Sore[9] sick in bed, her colour all foregone,
Bereft of stomach,[10] savour, and of taste,
Ne could she brook[11] no meat but broths alone.
Her breath corrupt, her keepers every one
Abhorring her, her sickness past recure,[12]
Detesting physic[13] and all physic's cure.

But oh, the doleful sight that then we see!
We turned our look and on the other side
A grisly shape of Famine mought[14] we see,
With greedy looks and gaping mouth that cried
And roared for meat as she should there have died;
Her body thin and bare as any bone,
Whereto was left nought but the case[15] alone.

And that alas was gnawn on everywhere,
All full of holes, that I ne mought refrain
From tears to see how she her arms could tear,
And with her teeth gnash on the bones in vain,

---

1 cheer look, mien, countenance.
2 The sisters here are the three Fates. See p. 302, note 10.
3 eld old age; train attendants.
4 lief life.
5 retchless reckless: negligent, careless.
6 fain eagerly.
7 I.e., he sometimes used a cane and sometimes crawled on all fours.
8 pilled made bare of hair, made bald.
9 Sore seriously, grievously.
10 Bereft of stomach deprived of appetite.
11 brook endure, tolerate.
12 recure remedy, cure.
13 physic the medicines and curative practices of physicians.
14 mought might.
15 case skin.

When all for nought she fain would so sustain
Her starven corpse, that rather seemed a shade
Than any substance of a creature made.

Great was her force, whom stone wall could not stay,[1]
Her tearing nails snatching at all she saw;
With gaping jaws that by no means ymay
Be satisfied from hunger of her maw,[2]
But eats herself as she that hath no law;
Gnawing alas her carcass all in vain,
Where you may count each sinew, bone, and vein.

On her while we thus firmly fixed our eyes,
That bled for ruth of such a dreary sight,
Lo, suddenly she shright in so huge wise[3]
As made Hell gates to shiver with the might;
Wherewith a dart[4] we saw, how it did light
Right on her breast, and therewithal pale Death
Enthrilling it, to reave[5] her of her breath.

And by and by a dumb[6] dead corpse we saw,
Heavy and cold, the shape of Death aright,
That daunts[7] all earthly creatures to his law;
Against whose force in vain it is to fight;
Ne peers, ne princes, nor no mortal wight,
No towns, ne realms, cities, ne strongest tower,
But all, perforce,[8] must yield unto his power.

His dart anon out of the corpse he took,
And in his hand (a dreadful sight to see)
With great triumph eftsoons[9] the same he shook,
That most of all my fears affrayed[10] me;
His body dight with nought but bones perdy[11]
The naked shape of man there saw I plain,
All save the flesh, the sinew, and the vein.

Lastly stood War in glittering arms yclad.
With visage grim, stern looks, and blackly hued,
In his right hand a naked sword he had,
That to the hilts was all with blood embrued;
And in his left (that kings and kingdoms rued)
Famine and fire he held, and therewithal
He razed towns, and threw down towers and all.

Cities he sacked and realms that whilom[12] flowered
In honour, glory, and the rule above the best,
He overwhelmed and all their fame devoured,
Consumed, destroyed, wasted, and never ceased,
Till he their wealth, their name, and all oppressed.
His face forhewed[13] with wounds, and by his side
There hung his targe[14] with gashes deep and wide.

[The shield is decorated with a picture of Deadly Debate, depicted like Medusa, her snaky hair bound with a blood-stained cloth. Around her, there are depictions of various scenes of war, conquest, and pillage, such as Macedo's (Alexander the Great of Macedon's) destruction of Darius and his army, Hannibal's victories over the Romans, and the destruction of Cyrus and his army, among others.]

But Troy alas (methought) above them all,
It made mine eyes in very tears consume;
When I beheld the woeful word befall,
That by the wrathful will of gods was come,
And Jove's unmoved sentence and foredoom[15]
On Priam king, and on his town so bent,[16]
I could not lin,[17] but I must there lament.

---

1 stay detain, hold back; contain.
2 maw stomach.
3 shright shrieked; in so huge wise in so immense or overwhelming a way.
4 dart a pointed missile, such as a javelin, light spear, arrow, etc.
5 Enthrilling piercing; reave rob, plunder.
6 dumb speechless.
7 daunts brings into subjection.
8 perforce forcibly; of necessity; under compulsion.
9 eftsoons afterwards.
10 affrayed alarmed, frightened.
11 dight clothed, dressed; perdy perdie, pardie: certainly, assuredly
12 whilom once long ago, formerly, previously.
13 forhewed hewed or cut to pieces.
14 targe a light shield.
15 foredoom a doom or judgement pronounced beforehand; destiny.
16 Priam king of Troy, father of Paris. Paris's kidnapping of Helen, wife of King Menelaus, sparked the Trojan war; bent directed against.
17 lin desist from, cease, stop.

And that the more sith[1] Destiny was so stern
As force perforce, there might no force avail,
But she[2] must fall, and by her fall we learn
That cities, tow'rs, wealth, world, and all shall quail.
No manhood, might, nor nothing mought prevail,
All were there pressed[3] full many a prince and peer,
And many a knight that sold his death full dear.

Not worthy Hector, worthiest of them all,
Her hope, her joy, his force is now for nought.
O Troy, Troy, there is no boot but bale,[4]
The hugy[5] horse within thy walls is brought;
Thy turrets fall, thy knights, that whilom fought
In arms amid the field, are slain in bed,
Thy gods defiled and all thy honour dead.

The flames upspring and cruelly they creep
From wall to roof till all to cinders waste;
Some fire the houses where the wretches sleep,
Some rush in here, some run in there as fast;
In everywhere or sword or fire they taste;
The walls are torn, the towers whirled to the ground;
There is no mischief but may there be found.

Cassandra yet there saw I how they haled[6]
From Pallas' house, with spercled tress[7] undone,
Her wrists fast bound and with Greeks' rout empaled;[8]
And Priam eke,[9] in vain how did he run
To arms, whom Pyrrhus with despite hath done
To cruel death, and bathed him in the bain[10]
Of his son's blood, before the altar slain.[11]

But how can I descrive the doleful[12] sight
That in the shield so life-like fair did shine?
Sith in this world I think was never wight
Could have set forth the half, not half so fine.
I can no more but tell how there is seen
Fair Ilium fall in burning red gledes[13] down,
And from the soil great Troy, Neptunus' town.[14]

Herefrom when scarce I could mine eyes withdraw
That filled with tears as doth the springing well,
We passed on so farforth till we saw
Rude Acheron, a loathsome lake to tell,
That boils and bubs[15] up swelth as black as Hell,
Where grisly Charon, at their fixed tide,
Still ferries ghosts unto the farther side.[16]

The aged god no sooner Sorrow spied,
But hasting straight unto the bank apace,[17]
With hollow call unto the rout[18] he cried

---

1 sith since, seeing that.

2 she i.e., Troy.

3 All were there i.e., even though there were; pressed slaughtered, executed [as opposed to those knights who died fighting, killing some of the enemy before they themselves were killed, and therefore "selling their deaths full dear"].

4 no boot but bale no help or deliverance but only evil.

5 hugy huge. The Greeks hid themselves inside a large wooden horse, which they pretended to have left as a gift to the goddess Minerva. The Trojans took it within the city walls; in the night, the Greek soldiers poured out and sacked the city. See Virgil's Aeneid, Bk. 2.

6 haled dragged violently.

7 Pallas' house the temple of Pallas Athena (Minerva), the goddess of wisdom, whose priestess Cassandra was (Aeneid, 2.402-406). Cassandra was a prophetess and one of the daughters of King Priam; spercled unclear, perhaps "scattered" or "sparkled"; tress a plait or braid of hair.

8 rout violence; empaled made pale.

9 eke also.

10 bain a quantity of liquid placed in a suitable receptacle in which one may bathe.

11 The Greek warrior Pyrrhus killed Polites right in front of his parents, Priam and Hecuba. Pyrrhus proceeded to drag Priam through his son's blood and then killed him before the altar of Priam's household gods (Aeneid, 2.526-38; 550-53).

12 doleful distressing, sorrowful, mournful.

13 Ilium another name for Troy; gledes live coals; embers.

14 The sea god, Neptune, was the patron of Troy.

15 bubs throws up in bubbles.

16 Acheron was one of the principal rivers (not lakes) of Hades, across which Charon, the ferryman of the Underworld, transported the souls of the dead.

17 apace immediately, at once.

18 hollow not full-toned; sepulchral; rout disorderly crowd.

To swarve apart and give the goddess place;
Straight it was done, when to the shore we pace,
Where hand in hand as we then linked fast,
Within the boat we are together plast.[1]

And forth we launch full fraughted[2] to the brink,
When with the unwonted weight,[3] the rusty keel
Began to crack as if the same should sink;
We hoise[4] up mast and sail, that in a while
We set the shore, where scarcely we had while[5]
For to arrive, but that we heard anon
A three-sound bark confounded[6] all in one.

We had not long forth passed but that we saw
Black Cerberus,[7] the hideous hound of Hell,
With bristles reared and with a three-mouthed jaw,
Foredinning[8] the air with his horrible yell.
Out of the deep dark cave where he did dwell,
The goddess straight he knew, and by and by[9]
He peaced and couched[10] while that we passed by.

Thence come we to the horror and the Hell,
The large great kingdoms and the dreadful reign
Of Pluto[11] in his throne where he did dwell,
The wide waste places and the hugy plain:
The wailings, shrieks, and sundry sorts of pain,
The sighs, the sobs, the deep and deadly groan,
Earth, air, and all, resounding plaint and moan.

Here puled[12] the babes, and here the maids unwed
With folded hands their sorry chance[13] bewailed,
Here wept the guiltless slain, and lovers dead,
That slew themselves when nothing else availed;
A thousand sorts of sorrows here that wailed
With sighs and tears, sobs, shrikes, and all yfere,[14]
That (oh alas) it was a hell to hear.

We stayed us straight, and with a rueful fear,
Beheld this heavy sight, while from mine eyes,
The vapoured tears downstilled here and there,
And Sorrow eke in far more woeful wise.
Took on with plaint, up heaving to the skies
Her wretched hands, that with her cry the rout
Gan all in heaps to swarm us round about.

"Lo here," quoth Sorrow, "princes of renown,
That whilom sat on top of Fortune's wheel
Now laid full low, like wretches whirled down,
Even with one frown, that stayed[15] but with a smile,
And now behold the thing that thou erewhile
Saw only in thought, and what thou now shalt hear Recompt the same to kesar,[16] king, and peer."

[...]

"How like you this, my masters?" quoth I.

"Very well," said one. "The tragedy[17] excelleth; the invention also of the induction and the descriptions are notable. But whereas[18] he feigneth to talk with princes in Hell, that I am sure

[1] plast placed.
[2] fraughted laden, loaded.
[3] The "unwonted weight" is that of the narrator, not a spirit but flesh and blood.
[4] hoise hoist.
[5] while noun: time.
[6] confounded mixed or mingled in a confused way.
[7] Cerberus the three-headed dog that guarded the entrance to the classical Underworld.
[8] Foredinning filling with noise; resounding throughout.
[9] straight immediately, straightaway; by and by directly, at once.
[10] peaced became still and silent; couched crouched; laid down.
[11] Pluto god of the Underworld.
[12] puled whined, cried
[13] chance fortune, destiny.
[14] yfere together.
[15] stayed remained standing.
[16] Recompt recount; kesar kaiser: caesar, emperor.
[17] Following "The Induction" is "The Complaint of Henry, Duke of Buckingham." In the last three stanzas of "The Induction," Buckingham approaches Sorrow and the narrator, "wringing his hands," "with ghastly looks," tearing his cloak, beating his "manly breast," and sighing. He then tells his tale.
[18] whereas seeing that, considering that.

will be misliked, because it is most certain that some of their souls be in Heaven. And although he herein do follow allowed poets in their description of Hell, yet it savoureth so much of Purgatory,[1] which the papists have digged thereout, that the ignorant may thereby be deceived."

"Not a whit, I warrant you," quoth I. "For he meaneth not by his Hell the place either of damned souls, or of such as lie for their fees,[2] but rather the grave, wherein the dead bodies of all sorts of people do rest till time of the Resurrection. And in this sense is Hell taken often in the Scriptures and the writings of learned Christians. And so (as he himself hath told me) he meaneth, and so would have it taken."

"Tush," quoth another, "what stand we hereupon? It is a poesy and no divinity,[3] and it is lawful for poets to feign what they list so it be appurtenant to the matter. And therefore let it pass even in such sort as you have read it."

"With a good will," quoth I. "But whereas you say a poet may feign what he list, indeed methink it should be so, and ought to be well taken of the hearers, but it hath not at all times been so allowed."

"Ye say truth," quoth the reader, "for here followeth in the story, that after the death of this Duke, one Collingbourne was cruelly put to death for making of a rhyme."[4]

[...]

[1] Purgatory In the Roman Catholic faith, a place where the souls of the faithful departed are punished and purged before being admitted to Heaven.

[2] such as lie for their fees i.e., lawyers.

[3] divinity theology; theological or doctrinal text.

[4] For the tragedy "How Collingbourne Was Cruelly Executed for Making a Foolish Rhyme," see the "Additional Online Texts."

How Shore's Wife, Edward the Fourth's Concubine, Was by King Richard Despoiled of All Her Goods and Forced to Do Open Penance[5]

Among the rest by Fortune overthrown,
I am not least that most may wail her fate.
My fame and bruit[6] abroad the world is blown;
Who can forget a thing thus done so late?[7]
My great mischance, my fall, and heavy state
Is such a mark[8] whereat each tongue doth shoot,
That my good name is plucked up by the root.

This wand'ring world bewitched me with wiles,
And won my wits with wanton sugared joys.
In Fortune's freaks[9] who trusts her when she smiles
Shall find her false and full of fickle toys;
Her triumphs all but fill our ears with noise;
Her flattering gifts are pleasures mixed with pain;
Yea, all her words are thunders threat'ning rain.

The fond desire that we in glory set
Doth thirl our hearts to hope in slipper hap.[10]
A blast of pomp is all the fruit we get,
And under that lies hid a sudden clap.[11]
In seeking rest unwares we fall in trap;
In groping flowers with nettles stung we are;
In labouring long we reap the crop of care.

[5] The author is Thomas Churchyard. See p. 289, note 9. Jane Shore (d. 1527?), daughter of a London merchant, and wife of the goldsmith, William Shore, became Edward IV's mistress around 1470, and the chroniclers agree that she had enormous influence over him. The story of Jane Shore is not in Fabyan. The main source for what follows is More, although Hall adds a few details to what he essentially reprints from More's account (Chronicles, pp. 363-64).

[6] fame and bruit celebrity and reputation or report.

[7] late recently, not long ago.

[8] mark a target in shooting.

[9] freaks a sudden, causeless change or turn of mind; capricious notion or whim.

[10] thirl probably "pierce," but perhaps also "enslave" (there are not many examples of figurative uses of this word in OED); slipper hap unstable and unreliable chance or fortune.

[11] clap sharp blow.

[...]

Myself for proof, lo, here I now appear
In woman's weed[1] with weeping, watered eyes,
That bought her youth and her delights full dear,
Whose loud reproach doth sound unto the skies,
And bids my corse out of the grave to rise,
As one that may no longer hide her face,
But needs must come and show her piteous case.

The sheet of shame wherein I shrouded was
Did move me oft to plain[2] before this day,
And in mine ears did ring the trump of brass,
Which is defame that doth each vice bewray.[3]
Yea though full dead and low in earth I lay,
I heard the voice of me what people sayde,
But then to speak, alas, I was affrayde.[4]

And now a time for me I see prepared;
I hear the lives and falls of many wights.
My tale, therefore, the better may be heard,
For at the torch the little candle lights.[5]
Where pageants be, small things fill out the sights.
Wherefore give ear, good Baldwin, do thy best,
My tragedy to place among the rest.

Because that truth shall witness well with thee,
I will rehearse in order as it fell
My life, my death, my doleful destiny,
My wealth, my woe, my doing every deal,[6]
My bitter bliss, wherein I long did dwell.
A whole discourse of me, Shore's wife by name,
Now shalt thou hear as thou hadst seen the same.

Of noble blood I cannot boast my birth,
For I was made out of the meanest mould,[7]
Mine heritage but seven foot of earth.
Fortune ne gave to me the gifts of gold,
But I could brag of nature, if I would,
Who filled my face with favour fresh and fair,
Whose beauty shone like Phoebus[8] in the air.

My shape, some said, was seemly[9] to each sight,
My countenance did show a sober grace,
Mine eyes in looks were never proved light,[10]
My tongue in words were chaste in every case,
Mine ears were deaf, and would no lovers place,
Save that (alas) a prince did blot my brow.
Lo, there the strong did make the weak to bow.

The majesty that kings to people bear,
The stately port, the awful cheer[11] they show,
Doth make the mean to shrink and couch[12] for fear,
Like as the hound that doth his master know.
What then, since I was made unto the bow?
There is no cloak can serve to hide my fault,
For I agreed the fort he should assault.

[...]

But clear from blame my friends cannot be found;
Before my time my youth they did abuse.
In marriage a prentice was I bound,
When that mere love I knew not how to use.[13]
But, wellaway,[14] that cannot me excuse.

---

1 weed attire, clothing.
2 plain bewail, lament, complain.
3 bewray reveal, disclose.
4 affrayde afraid.
5 A variation on the proverb, "A great torch may be lighted at a little candle" (Tilley T442).
6 every deal in every part, in every respect.
7 meanest poorest (in quality); most worthless; mould earth (regarded as the material or substance of the human body).
8 Phoebus the sun.
9 seemly fair, well-formed, handsome.
10 light wanton, unchaste, immodest.
11 port deportment, carriage, bearing; awful cheer awe-inspiring countenance, look, or expression of the face.
12 mean lowly, common; couch crouch or cower as a beast in obedience, fear, etc.
13 More notes: "This woman was born in London, worshipfully friended, honestly brought up, and very well married, saving somewhat too soon, her husband an honest citizen, young and goodly and of good substance. But forasmuch as they were coupled ere she were well ripe, she not very fervently loved, for whom she never longed." More adds that this circumstance "the more easily made her incline unto the King's appetite when he required her" (p. 55).
14 wellaway an exclamation of sorrow or lamentation.

The harm is mine, though they devised my care,[1]
And I must smart and sit in sland'rous snare.

Yet give me leave to plead my case at large.
If that the horse do run beyond his race,
Or anything that keepers have in charge
Do break their course, where rulers may take place,
Or meat be set before the hungry's face,
Who is in fault? The offender, yea or no,
Or they that are the cause of all this woe?

Note well what strife this forced marriage makes:
What loathed lives do come where love doth lack,
What scratting briars do grow upon such brakes,[2]
What common weals[3] by it are brought to wrack,
What heavy load is put on patience' back,
What strange delights this branch of vice doth breed,
And mark what grain springs out of such a seed.

Compel the hawk to sit that is unmanned,[4]
Or make the hound untaught to draw[5] the deer,
Or bring the free against his will in band,[6]
Or move the sad a pleasant tale to hear,
Your time is lost and you are never the near.[7]
So love ne learns of force the knot to knit;
She serves but those that feel sweet fancy's fit.

The less defame redounds to my dispraise:[8]
I was enticed by trains,[9] and trapped by trust;
Though in my power remained "yeas" or "nays,"
Unto my friends yet needs consent I must
In everything, yea lawful or unjust.
They brake the boughs and shaked the tree by sleight,
And bent the wand that might have grown full straight.

What help in this? The pale[10] thus broken down,
The deer must needs in danger run astray.
At me therefore why should the world so frown?
My weakness made my youth a prince's prey.
Though wisdom should the course of nature stay,[11]
Yet try[12] my case who list, and they shall prove
The ripest wits are soonest thralls[13] to love.

What need I more to clear myself too much?
A king me won, and had me at his call:
His royal state, his princely grace was such,
The hope of will (that women seek for all),[14]
The ease and wealth, the gifts which were not small,
Besieged me so strongly round about,
My power was weak, I could not hold him out.[15]

Duke Hannibal[16] in all his conquest great,
Or Caesar[17] yet, whose triumphs did exceed,
Of all their spoils,[18] which made them toil and sweat,
Were not so glad to have so rich a meed[19]
As was this Prince when I to him agreed,

---

1 care trouble, sorrow.

2 scratting scratching, wounding; brakes clumps of bushes, brushwood, or briars; thickets.

3 common weals commonwealths, nations, states.

4 that is unmanned i.e., that has not been trained [to sit on his master's gloved hand (in preparation for hunting)]. Not in OED.

5 draw search for; flush out.

6 band bondage.

7 never the near i.e., not any nearer to accomplishing your end or purpose.

8 defame dishonour, disgrace, evil repute; dispraise disparagement, blame, censure.

9 trains schemes devised to deceive or entrap; tricks, stratagems; perhaps, more precisely, something designed to lure an animal into a trap: a bait or decoy.

10 pale a fence made of stakes driven into the ground.

11 stay arrest, stop.

12 try test (in order to ascertain the truth of some matter).

13 thralls slaves.

14 I.e., the hope to have her own way (will).

15 More notes: "Howbeit the respect of his royalty, the hope of gay apparel, ease, pleasure, and other wanton wealth was able soon to pierce a soft tender heart" (p. 55).

16 Hannibal (247-183/82 BCE), the great Carthaginian general, crossed the Alps and invaded Italy during the Second Punic War, winning many decisive battles.

17 Caesar Julius Caesar.

18 spoils goods or property gained through conquest.

19 meed prize, reward.

And yielded me a prisoner willingly,
As one that knew no way away to flee.

The nightingale for all his merry voice,
Nor yet the lark that still delights to sing,
Did never make the hearers so rejoice
As I with words have made this worthy King.
I never jarred, in tune was every string,
I tempered so my tongue to please his ear
That what I said was current everywhere.

I joined my talk, my gestures, and my grace
In witty frames that long might last and stand,[1]
So that I brought the King in such a case
That to his death I was his chiefest hand.[2]
I governed him that ruled all this land.
I bare the sword, though he did wear the crown;
I strake the stroke that threw the mighty down.

If justice said that judgment was but death,
With my sweet words I could the King persuade,
And make him pause and take therein a breath,
Till I with suit the fautor's[3] peace had made.
I knew what way to use him in his trade.
I had the art to make the lion meek;
There was no point wherein I was to seek.

[...]

To purchase praise and win the people's zeal,
Yea, rather bent of kind[4] to do some good,
I ever did uphold the common weal.[5]
I had delight to save the guiltless blood;
Each suitor's cause, when that I understood,
I did prefer as it had been mine own,
And helped them up that might have been o'erthrown.

My power was pressed to right the poor man's wrong,
My hands were free to give where need required;
To watch[6] for grace I never thought it long;
To do men good I need not be desired.
Nor yet with gifts my heart was never hired.
But when the ball was at my foot to guide,
I played to those that Fortune did abide.[7]

My want[8] was wealth, my woe was ease at will,
My robes were rich and braver than the sun;
My fortune then was far above my skill;
My state was great, my glass[9] did ever run;
My fatal thread so happily was spun[10]
That then I sat in earthly pleasures clad,
And for the time a goddess' place I had.

But I had not so soon this life possessed,
But my good hap began to slip aside.
And Fortune then did me so sore molest
That unto plaints was turned all my pride.

---

[1] The nightingale … stand "Yet delighted not men so much in her beauty, as in her pleasant behaviour. For a proper wit had she, and could both read well and write, merry in company, ready and quick of answer, neither mute nor full of babble, sometime taunting without displeasure and not without disport." More records Edward stating that of his three "concubines" she was the "merriest" (p. 56).

[2] I.e., until the time he died I was his most important aide.

[3] fautor adherent, partisan, supporter.

[4] bent of kind inclined or disposed by nature.

[5] common weal the common good; the public interest; perhaps also, the state or commonwealth.

[6] watch as in to keep a vigil; wait for.

[7] I.e., that Fortune dwelt with; I governed him that ruled all this land … did abide More offers a similar evaluation of Shore's benevolent use of her influence with Edward: "[The King's] favour, to sayeth truth (for sin it were to belie the Devil), she never abused to any man's hurt, but to many a man's comfort and relief: where the King took displeasure, she would mitigate and appease his mind; where men were out of favour, she would bring them in his grace; for many that had highly offended, she obtained pardon; of great forfeitures, she got men remission; and finally, in many weighty suits, she stood many men in great stead, either for none or very small rewards, and those rather gay than rich: either for that she was content with the deed self well done, or for that she delighted to be sued unto, and to show what she was able to do with the King, or for that wanton women and wealthy be not always covetous" (p. 56).

[8] want poverty, destitution.

[9] glass hourglass.

[10] A reference to the three Fates or Destinies, responsible for dictating the scope, length, and shape of each person's life; Lachesis presides over and assigns each person's lot in life; Clotho spins the thread of life; and Atropos cuts the thread.

It booted not to row against the tide:[1]
Mine oars were weak, my heart and strength did fail,
The wind was rough, I durst not bear a sail.

What steps of strife belong to high estate!
The climbing up is doubtful to endure,
The seat itself doth purchase privy[2] hate,
And honour's fame is fickle and unsure.
And all she brings is flow'rs that be unpure,
Which fall as fast as they do sprout and spring,
And cannot last, they are so vain a thing.

We count no care to catch that[3] we do wish,
But what we win is long to us unknown.
Till present pain be served in our dish,
We scarce perceive whereon our grief hath grown.
What grain proves well that is so rashly sown?
If that a mean did measure all our deeds,
Instead of corn we should not gather weeds.

The settled mind is free from Fortune's power.
They need not fear who look not up aloft,
But they that climb are careful[4] every hour,
For when they fall they light not very soft.
Examples hath the wisest warned oft
That where the trees the smallest branches bear,
The storms do blow and have most rigour there.

[...]

As long as life remained in Edward's breast,
Who was but I? Who had such friends at call?
His body was no sooner put in chest,[5]
But well was him that could procure my fall.
His brother was mine enemy most of all,
Protector then, whose vice did still abound
From ill to worse till death did him confound.[6]

He falsely feigned that I of counsel was
To poison him, which thing I never meant;
But he could set thereon a face of brass[7]
To bring to pass his lewd and false intent.
To such mischief this tyrant's heart was bent,
To God ne man he never stood in awe,
For in his wrath he made his will a law.

Lord Hastings' blood for vengeance on him cries,[8]
And many more that were too long to name;
But most of all, and in most woeful wise,
I had good cause this wretched man to blame.
Before the world I suffered open shame:
Where people were as thick as is the sand
I penance took with taper in my hand.[9]

Each eye did stare and look me in the face;
As I passed by the rumours on me ran,
But patience then had lent me such a grace,
My quiet looks were praised of every man.
The shamefast blood brought me such colour than[10]

---

[1] Proverb, "It is hard (folly, in vain) to strive against the stream" (Tilley S927).

[2] privy secret; concealed.

[3] care trouble; that i.e., that which.

[4] careful full of care; anxious.

[5] chest coffin.

[6] His brother was mine enemy … confound Edward's brother was Richard of Gloucester, later Richard III; he became lord protector of England and of Edward's heir, Edward V, during the young king's minority.

[7] a face of brass a face insensible to shame; one full of effrontery or impudence.

[8] William Lord Hastings (1431-83) had been a favoured courtier under Edward IV, and lord chamberlain from 1461. On 14 June 1483 Hastings attended a council in the Tower of London, although he had been warned not to go, where Richard had him charged with treason and summarily executed. See More, pp. 50-54.

[9] More states that after Richard could not convince anyone that she had tried to bewitch him, and that she had been in league with Lord Hastings to murder him, he finally accused her of whoredom, for which sin the Bishop of London ordered this traditional public penance (p. 48, 54).

[10] shamefast bashful, modest; than then. More notes that during her penance "she went in countenance and pace demure so womanly, and albeit she were out of all array save her kirtle only: yet went she so fair and lovely, namely while the wondering of the people cast a comely rud [i.e., red or ruddiness] in her cheeks" (p. 54).

That thousands said, which saw my sober cheer,[1]
"It is great ruth to see this woman here."[2]

But what prevailed the people's pity there?
This raging wolf would spare no guiltless blood.
O wicked womb that such ill fruit did bear!
O cursed earth that yieldeth forth such mud!
The Hell consume all things that did thee good,
The Heavens shut their gates against thy sprite,
The world tread down thy glory under feet!

I ask of God a vengeance on thy bones;
Thy stinking corpse corrupts the air I know;
Thy shameful death no earthly wight bemoans,
For in thy life thy works were hated so
That every man did wish thy overthrow.
Wherefore I may, though partial now I am,
Curse every cause whereof thy body came.

[...]

Ye princes all, and rulers everychone,[3]
In punishment beware of hatred's ire.
Before ye scourge, take heed, look well thereon:
In wrath's ill will, if malice kindle fire,
Your hearts will burn in such a hot desire
That in those flames the smoke shall dim your sight,
Ye shall forget to join your justice right.

You should not judge till things be well deserned.[4]
Your charge is still to maintain upright laws.
In conscience' rules ye should be throughly learned;
Where clemency bids wrath and rashness pause,
And further saith, "Strike not without a cause,
And when ye smite do it for justice' sake,"
Then in good part[5] each man your scourge will take.

If that such zeal had moved this tyrant's mind
To make my plague a warning for the rest,
I had small cause such fault in him to find.
Such punishment is used for the best,
But by ill will and power I was oppressed.
He spoiled my goods, and left me bare and poor,
And caused me to beg from door to door.[6]

What fall was this, to come from prince's fare
To watch for crumbs among the blind and lame?
When alms was dealt I had a hungry share,
Because I knew not how to ask, for shame,
Till force and need had brought me in such frame[7]
That starve I must or learn to beg an alms,
With book in hand, and say St David's Psalms.[8]

Where I was wont[9] the golden chains to wear,
A pair of beads[10] about my neck was wound,
A linen cloth was lapped[11] about my hair.
A ragged gown that trailed on the ground,
A dish that clapped and gave a heavy sound,[12]

---

1 sober cheer serious expression, look, or countenance.

2 ruth a matter or occasion of sorrow or regret. More notes that she was generally pitied both by "those that were more amorous of her body than curious of her soul" and by those "good folk ... that hated her [manner of] living" yet were incensed with Richard's hypocrisy in having her so publicly corrected (p. 55).

3 everychone everyone.

4 Either "discerned" (perceived) or "decerned" (determined).

5 in good part favourably or without offence.

6 More records that after Hastings's execution, Richard "as it were for anger not for covetise ... sent into the house of Shore's wife (for her husband dwelled not with her) and spoiled [i.e., robbed] her of all that ever she had, above the value of two or three thousand marks, and sent her body to prison" (p. 54). Still alive at the time of More's writing, she had been reduced to a "beggarly condition, unfriended, [and] worn out of acquaintance" and "at this day she beggeth of many at this day living, that at this day had begged if she had not been" (pp. 56-57).

7 frame adapted or adjusted condition.

8 Authorship of the Psalms was traditionally ascribed to King David (probably died c. 970 BCE).

9 wont accustomed.

10 beads rosary beads.

11 lapped wrapped.

12 Lepers, beggars from lazar-houses, and mendicants generally would carry a wooden dish with a lid (a clap-dish) that they could use to give warning of their approach, and receive alms.

A staying staff and wallet[1] therewithal,
I bare about as witness of my fall.

I had no house wherein to hide my head;
The open street my lodging was perforce.
Full oft I went all hungry to my bed,
My flesh consumed, I looked like a corse.[2]
Yet in that plight[3] who had on me remorse?
O God, thou knowest my friends forsook me than,[4]
Not one holp[5] me that succoured many a man.

They frowned on me that fawned on me before,
And fled from me that followed me full fast;
They hated me, by whom I set much store,[6]
They knew full well my fortune did not last.
In every place I was condemned and cast.[7]
To plead my cause at bar[8] it was no boot,
For every man did tread me under foot.

Thus long I lived all weary of my life,
Till death approached and rid me from that woe.
Example take by me both maid and wife:
Beware, take heed, fall not to folly so;
A mirror make of my great overthrow;
Defy this world and all his wanton ways;
Beware by me that spent so ill her days.[9]

This was so well liked that all together exhorted me instantly to procure Master Churchyard to undertake and to pen as many more of the remainder as might by any means be attainted[10] at his hands.

And when I had promised I would do my diligence therein, they asked me if I had any more tragedies yet unread, for the evening was now at hand and there were enow already read to make a handsome volume.

"Indeed," quod I, "I purpose here to end the second part of this volume, for here endeth the cruel reign of King Richard III. And in another volume hereafter to discourse the residue from the beginning of King Henry VII to the end of this King and Queen's reign (if God so long will grant us life); and I beseech you all that you will diligently perform such stories as you have undertaken, and procure your friends, such as be learned, to help us with the rest; for there is in this part matter enough to set all the poets in England in work, and I would wish that every fine, apt wit would at the least undertake one, for so would it be a notable volume. For my part, I intend to be so impudent and importunate a suitor to so many as I know or may hereafter be acquainted with that no excuse shall serve to shake me off; and I desire you all to be as earnest.

—1563

---

[1] staying staff a staff to lean upon; wallet beggar's bag or sack.

[2] More notes that at the time of his writing, she was very old and some men said that she could never have been beautiful even in her youth: "Whose judgement seemeth me somewhat like, as though men should guess the beauty of one long before departed, by her scalp taken out of the charnel house" (p. 55).

[3] plight here, evil or unfortunate condition, situation.

[4] than then.

[5] holp helped.

[6] by whom I set much store i.e., whom I placed much value on, whom I held in such high esteem.

[7] cast thrown down; found guilty; convicted (likely a synonym for "condemned" here, added for emphasis and to fill out the line).

[8] at bar in open court.

[9] More says, "I doubt not some shall think this woman too slight a thing to be written of and set among the remembrances of great matters." However, he argues that her story is worth recording precisely because of her fall from wealth and influence to penury and obscurity: "Her doings were not much less [i.e., than those men who are now only famous for the 'infamy of their ill deeds'], albeit they be much less remembered, because they were not so evil. For men use if they have an evil turn to write it in marble: and who doth us a good turn, we write it in dust, which is not worst proved by her" (pp. 56-57). Cf. Hall, p. 364.

[10] attainted attained.

Mary Stuart, queen of Scots
1542-1587

Mary Stuart's life and reign were full of controversy. Queen of Scotland at the age of one, she was raised in France from the age of five, married to the dauphin, Francis, at age twelve, and became Queen of France at age 16. After only two years of marriage, however, Francis died of an ear infection, and Mary returned to rule Scotland in 1560. Scotland had just become a Protestant country, and the Roman Catholic Mary struggled constantly with those who were suspicious of her religion and her ability, as a woman, to rule. When Mary remarried, her choice proved disastrous; Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley was ambitious and selfish, and he and Mary quickly became enemies. Darnley was murdered in 1567 under suspicious circumstances. Within three months, Mary married the suspected murderer, John Hepburn, earl of Bothwell. By this point, the Scottish nobles were highly distrustful of their Queen, and they briefly imprisoned her and forced her to agree to her own abdication in favour of her son, James VI. Mary escaped and fled to England, hopeful that Elizabeth would help her; instead, Mary was imprisoned for eighteen years before she was executed for treason. Part of the evidence brought against her in Scotland and in England was a silver casket containing twelve sonnets and various letters to Bothwell, written before her husband Darnley's murder; Mary's authorship of these has never been proved, but it has not been disproved either, and many contemporaries believed Mary wrote them. The sonnets included here reveal how complex the traditional Petrarchan formulas could become when the author was a monarch and a woman. Also included here is a poem Mary wrote to Elizabeth, hoping for succour from her English cousin.

EDITIONS: Mary Stuart's "Sonnets to Bothwell" in George Buchanan, A detection of the actions of Mary Queen of Scots concerning the murther of her husband, and her conspiracy, adultery, and pretended marriage with the Earl Bothwell and a defence of the true Lords, maintainers of the King's Majesties action and authority. Written in Latin by G. Buchanan; translated into Scotch and now made English. London: Printed [...] by R. Janeway, 1689. Wing B5282; "Sonnet to Elizabeth," from Caligula BV, fol. 316, British Library.

Sonnets to Bothwell[1]

O gods,[2] have of me compassion,
And show what certain proof
I may give, which shall not seem to him vain,
Of my love and fervent affection.
He alas, is he not already in possession
Of my body, of heart, that refuses no pain,
Nor dishonour in this life uncertain,
Offence of friends, nor worse affliction?
For him I esteem all my friends less than nothing,
And I will have good hope of my enemies.
I have put in hazard for him both fame[3] and conscience,
I will for his sake renounce the world.
I will die to set him forward.
What remains to give proof of my conscience?[4]

[O Dieux ayez de moy compassion,
Et m'enseignez quelle preuve certain
Je puis donner qui ne luy semble vain
De mon amour & ferme affection.

[1] This version of the sonnets here was published by George Buchanan during Mary's first trial in Scotland, entitled A Detection of the Doings of Mary, Queen of Scots, Touching the murder of her husband (1571). Provided are the sixteenth-century French "originals," and modernized and anglicized Scottish translations. Included here are the 1st, 2nd, 6th and 7th sonnets.

[2] gods This appears as "Goddess" in the 1571 edition.

[3] fame The French has "nom" or name here, the royal name upon which all Mary's "fame" rests.

[4] Note the French "original" has "constance" or constancy here.

Las! n'est il pas ja en possession
Du corps, du coeur qui ne refuse paine
Ny dishonneur, en la vie incertain,
Offense de parents, ne pire affliction?
Pour luy tous mes ames j'estime moins que rien
Et de mes ennemis je veux esperer bien.
J'ay hazardé pour luy & nom & conscience:
Je veux pour luy au monde renoncer:
Je veux mourir pour luy avancer.
Que reste il plus pour prouver ma constance?]

In his hands and in his full power,
I put my son, my honour, and my life,
My country, my subjects, my soul, all subdued
To him, and have no other will
For my scope,[1] which without deceit,
I will follow in spite of all envy
That may ensue. For I have no other desire
But to make him perceive my faithfulness,
For storm or fair weather that may come,
Never will it change dwelling or place.
Shortly I shall give of my truth such proof,
That he shall know my constancy without fiction,
Not by my weeping, or feigned obedience,
As others have done, but by other experience.

[Entre ses mains & en son plein pouvoir
Je metz mon filz, mon honneur, & may vie,
Mon pais, mes subjectz, mon ame assubjectie
Est tout à luy, & n'ay autre vaulloir
Pour mon object que sans le decevoir
Suivre je veux malgré tout l'envie
Qu'issir en peult, car je n'autre e vie
Que de ma foy, luy faire appercevoir
Que pour tempeste ou bonnace qui face,
Jamais ne veux changer demeure ou place.
Brief je feray de ma foy telle preuve,
Qu'il cognoistra sans fainte ma constance,
Non par mes pleurs ou fainte obeyssance,
Comme autres ont fait, mais par divers espreuve.]

[1] no other will / For my scope no other desire/ For my object.

And now she begins to see[2]
That she was of very evil judgement,
To esteem the love of such a lover,
And would feign deceive my love,[3]
By writings and painted learning,
Which, not the less, did not breed in her brain,[4]
But borrowed from some feat[5] author,
To feign one story and have none.
And for all that, her painted words,
Her tears, her plaints[6] full of dissimulation,
And her high cries and lamentations
Have won that point, that you keep in store
Her letters and writings, to which you give trust,
Yea, and love and believe her more than me.

[Et maintenant elle commence à voir
Qu'elle estoit bien de mauvais jugement
De n'estimer l'amour d'un tel amant
Et voudroit bien mon amy decevoir,
Par les escriptz tout fardez de sçavoir
Qui pourtant n'est en son esprit croissant
Ains emprunté de quelque autheur luissant,
A faint tresbien un envoy sans l'avoir
Et toutefois ses parolles fardez,
Ses pleurs, ses plaincts remplis de fictions,
Et ses hauts cris & lamentations
Ont tant gaigné qui par vous sont gardez
Ses lettres escriptes ausquelles vous donnez foy
Et si l'aymez & croyez plus que moy.]

You believe her (alas) I perceive it too well,
And call in doubt my firm constancy
(O my only wealth, and my only hope)
And I cannot assure you of my truth.
I see that you esteem me light,
And be[7] no way assured of me,

[2] The "she" in these sonnets is Bothwell's wife. He was divorced very shortly before he married Mary.

[3] my love i.e., Bothwell; feign "desires to," but this also plays with the meaning of "feign" as "pretend."

[4] Which, not the less, did not breed in her brain a somewhat confusing double negative, meaning "which her brain did not create."

[5] feat accomplished, successful.

[6] plaints complaints.

[7] be are.

And do suspect (my heart)[1] without any appearing cause,
Discrediting me wrongfully.
You do not know the love I bear to you,
You suspect that other love transports me,
You think my words be but wind,
You paint my very heart as it were of[2] wax,
You imagine me a woman without judgment.
And all that increases my burning.

[Vous la croyez, las! trop je l'apperçoy
Et vous doutez de ma ferme constance,
O mon seul bien & mon seul esperance,
Et ne vous puis je asseurer de ma foy
Vous m'estimez leger que je voy,
Et si n'avez en moy nul asseurance
Et soupçonnez mon coeur sans apparence,
Vous deffiant à trop grand tort de moy.
Vous ignorez l'amour que je vous porte,
Vous soupçonnez qu'autre amour me transporte,
Vous estimez mes parolles du vent,
Vous depeignez de cire mon las coeur,
Vous me pensez femme sans jugement.
Et tout cela augmente mon ardeur.]

—composed, c. 1566-67

Sonnet to Elizabeth

A sole thought that profits and injures me, Bitter and sweet, changing in my heart without ceasing,
Between doubt and hope it oppresses me,
So much that peace and rest flee from me.
Thus, dear sister, if this card[3] outlines
The desire to see you that presses[4] me,
It is that I live in pain and sadness
If the result does not follow promptly.
I have seen the ship released from constraint
On the high seas near to entering the port,
And the serene changed to trouble;
Thus I am worried and fearful,
Not because of you, but because at times,
wrongly,
Fortune breaks sails and double rigging.

[Une seul penser qui me profite et nuit[5]
Amer et doux, change en mon coeur sans cesse,
Entre le doute[6] et l'espoir il m'oppresse
Tant que la paix et le repos me fuient.
Donc, chère soeur, si cette carte suit
L'affection de vous voir qui me presse,
C'est que je vis en peine et en tristesse,
Si promptement l'effect[7] ne s'en ensuit.
J'ai vu la nef relâcher par contrainte
En haute mer proche d'entrer au port,
Et le serein se convertir en trouble.
Ainsi je suis en souci et en crainte,
Non pas de vous mais quant aux fois à tort Fortune rompe voile et cordage double.]

—composed, c. 1567-68

[1] (my heart) This line could also have been translated without adding these parentheses.

[2] as it were of as if it were made of.

[3] card The French carte refers to Mary's letter, but within the metaphor that ends the sonnet, it is the card or map used by sailors.

[4] presses The French me presse may carry a sense of the press, a torture instrument.

[5] nuit nuire, to harm or injure.

[6] doute doubt, or perhaps fear.

[7] l'effect result or reply.

Sir Thomas Hoby
1530-1566

Most famous for his translation of Count Baldassare Castiglione's Il Cortegiano [The Courtier] (1528), Thomas Hoby was a career diplomat and civil servant, first in the service of Henry VIII and later under his son, Edward VI. Completed between 1552 and 1553, Hoby's translation had to wait for publication until his self-imposed exile on the Continent came to an end with the death of Mary I and the ascension of Elizabeth to the throne. On his return to England, he took up the quieter life of a landed gentleman on his estates in Berkshire and in 1561 he saw The Courtier through the press. It was published in London in the same year and was an immediate success, with three more editions soon appearing.

Baldassare Castiglione was an Italian humanist, writer, and diplomat. He gathered material for his wildly successful conduct manual from his experiences at the Urbino court of Guidobaldo da Montefeltro. A debate on the qualities of the ideal courtier, The Courtier was popular in a number of countries (both in the original Italian and its various translations) partly because of the extensive description of these moral, intellectual, and physical qualities, ranging from virtues like temperance, justice, and martial courage to different kinds of learning, in areas such as soldiership, literature, music, and the classics, to a variety of physically demanding activities, such as horsemanship, dancing, running, wrestling, and swordsmanship, to a certain grace and ease in social conversation.

Perhaps the two most influential aspects of Castiglione's Il Cortegiano have to do with its neo-Platonic discussions of love and its concept of sprezzatura. Both become very important concepts in fashioning the courtier and court culture in sixteenth-century England. Sprezzatura, an Italian term that Hoby most often translates as "grace" or "ease," refers to that quality which should pervade everything that the courtier does and says; all the skills and knowledge that he possesses should appear to have been achieved effortlessly, without application, study, or art. Through Hoby's translation, Castiglione introduced English courtiers and all those who read this popular book to the concept of "self-fashioning," the idea that each person could create and fashion their own identity and personality. In this sense, The Courtier is much like the period's "conduct manuals," offering the reader a set of moral, intellectual, educational, and social prescriptions for socially advantageous and morally correct conduct, although these goals are sometimes in tension with each other. Sir Thomas Elyot's The Book of the Governor (1531), for example, represents the ideal monarch as a person educated in humanist ideals, skilled in the minutiae of political life, and committed to the principles of reformed religion. Dedicated to Henry VIII, it aims at some of the same goals as The Book of the Courtier, although its focus is the monarch and not the courtier as such.

EDITION: The courtyer of Count Baldessar Castilio. London: By William Seres, 1561. STC 4778.

from The Book of the Courtier[1]

The Printer to the Reader

Greeting,

Now at the length (gentle reader) through the diligence of Master Hoby in penning and mine in printing, thou hast here set forth unto thee The Book of the Courtier, which for thy benefit had been done long since, but that there were certain places in it which of late years being misliked of some, that had the perusing of it (with what reason judge thou) the author thought it much better to keep it in darkness a while, than to put it in light imperfect and in piecemeal to serve the time. Use it, therefore, and so peruse it, that for thy profit, first he, and then I, may think our travail[1] herein well employed.

[1] The full title and subtitles read: The Courtier of Count Baldessar Castilio Divided into Four Books. Very necessary and profitable for young gentlemen and gentlewomen abiding in court, palace or place [i.e., manor house, chief residence on an estate], done into English by Thomas Hoby.

Farewell.

Thomas Sackville[2] in Commendation of the Work.

To the Reader.

These royal kings, that rear up to the sky
Their palace tops, and deck them all with gold,
With rare and curious works they feed the eye,
And show what riches here great princes hold.
A rarer work and richer far in worth,
Castilio's hand presenteth here to thee,
No proud ne golden court doth he set furth
But what in court a courtier ought to be.
The prince he raiseth huge and mighty walls,
Castilio frames a wight[3] of noble fame:
The king with gorgeous tissue[4] clads his halls,
The Count with golden virtue decks the same,
Whose passing skill lo[5] Hobby's pen displays
To Britain folk, a work of worthy praise.

To the Right Honourable the Lord Henry Hastings,[6] Son and Heir Apparent to the Noble Earl of Huntington.

Themistocles, the noble Athenian, in his banishment entertained most honourably with the king of Persia, willed upon a time to tell his cause by a spokesman, compared it to a piece of tapestry, that being spread abroad discloseth the beauty of the workmanship, but folded together, hideth it, and therefore demanded respite to learn the Persian tongue to tell his own cause.[7] Right so (Honourable Lord) this Courtier[8] hath long strayed about this realm, and the fruit of him either little or imperfectly received to the common benefit: for either men skilful in his tongue have delighted in him for their own private commodity,[9] or else he hath eftsones[10] spoken in piecemeal by an interpreter to such as desired to know his mind, and to practice his principles: the which how imperfect a thing it is, Themistocles and experience teach. But now, though late indeed, yet for all that at length, beside his three principal languages,[11] in the which he hath a long time haunted all the courts of Christendom, he is become an Englishman (which many a long time have wished, but few attempted and none achieved) and well-willing to dwell in the Court of England, and in plight[12] to tell his own cause. In whose commendation I shall not need to use any long process of words, for he can so well speak for himself, and answer to the opinion men have a long time conceived of him, that whatsoever I should write therein, were but labour in waste, and rather a diminishing, than a setting forth of his worthiness, and a great deal better it were to pass it over with silence, than to use briefness. Only for[13] the little acquaintance I have with him, and for the general profit is in him, my desire is he should now at his first arrival, a new man in this kind of trade, be well entertained and much honoured.

And forsomuch as none but a noble young gentleman, and trained up all his lifetime in court and

---

1 travail work, labour.

2 Thomas Sackville (1536-1608), first earl of Dorset, poet, diplomat, and lord treasurer; co-author of the early tragedy Gorboduc (1562); writer of the "Induction" and "Complaint of Buckingham" in Mirror for Magistrates (2nd ed., 1563).

3 wight man, person.

4 tissue cloth; here, fine tapestries or wall-hangings.

5 lo behold.

6 Lord Henry Hastings (?1536-95), courtier and administrator, later earl of Huntington (1560), lord president of the North (1572-95), and lord lieutenant of Leicestershire; he was well-known as a zealous Protestant and patron of charities in his county of Leicestershire.

7 Themistocles ... his own cause See Plutarch's "Life of Themistocles" (Plutarch, Lives) for this anecdote.

8 this Courtier i.e., The Book of the Courtier in its original Italian editions.

9 commodity advantage, benefit, profit.

10 eftsones repeatedly.

11 his three principal languages French, Spanish, and Dutch.

12 in plight in [good] condition, state, or trim.

13 Only for i.e., only because of.

of worthy qualities, is mete[1] to receive and entertain so worthy a courtier, that like may fellowship and get estimation with his like, I do dedicate him unto your good lordship, that through your means and under your patronage he may be common[2] to a great many. And this do I not for that I suppose you stand in need of any of his instructions, but partly because you may see him confirm with reason the courtly fashions, comely exercises, and noble virtues, that unawares have from time to time crept into you, and already with practice and learning taken custom[3] in you; and partly to get him the more authority and credit through so honourable a patron. For no doubt, if you be seen willingly to embrace him, other young and courtly gentlemen will not shun his company; and so both he shall get him the reputation now here in England which he hath had a good while since beyond the sea, in Italy, Spain and France, and I shall think my small travail[4] well-employed and sufficiently recompensed. The honour and entertainment[5] that your noble ancestors showed Castilio the maker, when he was in this realm to be installed knight of the Order for the duke his master, was not so much as presently both he and this his handiwork shall receive of you.

Generally ought this[6] to be in estimation with all degrees of men: for to princes and great men, it is a rule to rule themselves that rule others, and one of the books that a noble philosopher exhorted a certain king to provide him, and diligently to search, for in them he should find written such matters, that friends durst not utter unto kings; to men grown in years,[7] a pathway to the beholding and musing of the mind, and to whatsoever else is mete for that age; to young gentlemen, an encouraging to garnish their mind with moral virtues, and their body with comely exercises, and both the one and the other with honest qualities to attain unto their noble end; to ladies and gentlewomen, a mirror to deck and trim themselves with virtuous conditions, comely behaviours, and honest entertainment toward all men; and to them all in general, a storehouse of most necessary implements for the conversation, use, and training up of man's life with courtly demeanours.

Were it not that the ancientness of time, the degree of a consul, and the eloquence of Latin style in these our days bear a great stroke,[8] I know not whether in the invention and disposition[9] of the matter, as Castilio hath followed Cicero, and applied to his purpose sundry examples and pithy sentences out of him, so he may in feat conveyance[10] and like trade of writing, be compared to him: but well I wot[11] for renown among the Italians, he is not inferior to him. Cicero, an excellent orator, in three books of an Orator unto his brother, fashioneth such a one as never was, nor yet is like to be;[12] Castilio, an excellent courtier, in three books of a Courtier unto his dear friend, fashioneth such a one as is hard to find and perhaps impossible. [...] Both Cicero and Castilio profess they follow not any certain appointed order of precepts or rules, as is used in the instruction of youth, but call to rehearsal matters debated in their times to and fro in the disputation of most eloquent men and excellent wits in every worthy quality, the one company in the old time assembled in Tusculane, and the other of late years in the new palace of Urbin. Where many most excellent wits in this realm have made no less of this book than the great Alexander did of Homer,[13] I cannot suf-

[1] mete fit, appropriate, proper.

[2] common i.e., commonly available.

[3] taken custom taken up an accustomed place in you.

[4] travail labour, work.

[5] entertainment hospitality.

[6] this i.e., The Book of the Courtier.

[7] I.e., "To men grown in years [The Book of the Courtier is] a pathway to the beholding ..."

[8] bear a great stroke i.e., have great influence, authority, or excellence.

[9] invention and disposition terms from classical rhetoric describing the composition of an argument; "invention" refers to the selection of topics to be treated or arguments to be used, while "disposition" to the due arrangement of the parts of an argument or discussion.

[10] feat conveyance apt communication.

[11] wot know, understand.

[12] Cicero's De Oratore, a treatise that was popular among Renaissance writers.

[13] have made no less ... Homer Alexander the Great (356-323 BCE) reportedly carried his copy of Homer's epic poem the Iliad on all his military expeditions, keeping it in a golden casket that he had seized from his defeated foe, King Darius of Persia.

ficiently wonder that they have not all this while from time to time done a common benefit to profit others as well as themselves.

In this point (I know not by what destiny) Englishmen are much inferior to well most all other nations: for where they set their delight and bend themselves with an honest strife of matching others to turn into their mother tongue not only the witty writings of other languages, but also of all the philosophers, and all sciences both Greek and Latin, our men ween[1] it sufficient to have a perfect knowledge to no other end but to profit themselves, and (as it were) after much pains in breaking up a gap,[2] bestow no less to close it up again, that others may with like travail follow after. And where our learned men for the most part hold opinion[3] to have the sciences in the mother tongue hurteth memory and hindereth learning, in my opinion they do full ill consider from whence the Grecians first and afterward the Latins fet[4] their knowledge. And without wading to any farther reasons that might be alleged, if they will mark well the truth, they shall see at this day, where the sciences are most turned into the vulgar tongue[5] there are best learned men, and comparing it with the contrary, they shall also find the effects contrary. In Italy (where the most translation of authors is) not only for philosophy, logic, humanity and all liberal sciences both in Greek and Latin (leaving apart Barbarus, Naugerius, Sannazarus, Bembus, Lazarus and the rest that of very late days flourished) Genoa, Tomitanus, Robertellus, Manutius, Piccolhomineus,[6] are presently very singular[7] and renowned throughout all Christendom; but also for the same in the vulgar tongue with little or no sight[8] at all in the Latin, Aretino, Gelli (a tailor in Florence) the Lady Victoria Columna, the Lady Dionora Sanseverina, the Lady Beatrice Loffreda, Veronica Gambera, Virginea Salvi[9] and infinite other men and women are most famous throughout Italy, whose divine works and excellent style both in rhyme and prose

1 ween believe, suppose, think.

2 gap a breach in a wall or hedge, as the result of violence or natural decay.

3 hold opinion i.e., are of the opinion that.

4 fet i.e., fetched, received; to draw or derive from a source.

5 vulgar tongue i.e., the vernacular of a nation.

6 Barbarus perhaps, Hermolaus Barbarus (Ermolao Barbaro; 1454-93/95?), scholar and professor of philosophy at the University of Padua, author of important translations of Aristotle and a critical analysis of the natural philosophy of Pliny the elder; or perhaps Francesco Barbaro (1390-1454), Venetian scholar and statesman, author of De re uxoria ("On marriage"); Naugerius Andrea Navagero (Andreas Naugerius; 1483-1529), poet, scholar, and diplomat, who published both in Latin and Italian; with other scholars, he helped edit classical texts for Aldus Manutius's press; Sannazarus Jacopo Sannazaro (1458-1530), leading humanist scholar and poet, who published both in Latin and in the vernacular, author of the influential pastoral romance Arcadia; Bembus Pietro Bembo (1470-1547), scholar, poet, literary critic, linguist, and Roman Catholic cardinal; author of Gli Asolani (1505), a dialogue on courtly love, he published both in Latin and the vernacular, and contributed substantially to the development of the Italian language. He appears as one of the interlocutors in Courtier, and offers the Neoplatonic discourse on love at its conclusion; Lazarus Lazzaro Bonamico (1477/78-1552), Venetian humanist and professor of Latin and Greek, a scholar of Cicero; Genoa Marcantonio Genua de' Passeri (1490/91-1563), scholar of Averroës and Aristotle, professor of natural philosophy (University of Padua, 1531-63); Tomitanus Bernardino Tomitano (1517-76), University of Padua professor of logic and Aristotelean philosophy; Robertellus Francesco Robortello of Udine, University of Padua, professor of Latin rhetoric (1552-57; 1561-67), author of the most influential Latin commentary (1548) on Aristotle's Poetics; Manutius Aldo Manuzio [Manuzio the elder] (1449-1515), humanist scholar and printer, publisher of important Greek and Latin texts, as well as grammars, dictionaries, and textbooks for the study of these ancient languages; he also printed important editions of Dante, Petrarch and Bembo; Piccolhomineus Alessandro Piccolomini (1508-79), philosopher and humanist scholar, translator of important Greek and Latin works (including selections from Ovid, Virgil, and Xenophon; as well as Aristotle's Rhetoric and Poetics), and author of vernacular commentaries on Aristotelean philosophy; he was also a poet and the author of two comedies.

7 singular eminent, distinguished, notable.

8 sight knowledge, skill, insight.

9 Aretino Pietro Aretino (1492-1556), Italian vernacular poet, playwright, satirist, and author of erotic works; he parodied Courtier in his popular stage comedy La cortegiana; Gelli Giambattista Gelli (1498-1563), Florentine humanist, Dante scholar, and playwright; Victoria Columna Vittoria Colonna (1492-1547), noblewoman, important vernacular Italian poet, and patron of the arts; friend of Sannazaro, Tasso, and Michaelangelo; her lyrics, both religious and amorous, first appeared in 1538; Dionora Sanseverina presumably, a member of the family of Sanseverino; she, Beatrice Loffreda, Vittoria Colonna, and Veronica Gàmbara are mentioned among a group of female luminaries in a dedicatory letter prefacing Vincenzo Valgrisi's 1557 edition of Boccaccio's Decameron; Veronica Gambera Veronica (continued) give a sufficient testimony not only of their profound knowledge and noble wit, but also that knowledge may be obtained in studying only a man's own native tongue.

So that to be skilful and exercised[1] in authors translated is no less to be called learning than in the very same in the Latin or Greek tongue. Therefore, the translation of Latin or Greek authors doth not only not hinder learning, but it furthereth it; yea, it is learning itself, and a great stay[2] to youth, and the noble end to the which they ought to apply their wits, that with diligence and study have attained a perfect understanding, to open a gap for others to follow their steps, and a virtuous exercise for the unLatined to come by learning, and to fill their mind with the moral virtues, and their body with civil conditions, that they may both talk freely in all company, live uprightly though there were no laws, and be in a readiness against all kind of worldly chances that happen, which is the profit that cometh of philosophy. And he said well that was asked the question, "How much the learned differed from the unlearned." "So much," quoth he, "as the well-broken and ready horses, from the unbroken." Wherefore I wot[3] not how our learned men in this case can avoid the saying of Isocrates, to one that among sundry learned discourses at table spoke never a word: "If thou be unlearned, thou dost wisely: but if thou be learned, unwisely;" as who should say, learning is ill-bestowed where others be not profited by it. As I therefore have to my small skill bestowed some labour about this piece of work, even so could I wish with all my heart, profound learned men in the Greek and Latin should make the like proof, and every man store[4] the tongue, according to his knowledge and delight, above other men in some piece of learning, that we alone of the world may not be still counted barbarous in our tongue, as in time out of mind we have been in our manners. And so shall we perchance in time become as famous in England, as the learned men of other nations have been and presently are.

And though the hardness of this present matter be such, and mine unskilfulness to undertake this enterprise so great, that I might with good cause have despaired to bring to an end it[5] that many excellent wits have attempted, yet could I not choose but yield to the continual requests and often persuasions of many young gentlemen, which have (may chance) an opinion that to be in me that is not indeed, and unto whom in any reasonable matter I were skilful in, neither I could nor ought of duty to want[6] in fulfilling their desire. Notwithstanding a great while I forbore and lingered the time to see if any of a more perfect understanding in the tongue, and better practiced in the matter of the book (of whom we want not a number in this realm) would take the matter in hand, to do his country so great a benefit: and this imagination prevailed in me a long space after my duty done in translating the third book (that entreateth of a gentlewoman of the court) persuaded thereto, in that I was informed, it was as then in some forwardness by another, whose wit and style was greatly to be allowed, but since prevented by death he could not finish it. But of late being instantly craved upon afresh, I whetted[7] my style and settled myself to take in hand the other three books (that entreat of the perfection of a gentleman of the court) to fulfil their petition in what I am able, having time and leisure thereto, the which I have done, though not in effect, yet in appearance and that in a great deal shorter time, than the hardness of the matter required.

Gàmbara (1485-1550), poet, letter writer, and patron of the arts, niece of Emilia Pia (see p. 326, note 3), and friend of Pietro Bembo (see p. 312, note 6). After the death of her husband, Gàmbara became the successful ruler of his state, Correggio; her court became a centre of learning and she was a friend and supporter of writers such as Bandello, Aretino, and Ariosto; Virginea Salvi Virginia Salvi, popular and much-anthologized poet, whose works appeared alongside those of Colonna and Gàmbara in 1551.

1 exercised employed habitually (here, in reading and studying).

2 stay prop, support.

3 wot know.

4 store furnish, stock, supply.

5 it i.e., the translation of Castiglione's Il Cortegiano.

6 want lack.

7 whetted sharpened.

And where it shall not perhaps thoroughly please by reason my small understanding in the tongue, and less practice in the matters herein contained, is not of force to give it the brightness and full perfection in this our tongue that it hath in the Italian, it shall suffice yet that I have showed myself obedient in the respect a man ought to have toward his betters. And no more can they avoid the blame to charge me withal, than I to undertake it. Besides that, I have declared my good will and well meaning no less than if my cunning were greater, and could extend much farther. But paraventure[1] the rudeness of this shall be an encouraging of some other to give the onset[2] upon other matters with a better ripeness of style and much more aptness, and so shall this yet somewhat profit both ways.

But the estimation it must get by your Honour is the principal cause that setteth it out, and maketh it worn with the hands of heedful readers: for in case[3] you cheerfully receive it, men will reckon it good; if you allow it, worthy to be practiced; if you commend it, worthy to pass from hand to hand. Therefore, among the other good opinions men generally hold of you, let it not be the least that they may hold also no less of this that you allow and commend. And so shall you show undeserved kindness, I bounden duty, and all others good will to embrace and to welcome it out of Italy into England. And thus shall Castilio be esteemed such a one as he is indeed, and wex[4] familiar with all men, that of late was known of very few, and so mangled with variety of judgments, that he was (in a manner) maimed, and lost a good piece of his estimation. But in case judgements now feint,[5] or mine interpretation seem not pithy but rude, not proper but cold, there is no more imperfection in this Courtier than in Cyrus[6] himself in the translation of Xenophon into the Italian or any other tongue, the one as necessary and proper for a gentleman of the court, as the other for a king. And I shall desire my labour may so be taken well in worth, as I have endeavoured myself to follow the very meaning and words of the author, without being mislead by fancy, or leaving out any parcel[7] one or other, whereof I know not how some interpreters of this book into other languages can excuse themselves, and the more they be conferred,[8] the more it will perchance appear. Wherefore, receive you this as a token of my good will, and so receive it that the fruit, whatever it be, may be acknowledged at your hands, and you pass the expectation of men in this, as in all other things, which, no doubt, is very great of you: and I, to acknowledge this benefit, where my ability stretcheth to nothing else, shall at the least evermore wish unto your lordship long life, that you may go forward, as you do, in these beginnings, which promise a lucky end, to the honour of yourself, comfort of your friends, and forwardness of the commune weal[9] of your country.

—1556.

Your Lordship's most bounden,

THOMAS HOBY.

[1] paraventure maybe, perhaps.

[2] to give the onset to make a beginning, to start.

[3] in case i.e., if.

[4] wex wax, grow.

[5] feint either "deceive" or "turn weak" (as in "faint").

[6] Cyrus, king of Persia, whom the historian Xenophon presents as the ideal philosopher-prince. The first English translation of Cyropaedeia ("The Education of Cyrus") was William Barker's The School of Cyrus (1567). See James Tatum's 1987 edition for Garland Press (The Renaissance Imagination, Vol. 37).

[7] parcel small part.

[8] conferred compared.

[9] commune weal common good or health.

THE SECOND BOOK OF THE COURTIER[1]

[...]

"[...] as touching nobleness of birth, wit and disposition of person and grace of countenance, I say unto you that to get him[2] praise worthily and a good estimation with all men, and favour with such great men as he shall attend upon,[3] methink it behooveful[4] he have the understanding to frame all his life and to set forth his good qualities generally in company with all men without purchasing himself envy. The which how hard a matter it is of itself, a man may consider by the seldomness of such as are seen to attain to that point, because we are all the sort of us in very deed more inclined of nature to dispraise faults than to commend things well done. And a man would think that many by a certain rooted malice, although they manifestly discern the goodness, enforce themselves with all study and diligence to find in us either a fault or at the least the likeness of a fault.

"Therefore, it behooveth our courtier in all his doings to be chary and heedful,[5] and what so he sayeth or doth to accompany it with wisdom, and not only to set his delight to have in himself parts and excellent qualities, but also to order the tenor of his life after such a trade, that the whole may be answerable unto these parts, and see the self same to be always and in everything such that it disagree not from itself, but make one body of all these good qualities, so that every deed of his may be compact and framed[6] of all the virtues, as the Stoics[7] say the duty of a wise man is: although not withstanding always one virtue is the principal, but all are so knit and linked one to another, that they tend to one end, and all may be applied and serve to every purpose.

"Therefore, it behooveth he have the understanding to set them forth, and by comparison and (as it were) contrariety of the one, sometime to make the other the better known: as the good painters with a shadow make the lights of high places to appear, and so with light make low the shadows of plains, and meddle divers colours together,[8] so that through that diversity both the one and the other are more sightly to behold, and the placing of the figures contrary the one to the other is a help to them to do the feat that the painter's mind is to bring to pass. So that lowliness[9] is much to be commended in a gentleman that is of prowess and well seen in arms: and as that fierceness seemeth the greater when it is accompanied with sobermood,[10] even so doth sobermood increase and show itself the more through fierceness. Therefore, little speaking, much doing, and not praising a man's own self in commendable deeds, dissembling[11] them after an honest sort, doth increase both the one virtue and the other in a person that can discreetly use this trade.[12] And the like is to be said in all the other good qualities.

"Therefore will I have our courtier—in that he doth or sayeth—to use certain general rules, the which (in my mind) contain briefly as much as belongeth to me to speak. And for the first and chief

---

1 Courtier consists of dialogues on the nature and function of the courtier, but these dialogues take place at a very specific time and place: at the palace of Guidobaldo da Montefeltro (1472-1508), duke of Urbino, Castiglione's employer; and on the evenings of 5-8 March 1507. The interlocutors are real people, prominent and powerful noblemen and noblewomen, many of whom knew each other and Castiglione. See W.J. Schnerr, "Two Courtiers: Castiglione and Rodrigues Lobo," Comparative Literature 13.2 (1961): 142; and P. Burke, The Fortunes of the Courtier (University Park, PA, 1995), pp. 25-32. The discussion takes place before and at the instigation of Elisabetta Gonzaga (1471-1526), wife of Guidobaldo and duchess of Urbino.

2 him the courtier.

3 attend upon wait upon, serve in the manner of a courtier.

4 behooveful useful, advantageous.

5 chary cautious, circumspect; heedful careful.

6 compact and framed composed and fashioned.

7 Stoics Greek philosophers, who advocated that men should govern their lives through reason, and thus be indifferent to pain, death, and other reversals of fortune.

8 meddle divers colours together i.e., mix different colours of paint together.

9 lowliness humility.

10 sobermood sobermindedness; sobriety of demeanour.

11 dissembling feigning, disguising, hiding.

12 trade course of action.

let him avoid (as the Count[1] said well in that behalf yesternight) above all things curiosity.[2] Afterward let him consider well what the thing is he doth or speaketh, the place where it is done, in presence of whom, in what time, the cause why he doth it, his age, his profession, the end whereto it tendeth, and the means that may bring him to it: and so let him apply himself discreetly with these advertisements to whatsoever he mindeth to do or speak."

After Sir Frederick[3] had thus said, he seemed to stay[4] a while. Then said Master Morello of Ortona,[5] "Methink these your rules teach but little. And I for my part am as skilful now as I was before you spoke them, although I remember I have heard them at other times also of friars with whom I have been in confession, and I ween[6] they term them 'circumstances.'"[7]

Then laughed Sir Frederick and said, "If you do well bear in mind, the Count willed yesternight that the chief profession of the courtier should be in arms, and spoke very largely[8] in what sort he should do it; therefore will we make no more rehearsal thereof. Yet by our rule it may be also understood, that where the courtier is at a skirmish, or assault, or battle upon the land, or in such other places of enterprise, he ought to work the matter wisely in separating himself from the multitude, and undertake his notable and bold feats which he hath to do with as little company as he can, and in the sight of noblemen that be of most estimation in the camp, and especially in the presence and (if it were possible) before the very eyes of his king or great personage he is in service withal: for indeed it is mete[9] to set forth to the show things well done. And I believe even as it is an ill matter to seek a false renown, and in the thing he deserveth no praise at all, so is it also an ill matter to defraud a man's self of his due estimation, and not to seek that praise which alone is the true reward of virtuous enterprises. And I remember I have known of them in my time that for all they were of prowess, yet in this point they have showed themselves but gross-headed,[10] and put their life in as great hazard to go take a flock of sheep, as in being the foremost to scale the walls of a battered town, the which our courtier will not do if he bear in mind the cause that bringeth him to the war, which ought to be only his estimation. And if he happen moreover to be one to show feats of chivalry in open sights at tilt, tourney, or joco di canne[11] or in any other exercise of the person, remembering the place where he is, and in presence of whom, he shall provide before hand to be in his armour no less handsome and sightly than sure,[12] and feed the eyes of the lookers-on with all things that he shall think may give him a good grace, and shall do his best to get him a horse set out with fair harness and sightly trappings, and to have proper devices, apt poesies,[13] and witty inventions that may draw unto him the

---

[1] the Count Count Lodovico da Canossa (1476-1532), Veronese nobleman, diplomat, and servant to Pope Leo X and King Francis I. Made a bishop in 1516, he was a friend and kinsman of Castiglione. Hoby refers to him throughout as "Count Lewis."

[2] curiosity care or attention carried to excess; excessive attention lavished on trivial matters; fastidiousness.

[3] Sir Frederick Frederico Fregoso (1480-1541), humanist, linguist, courtier, scholar of ancient languages, and soldier, friend of Pietro Bembo and Castiglione, younger brother to Ottaviano, who was later ruler of Genoa (1513-22). He spent time in his youth at the court of his uncle, Guidobaldo da Montefeltro, the duke of Urbino.

[4] stay stop, pause.

[5] Master Morello of Ortona Sigismondo Morello da Ortona. In his youth, Morello was one of the duke of Urbino's soldiers; later, he became a trusted court retainer. According to Courtier, he is the oldest of the participants.

[6] ween understand, believe.

[7] although I remember ... 'circumstances' perhaps a reference to the circumstances under which a sin might be deemed more or less serious by a person's confessor, or perhaps more simply the rules set out for the examination of a penitent's conscience that would allow him or her to make a full and sincere confession of sin. The implication is that these "circumstances" (like the rules set out in the previous paragraph for the ideal courtier's speech and actions) are so vague in form and application as to be useless.

[8] largely comprehensively.

[9] mete appropriate, fitting.

[10] gross-headed dull, stupid.

[11] tilt, tourney, or joco di canne martial games to try combatants' skills at riding and jousting.

[12] sure not liable to break or give way; trusty, reliable.

[13] trappings gaily-ornamented cloths or coverings spread over the saddle of a horse; proper devices appropriate emblematic figures or designs (usually heraldic in origin, perhaps embroidered on one's clothes); apt poesies appropriate verses.

eyes of the lookers-on, as the adamant stone[1] doth iron. He shall never be among the last that come forth into the lists[2] to show themselves, considering the people, and especially women, take much more heed to the first than to the last, because the eyes and minds that at the beginning are greedy of that novelty, note every little matter and print it,[3] afterward by continuance they are not only full, but weary of it.

"Therefore was there a noble stage-player[4] in old time that for this respect would always be the first to come forth to play his part. In like manner also if our courtier do but talk of arms, he shall have an eye to the profession of them he talketh withal and according to that frame himself, and use one manner of talk with men, and another with women. And in case he will touch anything sounding to his own praise, he shall do it so dissemblingly[5] as it were at a chance and by the way and with the discretion and wariness that Count Lewis[6] showed us yesterday.

"Do you not now think, Master Morello, that our rules can teach somewhat? Trow[7] you not that friend of ours I told you of a few days ago had clean forgotten with whom he spoke, and why? When to entertain a gentlewoman whom he never saw before, at his first entering in talk with her, he began to tell how many men he had slain and what a hardy fellow he was, and how he could play at two-hand-sword and had never done until he had taught her how to defend certain strokes with a poleaxe being armed and how unarmed, and to show how (in a man's defence) to lay hand upon a dagger, so that the poor gentlewoman stood upon thorns, and thought an hour a thousand years till she were got from him, for fear lest he would go nigh to kill her as he had done those others. Into these errors run they that have not an eye to the 'circumstances' which you say ye have heard of friars.

[...]

"I would not our courtier should do as many do, that as soon as they come to any place, and also in the presence of great men with whom they have no acquaintance at all, without much entreating set out themselves to show as much as they know, yea and many times that they know not, so that a man would ween[8] they came purposely to show themselves for that, and that it is their principal profession. Therefore, let our courtier come to show his music as a thing to pass the time withal, and as he were enforced to do it, and not in the presence of noblemen nor of any great multitude. And for all he be skilful and doth well understand it, yet will I have him to dissemble the study and pains[9] that a man must needs take in all things that are well done. And let him make semblant[10] that he esteemeth but little in himself that quality, but in doing it excellently well make it much esteemed of other men.

[...]

"I will have our courtier therefore (beside that he hath and doth daily give men to understand that he is of the prowess which we have said ought to be in him) to turn all his thoughts and force of mind to love, and (as it were) to reverence the prince he serveth above all other things, and in his will, manners and fashions, to be altogether pliable to please him."

Here without any longer stay, Peter of Naples said, "Of these courtiers nowadays ye shall find ynow,[11] for (methink) in few words ye have painted us out a jolly flatterer."

---

1 adamant stone a stone with magnetic properties.

2 lists the enclosed space within which tournaments and tilting matches were held.

3 print it fix it firmly in memory.

4 <*>Q Roscius comoedus [Hoby's note]. Quintus Roscius Gallus, ancient Roman actor, was famous for his ability in both comedy and tragedy.

5 dissemblingly feigningly, disguisedly.

6 Count Lewis See p. 316, note 1.

7 Trow think, believe.

8 ween believe, think.

9 dissemble the study and pains disguise the study and efforts.

10 make semblant to have or assume a specified expression or demeanour.

11 ynow i.e., enough.

"You are far deceived," answered Sir Frederick, "for flatterers love not their lords nor their friends, the which I say unto you I will have principally in our courtier. And to please him and to obey his commandments whom he serveth, may be done without flattery, for I mean the commandments that are reasonable and honest, or such as of themselves are neither good nor bad, as is gaming and pastime,[1] and giving himself more to some one exercise than to another. And to this will I have the courtier to frame himself, though by nature he were not inclined to it: so that whensoever his lord looketh upon him, he may think in his mind that he hath to talk with him of a matter that he will be glad to hear. The which shall come to pass if there be a good judgement in him to understand what pleaseth his prince and a wit and wisdom to know how to apply it, and a bent[2] will to make him pleased with the thing which perhaps by nature should displease him. And having these principles, he shall never be sad[3] before his prince nor melancholy, nor so solein[4] as many, that a man would ween were at debate with their lords, which is truly a hateful matter.

"He shall not be ill-tongued, and especially against his superiors, which happeneth often times: for it appeareth that there is a storm in courts that carrieth this condition with it, that always look who receiveth most benefits at his lord's hands, and promoted from very base degree to high estate, he is evermore complaining and reporteth worst of him: which is an uncomely[5] thing, not only for such as these be, but even for such as be ill-handled indeed.

"Our courtier shall use no fond sauciness.[6] He shall be no carrier about of trifling news. He shall not be overseen in speaking otherwhile words that may offend, where his intent was to please. He shall not be stubborn and full of contention, as some busybodies that a man would ween had none other delight but to vex and stir men like flies, and take upon them to contrary[7] every man spitefully without respect. He shall be no babbler, not given to lightness,[8] no liar, no boaster, nor fond flatterer, but sober, and keeping him always within his bounds, use continually—and especially abroad—the reverence and respect that becometh the servant toward the master. And shall not do, as many that meeting a prince how great soever he be, if they have once spoken with him before, come toward him with a certain smiling and friendly countenance, as though they would make of one their equal, or show favour to an inferior of theirs.

"Very seldom or (in manner) never shall he crave anything of his lord for himself, lest the lord having respect to deny it him for himself, should happen to grant it him with displeasure, which is far worse. Again, in suing for others he shall discreetly observe the times, and his suit shall be for honest and reasonable matters, and he shall so frame his suit, in leaving out those points that he shall know will trouble him, and in making easy after a comely sort the lets,[9] that his lord will evermore grant it him: and though he deny it, he shall not think to have offended him whom he meant not to do, for, because great men oftentimes after they have denied request to one that hath sued to them with great instance, think the person that laboured to them so earnestly for it, was very greedy of it, and therefore in not obtaining it, hath cause to bear him ill will that denied him it, and upon this suspicion they conceive a hatred against that person, and can never afterward brook[10] him nor afford him good countenance.[11]

"He shall not covet to press into the chamber or other secret places where his lord is withdrawn, unless he be bid, for all he be[12] of great authority

---

1 gaming and pastime gambling and leisure activities.
2 bent determined or inclined.
3 sad serious, grave.
4 solein morose, sullen, unsociable.
5 uncomely unbecoming, improper.
6 fond sauciness foolish insolent presumption, arrogance.
7 contrary contradict.
8 lightness fickleness, frivolity, thoughtlessness.
9 lets hindrances, obstacles.
10 brook endure, tolerate.
11 afford him good countenance offer him favourable or welcoming looks.
12 for all he be i.e., even if he is.

with him: because great men oftentimes when they are privately gotten alone love a certain liberty to speak and do what they please, and therefore will not be seen or heard of any person that may lightly deem[1] of them, and reason willeth no less. Therefore, such as speak against great men for making of their chamber persons of no great quality in other things but in knowing how to attend about their person (methink) commit an error: because I cannot see why they should not have the liberty to refresh their minds, which we ourselves would have to refresh ours. But in case the courtier that is inured with weighty affairs happen to be afterward secretly in chamber with him, he ought to change his coat[2] and to defer grave matters till another time and place, and frame himself to pleasant communication, and such as his lord will be willing to give ear unto, lest he hinder that good mood of his.

"But herein and in all other things, let him have an especial regard that he be not cumbrous to him. And let him rather look to have favour and promotion offered him than crave it so openly in the face of the world, as many do that are so greedy of it that a man would ween[3] the not obtaining it grieveth them as much as the loss of life: and if they chance to enter into any displeasure, or else see others in favour, they are in such anguish of mind that they can by no means dissemble the malice, and so make all men laugh them to scorn: and many times they are the cause that great men favour some one, only to spite them withal. And afterward if they happen to enter in favour that passeth a mean,[4] they are so drunken in it, that they know not what to do for joy: and a man would ween that they wist[5] not what were become of their feet and hands, and (in a manner) are ready to call company to behold them and to rejoice with them, as a matter they have not been accustomed withal. Of this sort I will not have our courtier to be. I would have him esteem favour and promotion, but for all that not to love it so much that a man should think he could not live without it. And when he hath it, let him not show himself new or strange in it; nor wonder at it when it is offered him; nor refuse it in such sort as some that for very ignorance receive it not, and so make men believe that they acknowledge themselves unworthy of it. Yet ought a man always to humble himself somewhat under his degree, and not receive favour and promotions so easily as they be offered him, but refuse them modestly, showing he much esteemeth them and after such a sort that he may give him an occasion that offereth them to offer them with a great deal more instance: because the more resistance a man maketh in such manner to receive them, the more doth he seem to the prince that giveth them to be esteemed, and that the benefit which he bestoweth is so much the more, as he that receiveth it seemeth to make of it, thinking himself much honoured thereby. And these are the true and perfect promotions that make men esteemed of such as see them abroad: because when they are not craved, every man conjectureth they arise of true virtue, and so much the more as they are accompanied with modesty."

[...]

THE THIRD BOOK OF THE COURTIER

[...]

Then the Lord Julian[6] turning him to the Duchess: "Madam," quoth he, "since it is so your pleasure, I will speak that commeth to mind, but with very [1] lightly deem carelessly or thoughtlessly judge.

[2] change his coat alter his manner.

[3] ween think.

[4] passeth a mean goes beyond the ordinary.

[5] wist knew.

[6] Lord Julian Giuliano de' Medici (1479-1516), third son of Lorenzo de' Medici (sometimes called Lorenzo the Magnificent). During his family's exile from Florence (beginning in 1494), Giuliano resided partly at the court of Urbino. When his family was restored to power, he became governor of Florence, and later received the important position of a general of the Church from his brother, Leo X. Reputedly a good poet but an uninspired soldier, he was a friend of Pietro Bembo.

great doubt to satisfy. And iwis[1] a great deal less pain it were for me to fashion a lady that should deserve to be queen of the world, than a perfect gentlewoman of the court, for of her I wot not where to fet[2] any pattern, but for a queen I should not need to seek far, and sufficient it were for me only to imagine the heavenly conditions of a lady whom I know, and through seeing them, direct all my thoughts to express plainly with words the thing that many see with their eyes, and where I could do no more, yet should I fulfil my duty in naming her."

Then said the Duchess: "Pass not your bounds, my Lord Julian, but mind the order taken, and fashion the gentlewoman of the palace, that this so worthy a mistress may have him that shall worthily serve her."

The Lord Julian proceeded: "For a proof therefore, madam, that your commandment may drive me to assay to do, yea the thing I have no skill in, I shall speak of this excellent woman, as I would have her. And when I have fashioned her after my mind, and can afterward get none other, I will take her as mine own, after the example of Pygmalion.[3] And whereas the Lord Gaspar[4] hath said that the very same rules that are given for the courtier serve also for the woman, I am of a contrary opinion. For albeit some qualities are common and necessary as well for the woman as the man, yet are there some other more meter[5] for the woman than for the man, and some again mete for the man that she ought in no wise[6] to meddle withal. The very same I say of the exercises of the body. But principally in her fashions, manners, words, gestures and conversation (methink) the woman ought to be much unlike the man. For right as it is seemly for him to show a certain manliness full and steady, so doth it well in a woman to have a tenderness, soft and mild, with a kind of womanly sweetness in every gesture of hers, that in going, standing and speaking whatever she lusteth,[7] may always make her appear a woman without any likeness of man. Adding therefore this principle to the rules that these lords have taught the courtier, I think well, she may serve her turn with many of them, and be endowed with very good qualities, as the Lord Gaspar sayeth. For many virtues of the mind I reckon be as necessary for a woman, as for a man. Likewise nobleness of birth, avoiding affectation or curiosity, to have a good grace of nature in all her doings, to be of good conditions, witty, foreseeing, not haughty, not envious, not ill-tongued, not light,[8] not contentious, not untowardly,[9] to have the knowledge to win and keep the good will of her lady and of all others, to do well and with a good grace the exercises comely for women.

"Methink well beauty is more necessary in her than in the courtier, for (to say the truth) there is a great lack in the woman that wanteth beauty. She ought also to be more circumspect and to take better heed that she give no occasion to be ill-reported of, and so to behave herself, that she be not only not spotted with any fault, but not so much as with suspicion. Because a woman hath not so many ways to defend herself from slanderous reports, as hath a man. But for so much as Count Lewis hath very particularly expressed the principal profession of the courtier, and willeth it to be in martial feats, methink also behooveful to utter (according to my judgement) what the gentlewoman's of the palace ought to be: in which point when I have thoroughly satisfied, I shall think myself rid of the greatest part of my duty. Leaving therefore apart the virtues of the mind that ought to be common to her with the courtier, as wisdom, nobleness of courage, staidness,[10] and many more, and likewise the conditions that are

1 iwis truly, certainly.

2 fet fetch.

3 Pygmalion the mythic Greek sculptor who fashioned a statue of a woman so perfect that he fell in love with it; Venus took pity on him and brought the statue to life.

4 the Lord Gaspar Gaspare Pallavicino (1486-1511), the youngest of the participants.

5 meter more appropriate, proper.

6 wise way.

7 lusteth desires, wishes.

8 light frivolous, unthinking.

9 untowardly froward, perverse, ill-disposed.

10 staidness sobriety of character, manner, or conduct.

mete for all women, as to be good and discreet, to have the understanding to order her husband's goods and her house and children when she is married, and all those parts that belong to a good huswife:[1] I say that for her that liveth in court, methink there belongeth unto her above all other things a certain sweetness in language that may delight, whereby she may gently entertain all kinds of men with talk worth the hearing and honest, and applied to the time and place, and to the degree of the person she communeth withal, accompanying with sober and quiet manners and with the honesty that must always be a stay to all her deeds, a ready liveliness of wit, whereby she may declare herself far wide from all dullness: but with such a kind of goodness that she may be esteemed no less chaste, wise and courteous than pleasant, feat-conceited[2] and sober: and therefore must she keep a certain mean[3] very hard, and (in a manner) derived of contrary matters, and come just to certain limits, but not pass them.

"This woman ought not therefore (to make herself good and honest) be so skemish[4] and make wise[5] to abhor both the company and the talk (though somewhat of the wantonest) if she be present, to get her thence by and by,[6] for a man may lightly guess that she feigned to be so coy to hide that in herself which she doubted others might come to the knowledge of; and such nice fashions[7] are always hateful. Neither ought she again (to show herself free and pleasant) speak words of dishonesty, nor use a certain familiarity without measure and bridle, and fashions to make men believe that of her that perhaps is not: but being present at such kind of talk, she ought to give the hearing with a little blushing and shamefastness.[8]

[...]

"And because the Lord Gaspar doth also ask what these many things be she ought to have a sight in,[9] and how to entertain, and whether the virtues ought to be applied to this entertainment, I say that I will have her to understand that[10] these lords have willed the courtier to know: and in those exercises that we have said are not comely for her, I will at the least she have that judgement that men can have of the things which they practice not, and this to have knowledge to praise and make of gentlemen more and less according to their deserts. And to make a brief rehearsal in few words of that is already said, I will that this woman have a sight in letters, in music, in drawing or painting, and skilful in dancing, and in devising sports and pastimes, accompanying with that discreet sobermood[11] and with the giving a good opinion of herself, the other principles also that have been taught the courtier. And thus in conversation, in laughing, in sporting, in jesting, finally in everything she shall be had in very great price, and shall entertain accordingly both with jests and feat conceits[12] mete for her, every person that commeth in her company. And albeit staidness, nobleness of courage, temperance, strength of the mind, wisdom and the other virtues a man would think belonged not to entertain, yet will I have her endowed with them all, not so much to entertain (although notwithstanding they may serve thereto also) as to be virtuous: and these virtues to make her such a one that she may deserve to be esteemed, and all her doings framed by them."

"I wonder then," quoth the Lord Gaspar smiling, "since you give women both letters, and staidness, and nobleness of courage and temperance, ye will not have them also to bear rule in cities, and to make laws, and to lead armies, and men to stand spinning in the kitchen."

---

1 huswife i.e., housewife.

2 feat-conceited having a proper or appropriate wit/intelligence.

3 mean middle path.

4 skemish perhaps from "scheme": contriving, plotting.

5 make wise falsely wise (pretending to wisdom).

6 by and by immediately.

7 nice fashions fastidious, overly-scrupulous behaviours or actions.

8 shamefastness modesty.

9 have a sight in i.e., have knowledge or insight in.

10 that i.e., that which.

11 sobermood sobermindedness; sobriety of demeanour.

12 feat conceits apt figures of speech.

The Lord Julian answered in like manner, smiling: "Perhaps too this were not amiss." Then he proceeded: "Do you not know that Plato (which indeed was not very friendly to women) giveth them the overseeing of cities, and all other martial offices he appointeth to men? Think you not there were many to be found that could as well skill in ruling cities and armies, as men can? But I have not appointed them these offices, because I fashion a waiting gentlewoman of the court, not a queen. I see well you would covertly have up again the slanderous report that the Lord Octavian[1] gave women yesterday: namely, that they be most imperfect creatures, and not apt to work any virtuous deed, and of very little worthiness and of no value in respect of men. But surely both he and you should be in very great error if ye thought so."

Then said the Lord Gaspar: "I will not have up again matters already past, but you would fain[2] press me to speak some word that might offend these ladies' minds, to make them my foes, as you with flattering them falsely will purchase their good will. But they are so wise above other[s], that they love truth better (although it make not so much with them) than false praises: neither take they it in ill part for a man to say that men are of a more worthiness, and they will not let[3] to confess that you have spoken great wonders, and appointed to the gentlewoman of the palace certain fond impossible matters, and so many virtues that Socrates and Cato and all the philosophers in the world are nothing to her. For to tell you the plain truth, I marvel you were not ashamed so much to pass your bounds, where it ought to have sufficed ye to make this gentlewoman of the palace beautiful, sober, honest, well-spoken, and to have the understanding to entertain without running in slander, with dancing, music, sports, laughing, jests, and the other matters that we see daily used in court: but to go about to give her the knowledge of all things in the world, and to appoint her the virtues that so seldom times are seen in men, yea and in them of old time, it is a matter that can neither be held withal nor scantly heard.

"Now that women are imperfect creatures and consequently of less worthiness than men, and not apt to conceive those virtues that they are,[4] I purpose not to affirm it, because the prowess of these ladies were enough to make me a liar. Yet this I say unto you, that most wise men have left in writing that nature, because she is always set and bent to make things most perfect, if she could, would continually bring forth men, and when a woman is born, it is a slackness or default of nature, and contrary to that she would do. As it is also seen in one born blind, lame, or with some other impediment, and in trees many fruits that never ripen: even so may a woman be said to be a creature brought forth at a chance and by hap,[5] and that it is so, mark me the works of the man and the woman, and by them make your proof of the perfection of each of them. Howbeit[6] since these defaults of women are the wit of nature that hath so brought them forth, we ought not for this to hate them, nor feint[7] in having less respect to them than is mete, but to esteem them above that they are, methinketh a plain error."

[...]

Then answered Sir Frederick smiling, "Methink, my Lord Julian, this opinion of yours[8] is very sour and crabbed, and I believe you have learned it of some friar preacher, of them that rebuke women in love with laymen that their part may be the more.[9] And me seemeth you set over-hard laws to married women, for many there be that their husbands bear very sore hatred unto without cause, and nip them

---

1 the Lord Octavian Ottaviano Fregoso (1470-1524), soldier, ambassador to France, and later governor of Genoa. He died in exile after the invasion of Genoa in 1522.

2 fain eagerly, willingly.

3 let pause.

4 not apt to conceive those virtues that they are i.e., not able to conceptualize or understand these virtues as they actually exist.

5 hap chance, accident.

6 Howbeit even so.

7 feint be deceptive, deceiving.

8 Lord Julian has just finished stating his opinion that married gentlewomen of the palace should not take lovers or engage in flirtations which might damage their reputations.

9 that their part may be the more i.e., that the friars themselves may have sexual access to these women instead.

at the heart, sometime in loving other women, otherwhile in working them all the displeasures they can imagine. Some are compelled by their fathers to take old men full of diseases, uglesome[1] and wayward, that make them lead their life in continual misery. And in case it were leefull[2] for such to be divorced and severed from them they be ill-coupled withal, perhaps it were not to be allowed that they should love any other than their husband. But when either through the stars, their enemies, or through the diversity of complexion, or any other casualty, it befalleth that in bed, which ought to be the nest of agreement and love, the cursed fury of Hell soweth the seed of his venom, which afterward bringeth forth disdain, suspicion and the pricking thorns of hatred, that tormenteth those unlucky souls bound cruelly together in the fast-linked chain that cannot be broken but by death, why will not you have it leefull for this woman to seek some easement for so hard a scourge, and give unto another that which her husband not only regardeth not, but rather clean abhorreth? I hold well that such as have meet husbands and be beloved of them ought not to do them injury; but the other in not loving him that loveth them do themselves injury."

"Nay, they do themselves injury in loving other beside their husband," answered the Lord Julian. "Yet since not loving is not many times in our will, if this mishap chance to the woman of the palace, that the hatred of her husband or the love of another bendeth her to love, I will have her to grant her lover nothing else but the mind: nor at any time to make him any certain token of love, neither in word nor gesture, nor any other way that he may be fully assured of it."

Then said Master Robert of Bari, smiling: "I appeal, my Lord Julian, from this judgement of yours, and I believe I shall have many fellows. But since you will teach this currishness[3] (that I may term it so) to married women, will ye also have the unmarried to be so cruel and discourteous, and not please their lovers at the least in somewhat?"

"In case my woman of the palace," answered the Lord Julian, "be not married, minding to love, I will have her to love one whom she may marry, neither will I think it an offence if she show him some token of love. In which matter I will teach her one general rule in few words, and that is, that she show him whom she loveth all tokens of love, but[4] such as may bring into the lover's mind a hope to obtain of her any dishonest matter. [...]"

[...]

THE FOURTH BOOK OF THE COURTIER

[...]

[Lord Octavian continues his speech.]

"The end therefore of a perfect courtier (whereof hitherto nothing hath been spoken) I believe is to purchase him, by the mean of the qualities which these lords have given him, in such wise[5] the good will and favour of the prince he is in service withal, that he may break his mind to him and always inform him frankly of the truth of every matter mete[6] for him to understand, without fear or peril to displease him. And when he[7] knoweth his mind[8] is bent to commit anything unseemly for him, to be bold to stand with him in it,[9] and to take courage after an honest sort at the favour which he hath gotten him[10] through his good qualities, to dissuade him from every ill purpose, and to set him in the way of virtue. And so shall the courtier, if he have the goodness in him that these lords have given him accompanied with readiness of wit, pleasantness, wisdom, knowledge in letters and so many other things, understand how to behave himself readily in

---

1 uglesome fearful, horrible, gruesome.

2 leeful permissible, lawful.

3 currishness quarrelsomeness, baseness.

4 but i.e., except.

5 in such wise in such a way.

6 mete appropriate, fitting.

7 I.e., the courtier.

8 his mind i.e., the prince's mind.

9 to stand with him in it i.e., to argue with him about it; to stand up to him concerning it.

10 he hath gotten him i.e., which the courtier has himself achieved.

all occurrences to drive into his prince's head what honour and profit shall ensue to him and to his[1] by justice, liberality, valiantness of courage, meekness and by the other virtues that belong to a good prince, and contrariwise what slander and damage cometh of the vices contrary to them.

"And therefore in mine opinion, as music, sports, pastimes, and other pleasant fashions are (as a man would say) the flower of courtliness, even so is the training and the helping forward of the prince to goodness and the fearing him from evil, the fruit of it. And because the praise of well-doing consisteth chiefly in two points, whereof the one is, in choosing out an end that our purpose is directed unto that is good indeed: the other, the knowledge to find out apt and meet means to bring it to the appointed good end. Sure it is that the mind of him which thinketh to work so—that his prince shall not be deceived nor led with flatterers, railers and liars, but shall know both the good and the bad and bear love to the one and hatred to the other—is directed to a very good end.

"Methink again that the qualities which these lords have given the courtier may be a good means to compass it, and that because among many vices that we see nowadays in many of our princes the greatest are ignorance and self-liking, and the root of these two mischiefs is nothing else but lying, which vice is worthily abhorred of God and man, and more hurtful to princes than any other, because they have more scarcity than of anything else, of that which they need to have more plenty of than of any other thing: namely, of such as should tell them the truth and put them in mind of goodness. For enemies be not driven of love to do these offices, but they delight rather to have them live wickedly and never to amend; on the other side, they dare not rebuke them openly for fear they be punished. As for friends, few of them have free passage to them, and those few have a respect to reprehend[2] their vices so freely as they do private men's. And many times to curry favour and to purchase good will, they give themselves to nothing else but to feed them with matters that may delight and content their mind, though they be foul and dishonest. So that of friends they become flatterers, and to make a hand[3] by that strict familiarity, they speak and work always to please, and for the most part open the way with lies, which in the prince's mind engender ignorance, not of outward matters only, but also of his own self. And this may be said to be the greatest and foulest lie of all other, because the ignorant mind deceiveth himself and inwardly maketh lies of himself.

"Of this it cometh, that great men, beside that they never understand the truth of anything—drunken with the licentious liberty that rule bringeth with it and with abundance of delicacies drowned in pleasures—are so far out of the way and their mind is so corrupted in seeing themselves always obeyed and (as it were) worshipped with so much reverence and praise, without not only any reproof at all but also gainsaying,[4] that through this ignorance they wade to an extreme self-liking, so that afterward they admit no counsel nor advice of others. And because they believe that the understanding how to rule is a most easy matter, and to compass it there needeth neither art nor learning, but only stoutness,[5] they bend their mind and all their thoughts to the maintenance of that port[6] they keep, thinking it the true happiness to do what a man lusteth.[7] Therefore do some abhor reason and justice, because they ween[8] it a bridle and a certain mean to bring them in bondage and to 'minish[9] in them the contentation[10] and heart's ease that they have to bear rule, if they should observe it: and their rule were not perfect nor whole if they should be compelled to obey unto duty and honesty, because they have an opinion that 'Whoso obeyeth, is no right lord indeed.'

---

1 his i.e., his family, his descendants.

2 a respect to reprehend a deferential hesitancy to reprove or criticize.

3 to make a hand to succeed.

4 gainsaying contradiction, opposition.

5 stoutness pride, arrogance; obstinacy.

6 port bearing, demeanour, comportment.

7 lusteth desires, wishes.

8 ween believe, suppose.

9 'minish i.e., diminish.

10 contentation contentment.

[...]

"But in case a grave philosopher should come before any of our princes, or whoever beside, that would show them plainly and without any circumstance the horrible face of true virtue and teach them good manners and what the life of a good prince ought to be, I am assured they would abhor him at the first sight, as a most venomous serpent, or else they would make him a laughing stock, as a most vile matter. I say therefore that since nowadays princes are so corrupt through ill usages, ignorance and false self-liking, and that it is so hard a matter to give them the knowledge of the truth and to bend them to virtue, and men with lies and flattery and such naughty means seek to curry favour with them, the courtier by the mean of those honest qualities that Count Lewis and Sir Frederick have given him, may soon, and ought to go about so to, purchase him the good will and allure unto him the mind of his prince, that he may make him a free and safe passage to commune with him[1] in every matter without troubling him. And if he be such a one as is said, he shall compass it with small pain, and so may he always open unto him the truth of every matter at ease. Beside this by little and little distil into his mind goodness, and teach him continency, stoutness of courage, justice, temperance, making him to taste what sweetness is hid under that little bitterness, which at the first sight appeareth unto him that withstandeth vices: which are always hurtful, displeasant and accompanied with ill report and shame, even as virtues are profitable, pleasant and praiseable, and inflame him to them with the examples of many famous captains, and of other notable personages, unto whom they of old time used to make images of metal and marble, and sometime of gold, and to set them up in common haunted places,[2] as well for the honour of them, as for an encouraging of others, that with an honest envy they might also endeavour themselves to reach unto that glory.

"In this wise may he lead him through the rough way of virtue (as it were) decking it about with boughs to shadow it and strewing it over with sightly flowers, to ease the grief of the painful journey in him that is but of a weak force. And sometime with music, sometime with arms, and horses, sometime with rhymes and meter, otherwhile with communication of love, and with all those ways that these lords have spoken of, continually keep that mind of his occupied in honest pleasure: imprinting notwithstanding therein always beside (as I have said) in company with these flickering provocations some virtuous condition, and beguiling him with a wholesome craft, as the wary physicians do, who many times when they minister to young and tender children in their sickness a medicine of a bitter taste anoint the cup about the brim with some sweet liquor. The courtier, therefore, applying to such a purpose this veil of pleasure, in every time, in every place, and in every exercise he shall attain to his end, and deserve much more praise and recompense than for any other good work that he can do in the world, because there is no treasure that doth so universally profit as doth a good prince, nor any mischief so universally hurt as an ill prince.

"Therefore, is there also in pain so bitter and cruel that were a sufficient punishment for those naughty and wicked courtiers, that make their honest and pleasant manners and their good qualities a cloak for an ill end, and by mean of them seek to come in favour with their princes for to corrupt them and to stray them from the way of virtue and to lead them to vice. For a man may say that such as these be do infect with deadly poison not one vessel, whereof one man alone drinketh, but the common fountain that all the people resorteth to."

[...]

"But in case our courtier will do as we have said, he shall find them all[3] in his prince's mind: and

[1] him i.e., the prince.

[2] common haunted places public places often frequented.

[3] In the section deleted here, Octavian speaks of all the qualities and attitudes that a courtier should help inculcate in his prince, all of which arise from virtues such as temperance, justice, sober mood, goodness, discernment, stoutness of courage, sumptuousness, thoughtfulness, meekness, courtesy, and pleasantness.

daily he shall see spring such beautiful flowers and fruits as all the delicious gardens in the world have not the like: and he shall feel very great contentation[1] within himself, when he remembereth that he hath given him not the things which foolish persons give—which is gold or silver, plate, garments, and such matters, whereof he that giveth them hath himself very great scarcity, and he that receiveth them exceeding great store—but that virtue which perhaps among all the matters that belong unto man is the chiefest and rarest: that is to say, the manner and way to rule and to reign in the right kind. Which alone were sufficient to make men happy, and to bring once again into the world the golden age, which is written to have been when Saturnus reigned in the old time."[2]

[...]

Here after a little debating of the matter to and fro among the company, with certain contentions tending to the commendation of that that had been spoken, and agreeing on all hands not yet to be bedtime, the Lord Julian said smiling: "Madam, I am so very an enemy to craft and guile that needs must I speak against the Lord Octavian who, for that he is (as I much doubt him) a secret conspirator with the Lord Gaspar against women, hath overshot himself in committing of two errors (in mine opinion) very great: whereof the one is, that meaning to prefer this courtier before the gentlewoman of the palace, and to make him to pass those bounds that she is not able to reach to, he hath also preferred him before the prince, which is most unseemly. The other, that he hath given him such an end, that it is evermore hard and otherwhile impossible for him to come by it: and yet when he doth come by it, he ought not to have the name of a courtier."

"I cannot see," quoth the Lady Emilia,[3] "how it is hard or impossible for the courtier to come by this his end, nor yet how the Lord Octavian hath preferred him before the prince."

"Grant it him not," answered the Lord Octavian, "for I have not preferred the courtier before the prince. And as touching the end of courtliness, I dare undertake that I am not overseen in any point."

Then answered the Lord Julian, "You cannot say, my Lord Octavian, that always the cause, by which the effect is such as it is, is no more such as the effect is. Therefore, needs must the courtier, by whose instruction the prince must be of such an excellency, be more excellent than the prince: and in this wise shall he be also of a more worthiness than the prince himself, which is most unfitting. Then concerning the end of courtliness, that which you have spoken may follow when there is little between the age of the prince and the courtier's: yet very hardly, for where there is small difference of age, it is likely there is also small difference of knowledge. But in case the prince be old and the courtier young, it is mete that the old prince know more than the young courtier, and where this followeth not always, it followeth sometime, and then is the end which you have appointed to the courtier impossible. In case again the prince be young and the courtier aged, much ado shall the courtier have to win him the good will of the prince with those qualities that you have given him. For (to say the truth) feats of arms and the other exercises belong unto young men and be not comely in age: and music, dancing, feastings, sportings, and love, be matters to be laughed at in old men, and (methink) to an instructor of the life and manners of a prince,—who ought to be a grave person and of authority, ripe in years and experience and (if it were possible) a good philosopher, a good captain and to have the knowledge almost of everything,—they are most unseemly. Wherefore he that instructeth a prince (I believe) ought

[1] contentation contentment.

[2] the golden age ... Saturnus ... the old time In classical literature, the golden age was the age of original human and natural perfection; Hesiod's poem Works and Days is the source for the division of history into a series of increasingly degenerate ages of mankind. Christian writers often represented the usurpation of Saturn by Jupiter as the fall from the worship of the one true god into antiquity's dedication to paganism.

[3] Lady Emilia Emilia Pia (d. 1528) was the wife of Antonio da Montefeltro (illegitimate son of Guidobaldo's father, and thus Guidobaldo's half-brother). She was the friend and companion of Elisabetta, duchess of Urbino.

not to be called a courtier, but deserveth a far greater and a more honourable name." [...]

[...]

The Lord Octavian laughed and said, "[...] Now to make you answer to your objections, you shall understand that I have not said that the instruction of the courtier ought to be the only cause why the prince should be such a one, for in case he be not inclined of nature and apt to be such a one, all diligence and exhortation of the courtier were in vain. As in like manner every good husbandman[1] should labour in vain that would take in hand to till and sow with good grain the barren sand of the sea, because this barrenness in that place is natural. But when to the good seed in a fruitful soil with the temperateness of air and rain meet for the season of the year, there is also applied the diligence of man's husbanding[2] the ground, always great abundance of corn is seen to spring plenteously: yet for all this, is it not to be said that the husbandman alone is the cause of it, although without him all the other things do little or nothing help the purpose.

"There be, therefore, many princes that would be good in case[3] their minds were well-tilled, and of them speak I, not of such as be like the barren country, and of nature so far wide from good conditions that no teaching were able to frame their mind to a right trade.[4] And forsomuch as (as we have already said) such customs and properties be engendered in us as our doings are, and virtue consisteth in doing and practice, it is not impossible nor any marvel that the courtier should train his prince in many virtues—as justice, liberality, noble courage—the practicing whereof he, through his greatness, may lightly put in use and make it custom, which the courtier cannot do, because he hath no means to practice them, and thus the prince inclined to virtue by the courtier may become more virtuous than the courtier. Beside that, you must conceive that the whetstone which cutteth not a whit[5] doth yet make a tool sharp: therefore although the courtier instructeth his prince, yet (me think) it is not to be said that he is of a more worthiness than his prince.

"That the end of this courtier is hard and sometime impossible, and that when the courtier doth come by it, he ought not to be named a courtier, but deserveth a greater name, I tell you plainly, that I deny not this hardness, because it is no less hard to find out so excellent a courtier, than to come by such an end. Yet by reason (methink) the impossibleness of the matter lieth not in the point that you have alleged. For in case the courtier be so young that he hath not understanding in the thing which he ought to have a knowledge in, it is not to the purpose to speak of him, because he is not the courtier that we entreat upon, neither is it possible for him that must have a sight[6] in so many things to be[7] very young. And if it happen moreover the prince to be so wise and good of himself, that he needeth no exhortations or counsel of others (although it be so hard a matter as every man knoweth) it sufficeth that the courtier be such a one as—if his prince had need—he could make him virtuous. And then may he in effect fulfil the other part: not to suffer him to be deceived, and to work that evermore he may understand the truth of everything, and bolster him against flatterers and railers, and all such as should endeavour to corrupt his mind with dishonest delights. And in this wise shall he come by a part of his end though he cannot practice the whole, which cannot be justly laid to him for a fault, since he refraineth the doing of it upon so good a ground. [...]"

[...]

They stood all hearkening heedfully to Bembo's reasoning, and after he had stayed a while and saw that none spoke, he said: "Since you have made me to begin to show our not young courtier this

1 husbandman farmer.
2 husbanding preparing.
3 in case i.e., in the event that.
4 right trade a morally correct way of life.
5 whetstone a stone used to sharpen metal blades; not a whit not at all.
6 sight knowledge.
7 to be i.e., if he is.

happy love, I will lead him yet somewhat farther forwards, because to stand still at this stay were somewhat perilous for him, considering, as we have oftentimes said, the soul is most inclined to the senses, and for all reason with discourse chooseth well, and knoweth that beauty not to spring of the body, and therefore setteth a bridle to the unhonest desires, yet to behold it always in that body doth oftentimes corrupt the right judgment. And where no other inconvenience ensueth upon it, one's absence from the wight[1] beloved carrieth a great passion with it; because the influence of that beauty when it is present giveth a wondrous delight to the lover, and, setting his heart on fire, quickeneth and melteth certain virtues in a trance and congealed in the soul, the which, nourished with the heat of love, flow about and go bubbling nigh the heart, and thrust out through the eyes those spirits which be most fine vapours made of the purest and clearest part of the blood, which receive the image of beauty and deck it with a thousand sundry furnitures.[2] Whereupon the soul taketh a delight, and with a certain wonder is aghast, and yet enjoyeth she it, and, as it were, astonied[3] together with the pleasure, feeleth the fear and reverence that men accustomably have toward holy matters, and thinketh herself to be in paradise. The lover, therefore, that considereth only the beauty in the body, loseth this treasure and happiness as soon as the woman beloved with her departure leaveth the eyes without their brightness, and consequently the soul as a widow without her joy. For since beauty is far off, that influence of love setteth not the heart on fire, as it did in presence. Whereupon the pores be dried up and withered, and yet doth the remembrance of beauty somewhat stir those virtues of the soul in such wise that they seek to scatter abroad the spirits, and they, finding the ways closed up, have no issue,[4] and still they seek to get out, and so with those shootings enclosed prick the soul and torment her bitterly, as young children when in their tender gums they begin to breed teeth. And hence come the tears, sighs, vexations, and torments of lovers; because the soul is always in affliction and travail[5] and, in a manner, waxeth wood,[6] until the beloved beauty cometh before her once again, and then she is immediately pacified and taketh breath, and, thoroughly bent to it, is nourished with most dainty food, and by her will would never depart from so sweet a sight.

"To avoid, therefore, the torment of this absence, and to enjoy beauty without passion, the courtier by the help of reason must full and wholly call back again the coveting of the body to beauty alone, and, in what he can, behold it in itself simple and pure, and frame it within his imagination sundered from all matter, and so make it friendly and loving to his soul, and there enjoy it, and have it with him day and night, in every time and place, without mistrust ever to lose it; keeping always fast in mind that the body is a most diverse[7] thing from beauty, and not only not increaseth but diminisheth the perfection of it. In this wise[8] shall our not young courtier be out of all bitterness and wretchedness that young men feel, in a manner continually, as jealousies, suspicions, disdains, angers, desperations, and certain rages full of madness, whereby many times they be led into so great error that some do not only beat the women whom they love, but rid themselves out of their life. He shall do no wrong to the husband, father, brethren, or kinsfolk of the woman beloved. He shall not bring her in slander. He shall not be in case with much ado otherwhile to refrain his eyes and tongue from discovering his desires to others. He shall not take thought at departure or in absence, because he shall evermore carry his precious treasure about with him shut fast within his heart. And besides, through the virtue of imagination, he shall fashion within himself that beauty much more fair than it is indeed.

"But among these commodities the lover shall find another yet far greater, in case he will take this

[1] wight creature.
[2] furnitures embellishments, adornments.
[3] astonied overwhelmed, astonished.
[4] issue way out, exit.
[5] travail toil, labour.
[6] waxeth wood grows mad.
[7] diverse different (in character or quality).
[8] wise way.

love for a stair, as it were, to climb up to another far higher than it. The which he shall bring to pass, if he will go and consider with himself what a streict[1] bond it is to be always in the trouble to behold the beauty of one body alone. And therefore, to come out of this so narrow a room, he shall gather in his thought by little and little so many ornaments that meddling[2] all beauties together he shall make a universal concept, and bring the multitude of them to the unity of one alone, that is generally spread over all the nature of man. And thus shall he behold no more the particular beauty of one woman, but an universal, that decketh out all bodies. Whereupon, being made dim with this greater light, he shall not pass upon the lesser, and, burning in a more excellent flame, he shall little esteem it that he set great store by at the first. This stair of love, though it be very noble and such as few arrive at it, yet is it not in this sort to be called perfect, forsomuch as where the imagination is of force to make conveyance and hath no knowledge but through those beginnings that the senses help her withal, she is not clean purged from gross darkness; and therefore, though she do consider that universal beauty in sunder[3] and in itself alone, yet doth she not well and clearly discern it, nor without some doubtfulness, by reason of the agreement that the fancies have with the body. Wherefore such as come to this love are like young birds almost flush,[4] which for all they flutter a little their tender wings, yet dare they not stray far from the nest, nor commit themselves to the wind and open weather. When our courtier, therefore, shall be come to this point, although he may be called a good and happy lover, in respect of them that be drowned in the misery of sensual love, yet will I not have him to set his heart at rest, but boldly proceed farther, following the high way after his guide, that leadeth him to the point of true happiness. And thus, instead of going out of his wit with thought, as he must do that will consider the bodily beauty, he may come into his wit to behold the beauty that is seen with the eyes of the mind, which then begin to be sharp and through-seeing, when the eyes of the body lose the flower of their sightliness.

"Therefore the soul, rid of vices, purged with the studies of true philosophy, occupied in spiritual, and exercised in matters of understanding, turning her to the beholding of her own substance, as it were raised out of a most deep sleep, openeth the eyes that all men have and few occupy,[5] and seeth in herself a shining beam of that light which is the true image of the angel-like beauty partened[6] with her, whereof she also partneth with the body a feeble shadow; therefore, waxed blind about earthly matters, is made most quick of sight about heavenly. And otherwhile when the stirring virtues of the body are withdrawn alone through earnest beholding, either fast bound through sleep, when she is not hindered by them, she feeleth a certain privy smell of the right angel-like beauty, and, ravished with the shining of that light, beginneth to be inflamed, and so greedily followeth after, that in a manner she waxeth drunken and beside herself, for coveting to couple herself with it, having found, to her weening,[7] the footsteps of God, in the beholding of whom, as in her happy end, she seeketh to settle herself. And therefore, burning in this most happy flame, she ariseth to the noblest part of her, which is the understanding, and there, no more shadowed with the dark night of earthly matters, seeth the heavenly beauty; but yet doth she not for all that enjoy it altogether perfectly, because she beholdeth it only in her particular understanding, which cannot conceive the passing[8] great universal beauty; whereupon, not thoroughly satisfied with this benefit, love giveth unto the soul a greater happiness. For like as through the particular beauty of one body he guideth her to the universal beauty of all bodies, even so in the last degree of perfection through particular understanding he guideth her to the universal

[1] streict tight, restrictive.
[2] meddling mixing, combining.
[3] in sunder apart or separate from (something).
[4] flush fledged, fit to fly.
[5] occupy use.
[6] partened shared.
[7] weening thought, belief, opinion.
[8] passing surpassingly, exceedingly.

understanding. Thus the soul kindled in the most holy fire of true heavenly love fleeth to couple herself with the nature of angels, and not only clean forsaketh sense,[1] but hath no more need of the discourse of reason, for, being changed into an angel, she understandeth all things that may be understood; and without any veil or cloud she seeth the main sea of the pure heavenly beauty, and receiveth it into her, and enjoyeth that sovereign happiness that cannot be comprehended of the senses. Since, therefore, the beauties which we daily see with these our dim eyes in bodies subject to corruption, that nevertheless be nothing else but dreams and most thin shadows of beauty, seem unto us so well-favoured and comely that oftentimes they kindle in us a most burning fire, and with such delight that we reckon no happiness may be compared to it that we feel otherwhile through the only look which the beloved countenance of a woman casteth at us; what happy wonder, what blessed abashment, may we reckon that to be that taketh the souls which come to have a sight of the heavenly beauty? What sweet flame, what sweet incense, may a man believe that to be which ariseth of the fountain of the sovereign and right beauty? Which is the origin of all other beauty, which never increaseth nor diminisheth, always beautiful, and of itself, as well on the one part as on the other, most simple, only like itself, and partner of none other, but in such wise beautiful that all other beautiful things be beautiful because they be partners of the beauty of it.

"This is the beauty unseparable from the high bounty which with her voice calleth and draweth to her all things; and not only to the endowed with understanding giveth understanding, to the reasonable reason, to the sensual sense and appetite to live, but also partaketh with plants and stones, as a print of herself, stirring, and the natural provocation of their properties. So much, therefore, is this love greater and happier than others as the cause that stirreth it is more excellent. And therefore, as common fire trieth gold and maketh it fine, so this most holy fire in souls destroyeth and consumeth whatsoever is mortal in them, and relieveth and maketh beautiful the heavenly part, which at the first by reason of the sense was dead and buried in them. This is the great fire in the which, the poets write, that Hercules was burned on the top of the mountain Oeta,[2] and, through that consuming with fire, after his death was holy and immortal. This is the fiery bush of Moses; the divided tongues of fire; the inflamed chariot of Elias;[3] which doubleth grace and happiness in their souls that be worthy to see it, when they forsake this earthly baseness and flee up unto Heaven. Let us, therefore, bend all our force and thoughts of soul to this most holy light, which showeth us the way which leadeth to Heaven; and after it, putting off the affections we were clad withal at our coming down, let us climb up the stairs which at the lowermost step have the shadow of sensual beauty, to the high mansion place where the heavenly, amiable, and right beauty dwelleth, which lieth hid in the innermost secrets of God, lest unhallowed eyes should come to the sight of it; and there shall we find a most happy end for our desires, true rest for our travails, certain remedy for miseries, a most healthful medicine for sickness, a most sure haven in the troublesome storms of the tempestuous sea of this life.

"What tongue mortal is there then, O most holy love, that can sufficiently praise thy worthiness? Thou most beautiful, most good, most wise, art derived of the unity of heavenly beauty, goodness, and wisdom, and therein dost thou abide, and unto it through it, as in a circle, turnest about. Thou the most sweet bond of the world, a mean betwixt heavenly and earthly things, with a bountiful temper bendest the high virtues to the government of the lower, and turning back the minds of mortal men to their beginning, couplest them with it. Thou with agreement bringest the elements in one, and stirrest nature to bring forth that which ariseth and is born for the succession of the life. Thou bringest severed matters into one, to the unperfect givest perfection, to the unlike likeness, to enmity amity, to the earth fruits, to the sea calmness, to the heaven lively light. Thou art the father of true pleasures, of grace, peace, lowliness, and goodwill, enemy to rude wildness and sluggishness—to be short, the beginning and end of all goodness. And forsomuch as thou delightest to dwell in the flower of beautiful bodies and beautiful souls, I suppose that thy abiding-place is now here among us, and from above otherwhile showest thyself a little to the eyes and minds of them that be worthy to see thee.

[1] sense i.e., the senses.

[2] <*>Oeta A mountain between Thessalia and Macedonia where is the sepulchre of Hercules [Hoby's note].

[3] This … Elias These are all references to encounters between humans and the divine in Scripture: God appears in the form of a burning bush that is never consumed, and commands Moses to lead the Jews out of their enslavement in Egypt into the Promised Land (Exodus 3:1-12); the Holy Spirit descends upon the apostles in the form of tongues of fire on Pentecost, allowing them to speak in many languages (Acts 2:1-13); the prophet Elijah is swept up to Heaven in a fiery chariot in 2 Kings 2:11-12.

"Therefore vouchsafe, Lord, to hearken to our prayers, pour thyself into our hearts, and with the brightness of thy most holy fire lighten our darkness, and, like a trusty guide in this blind maze, show us the right way; reform the falsehood of the senses, and after long wandering in vanity give us the right and sound joy. Make us to smell those spiritual savours that relieve the virtues of the understanding, and to hear the heavenly harmony so tunable that no discord of passion take place any more in us. Make us drunken with the bottomless fountain of contentation[1] that always doth delight and never giveth fill, and that giveth a smack[2] of the right bliss unto whoso drinketh of the running and clear water thereof. Purge with the shining beams of thy light our eyes from misty ignorance, that they may no more set by mortal beauty, and well perceive that the things which at the first they thought themselves to see be not indeed, and those that they saw not to be in effect. Accept our souls that be offered unto thee for a sacrifice. Burn them in the lively flame that wasteth all gross filthiness, that after they be clean sundered from the body they may be coupled with an everlasting and most sweet bond to the heavenly beauty. And we, severed from ourselves, may be changed like right lovers into the beloved, and, after we be drawn from the earth, admitted to the feast of the angels, where, fed with immortal ambrosia and nectar, in the end we may die a most happy and lively death, as in times past died the fathers of old time, whose souls with most fervent zeal of beholding thou didst hale from the body and coupledst them with God."

When Bembo had hitherto spoken with such vehemency that a man would have thought him, as it were, ravished[3] and beside himself, he stood still without once moving, holding his eyes toward Heaven as astonied, when the Lady Emilia, which together with the rest gave most diligent ear to this talk, took him by the plait of his garment and plucking him a little, said: "Take heed, Master Peter, that these thoughts make not your soul also to forsake the body."

"Madam," answered Master Peter, "it should not be the first miracle that love hath wrought in me."

Then the Duchess and all the rest began afresh to be instant upon Master Bembo that he would proceed once more in his talk, and every one thought he felt in his mind, as it were, a certain sparkle of that godly love that pricked him, and they all coveted to hear farther; but Master Bembo: "My lords," quoth he, "I have spoken what the holy fury[4] of love hath, unsought for, indited[5] to me; now that, it seemeth, he inspireth me no more, I wot[6] not what to say. And I think verily that love will not have his secrets discovered any farther, nor that the courtier should pass the degree that his pleasure is I should show him, and therefore it is not perhaps lawful to speak any more in this matter."

[...]

—1561

1 contentation contentment.

2 smack taste.

3 ravished enraptured, overwhelmed.

4 fury inspired frenzy.

5 indited dictated.

6 wot know.

Roger Ascham
1514/1515-1568

Roger Ascham was a courtier, scholar, and respected educator. He not only tutored Princess Elizabeth from 1548 to 1550, but was also Latin Secretary for Edward VI, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth. His treatise The Schoolmaster was written in response to requests to impart his knowledge of schooling to a wider audience, and is based on Renaissance humanist educational practices. In it, he asserts his belief in the Ciceronian technique of "double translation"—from Latin to English and back to Latin—and in the necessity of motivating students with praise rather than punishment. For Ascham, education was a public concern: it was the responsibility of parents as well as the children's teachers. The objective of education in Ascham's mind was to form the citizens who would become leaders of Protestant England. His warnings against the malign influence of Italy in the final section of book one of The Schoolmaster were very much informed by these national and religious sentiments. The treatise, published posthumously in 1570 by Ascham's wife, Margaret, was a key influence on Renaissance educational theory and practice.

EDITION: The scholemaster, or plaine and perfite way of teachyng children, to understand, write, and speake, the Latin tonge ... London: John Day, 1570. STC 832.

from The Schoolmaster

Or plain and perfect way of teaching children to understand, write, and speak the Latin tongue, but specially purposed for the private bringing up of youth in gentlemen and noblemen's houses, and commodious also for all such as have forgot the Latin tongue and would by themselves, without a schoolmaster, in short time and with small pains, recover a sufficient ability to understand, write and speak Latin.

To the Honourable Sir William Cecil, Knight, Principal Secretary to the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty.[1]

Sundry and reasonable be the causes why learned men have used to offer and dedicate such works as they put abroad to some such personage as they think fittest, either in respect of ability of defence, or skill for judgement, or private regard of kindness and duty. Every one of those considerations, sir, move me of right to offer this my late husband's, Master Ascham's, work unto you. For well remembering how much all good learning oweth unto you for defence thereof, as the university of Cambridge, of which my said late husband was a member, having in choosing you their worthy chancellor acknowledged; and how happily you have spent your time in such studies and carried the use thereof to the right end, to the good service of the Queen's Majesty and your country to all our benefits; thirdly, how much my said husband was many ways bound unto you, and how gladly and comfortably he used in his life to recognize and report your goodness toward him, leaving with me then his poor widow and a great sort of orphans a good comfort in the hope of your good continuance, which I have truly found to me and mine, and therefore do duly and daily pray for you and yours. I could not find any man for whose name this book was more agreeable for hope [of] protection, more meet[2] for submission to judgement, nor more due for respect of worthiness of your part and thankfulness of my husband's and mine. Good I trust it shall do, as I am put in great hope by many very well-learned that can well judge thereof. Meet therefore I compt[1] it that such good as my husband was able to do and leave to the commonweal, it should be received under your name, and that the world should owe thank[s] thereof to you, to whom my husband the author of it was, for good received of you, most dutifully bounden. And so beseeching you to take on you the defence of this book, to advance the good that may come of it by your allowance and furtherance to public use and benefit, and to accept the thankful recognition of me and my poor children, trusting of the continuance of your good memory of Master Ascham and his, and daily commending the prosperous estate of you and yours to God whom you serve and whose you are, I rest to trouble you,

[1] This opening letter is written by Ascham's wife Margaret. As the letter implies, Margaret was struggling to care for a large household, and hoped to prevail upon Cecil's remembrance of her husband for help.

[2] meet proper, fitting.

Your humble Margaret Ascham.

The First Book for the Youth.

[...] There is a way touched in the first book of Cicero's De Oratore[2] which, wisely brought into schools, truly taught and constantly used, would not only take wholly away this butcherly fear in making of Latins, but would also, with ease and pleasure, and in short time as I know by good experience, work a true choice and placing of words, a right ordering of sentences, an easy understanding of the tongue, a readiness to speak, a facility to write, a true judgement, both of his own and other men's doings, what tongue so ever he doth use.

The way is this. After the three concordances learned, as I touched before,[3] let the master read unto him the Epistles of Cicero, gathered together and chosen out by Sturmius for the capacity of children.[4]

First, let him teach the child, cheerfully and plainly, the cause and matter of the letter; then, let him construe it into English so oft as the child may easily carry away the understanding of it; lastly, parse[5] it over perfectly. This done thus, let the child by and by both construe and parse it over again, so that it may appear that the child doubteth in nothing that his master taught him before. After this, the child must take a paper book and, sitting in some place where no man shall prompt him, by himself, let him translate into English his former lesson. Then showing it to his master, let the master take from him his Latin book and pausing an hour at the least, then let the child translate his own English into Latin again, in another paper book. When the child brings it, turned into Latin, the master must compare it with Tully's[6] book and lay them both together, and where the child does well, either in choosing or true placing of Tully's words, let the master praise him and say, "Here you do well." For I assure you, there is no such whetstone to sharpen a good wit and encourage a will to learning as is praise.

But if the child miss, either in forgetting a word or in changing a good with a worse, or misordering the sentence, I would not have the master either frown or chide with him, if the child have done his diligence and used no truantship therein. For I know by good experience that a child shall take more profit of two faults gently warned of than of four things rightly hit. For then the master shall have good occasion to say unto him, "N.[7] Tully would have used such a word, not this; Tully would have placed this word here, not there; would have used this case, this number, this person, this degree, this gender; he would have used this mood, this tense, this simple, rather than

---

1 compt count.

2 Cicero's De Oratore a study of rhetoric by Marcus Tullius Cicero, a Roman orator and statesman.

3 three concordances ... before In the opening sentence, Ascham has outlined three "concords," or formal agreements between words as parts of speech: "the right joining together of substantives [forms of nouns] with adjectives, the noun with the verb, the relative [pronoun] with the antecedent."

4 Ascham had regular correspondence with Johann Sturm, a writer of educational treatises in Strasbourg. Sturms' Ciceronis epistolarum libri IV appeared in 1539.

5 parse to resolve a sentence into its component parts of speech and describe them grammatically.

6 Tully Marcus Tullius Cicero.

7 N. Latin, "nomen" (name); i.e., insert the name of the child here.

this compound; this adverb here, not there; he would have ended the sentence with this verb, not with that noun or participle, etc."[1]

In these few lines I have wrapped up the most tedious part of grammar and also the ground of almost all the rules that are so busily taught by the master, and so hardly learned by the scholar, in all common schools, which after this sort, the master shall teach without all error, and the scholar shall learn without great pain, the master being led by so sure a guide, and the scholar being brought into so plain and easy a way. And therefore we do not condemn rules, but we gladly teach rules, and teach them more plainly, sensibly, and orderly than they be commonly taught in common schools. For when the master shall compare Tully's book with his scholar's translation, let the master at the first lead and teach his scholar to join the rules of his grammar book with the examples of his present lesson, until the scholar by himself be able to fetch out of his grammar every rule for every example, so as the grammar book be ever in the scholar's hand, and also be used of him as a dictionary for every present use. This is a lively and perfect way of teaching of rules, where the common way used in common schools, to read the grammar alone by itself, is tedious for the master, hard for the scholar, cold and uncomfortable for them both.

Let your scholar be never afraid to ask you any doubt, but use discreetly the best allurements you can to encourage him to the same, lest his ever much fearing of you drive him to seek some misorderly shift, as to seek to be helped by some other book, or to be prompted by some other scholar, and so go about to beguile you much and himself more.

With this way of good understanding the matter, plain construing, diligent parsing, daily translating, cheerful admonishing, and heedful amending of faults, never leaving behind just praise for well doing, I would have the scholar brought up withal, till he had read and translated over the first book of Epistles chosen out by Sturmius, with a good piece of a comedy of Terence also.[2]

All this while, by my advice, the child shall use to speak no Latin, for as Cicero says in like matter, with like words, loquendo, male loqui discunt.[3] And that excellent learned man, G. Budaeus, in his Greek Commentaries,[4] sore complains that when he began to learn the Latin tongue, use of[5] speaking Latin at the table and elsewhere, unadvisedly, did bring him to such an evil choice of words, to such a crooked framing of sentences, that no one thing did hurt or hinder him more all the days of his life afterward, both for readiness in speaking and also good judgement in writing.

[...] now commonly, in the best schools in England, for words, right choice is smally regarded, true propriety wholly neglected, confusion is brought in, barbariousness is bred up so in young wits as afterward they be not only marred for speaking, but also corrupted in judgement, as with much ado, or never at all, they be brought to right frame again.

Yet all men covet to have their children speak Latin and so do I very earnestly too. We both have one purpose; we agree in desire, we wish one end, but we differ somewhat in order and way that leads rightly to that end. Other would have them speak at all adventures and, so they be speaking, to speak, the master cares not, the scholar knows not what. This is to seem and not to be, except it be to be bold without shame, rash without skill, full of words without wit. I wish to have them speak so as it may well appear that the brain does govern the tongue and that reason leads forth the talk. Socrates' doctrine is true in Plato and well marked and truly uttered by Horace in Ars Poetica, that wheresoever knowledge does accompany the wit,

---

[1] These are all terms referring to Latin grammar and syntax; simple a verb in its simple form or without prefix; compound a combined or compound word or verb.

[2] Terence Roman writer of six influential comedies (195/185?-159 BCE).

[3] loquendo, male loqui discunt Latin, "by speaking, they learn to speak badly."

[4] G. Budaeus in his Greek Commentaries Guillaume Budé, a French humanist, made notable contributions to Greek scholarship; his Commentarii linguae Graecae was published in Paris in 1529.

[5] use of practice of.

there best utterance does always await upon the tongue,[1] for good understanding must first be bred in the child which, being nourished with skill and use of writing (as I will teach more largely hereafter), is the only way to bring him to judgement and readiness in speaking, and that in far shorter time (if he follow constantly the trade of this little lesson) than he shall do by common teaching of the common schools in England. [...]

I have now wished twice or thrice this gentle nature to be in a schoolmaster, and that I have done so neither by chance nor without some reason I will now declare at large why, in my opinion, love is fitter than fear, gentleness better than beating, to bring up a child rightly in learning.

With the common use of teaching and beating in common schools of England I will not greatly contend, which if I did, it were but a small grammatical controversy neither belonging to heresy nor treason, nor greatly touching God nor the prince, although, in very deed, in the end the good or ill bringing up of children does as much serve to the good or ill service of God, our prince, and our whole country as any one thing does beside.

I do gladly agree with all good schoolmasters in these points: to have children brought to good perfectness in learning, to all honesty in manners; to have all faults rightly amended; to have every vice severely[2] corrected; but for the order and way that leads rightly to these points, we somewhat differ. For commonly many schoolmasters, some as I have seen, more as I have heard tell, be of so crooked a nature as when they meet with a hard-witted scholar, they rather break him than bow[3] him, rather mar him than mend him. For when the schoolmaster is angry with some other matter, then will he soonest fall to beat his scholar, and though he himself should be punished for his folly, yet must he beat some scholar for his pleasure, though there be no cause for him to do so nor yet fault in the scholar to deserve so. These you will say be fond schoolmasters, and few they be that be found to be such. They be fond indeed, but surely overmany such be found everywhere. But this will I say, that even the wisest of your great beaters do as oft punish nature as they do correct faults. Yea, many times, the better nature is sorer punished, for if one by quickness of wit take his lesson readily, another, by hardness of wit, takes it not so speedily; the first is always commended, the other is commonly punished, when a wise schoolmaster should rather discreetly consider the right disposition of both their natures and not so much weigh what either of them is able to do now as what either of them is likely to do hereafter. For this I know, not only by reading of books in my study but also by experience of life abroad in the world, that those which be commonly the wisest, the best learned, and best men also when they be old, were never commonly the quickest of wit when they were young. [...]

And one example, whether love or fear doth work more in a child for virtue and learning, I will gladly report, which may be heard with some pleasure and followed with more profit. Before I went into Germany, I came to Broadgate in Leicestershire to take my leave of that noble Lady Jane Grey,[4] to whom I was exceeding much beholding. Her parents, the duke and the duchess, with all the household, gentlemen and gentlewomen, were hunting in the park. I found her in her chamber, reading Phaedon Platonis in Greek, and that with as much delight as some gentleman would read a merry tale in Bocase.[5] After salutation and duty done, with some other talk, I asked her why she would lose such pastime in the park.

---

[1] Socrates' … Ars Poetica Socrates (469-399 BCE) was a Greek philosopher, whose teaching methods were preserved in the Dialogues of Plato (c. 428/27-c. 348/47 BCE), a Greek philosopher; Horace (65-8 BCE) was a Latin poet whose critical work Ars Poetica was highly influential.

[2] severely The original "seuerelie" might also mean "severally" (individually).

[3] bow direct or incline.

[4] Lady Jane Grey The daughter of Henry VIII's younger sister, Mary, Jane was very well-educated. She was executed at age sixteen for her unwilling part in a coup against Mary Tudor. See above, pp. 226-34.

[5] Phaedon Platonis Plato's Phaedo narrates a discussion which took place between Socrates and his friends in the last hours of his life, and is concerned with the nature of death and the immortality of the soul; Bocase Giovanni Boccaccio (1313-75), Italian writer of, among other genres, narrative fiction.

Smiling she answered me, "Iwis,[1] all their sport in the park is but a shadow to that pleasure that I find in Plato. Alas, good folk, they never felt what true pleasure meant." "And how came you, Madam," quoth I, "to this deep knowledge of pleasure, and what did chiefly allure you unto it, seeing not many women, but very few men, have attained thereunto?" "I will tell you," quoth she, "and tell you a truth which perchance you will marvel at. One of the greatest benefits that ever God gave me is that he sent me so sharp and severe parents, and so gentle a schoolmaster. For when I am in presence either of father or mother, whether I speak, keep silence, sit, stand or go, eat, drink, be merry or sad, be sewing, playing, dancing or doing anything else, I must do it, as it were, in such weight, measure, and number, even so perfectly as God made the world, or else I am so sharply taunted, so cruelly threatened, yea presently sometimes, with pinches, nips, and bobs,[2] and other ways which I will not name for the honour I bear them, so without measure misordered, that I think myself in Hell till time come that I must go to Master Aylmer, who teaches me so gently, so pleasantly, with such fair allurements to learning, that I think all the time nothing, while I am with him. And when I am called from him, I fall on weeping, because whatsoever I do else but[3] learning is full of grief, trouble, fear, and whole misliking unto me. And thus my book has been so much my pleasure and brings daily to me more pleasure and more, that in respect of it all other pleasures in very deed be but trifles and troubles unto me." I remember this talk gladly, both because it is so worthy of memory and because also it was the last talk that ever I had and the last time that ever I saw that noble and worthy lady. [...]

[...] If some yet do not well understand what is an Englishman Italianated, I will plainly tell him:[4] he that by living and travelling in Italy brings home into England out of Italy the religion, the learning, the policy, the experience, the manners of Italy. That is to say, for religion, papistry or worse; for learning, less, commonly, than they carried out with them; for policy, a factious heart, a discoursing head, a mind to meddle in all men's matters; for experience, plenty of new mischiefs never known in England before; for manners, variety of vanities, and change of filthy living. These be the enchantments of Circe[5] brought out of Italy to mar men's manners in England much by example of ill life, but more by precepts of fond books of late translated out of Italian into English, sold in every shop in London, commended by honest titles the sooner to corrupt honest manners, dedicated overboldly to virtuous and honourable personages, the easier to beguile simple and innocent wits. It is pity that those which have authority and charge to allow and disallow books to be printed be no more circumspect herein than they are. Ten sermons at Paul's Cross[6] do not so much good for moving men to true doctrine as one of those books do harm with enticing men to ill living. Yea, I say farther, those books tend not so much to corrupt honest living as they do to subvert true religion. More papists be made by your merry books of Italy than by your earnest books of Louvain.[7] And because our great physicians do wink at the matter and make no count of this sore, I, though not admitted one of their fellowship, yet having been many years a prentice[8] to God's true religion, and trust to continue a poor journeyman[9] therein all the days of my life, for the duty I owe and love I bear both to true doctrine and honest living, though I have no authority to amend the sore myself, yet I will declare my good will to discover the sore to others.

---

1 Iwis certainly.

2 bobs blows or raps.

3 but except, outside of.

4 After stating that book learning is a safer way to knowledge than is experience, Ascham outlines some of the variety of dangers facing those who insist on travelling to other countries.

5 Circe The enchantress Circe turned Ulysses' companions into swine.

6 Paul's Cross St. Paul's Cathedral in London.

7 Louvain part of the Spanish Netherlands (east of Brussels).

8 prentice apprentice.

9 journeyman one who has finished an apprenticeship and works for another (i.e., he is not a master).

St. Paul says that sects and ill opinions be the works of the flesh and fruits of sin.[1] This is spoken no more truly for the doctrine than sensibly for the reason. And why? For ill doings breed ill thinkings, and of corrupted manners spring perverted judgements. And how? There be in man two special things: man's will, man's mind. Where will inclines to goodness, the mind is bent to truth; where will is carried from goodness to vanity, the mind is soon drawn from truth to false opinion. And so the readiest way to entangle the mind with false doctrine is first to entice the will to wanton living. Therefore, when the busy and open papists abroad could not, by their contentious books, turn men in England fast enough from truth and right judgement in doctrine, then the subtle and secret papists at home procured bawdy books to be translated out of the Italian tongue, whereby overmany young wills and wits allured to wantonness do now boldly condemn all severe books that sound to honesty and godliness. In our forefathers' time, when papistry, as a standing pool, covered and overflowed all England, few books were read in our tongue saving certain books of chivalry, as they said, for pastime and pleasure, which, as some say, were made in monasteries by idle monks or wanton canons,[2] as one for example, Morte D'Arthur,[3] the whole pleasure of which book stands in two special points: in open manslaughter and bold bawdry, in which book those be counted the noblest knights that do kill most men without any quarrel and commit foulest adulteries by subtlest shifts, as Sir Lancelot with the wife of King Arthur his master; Sir Tristram with the wife of King Mark, his uncle; Sir Lamorak with the wife of King Lot, that was his own aunt. This is good stuff for wise men to laugh at, or honest men to take pleasure at. Yet I know when God's Bible was banished the court and Morte D'Arthur received into the prince's chamber. What toys the daily reading of such a book may work in the will of a young gentleman or a young maid that lives wealthily and idly, wise men can judge and honest men do pity. And yet ten Morte D'Arthurs do not the tenth part so much harm as one of these books made in Italy and translated in England. They open not fond and common ways to vice, but such subtle, cunning, new, and diverse shifts to carry young wills to vanity and young wits to mischief, to teach old bawds new school points, as the simple head of an Englishman is not able to invent, nor never was heard of in England before, yea, when papistry overflowed all. Suffer these books to be read and they shall soon displace all books of godly learning, for they, carrying the will to vanity and marring good manners, shall easily corrupt the mind with ill opinions and false judgement in doctrine, first to think ill of all true religion, and at last to think nothing of God himself, one special point that is to be learned in Italy and Italian books. And that which is most to be lamented and therefore more needful to be looked to, there be more of these ungracious books set out in print within these few months than have been seen in England many score years before. And because our Englishmen made Italians cannot hurt but certain persons and in certain places, therefore these Italian books are made English to bring mischief enough openly and boldly to all states, great and mean, young and old, everywhere.

And thus you see how will enticed to wantonness does easily allure the mind to false opinions, and how corrupt manners in living breed false judgement in doctrine, how sin and fleshliness bring forth sects and heresies. And therefore suffer not vain books to breed vanity in men's wills if you would have God's truth take root in men's minds. [...]

I know none will be offended with this my general writing but only such as find themselves guilty privately therein, who shall have good leave to be offended with me until they begin to amend themselves. I touch not them that be good, and I

---

[1] St Paul ... sin Galatians 5:19-21: "Now the works of the flesh are plain: immorality, impurity, licentiousness, idolatry, sorcery, enmity, strife, jealousy, anger, selfishness, dissension, party spirit, envy, drunkenness, carousing, and the like...."

[2] canons clergymen living within the precincts of a cathedral or collegiate church.

[3] Morte D'Arthur the title of the cycle of Arthurian legends by Sir Thomas Malory, printed in 1485.

say too little of them that be naught. And so, though not enough for their deserving, yet sufficiently for this time and more else when if occasion so require.

And thus far have I wandered from my first purpose of teaching a child, yet not altogether out of the way, because this whole talk has tended to the only advancement of truth in religion, and honesty of living, and has been wholly within the compass of learning and good manners, the special points belonging in the right bringing up of youth.

But to my matter: as I began plainly and simply with my young scholar, so will I not leave him, God willing, until I have brought him a perfect scholar out of the school and placed him in the university to become a fit student for logic and rhetoric, and so after to physic,[1] law, or divinity, as aptness of nature, advice of friends, and God's disposition shall lead him.[2]

—1570

[1] physic medicine.

[2] The second book of Ascham's Schoolmaster, "The Ready Way to the Latin Tongue," provides details in the study of rhetoric and logic.

George Gascoigne
1534/1535?-1577

Although George Gascoigne seems to have started out on the path of many young gentlemen in the period—educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and Gray's Inn, London—he encountered personal and professional difficulties quite early. Accounts of his early life agree on the following: he left Cambridge without taking his degree; his father disinherited him for the debts he had accumulated; he entered Gray's Inn as a student of law in 1555; and he sat as a member of Parliament for Bedford in 1557-58 and 1558-59.

Gascoigne had clearly become fascinated with court life, having served as almoner at Queen Elizabeth's coronation; however, even his marriage to the wealthy widow Elizabeth Bacon Breton did not allow him to pursue the life of an amateur gentleman writer. Although early disillusioned with his prospects as a lawyer, Gascoigne returned to Gray's Inn around 1565. Practicing law, however, seems to have been far less attractive than writing: Gascoigne began producing work for the stage and the print market in the early 1570s. The Supposes is one of the earliest known English comedies, and Jocasta the second English tragedy.

Drained financially by his continued presence at court, he volunteered as a soldier for Humphrey Gilbert's expedition to the Low Countries in 1572. Gascoigne returned to England, only to flee from charges of murder, treason, and atheism. The same decade also marks the beginning of his serious hunt for literary patronage, and he soon attracted the support of Arthur Grey, Baron Grey of Wilton.

Gascoigne published his collected works twice, in what one critic has called "one of the great publishing hoaxes of the Renaissance," the auto-anthology A Hundred Sundry Flowers Bound up in One Small Posy, Gathered Partly (by Translation) ... and Partly by Invention (1573).[1] A Hundred Sundry Flowers claims to be an anthology comprised of anonymous pieces, even though there are numerous hints throughout the volume that these works are all Gascoigne's. According to Staub, three main factors influenced Gascoigne's publishing strategy: the desire "to capitalize on the popularity of Tottel's Miscellany (1557)"; the desire to explore different genres, voices, and poetic forms; and the desire to avoid the so-called 'stigma of print,' the fear of appearing to cheapen or degrade one's work by having it appear in the profit-driven milieu of the print market, a market aimed at a wide, indiscriminate readership as opposed to the small, elite readership of manuscript circulation. When readers thought they saw real court personages represented in thinly veiled fiction, the Stationers' Company recalled and banned A Hundred Sundry Flowers. (There were perceived to be particularly clear connections to real persons and events in the pseudo-Petrarchan prose romance, The Adventures of Master F.J.)

A second edition, claiming to be a "corrected, perfected, and augmented" version of his complete works, was published in 1575 entitled The Posies of George Gascoigne, Esquire. The new edition deletes some poems and adds others, and also revises The Adventures of Master F.J. Retitled The Pleasant Fable of Ferdinando Jeronimi and Leonora de Valasco, Translated out of the Italian Riding Tales of Bartello, this version tried to diminish the perception of contemporary readers that the novel was "real-life" disguised as fiction: gone are the letters and initials that tease a reader to make connections between the fictional characters and real-life personages; gone is the English setting, to be replaced with an Italian one; and gone is the editor, "G.T.," which in the original suggested again that the fiction of F.J. and his lady was based upon a real-life relationship and an actual correspondence that "G.T." is simply mediating for the reader. In the place of G.T., Gascoigne gives the reader a censorious first-person narrator, whose major role is to point out the glaringly obvious failings of the lovers.[2] Even with its obvious moralizing, the second version of the Adventures of Master F.J. fared no better than the first: it was also soon banned.

After The Posies, Gascoigne wrote two moral works, The Glass of Government (1575) and The Steel Glass (1576), which he claims arose from his personal and spiritual reformation, about which modern critics have been particularly sceptical. Gaining new favour at court for his dramatic entertainment on the theme of marriage subordinated to the good of the state, Gascoigne went to France and Antwerp in the employ of William Cecil, Lord Burghley; his eyewitness account of the Spaniards' sack of Antwerp, "The Spoil of Antwerp" (1576), was his last work.

---

[1] S.C. Staub, "George Gascoigne," DLB 136, online.

[2] Staub, DLB 136, online.

EDITIONS: A hundreth sundrie flowres bounde up in one small poesie. London: Henry Bynneman [and Henry Middleton] for Richard Smith, [1573]. STC 11635; "The Green Knight's Farewell to Fancy" and The Introduction and Conclusion of "The Pleasant Fable of Ferdinando Jeronimi and Lenora de Valasco" in The posies of George Gascoigne Esquire. London: For Richard Smith, [1575]. STC 11637.

ADDITIONAL ONLINE TEXT: From "Certain Notes of Instruction Concerning the Making of Verse or Rhyme in English" in The Posies of George Gascoigne (1575).

from A Hundred Sundry Flowers[1]

The Printer to the Reader

It hath been an old saying, that whiles two dogs do strive for a bone, the third may come and carry it away.[2] And this proverb may (as I fear) be well-verified in me which take in hand the imprinting of this poetical posy. For the case seemeth doubtful, and I will disclose my conjecture. Master H.W., in the beginning of this work, hath in his letter (written to the readers) cunningly discharged himself of any such misliking as the graver sort of grey-haired judgers might (perhaps) conceive in the publication of these pleasant pamphlets. And next unto that learned preamble, the letter of G.T. (by whom, as seemeth, the first copy hereof was unto the same H.W. delivered) doth with no less clerkly[3] cunning seek to persuade the readers, that he (also) would by no means have it published. Now I fear very much (all these words notwithstanding) that these two gentlemen were of one assent compact to have it imprinted. And yet, finding by experience that nothing is so well-handled nowadays but that some malicious minds may either take occasion to mislike it themselves or else find means to make it odious unto others, they have therefore (each of them) politicly[4] prevented the danger of misreport, and suffered me, the poor printer, to run away with the palm of so perilous a victory.[5] Notwithstanding, having well-perused the work, I find nothing therein amiss (to my judgement), unless it be two or three wanton places passed over in the discourse of an amorous enterprise: the which for as much as the words are cleanly[6] (although the thing meant be somewhat natural[7]) I have thought good also to let them pass

[1] The title and subtitles read: A Hundred Sundry Flowers Bound Up in One Small Posy. Gathered partly (by translation) in the fine outlandish gardens of Euripides, Ovid, Petrarch, Ariosto and Others: and partly by invention, out of our own fruitful orchards in England: Yielding sundry sweet savours of tragical, comical, and moral discourses, both pleasant and profitable to the well-smelling noses of learned readers. The title page concludes with the Latin motto: Meritum petere grave ("To strive for serious merit"). posy a nosegay or bouquet of flowers, with a pun on its fig. meanings: 1) a collection of the "flowers" (most beautiful examples) of poetry or rhetoric; and 2) poesy: poetic production; outlandish foreign, not native; Euripides (c. 485-406 BCE), Greek tragic dramatist; Ovid Publius Ovidius Naso (43 BCE-17/18 CE), Roman poet, author of the Ars Amatoria (The Art of Love) and the Metamorphoses; Petrarch Francesco Petrarca (1304-74), Italian poet and scholar, author of the Trifoni and the Canzoniere, the latter of which contained the pattern for English Elizabethan sonnet sequences; Ariosto Ludovico Ariosto (1474-1533), Italian writer, most famous for his romance epic Orlando Furioso (1532), which influenced Spenser and other writers of romance; Gascoigne also translated one of Ariosto's comedies I suppositi (1509) as The Supposes; it is the first item in A Hundred Sundry Flowers.

[2] Proverb (Tilley D545).

[3] clerkly scholarly, learned.

[4] politicly shrewdly, skilfully.

[5] the palm of so perilous a victory Traditionally, winners of athletic and poetic competitions would be crowned with laurel leaves, the emblem of Apollo, the god of poetry.

[6] cleanly morally or spiritually clean; pure.

[7] natural i.e., pertaining to bodily matters.

as they came to me, and the rather because (as Master H.W. hath well alleged in his letter to the reader) the well-minded man may reap some commodity out of the most frivolous works that are written. And as the venomous spider will suck poison out of the most wholesome herb, and the industrious bee can gather honey out of the most stinking weed: even so the discreet reader may take a happy example by the most lascivious histories, although the captious and harebrained heads can neither be encouraged by the good, nor forewarned by the bad. And thus much I have thought good to say in excuse of some savours, which may perchance smell unpleasantly to some noses, in some part of this poetical posy. Now it hath with this fault a greater commodity than common posies have been accustomed to present, and that is this—you shall not be constrained to smell of the flowers therein contained all at once, neither yet to take them up in such order as they are sorted; but you may take any one flower by itself, and if that smell not so pleasantly as you would wish, I doubt not yet but you may find some other which may supply the defects thereof. As thus, he which would have good moral lessons clerkly handled, let him smell to the tragedy translated out of Euripides.[1] He that would laugh at a pretty conceit closely conveyed,[2] let him peruse the comedy translated out of Ariosto.[3] He that would take example by the unlawful affections of a lover bestowed upon an inconstant dame, let them read the report in verse made by Dan Bartholomew of Bath,[4] or the discourse in prose of the adventures passed by Master F.J., whom the reader may name Freeman Jones,[5] for the better understanding of the same. He that would see any particular pang of love lively displayed may here approve every pamphlet by the title, and so remain contented. As also diverse godly hymns and psalms may in like manner be found in this record.[6] To conclude, the work is so universal as, either in one place or other, any man's mind may therewith be satisfied, the which I adventure (under pretext of this promise) to present unto all indifferent[7] eyes as followeth.

[...]

The Adventures of Master F.J.

H.W. to the Reader.

In August last past my familiar friend Master G.T. bestowed upon me the reading of a written book, wherein he had collected diverse discourses and verses, invented upon sundry occasions by sundry gentlemen (in mine opinion) right commendable for their capacity. And herewithal my said friend charged[8] me that I should use them only for mine own particular commodity,[9] and eftsoons[10] safely deliver the original copy to him again, wherein I must confess myself but half a merchant: for the copy unto him I have safely redelivered, but the work (for I thought it worthy to be published) I have entreated my friend A.B. to imprint, as one that thought better to please a number by common commodity than to feed the humour of any private person by needless singularity. This I

---

[1] Gascoigne's translation of Euripides's tragedy Jocasta is the second item in A Hundred Sundry Flowers.

[2] pretty conceit witty notion or expression; closely conveyed accurately translated.

[3] the comedy ... Ariosto See p. 340, note 1.

[4] Dan i.e., Don, an honorific title, meaning "Master" or "Sir." This long poem, which appears later in the collection, recounts Bartholomew's successful winning of the love of the Lady Ferenda Natura, Ferenda's subsequent unfaithfulness, Bartholomew's wounded reaction, the temporary reconciliation of the lovers, and Bartholomew's desire for death at Ferenda's final rejection of him; the narrative breaks off here in A Hundred Sundry Flowers, but in The Posies it is continued with Bartholomew's revival on his deathbed (on receipt of a penitent letter sent by Ferenda), and his intention to reunite with her. Gascoigne implies, however, that Ferenda can never be faithful and will desert Bartholomew yet again.

[5] Freeman Jones a Renaissance version of "John Doe"; an "everyman" figure.

[6] All of the genres mentioned here appear in A Hundred Sundry Flowers.

[7] indifferent neutral, fair.

[8] charged ordered, enjoined.

[9] commodity advantage, benefit; often, as here, in the sense of private interest.

[10] eftsoons afterwards.

have adventured for thy contentation,[1] learned reader, and further have presumed of myself to christen it by the name of A Hundred Sundry Flowers, in which poetical posy are set forth many trifling fantasies, humoural passions, and strange affects[2] of a lover.

And therein (although the wiser sort would turn over the leaf[3] as a thing altogether fruitless) yet I myself have reaped this commodity: to sit and smile at the fond devices[4] of such as have enchained themselves in the golden fetters of fantasy, and having bewrayed[5] themselves to the whole world, do yet conjecture that they walk unseen in a net.[6] Some other things you may also find in this book which are as void of vanity as the first are lame for government. And I must confess that (what to laugh at the one, and what to learn by the other) I have contrary to the charge of my said friend G.T. procured for these trifles this day of publication. Whereat if the authors only repine, and the number of other learned minds be thankful, I may then boast to have gained a bushel of good will in exchange for one pint of peevish choler.[7] But if it fall out, contrary to expectation, that the readers' judgements agree not with mine opinion in their commendations, I may then (unless their courtesies supply my want of discretion) with loss of some labour accompt[8] also the loss of my familiar friends; in doubt whereof, I cover[9] all our names and refer you to the well-written letter of my friend G.T. next following, whereby you may more at large consider of these occasions.

And so I commend the praise of other men's travails together with the pardon of mine own rashness unto the well-willing minds of discreet readers. From my lodging near the Strand[10] the 20 of January, 1572.

H.W.

The Letter of G.T. to His Very Friend H.W. Concerning This Work.

Remembering the late conference passed between us in my lodging, and how you seemed to esteem some pamphlets which I did there show unto you far above their worth in skill, I did straightaway conclude the same your judgment to proceed of two especial causes: one (and principal) the steadfast good will which you have ever hitherto sithens[11] our first familiarity borne towards me; another (of no less weight) the exceeding zeal and favour that you bear to good letters,[12] the which (I agree with you) do no less bloom and appear in pleasant ditties or compendious[13] sonnets devised by green[14] youthful capacities than they do fruitfully flourish unto perfection in the riper works of grave and grey-haired writers. For as in the last the younger sort may make a mirror of perfect life, so in the first the most frosty bearded philosopher may take just occasion of honest recreation, not altogether without wholesome lessons tending to the reformation of manners. For who doubteth but that poets in their most feigned fables and imaginations have metaphorically set forth unto us the right rewards of virtues and the due punishments for vices?

Marry[15] indeed, I may not compare pamphlets unto poems, neither yet may justly advant[16] for

---

1 contentation contentment, satisfaction.

2 humoural passions passions arising from the imbalance of the humours typical of those afflicted with love-sickness; strange affects intense or extreme moods, feelings, or desires/intentions.

3 leaf page.

4 fond devices foolish schemes or stratagems.

5 bewrayed exposed, revealed.

6 they walk unseen in a net Proverb: "You dance in a net and think nobody sees you"(i.e., you behave as though no one can observe your actions even though you are only wearing a net through which anyone can see) (Tilley N130).

7 peevish choler spiteful anger.

8 accompt account.

9 cover conceal.

10 the Strand the name of a street in London which runs along the strand or shore of the Thames, between the cities of London and Westminster.

11 sithens since.

12 good letters i.e., fine literature.

13 ditties any verse composition; a poem or ballad; compendious concise, succinct; comprehensive though brief.

14 green inexperienced.

15 Marry a mild oath, meaning "why, to be sure."

16 advant boast, vaunt; advance.

our native countrymen that they have in their verses hitherto (translations excepted) delivered unto us any such notable volume as have been by poets of antiquity left unto the posterity. And the more pity that amongst so many toward wits[1] no one hath been hitherto encouraged to follow the trace of that worthy and famous knight Sir Geoffrey Chaucer, and after many pretty devices spent in youth for the obtaining a worthless victory might consume and consummate his age in describing the right pathway to perfect felicity, with the due preservation of the same.[2] The which although some may judge over grave a subject to be handled in style metrical, yet for that I have found in the verses of eloquent Latinists, learned Greeks, and pleasant Italians sundry directions whereby a man may be guided toward the attaining of that unspeakable treasure, I have thus far lamented that our countrymen have chosen rather to win a passover praise[3] by the wanton penning of a few loving lays, than to gain immortal fame by the clerkly handling of so profitable a theme. For if quickness of invention, proper vocables,[4] apt epithets, and store of monosyllables may help a pleasant brain to be crowned with laurel,[5] I doubt not but both our countrymen and country language might be enthronized[6] among the old foreleaders unto the mount Helicon.[7]

But now let me return to my first purpose, for I have wandered somewhat beside the path, and yet not clean out of the way. I have thought good (I say) to present you with this written book, wherein you shall find a number of sonnets, lays, letters, ballads, roundlets, verlays[8] and verses, the works of your friend and mine Master F.J. and divers others, the which when I had with long travail[9] confusedly gathered together, I thought it then opere precium[10] to reduce them into some good order. The which I have done according to my barren skill in this written book, commending it unto you to read and to peruse, and desiring you, as I only do adventure thus to participate the sight thereof[11] unto your former good will, even so that you will by no means make the same common; but after your own recreation taken therein that you will safely redeliver unto me the original copy. For otherwise I shall not only provoke all the authors to be offended with me, but further shall lose the opportunity of a greater matter, half and more granted unto me already, by the willing consent of one of them. And to be plain with you my friend, he hath written (which as far as I can learn did never yet come to the reading or perusing of any man but himself) two notable works: the one called the Sundry Lots of Love, the other of his own invention entitled The Climbing of an Eagle's Nest.[12] These things (and especially the latter) doth seem by the name to be a work worthy the reading. And the rather I judge so because his fantasy[13] is so occupied in the same as that, contrary to his wonted use, he hath hitherto withheld it from sight of any of his familiars until it be finished; you may guess him by his nature. And therefore I require your secrecy herein, lest if he hear the con-

---

1 toward wits promising individuals possessing genius or talent.

2 A reference to Geoffrey Chaucer's retraction at the conclusion of his Canterbury Tales and in the final stanzas of Troilus and Criseyde.

3 passover praise a slight praise which is quickly passed over and forgotten.

4 vocables words or terms.

5 crowned with laurel See p. 340, note 5.

6 enthronized enthroned.

7 mount Helicon the sacred dwelling of the classical Muses, patrons of the arts and sciences.

8 lay a short lyric or narrative poem meant to be sung; roundlet a short "rondel" or "rondeau," a poem consisting of ten or in stricter sense of thirteen lines, having only two rhymes throughout and with the opening words used as a refrain; verlay virelay: a song or short lyric piece (originating in fourteenth-century France) wherein the short lines are arranged in stanzas with only two rhymes, the end-rhyme of one stanza being the first one of the next.

9 travail labour, toil.

10 Latin, "a precious or valuable work."

11 participate the sight thereof share the reading of.

12 These works have not been positively identified, although Sundry Lots of Love may refer to the poem "Dan Bartholomew of Bath," included in Hundred Sundry Flowers, and Climbing of an Eagle's Nest to the poem "Dulce Bellum Inexpertis." They may also be lost, fictional, or simply contemplated works by Gascoigne.

13 fantasy imagination.

trary, we shall not be able by any means to procure these other at his hands. So fare you well, from my chamber this tenth of August, 1572.

Yours or not his own.
G.T.

When I had with no small entreaty obtained of Master F.J. and sundry other toward young gentlemen the sundry copies of these sundry matters, then as well for that the number of them was great, as also for that I found none of them so barren but that (in my judgment) had in it aliquid salis,[1] and especially being considered by the very proper occasion whereupon it was written (as they themselves did always with the verse rehearse unto me the cause that then moved them to write), I did with more labour gather them into some order, and so placed them in this register. Wherein, as near as I could guess, I have set in the first places those which Master F.J. did compile. And to begin with this his history[2] that ensueth, it was (as he declared unto me) written upon this occasion: the said F.J. chanced once in the north parts of this realm to fall in company of a very fair gentlewoman whose name was Mistress Elinor, unto whom bearing a hot affection, he first adventured to write this letter following.

G.T.

Mistress, I pray you understand that, being altogether a stranger in these parts, my good hap[3] hath been to behold you to my no small contentation, and my evil hap accompanies the same with such imperfection of my deserts as that I find always a ready repulse in mine own forwardness. So that considering the natural climate of the country, I must say that I have found fire in frost. And yet comparing the inequality of my deserts with the least part of your worthiness, I feel a continual frost in my most fervent fire.[4] Such is then the extremity of my passions, the which I could never have been content to commit unto this telltale paper were it not that I am destitute of all other help. Accept therefore, I beseech you, the earnest good will of a more trusty than worthy servant, who being thereby encouraged may supply the defects of his abilities with ready trial of dutiful loyalty. And let this poor paper (besprent with salt tears, and blown over with scalding sighs) be saved of you as a safeguard for your sampler, or a bottom to wind your sewing silk,[5] that when your last needleful is wrought, you may return to reading thereof and consider the care of him who is

More yours than his own.
F.J.

This letter by her received (as I have heard him say) her answer was this: she took occasion one day, at his request, to dance with him, the which doing she bashfully began to declare unto him that she had read over the writing which he delivered unto her, with like protestation that, as at delivery thereof she understood not for what cause he thrust the same into her bosom, so now she could not perceive thereby any part of his meaning; nevertheless, at last seemed to take upon her the matter, and though she disabled herself, yet gave him thanks as etc.[6] Whereupon he broke the brawl,[7] and walking abroad devised immediately these few verses following.

G.T.

---

[1] aliquid salis Latin, literally "something of salt"; fig., "something of cunning or wit; something of value."

[2] this his history one of a number of claims to truth and authenticity of the tale, which were changed or deleted in its subsequent revision; cf. the title of the Italianate version of Master F.J. in The Posies, where it is described as a "pleasant fable." See headnote, p. 339, and Appendix, pp. 375-76.

[3] hap chance, fortune.

[4] fire in frost ... fervent fire The Petrarchan lover is often portrayed in terms of this and similar oxymorons.

[5] a safeguard for your sampler, or a bottom to wind your sewing silk A "safeguard" was a type of over-petticoat used to protect a woman's skirts from dirt and staining; presumably, the letter could serve as a "safeguard" by being wrapped around the "sampler" (a piece of canvas embroidered by a girl or woman as a specimen of skill, usually containing the alphabet and some mottoes worked in ornamental characters); a "bottom" was a clew or nucleus on which to wind thread.

[6] etc. and so forth, and so on. G.T. sometimes uses this abbreviation (as here) to refer to a common sequence of events, emotions, and the like that the reader does not need to have "spelled out." At other times (as on p. 360), he uses it to avoid explicitly describing sexual activities or desires.

[7] broke the brawl stopped dancing; a "brawl" is a dance step, perhaps referring to a step in a French dance which resembled a cotillion.

Fair Bersabe the bright once bathing in a well,
With dew bedimmed King David's eyes that ruled Israel.[1]
And Solomon himself, the source of sapience,
Against the force of such assaults could make but small defence:[2]
To it the stoutest yield, and strongest feel like woe,
Bold Hercules[3] and Sampson both did prove it to be so.
What wonder seemeth then, when stars stand thick in skies,
If such a blazing star have power to dim my dazzled eyes?

Lenvoy.[4]

To you these few suffice, your wits be quick and good,
You can conject by change of hue, what humours feed my blood.[5]

F.J.

I have heard the author say that these were the first verses that ever he wrote upon like occasion. The which, considering the matter precedent, may in my judgement be well-allowed, and to judge his doings by the effects, he declared unto me that before he could put the same in legible writing, it pleased the said Mistress Elinor of her courtesy thus to deal with him. Walking in a garden among divers[6] other gentlemen and gentlewomen, with a little frowning smile in passing by him, she delivered unto him a paper with these words: "For that I understand not," quoth she, "the intent of your letters, I pray you take them here again and bestow them at your pleasure." The which done and said, she passed by without change either of pace or countenance.

F.J., somewhat troubled with her angry look, did suddenly leave the company and, walking into a park near adjoining, in great rage began to wreak his malice on this poor paper, and the same did rend and tear in pieces. When suddenly at a glance he perceived it was not of his own handwriting, and therewithal abashed upon better regard he perceived in one piece thereof written (in Roman[7]) these letters SHE. Wherefore, placing all the pieces thereof as orderly as he could, he found therein written these few lines hereafter following.

G.T.

Your sudden departure from our pastime yesterday did enforce me for lack of chosen company to return unto my work, wherein I did so long continue till at the last the bare bottom[8] did draw unto my remembrance your strange request. And although I found therein no just cause to credit your coloured[9] words, yet have I thought good hereby to requite you with like courtesy, so that at least you shall not condemn me for ungrateful. But as to the matter therein contained, if I could persuade myself that there were in me any coals to

[1] For the story of Bathsheba and David, see 2 Samuel 11. The dew that obscures David's sight here refers to a popular Petrarchan conceit, where the beauty of the beloved shoots beams of love into the male lover's eyes, making them fill with tears.

[2] And Solomon … but small defence Solomon's divinely bestowed wisdom is overwhelmed by the demands of his 700 wives and 300 concubines: many of them worshiped foreign gods and led Solomon to do likewise (1 Kings 11:1-9).

[3] Hercules the Greek hero had numerous amorous relationships, but given the pairing with Samson (the Jewish hero most famous for loving the pagan woman Delilah and being subsequently robbed of his manhood by her), Gascoigne is referring to Hercules's enslavement by Omphale, queen of Lydia, who forced him to take on women's clothes and women's work.

[4] Lenvoy the concluding part of a poetical composition.

[5] humours feed my blood Erotic love and desire could have serious psychosomatic effects on the lover. Ranging from insomnia to physical lassitude to madness, these effects were traced back to the way love could introduce a significant imbalance in the body's four governing humours, the balance of which was crucial for a person's physical and emotional health. According to Jacques Ferrand's A Treatise on Lovesickness (1623), paleness of complexion was one of the symptoms of love as a disease that upset this humoural balance: erotic melancholy.

[6] divers several; a small group.

[7] in Roman in Roman hand, a type of handwriting characterized by round, smooth, clear letters, an italic hand often taught to Englishwomen in this period.

[8] bare bottom See p. 344, note 5.

[9] coloured fair-seeming; specious.

kindle such sparks of fire,[1] I might yet peradventure[2] be drawn to believe that your mind were frozen with like fear. But as no smoke ariseth where no coal is kindled,[3] so without cause of affection the passion is easy to be cured. This is all that I understand of your dark letters, and as much as I mean to answer.

SHE.

My friend F.J. hath told me divers times that immediately upon receipt hereof he grew in jealousy[4] that the same was not her own device.[5] And therein I have no less allowed his judgment than commended his invention of the verses and letters before rehearsed.[6] For as by the style this letter of hers bewrayeth[7] that it was not penned by a woman's capacity, so the sequel of her doings may decipher that she had more ready clerks than trusty servants in store. Well, yet as the perfect hound when he hath chased the hurt deer amid the whole herd will never give over till he have singled it again, even so F.J., though somewhat abashed with this doubtful show, yet still constant in his former intention, ceased not by all possible means to bring this deer yet once again to the bows, whereby she might be the more surely stricken,[8] and so in the end enforced to yield. Wherefore he thought not best to commit the said verses willingly into her custody, but privily lost them in her chamber, written in counterfeit.[9] And after on the next day thought better to reply, either upon her or upon her secretary, in this wise,[10] as here followeth.

G.T.

The much that you have answered is very much, and much more than I am able to reply unto. Nevertheless, in mine own defence thus much I allege: that if my sudden departure pleased not you, I cannot myself therewith be pleased, as one that seeketh not to please many, and more desirous to please you than any. The cause of mine affection I suppose you behold daily. For (self love avoided) every wight[11] may judge of themselves as much as reason persuadeth; the which if it be in your good nature suppressed with bashfulness, then mighty Jove grant you may once behold my wan cheeks washed in woe, that therein my salt tears may be a mirror to represent your own shadow,[12] and that like unto Narcissus you may be constrained to kiss the cold waves wherein your counterfeit is so lively portrayed.[13] For if abundance of other matters failed to draw my gazing eyes in contemplation of so rare excellency, yet might these your letters both frame in me an admiration of such divine esprit,[14] and a confusion to my dull understanding which so rashly presumed to wander in this endless labyrinth.[15] Such I esteem you, and thereby am become such, and even

HE. F.J.

This letter finished and fair written over,[16] his chance was to meet her alone in a gallery of the

---

[1] any coals to kindle such sparks of fire Another common Petrarchan conceit, which refers to the belief that the woman kindles a fire in her lover's heart.

[2] peradventure perhaps.

[3] But as no smoke ariseth where no coal is kindled Proverb, "No smoke without some fire" (Tilley S569; see also F282).

[4] jealousy suspicion.

[5] device invention.

[6] rehearsed related, recounted.

[7] bewrayeth reveals, discloses.

[8] to bring this deer ... stricken a common Renaissance hunting technique, where deer would be driven past the place where the hunters were waiting with their bows at the ready.

[9] counterfeit forged; the sense here is that the verses are written in a disguised hand.

[10] wise way.

[11] wight person, individual.

[12] shadow a reflected image.

[13] Narcissus ... portrayed In Greek legend, this beautiful young man, son of the nymph Liriope and the god of the river Cephisus, fell in love with his own reflection in a pool, eventually pining away and dying for the unrequited love of his own image.

[14] esprit spirit; perhaps also, sprightliness, vivacious wit in conversation or composition; in a wider sense, cleverness, brains.

[15] The labyrinth is another common image for love in the Petrarchan tradition; cf. Lady Mary Wroth, "In this strange labyrinth how shall I turn?" (The Poems of Lady Mary Wroth, ed. J.A. Roberts [Baton Rouge, 1983], pp. 127-28).

[16] fair written over neatly copied.

same house, where (as I have heard him declare) his manhood in this kind of combat was first tried, and therein I can compare him to a valiant prince who, distressed with power of enemies, had committed the safeguard of his person to treaty of ambassade, and suddenly (surprised with a camnassado[1] in his own trenches) was enforced to yield as prisoner. Even so my friend F.J., lately overcome by the beautiful beams[2] of this dame Elinor, and having now committed his most secret intent to these late rehearsed letters, was at unwares[3] encountered with his friendly foe, and constrained either to prepare some new defence, or else like a recreant[4] to yield himself as already vanquished.

Wherefore (as in a trance) he lifted up his dazzled eyes, and so continued in a certain kind of admiration not unlike the astronomer who, having after a whole night's travail in the grey morning found his desired star, hath fixed his hungry eyes to behold the comet long looked for. Whereat, this gracious dame, as one that could discern the sun before her chamber windows were wide open, did deign to embolden the fainting knight with these or like words:

"I perceive now," quod she, "how mishap doth follow me, that having chosen this walk for a simple solace I am here disquieted by the man that meaneth my destruction." And therewithal, as half angry, began to turn her back, whenas my friend F.J., now awaked, gan[5] thus salute her:

"Mistress," quod he, "and I perceive now that good hap haunts me, for being by lack of opportunity constrained to commit my welfare unto these blabbing leaves of bewraying paper" (showing that in his hand) "I am here recomforted with happy view of my desired joy;" and therewithal reverently kissing her hand, did softly distrain[6] her slender arm and so stayed her departure.

The first blow thus proffered and defended, they walked and talked, traversing divers ways, wherein I doubt not but that my friend F.J. could quit himself reasonably well. And though it stood not with duty of a friend that I should therein require to know his secrets, yet of himself he declared thus much: that after long talk she was contented to accept his proffered service, but yet still disabling[7] herself, and seeming to marvel what cause had moved him to subject his liberty so wilfully, or at least in a prison (as she termed it) so unworthy. Whereunto I need not rehearse his answer but suppose now that thus they departed, saving—I had forgotten this—she required of him the last rehearsed letter, saying that his first was lost, and now she lacked a new bottom for her silk, the which, I warrant you, he granted; and so proffering to take an humble congé by bezo las manos, she graciously gave him the zuccado dez labros,[8] and so for then departed.

G.T.

[...]

And now the coals began to kindle, whereof but erewhile[9] she feigned herself altogether ignorant. The flames began to break out on every side, and she to quench them shut up herself in her chamber solitarily. But as the smithy[10] gathers greater heat by casting on of water, even so the more she absented herself from company, the fresher was the grief which galded[11] her remembrance; so that at last the report was spread

[1] treaty of ambassade a treaty made by the ambassadors of two hostile and armed camps; camnassado camisado (Spanish, lit. "to attack in one's shirt"), a Renaissance military term referring to a nighttime ambush where the attackers wear their shirts over their armour so they will be able to distinguish friend from foe in the dark.

[2] beautiful beams The Petrarchan beloved was believed to shoot forth beams of love from her eyes which had an extreme and often physically as well as mentally deleterious effect on the lover; see p. 345, note 1.

[3] at unwares unpreparedly.

[4] recreant coward.

[5] gan i.e., began to.

[6] distrain clasp tightly.

[7] disabling depreciating, disparaging.

[8] congé French, "leave," "departure"; bezo las manos Spanish, "kiss on the hands"; zuccado dez labros Spanish, "kiss on the lips."

[9] erewhile formerly.

[10] smithy forge.

[11] galded vexed, harassed, oppressed.

through the house that Mistress Elinor was sick. At which news F.J. took small comfort; nevertheless, Dame Venus with good aspect did yet thus much further his enterprise.

The dame (whether it were by sudden change or of wonted[1] custom) fell one day into a great bleeding at the nose.[2] For which accident the said F.J., amongst other pretty conceits,[3] hath a present remedy, whereby he took occasion (when they of the house had all in vain sought many ways to stop her bleeding) to work his feat in this wise. First he pleaded ignorance, as though he knew not her name, and therefore demanded the same of one other gentlewoman in the house, whose name was Mistress Frances, who when she had to him declared that her name was Elinor, he said these words or very like in effect: "If I thought I should not offend Mistress Elinor, I would not doubt to stop her bleeding without either pain or difficulty." This gentlewoman, somewhat tickled with his words, did incontinent[4] make relation thereof to the said Mistress Elinor, who immediately (declaring that F.J. was her late received servant) returned the said messenger unto him with especial charge that he should employ his devoir[5] towards the recovery of her health, with whom the same F.J. repaired[6] to the chamber of his desired. And finding her set in a chair, leaning on the one side over a silver basin, after his due reverence, he laid his hand on her temples and, privily rounding[7] her in her ear, desired her to command a hazel stick[8] and a knife; the which being brought, he delivered unto her, saying on this wise:[9] "Mistress, I will speak certain words in secret to myself, and do require no more but when you hear me say openly this word, 'Amen,' that you with this knife will make a nick upon this hazel stick; and when you have made five nicks, command me also to cease." The dame, partly of good will to the knight, and partly to be stanched of her bleeding, commanded her maid, and required the other gentles, somewhat to stand aside; which done, he began his orisons,[10] wherein he had not long muttered before he pronounced "Amen," wherewith the lady made a nick on the stick with her knife. The said F.J. continued to another "Amen," when the lady having made another nick felt her bleeding began to stanch, and so by the third "Amen" thoroughly stanched.

F.J., then changing his prayers into private talk, said softly unto her: "Mistress, I am glad that I am hereby enabled to do you some service, and as the stanching of your own blood may some way recomfort you, so if the shedding of my blood may any way content you, I beseech you command it, for it shall be evermore readily employed in your service." And therewithal with a loud voice pronounced "Amen." Wherewith the good lady making a nick did secretly answer thus: "Good servant," quod she, "I must needs think myself right happy to have gained your service and good will, and be you sure that although there be in me no such desert as may draw you into this depth of affection, yet such as I am, I shall be always glad to show myself thankful unto you, and now, if you think yourself assured that I shall bleed no more, do then pronounce your fifth Amen." The which pronounced, she made also her fifth nick, and held up her head, calling the company unto her, and declaring unto them that her bleeding was thoroughly stanched.

Well, it were long to tell what sundry opinions were pronounced upon this act, and I do dwell overlong in the discourses of this F.J., especially having taken in hand only to copy out his verses,

---

1 wonted usual.

2 bleeding at the nose Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy includes the nosebleed among the "symptoms ... of the body to discern lovers by," since they are apt to "look pale, red, and commonly blush at their first congress, and sometimes ... bleed at nose" ([London, 1932], Vol. 3, 135-36). See D. Oakleaf, "The Eloquence of Blood in Eliza Heywood's Lasselia" SEL 39.3 (1999): pp. 483-98.

3 pretty conceits ingenious or clever ideas.

4 incontinent immediately.

5 employ his devoir do what he can; do his utmost.

6 repaired went.

7 rounding whispering.

8 hazel stick Hazel wands had a wide range of magical properties in the period; witches' wands and divining rods were traditionally made of hazel, as was Mercury's magical staff, the caduceus, a gift from Apollo.

9 on this wise in this way.

10 orisons prayers.

but for the circumstance doth better declare the effect, I will return to my former tale. F.J. tarrying awhile in the chamber found opportunity to lose his sequence near to his desired mistress[1] and, after congé taken, departed.

After whose departure the lady rose out of her chair, and her maid, going about to remove the same, espied and took up the writing; the which her mistress perceiving, gan suddenly conjecture that the same had in it some like matter to the verses once before left in like manner, and made semblant to mistrust[2] that the same should be some words of conjuration; and taking it from her maid, did peruse it, and immediately said to the company that she would not forgo the same for a great treasure. But to be plain, I think that (F.J. excepted) she was glad to be rid of all company until she had with sufficient leisure turned over and retossed every card in this sequence. And not long after being now tickled through all the veins with an unknown humour, adventured of herself to commit unto a like ambassador the deciphering of that which hitherto she had kept more secret, and thereupon wrote with her own hand and head in this wise.

G.T.

Good servant, I am out of all doubt much beholding unto you, and I have great comfort by your means in the stanching of my blood, and I take great comfort to read your letters, and I have found in my chamber divers songs which I think to be of your making, and I promise you they are excellently made, and I assure you that I will be ready to do for you any pleasure that I can during my life. Wherefore I pray you come to my chamber once in a day till I come abroad again, and I will be glad of your company, and for because that you have promised to be my HE, I will take upon me this name,

YOUR SHE.

This letter I have seen, of her own handwriting, and as therein the reader may find great difference of style from her former letter, so may you now understand the cause. She had in the same house a friend,[3] a servant, a secretary. What should I name him?—such one as she esteemed in time past more than was cause in time present, and to make my tale good, I will (by report of my very good friend F.J.) describe him unto you. He was in height the proportion of two pygmies, in breadth the thickness of two bacon hogs, of presumption a giant, of power a gnat, apishly witted, knavishly mannered, and crabbedly favoured.[4] What was there in him then to draw a fair lady's liking? Marry, sir, even all in all a well-lined purse, wherewith he could at every call provide such pretty conceits as pleased her peevish fantasy,[5] and by that means he had thoroughly (long before) insinuated himself with this amorous dame.

This manling, this minion,[6] this slave, this secretary, was now by occasion ridden to London forsooth.[7] And though his absence were unto her a disfurnishing of eloquence, it was yet unto F.J. an opportunity of good advantage, for when he perceived the change of her style, and thereby grew in some suspicion that the same proceeded by absence of her chief chancellor,[8] he thought good now to smite while the iron was hot,[9] and to lend his mistress such a pen[10] in her secretary's absence as he should never be able at his return to amend the well writing thereof. Wherefore, according to her command, he repaired once every day to her chamber, at the least, whereas he guided himself

[1] lose his sequence ... mistress i.e., to leave his terza sequenza, which he composed earlier, where Elinor will find it.

[2] made semblant to mistrust i.e., [she] assumed an expression of mistrust.

[3] friend lover, paramour.

[4] apishly fantastically foolishly; perhaps also stupidly imitative; knavishly impertinently, vulgarly; crabbedly favoured having an appearance which expresses a harsh or disagreeable disposition.

[5] pretty conceits fancy articles or objects; fantasy foolish whim, caprice.

[6] minion contemptuous term for a person who will do anything to maintain the favour of his or her patron; perhaps a sneer at the secretary's willingness to subordinate himself to a woman, since "minion" can also mean "mistress" or "paramour."

[7] forsooth truly.

[8] chancellor secretary.

[9] to smite while the iron was hot Proverb (Tilley 194).

[10] pen with a play on its late sixteenth-century slang meaning: "penis."

so well, and could devise such store of sundry pleasures and pastimes, that he grew in favour not only with his desired, but also with the rest of the gentlewomen.

[...]

[Lady Frances, the daughter of the lord of the castle (Elinor's father-in-law) dances with F.J. after dinner, offering him cryptic advice about love and his relationship with Elinor. Elinor's anger over their seeming intimacy leads to her angry withdrawal from the room and F.J.'s public performance of a song (a tyntarell) about the course of a young man's love. The next morning he waits vainly in the gallery hoping to intercept Elinor.]

He wandered into the park near adjoining to the castle wall, where his chance was to meet Mistress Frances, accompanied with one other gentlewoman, by whom he passed with a reverence of courtesy,[1] and so, walking on, came into the side of a thicket, where he sat down under a tree to allay his sadness with solitariness. Mistress Frances, partly of courtesy and affection, and partly to content her mind by continuance of such talk as they had commenced over night, entreated her companion to go with her unto this tree of reformation, whereas they found the knight with his arms folded[2] in a heavy kind of contemplation, unto whom Mistress Frances stepped apace (right softly), and at unawares gave this salutation:

"I little thought, sir knight," quod she, "by your evensong yesternight to have found you presently at such a morrow-mass, but I perceive you serve your saint with double devotion, and I pray God grant you treble meed[3] for your true intent."

F.J., taken thus upon the sudden, could none otherwise answer but thus: "I told you, mistress," quod he, "that I could laugh without lust and jest without joy." And therewithal starting up, with a more bold countenance came towards the dames, proffering unto them his service to wait upon them homewards.

"I have heard say oft times," quod Mistress Frances, "that it is hard to serve two masters at one time,[4] but we will be right glad of your company."

"I thank you," quod F.J.

And so walking on with them, fell into sundry discourses, still refusing to touch any part of their former communication, until Mistress Frances said unto him: "By my troth," quod she, "I would be your debtor these two days to answer me truly but unto one question that I will propound."

"Fair gentlewoman," quod he, "you shall not need to become my debtor, but if it please you to quit[5] question by question, I will be more ready to gratify you in this request than either reason requireth or than you would be willing to work my contentation."

"Master F.J.," quod she, and that sadly, "peradventure you know but a little how willing I would be to procure your contentation, but you know that hitherto familiarity hath taken no deep root betwixt us twain. And though I find in you no manner of cause whereby I might doubt to commit this or greater matter unto you, yet have I stayed hitherto so to do, in doubt lest you might thereby justly condemn me both of arrogancy and lack of discretion; wherewith I must yet foolishly affirm that I have with great pain bridled my tongue from disclosing the same unto you. Such is then the good will that I bear towards you, the which if you rather judge to be impudency than a friendly meaning, I may then curse the hour that I first concluded thus to deal with you."

Herewithal, being now red for chaste bashfulness, she abased her eyes and stayed her talk, to whom F.J. thus answered: "Mistress Frances, if I

---

1 reverence of courtesy a courteous gesture; perhaps, a bow.

2 Although Hundred has "unfolded" here, this word doesn't make much sense given the conventions of body language associated with deep thought and sad contemplation. Posies changes "unfolded" to "folded."

3 evensong After the Reformation, the name given to the evening prayer service in the Church of England; morrow-mass the first mass of the day; meed reward, recompense.

4 it is hard to serve two masters at one time Matthew 6:24; Luke 16:13.

5 quit repay, requite.

should with so exceeding villainy requite[1] such and so exceeding courtesy, I might not only seem to degenerate from all gentry,[2] but also to differ in behaviour from all the rest of my life spent; wherefore to be plain with you in few words, I think myself so much bound unto you for divers respects as, if ability do not fail me, you shall find me mindful in requital of the same; and for disclosing your mind to me, you may (if so please you) adventure it without adventure,[3] for by this sun," quod he, "I will not deceive such trust as you shall lay upon me, and furthermore (so far forth as I may) I will be yours in any respect. Wherefore I beseech you accept me for your faithful friend, and so shall you surely find me."

"Not so," quod she, "but you shall be my Trust, if you vouchsafe the name, and I will be to you as you shall please to term me."

"My Hope," quod he, "if you so be pleased."

And thus agreed, they two walked apart from the other gentlewoman, and fell into sad[4] talk, wherein Mistress Frances did very courteously declare unto him that indeed one cause of her sorrow sustained in his behalf was that he had said so openly over night that he could not love, for she perceived very well the affection between him and Madam Elinor, and she was also advertised[5] that Dame Elinor stood in the portal of her chamber, harkening to the talk that they had at supper that night, wherefore she seemed to be sorry that such a word (rashly escaped) might become great hindrance unto his desire; but a greater cause of her grief was (as she declared) that his hap[6] was to bestow his liking so unworthily, for she seemed to accuse Dame Elinor for the most inconstant woman living. In full proof whereof, she bewrayed unto F.J. how she, the same dame Elinor, had of long time been yielded to the minion[7] secretary whom I have before described. "In whom though there be," quod she, "no one point of worthiness, yet shameth she not to use him as her dearest friend,[8] or rather her holiest idol."

And that this notwithstanding, Dame Elinor had been also sundry times won to choice of change, as she named unto F.J. two gentlemen—whereof the one was named H.D. and that other H.K.—by whom she was, during sundry times of their several abode in those parts,[9] entreated to like courtesy. For these causes the dame Frances seemed to mislike F.J.'s choice, and to lament that she doubted[10] in process of time to see him abused. The experiment she meant was this, for that she thought F.J. (I use her words) a man in every respect very worthy to have the several use of a more commodious common,[11] she hoped now to see if his enclosure thereof might be defensible against her said secretary, and such like. These things and divers other of great importance this courteous Lady Frances did friendly disclose unto F.J., and furthermore did both instruct and advise him how to proceed in his enterprise.

Now, to make my talk[12] good, and lest the reader might be drawn in a jealous suppose of this Lady Frances, I must let you understand that she was unto F.J. a kinswoman, a virgin of rare chastity, singular capacity, notable modesty, and excellent beauty; and though F.J. had cast his affection on the other (being a married woman), yet was there in their beauties no great difference, but in all other good gifts a wonderful diversity, as 1 requite repay, make return for.

---

2 gentry the state of being a gentleman, possessing good-breeding, courtesy, generosity, etc.

3 adventure it without adventure dare to undertake [it] without risk or hazard.

4 sad serious, grave.

5 advertised informed.

6 hap fortune.

7 minion darling, beloved (with contemptuous connotations).

8 friend lover, paramour.

9 their several abode in those parts i.e., their separate dwelling in those parts (i.e., they had visited separately those parts). The "she" here is Elinor.

10 doubted feared, suspected.

11 the several use of a more commodious common The image is from the practice of enclosure, where an individual would close off a common field for his own private and exclusive use; Frances is saying that F.J. is too worthy a man to suffer the indignity of sharing Elinor's body with the secretary; F.J. should have the separate ("several") use of a more accommodating ("commodious") woman.

12 talk discourse.

much as might be between constancy and flitting fantasy, between womanly countenance and girlish garishness, between hot dissimulation and temperate fidelity. Now if any man will curiously ask the question why F.J. should choose the one and leave the other, over and besides the common proverb ("So many men so many minds"[1]), thus may be answered: we see by common experience that the highest flying falcon doth more commonly prey upon the corn-fed crow and the simple shiftless[2] dove than on the mounting kite.[3] And why? Because the one is overcome with less difficulty than that other. Thus much in the defence of this Lady Frances, and to excuse the choice of my friend F.J., who thought himself now no less beholding to good fortune to have found such a trusty friend than bounden to Dame Venus to have won such a mistress.

And to return unto my pretence,[4] understand you that F.J. (being now with these two fair ladies come very near the castle) grew in some jealous doubt (as on his own behalf) whether he were best to break company or not, when his assured Hope, perceiving the same, gan thus recomfort him:

"Good sir," quod she, "if you trusted your trusty friends, you should not need thus cowardly to stand in dread of your friendly enemies."

"Well said in faith," quod F.J., "and I must confess you were in my bosom before I wist,[5] but yet I have heard said often that in trust is treason."[6]

"Well spoken for yourself," quod his Hope.

F.J. now remembering that he had but erewhile taken upon him the name of her Trust came home per misericordiam,[7] when his Hope, entering the castle gate, caught hold of his lap,[8] and half by force led him by the gallery unto his mistress's chamber; whereas, after a little dissembling disdain,[9] he was at last by the good help of his Hope right thankfully received.

[...]

Supper time came and passed over, and not long after came the handmaid of the Lady Elinor into the great chamber, desiring F.J. to repair unto their mistress, the which he willingly accomplished. And being now entered into her chamber, he might perceive his mistress in her night's attire, preparing herself towards bed. To whom F.J. said: "Why, how now, mistress? I had thought this night to have seen you dance (at least or at last) amongst us?"

"By my troth, good servant," quod she, "I adventured so soon unto the great chamber yesternight that I find myself somewhat sickly disposed, and therefore do strain courtesy (as you see) to go the sooner to my bed this night. But before I sleep (quod she), I am to charge you with a matter of weight." And taking him apart from the rest, declared that (at that present night) she would talk with him more at large in the gallery near adjoining to her chamber.

Hereupon F.J., discreetly dissimulating his joy, took his leave and returned into the great chamber, where he had not long continued before the lord of the castle commanded a torch to light him unto his lodging, whereas he prepared himself and went to bed, commanding his servant also to go to his rest. And when he thought as well his servant as the rest of the household to be safe,[10] he arose again, and taking his nightgown did under the same convey his naked sword, and so walked to the gallery, where he found his good mistress walking in her nightgown and attending his coming. The moon was now at the full, the skies clear, and the weather temperate, by reason whereof he might the more plainly and with the greater contentation behold his long desired joys,

---

1 Proverb (Tilley M583).

2 shiftless helpless.

3 kite a bird of prey.

4 pretence expressed aim, intention, or design.

5 in my bosom before I wist "to be in or of (a person's) bosom": to be entrusted with his/her secrets; wist knew, was aware.

6 in trust is treason Proverb (Tilley T549).

7 per misericordiam Latin, "experiencing compassion or pity."

8 lap a part of a garment that hangs down allowing it to be folded over.

9 dissembling disdain feigned scorn or contempt.

10 to be safe asleep, and thus not likely to interfere (with F.J.'s plans).

and spreading his arms abroad to embrace his loving mistress, he said: "Oh, my dear lady, when shall I be able with any desert to countervail[1] the least part of this your bountiful goodness?"

The dame (whether it were of fear indeed, or that the wiliness of womanhood had taught her to cover her conceits[2] with some fine dissimulation) stert[3] back from the knight, and shrieking (but softly) said unto him:

"Alas, servant, what have I deserved that you come against me with naked sword as against an open enemy?"

F.J., perceiving her intent, excused himself, declaring that he brought the same for their defence, and not to offend her in any wise. The lady being therewith somewhat appeased, they began with more comfortable gesture to expel the dread of the said late affright, and sithens[4] to become bolder of behaviour, more familiar in speech, and most kind in accomplishing of common comfort.

But why hold I so long discourse in describing the joys which (for lack of like experience) I cannot set out to the full? Were it not that I know to whom I write, I would the more beware what I write. F.J. was a man, and neither of us are senseless, and therefore I should slander him (over and besides a greater obloquy to the whole genealogy of Aeneas[5]), if I should imagine that of tender heart he would forbear to express[6] her more tender limbs against the hard floor. Sufficed that of her courteous nature she was content to accept boards for a bed of down, mats for camerike sheets, and the night gown of F.J. for a counterpoint[7] to cover them; and thus with calm content, instead of quiet sleep, they beguiled[8] the night until the proudest star began to abandon the firmament, when F.J. and his mistress were constrained also to abandon their delights, and with ten thousand sweet kisses and straight embracings did frame themselves to play loath to depart. Well, remedy was there none, but Dame Elinor must return unto her chamber, and F.J. must also convey himself (as closely[9] as might be) into his chamber, the which was hard to do, the day being so far sprung, and he having a large base court[10] to pass over before he could recover his stair foot door. And though he were not much perceived, yet the Lady Frances, being no less desirous to see an issue of these enterprises than F.J. was willing to cover them in secrecy, did watch and even at the entering of his chamber door perceived the point of his naked sword glistering under the skirt of his night gown. Whereat she smiled and said to herself, "This gear goeth well about."[11]

[...]

Well, I dwell too long upon these particular points in discoursing this trifling history, but that the same is the more apt mean of introduction to the verses which I mean to rehearse[12] unto you, and I think you will not disdain to read my conceit with his invention about declaration of his comedy. The next that ever F.J. wrote then upon any adventure happened between him and this fair lady was this, as I have heard him say, and upon this occasion. After he grew more bold and better acquainted with his mistress's disposition, he adventured one Friday in the morning to go unto her chamber, and thereupon wrote as followeth, which he termed "A Friday's Breakfast":

G.T.

1 countervail make an equivalent return for.

2 conceits thoughts.

3 stert started.

4 sithens thereupon, subsequently.

5 the whole genealogy of Aeneas refers to Aeneas, the Trojan hero whom Virgil represents as the founder of the city of Rome; more specifically, the reference is to all Englishmen, who traditionally viewed Aeneas' grandson, Brute, as the founder of London and the English nation.

6 forbear to express refrain from pressing or squeezing.

7 camerike cambric, a fine white linen; counterpoint quilt or counterpane.

8 beguiled whiled away, passed pleasantly and leisurely.

9 closely secretly.

10 base court outer or lower court.

11 this gear goeth well about i.e., this business is proceeding well.

12 rehearse repeat.

That self-same day, and of that day that hour,
When she[1] doth reign that mocked Vulcan the Smith:
And thought it meet[2] to harbour in her bower
Some gallant guest for her to dally with.
That blessèd hour, that blest and happy day,
I thought it meet with hasty steps to go
Unto the lodge wherein my lady lay,
To laugh for joy, or else to weep for woe.
And lo, my lady of her wonted grace,
First lent her lips to me (as for a kiss),
And after that her body to embrace,
Wherein Dame Nature wrought nothing amiss.
What followed next, guess you that know the trade,
For in this sort my Friday's feast I made.

F.J.

This sonnet is short and sweet, reasonably well, according to the occasion etc. Many days passed these two lovers with great delight, their affairs being no less politicly governed than happily achieved. And surely I have heard F.J. affirm in sad earnest that he did not only love her, but was furthermore so ravished in ecstasies with continual remembrance of his delights that he made an idol of her in his inward conceit.[3] So seemeth it by this challenge to beauty which he wrote in her praise and upon her name.

G.T.

Beauty shut up thy shop, and truss up all thy trash,[4]
My Nell hath stolen thy finest stuff, and left thee in the lash:[5]
Thy market now is marred, thy gains are gone, God wot,[6]
Thou hast no ware[7] that may compare with this that I have got.
As for thy painted pale, and wrinkles surfled up,[8]
Are dear enough for such as lust to drink of ev'ry cup.
Thy bodies bolstered out with bumbast and with bags,[9]
Thy rolls, thy ruffs, thy cauls, thy coifs, thy jerkins, and thy jags,[10]
Thy curling and thy cost, thy frisling and thy fare,[11]
To court, to court with all those toys,[12] and there set forth such ware
Before their hungry eyes that gaze on every guest,
And choose the cheapest chaffayre[13] still to please their fancy best.
But I whose steadfast eyes could never cast a glance,
With wand'ring look amid the prease[14] to take my choice by chance,
Have won by due desert a piece[15] that hath no peer,

[1] she Venus.
[2] meet appropriate, fitting.
[3] conceit thoughts, imagination.
[4] truss up all thy trash pack up all your rubbish.
[5] lash lurch.
[6] wot knows.
[7] ware goods, merchandise, commodities.
[8] painted pale a pale complexion artificially brightened by cosmetics (painting); surfled up painted, made-up (with cosmetics).
[9] Thy bodies bolstered ... bags It was a common practice to fill out or pad clothing with bumbast, a cotton stuffing.
[10] rolls pads (of hair or cloth in a woman's headdress); ruffs an article of neckwear, usually consisting of starched linen or muslin arranged in horizontal flutings and standing out all around the neck; cauls close-fitting, elaborately ornamented caps; coifs close-fitting caps; jerkins garment for the upper part of the body, worn by men in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; a close-fitting short coat, often made of leather; apparently the fashion was adopted by some women, prompting condemnation in moral and religious texts; jags fashionable slashes in clothing, especially sleeves, meant to reveal the colour and quality of the garment underneath.
[11] thy curling and thy cost the dressing of hair and its expense; frisling i.e. frizzling: to curl (hair) in small, crisp curls; fare appearance, demeanour.
[12] toys trifles, fripperies.
[13] chaffayre bargain, purchase.
[14] prease i.e., press: throng, great crowd.
[15] piece woman or girl (the contemporary implication of a woman regarded contemptuously as a sexual object does not become a possible meaning until the nineteenth century).

And left the rest as refuse[1] all to serve the market there.
There let him choose that list,[2] there catch the best who can;
A painted blazing bait may serve to choke a gazing man.
But I have slipt thy flower[3] that freshest is of hue,
I have thy corn, go sell thy chaff, I list to seek no new.
The windows of mine eyes are glazed with such delight,
As each new face seems full of faults that blazeth in my sight.
And not without just cause, I can compare her so,
Lo here my glove I challenge him that can, or dare, say no.[4]
Let Theseus come with club, or Paris brag with brand,
To prove how fair their Helen was that scourged the Grecian land;
Let mighty Mars himself come armed to the field,
And vaunt[5] Dame Venus to defend with helmet, spear and shield:
This hand that had good hap my Helen to embrace
Shall have like luck to foil her foes and daunt them with disgrace;
And cause them to confess by verdict and by oath,
How far her lovely looks do stain the beauties of them both;
And that my Helen is more fair than Paris' wife,
And doth deserve more famous praise than Venus for her life.
Which if I not perform, my life then let me leese,[6]
Or else be bound in chains of change, to beg for beauty's fees.

F.J.

By this challenge I guess that either he was then in an ecstasy or else sure I am now in a lunacy, for it is a proud challenge made to Beauty herself and all her companions; and imagining that Beauty, having a shop where she uttered[7] her wares of all sundry sorts, his lady had stolen the finest away, leaving none behind her but painting, bolstering, forcing[8] and such like, the which in his rage[9] he judgeth good enough to serve the court, and thereupon grew a great quarrel when these verses were by the negligence of his mistress dispersed into sundry hands, and so at last to the reading of a courtier. Well, F.J. had his desire if his mistress liked them, but, as I have heard him declare, she grew in jealousy that the same were not written by her,[10] because her name was Elinor and not Helen. And about this point have been divers and sundry opinions, for this and divers other of his most notable poems have come to view of the world, although altogether without his consent. And some have attributed this praise unto a Helen who deserved not so well as this dame Elinor should seem to deserve by the relation of F.J., and yet never a barrel of good herring between them both.[11] But that other Helen, because she was and is of so base condition as may deserve no manner commendation in any honest judgement, therefore I will excuse my friend F.J. and adventure my pen in his behalf, that he would never bestow verse of so [1] refuse garbage.

[2] list desires, wishes.
[3] slipt thy flower cut thy flower, taken a "slip" for planting elsewhere.
[4] Lo here my glove I challenge him … no Throwing down one's glove is a traditional method of challenging an opponent.
[5] Theseus ... Paris Before Paris' much more famous abduction of Helen of Sparta from her husband Menelaus (the action which triggered the Trojan War), some classical writers say that Theseus, king of Athens, stole Helen away when she was only nine, intending to marry her when she was old enough. Some writers say that she gave birth to a daughter before Theseus was forced to return her to her family (Classical Dict., p. 676); Mars a reference to Mars's seduction of Vulcan's wife, Venus. See p. 362, note 3; vaunt boast.
[6] leese i.e., lose.
[7] uttered offered for sale.
[8] bolstering padding; forcing perhaps, "farcing": using cosmetics.
[9] rage violent passion.
[10] by her for/about her.
[11] never a barrel of good herring between them both Proverb, "Neither (never a) barrel better herring"(i.e., there's nothing to choose between them) (Tilley B94).

mean[1] a subject. And yet some of his acquaintance, being also acquainted (better than I) that F.J. was sometimes acquainted with Helen, have stood in argument with me, that it was written by Helen and not by Elinor.[2] Well, F.J. told me himself that it was written by this dame Elinor, and that unto her he thus alleged, that he took it all for one name, or at least he never read of any Elinor such matter as might sound worthy like commendation for beauty. And indeed, considering that it was in the first beginning of his writings, as then he was no writer of any long continuance, comparing also the time that such reports do spread of his acquaintance with Helen, it cannot be written less than six or seven years before he knew Helen. Marry, peradventure if there were any acquaintance between F.J. and that Helen afterwards (the which I dare not confess), he might adapt it to her name, and so make it serve both their turns, as elder[3] lovers have done before and still do and will do world without end. Amen.[4]

Well, by whom he wrote it I know not, but once[5] I am sure that he wrote it, for he is no borrower of inventions,[6] and this is all that I mean to prove, as one that send you his verses by stealth, and do him double wrong to disclose unto any man the secret causes why they were devised. But this for your delight I do adventure, and, to return to the purpose, he sought more certainly to please his mistress Elinor with this sonnet written in her praise as followeth.

G.T.

The stately dames of Rome their pearls did wear
About their necks to beautify their name,
But she (whom I do serve) her pearls[7] doth bear
Close in her mouth, and smiling shows the same.
No wonder then though every word she speaks
A jewel seems in judgement of the wise,
Since that her sugared tongue the passage breaks
Between two rocks bedecked with pearls of price.
Her hair of gold, her front[8] of ivory,
(A bloody heart within so white a breast)
Her teeth of pearl, lips ruby, crystal eye,
Needs must I honour her above the rest,
Since she is formed of none other mould[9]
But ruby, crystal, ivory, pearl, and gold.

F.J.

Of this sonnet I am assured that it is but a translation, for I myself have seen the invention of an Italian, and Master J. hath a little dilated the same, but not much besides the sense of the first, and the addition very aptly applied, wherefore I cannot condemn his doing therein, and for the sonnet, were it not a little too much praise (as the Italians do most commonly offend in the superlative), I could the more commend it; but I hope the party to whom it was dedicated had rather it were much more, than anything less.

Well, thus these two lovers passed many days in exceeding contentation and more than speakable pleasures, in which time F.J. did compile very many verses according to the sundry occasions proffered, whereof I have not obtained the most at his hands, and the reason that he denied me the same was that (as he alleged) they were for the most part sauced with a taste of glory—as you know that in such cases a lover being charged with inexprimable[10] joys, and therewith enjoined both by duty and discretion to keep the same covert, can by no means devise a greater consolation than to

---

1 mean unworthy.

2 by Helen and not by Elinor i.e., for Helen and not for Elinor.

3 elder ancient or earlier; or perhaps, simply, "more experienced."

4 world without end. Amen See Ephesians 3:21. The phrase appears most commonly in the prayer known as the Minor or Lesser Doxology: "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit, as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end, Amen."

5 once in any case, at any rate.

6 borrower of inventions This is not to claim that F.J's poems are entirely original; in the following sonnet, the beloved's description is highly conventional. Gascoigne perhaps refers here to his own conviction that true poets should be most concerned about creating a work's governing or grounding idea or conception (its "invention").

7 Hundred's errata sheet changes the original "peers" to "pearls," which obviously makes more sense in the poem's context.

8 front forehead.

9 mould substance (lit., the earth). The human body was sometimes depicted as composed of earth, but here the beloved's body is made of far more precious and durable material.

10 inexprimable inexpressible.

commit it into some ciphered words and figured speeches[1] in verse, whereby he feeleth his heart half (or more than half) eased of swelling. For as sighs are some present ease to the pensive mind, even so we find by experience that such secret intercommoning[2] of joys doth increase delight. I would not have you construe my words to this effect, that I think a man cannot sufficiently rejoice in the lucky lots of love unless he impart the same to others. God forbid that ever I should enter into such a heresy, for I have always been of this opinion: that as to be fortunate in love is one of the most inward contentations to man's mind of all earthly joys, even so if he do but once bewray the same to any living creature, immediately either dread of discovering doth bruise his breast with an intolerable burden, or else he loseth the principal virtue which gave effect to his gladness,[3] not unlike to a 'pothecary's pot[4] which being filled with sweet ointments or perfumes doth retain in itself some scent of the same, and being poured out doth return to the former state: hard, harsh, and of small savour; so the mind being fraught with delights, as long as it can keep them secretly enclosed, may continually feed upon the pleasant record thereof as the well-willing and ready horse biteth on the bridle, but having once disclosed them to any other straightway we lose the hidden treasure of the same, and are oppressed with sundry doubtful opinions and dreadful conceits.[5] And yet for a man to record unto himself in the inward contemplation of his mind the often remembrance of his late-received joys doth, as it were, ease the heart of burden, and add unto the mind a fresh supply of delight. Yea, and in verse principally (as I conceive) a man may best contrive this way of comfort in himself.

Therefore, as I have said, F.J., swimming now in delights, did nothing but write such verse as might accumulate his joys to the extremity of pleasure, the which for that purpose he kept from me as one more desirous to seem obscure and defective, than overmuch to glory in his adventures, especially for that in the end his hap was as heavy as hitherto he had been fortunate; amongst other I remembered one happened upon this occasion: the husband of the Lady Elinor, being all this while absent from her, gan now return and kept cut at home,[6] with whom F.J. found means so to insinuate himself that familiarity took deep root between them, and seldom but by stealth you could find the one out of the other's company. On a time, the knight riding on hunting desired F.J. to accompany him, the which he could not refuse to do, but like a lusty younker ready at all assays[7] apparelled himself in green, and about his neck a bugle, pricking[8] and galloping amongst the foremost, according to the manner of that country. And it chanced that the married knight thus galloping lost his horn, which some divines[9] might have interpreted to be but moulting,[10] and that by God's grace he might have a new come up again shortly instead of that. Well, he came to F.J. requiring him to lend him his bugle. "For," said the knight, "I heard you not blow this day, and I would fain[11] encourage the hounds, if I had a horn."

Quod F.J., "Although I have not been over lavish of my coming hitherto, I would you should not doubt but that I can tell how to use a horn well enough, and yet I may little do if I may not lend you a horn," and therewithal took his bugle from 1 ciphered words words disguised or coded and which can only be read by those who hold the key; figured speeches speeches adorned with rhetorical figures, metaphors, images, etc.; figurative.

---

2 intercommoning sharing.

3 I would not have you construe ... gave effect to his gladness a reflection of the conventional secrecy expected of those engaged in courtly love affairs which (like this one) were usually adulterous.

4 'pothecary's pot i.e., an apothecary's jar in which he would store the medicines or cosmetics that were the stock in trade of this Renaissance pharmacist/chemist.

5 conceits thoughts, notions.

6 kept cut at home isolated himself from the outside world; kept himself wholly at home.

7 lusty younker eager or active young gentleman; at all assays for every event.

8 pricking spurring or urging on a horse.

9 divines seers, fortune-tellers.

10 moulting Bucks molt or shed their horns annually; the horns of the cuckold, the emblem of the sexually deceived husband, are meant here.

11 fain willingly.

his neck, and lent it to the knight, who making in unto the hounds, gan assay to rechate.[1] But the horn was too hard for him to wind,[2] whereat F.J. took pleasure, and said to himself, "Blow till thou break that: I made thee one within these few days that thou wilt never crack whiles thou livest."[3]

And hereupon (before the fall of the buck) devised this sonnet following, which at his homecoming he presented unto his mistress.

G.T.

As some men say there is a kind of seed
Will grow to horns if it be sowed thick:
Wherewith I thought to try if I could breed
A brood of buds, well sharped on the prick,
And by good proof of learned skill I found
(As on some special soil all seeds best frame)
So jealous brains do breed the battleground
That best of all might serve to bear the same.
Then sought I forth to find such supple soil,
And called to mind thy husband had a brain,
So that percase, by travail and by toil,
His fruitful front might turn my seed to gain:
And as I groped in that ground to sow it,
Start up a horn, thy husband could not blow it.

F.J.

This sonnet treateth of a strange seed, but it tasteth most of rye,[4] which is more common amongst men nowadays. Well, let it pass amongst the rest, and he that liketh it not turn over the leaf to another; I doubt not but in this register he may find some to content him, unless he be too curious.[5] And here I will surcease to rehearse any more of his verses until I have expressed how that his joys, being now exalted to the highest degree, began to bend towards declination.

[...]

[G.T. recounts the return of Lady Elinor's secretary from London, reminds us of the disclosure of Frances—that the secretary is also Elinor's lover—, and charts the descent of F.J. into the psychological, physical and emotional illness conventionally attendant on overwhelming jealousy. Accompanied by Lady Frances, Elinor visits the bed-ridden F.J. several times, and during her last visit Elinor whispers that she will return to join F.J. later that night.]

About ten or eleven of the clock came his mistress in her nightgown, who knowing all privy ways in that house very perfectly, had conveyed herself into F.J.'s chamber unseen and unperceived, and being now come unto his bedside kneeled down, and laying her arm over him said these or like words:

"My good servant, if thou knewest what perplexities I suffer in beholding of thine infirmities, it might then suffice either utterly to drive away thy malady or much more to augment thy griefs, for I know thou lovest me, and I think also that thou hast had sufficient proof of mine unfeigned good will, in remembrance whereof I fall into sundry passions. First, I accompt the happy lots[6] of our first acquaintance, and therein I call to mind the equality of our affections, for I think that there were never two lovers conjoined with freer consent on both parts; and if my overhasty delivery of yielding words be not wrested[7] hereafter to my condemnation, I can then assure myself to escape forever without desert of any reproof. Herewithal[8] I cannot forget the sundry adventures happened since we became one heart divided in two bodies, all which have been both happily achieved and delectably enjoyed. What resteth[9] then to consider but this thy present state?—the first corrosive that I have felt, and the last cordial that I look for, the end of my joys and the beginning of my torments."

---

1 to rechate to blow a horn.

2 wind blow, sound.

3 I made thee one ... whiles thou livest i.e., I have made you a cuckold, an identity you will never be able to cast off while you live.

4 rye the most common cereal grain for making bread in the period.

5 curious exacting, fastidious.

6 accompt the happy lots reckon or count up the lucky lots (fortunes).

7 wrested twisted, perverted.

8 Herewithal together with this.

9 resteth remains (to be done).

And hereat her salt tears gan bathe the dying lips of her servant, who, hearing these words and well considering her demeanour, began now to accuse himself of such and so heinous treason as that his guilty heart was constrained to yield unto a just scourge for the same. He swooned[1] under her arm: the which, when she perceived, it were hard to tell what fears did most affright her. But I have heard my friend F.J. confess that he was in a happy trance, and thought himself for divers causes unhappily revived. For surely I have heard him affirm that to die in such a passion had been rather pleasant than like to pangs of death. It were hard now to rehearse how he was revived, since there were none present but he dying (who could not declare), and she living (who would not disclose so much as I mean to bewray). For my friend F.J. hath to me emported[2] that returning to life the first thing which he felt was that his good mistress lay pressing his breast with the whole weight of her body, and biting his lips with her friendly teeth; and peradventure she refrained (either of courtesy towards him, or for womanish fear to hurt her tender hand) to strike him on the cheeks in such sort as they do that strive to call again a dying creature, and therefore thought this the aptest mean to reduce him unto remembrance.[3] F.J., now awaked, could no less do than of his courteous nature receive his mistress into his bed; who, as one that knew that way better than how to help his swooning, gan gently strip off her clothes and, lovingly embracing him, gan demand of him in this sort.

"Alas, good servant," quod she, "what kind of malady is this that so extremely doth torment thee?"

F.J. with fainting speech answered: "Mistress, as for my malady, it hath been easily cured by your bountiful medicines applied. But I must confess that in receiving that guerison[4] at your hands I have been constrained to fall into an ecstasy, through the galding[5] remembrance of mine own unworthiness. Nevertheless, good mistress, since I perceive such fidelity remaining between us as that few words will persuade such trust as lovers ought to embrace, let these few words suffice to crave your pardon, and do eftsoons[6] pour upon me (your unworthy servant) the abundant waves of your accustomed clemency; for I must confess that I have so highly offended you as (but your goodness surpass the malice of my conceits) I must remain (and that right worthily) to the severe punishment of my deserts, and so should you but lose him who hath cast away himself, and neither can accuse you, nor dare excuse himself, of the crime."

Dame Elinor, who had rather have found her servant perfectly revived than thus with strange conceits encumbered, and musing much at his dark speech, became importunate to know the certainty[7] of his thoughts. And F.J., as one not master of himself, gan at the last plainly confess how he had mistrusted the change of her vowed affections, yea and (that more was) he plainly expressed with whom, of whom, by whom, and to whom she bent her better liking.

Now, here I would demand of you and such other as are expert: "Is there any greater impediment to the fruition of a lover's delights than to be mistrusted? Or rather, is it not the ready way to race[8] all love and former good will out of remembrance to tell a guilty mind that you do mistrust it?" It should seem "yes," by Dame Elinor, who began now to take the matter hotly, and of such vehemency were her fancies that she now fell into flat defiance with F.J., who although he sought by many fair words to temper her choleric passions, and by yielding himself to get the conquest of another, yet could he by no means determine[9] the quarrel.

---

1 swooned fainted.

2 emported communicated, imparted.

3 aptest mean to reduce him unto remembrance i.e., the most effective way to restore him to consciousness.

4 guerison cure, healing.

5 galding i.e., galling.

6 eftsoons again.

7 dark obscure, cryptic, hard to understand; certainty truth.

8 race i.e., rase or erase.

9 determine bring to an end, settle.

The soft pillows being present at all these hot words put forth themselves as mediators for a truce between these enemies, and desired that (if they would needs fight) it might be in their presence but only one push of the pike,[1] and so from thenceforth to become friends again forever. But the dame denied flatly, alleging that she found no cause at all to use such courtesy unto such a recreant, adding further many words of great reproach; the which did so enrage[2] F.J. as that, having now forgotten all former courtesies, he drew upon his new professed enemy and bare her up with such a violence against the bolster that, before she could prepare the ward,[3] he thrust her through both hands, and etc.; whereby the dame, swooning for fear, was constrained (for a time) to abandon her body to the enemy's courtesy. At last, when she came to herself, she rose suddenly and determined to save herself by flight, leaving F.J. with many despiteful words, and swearing that he should never (eftsoons) take her at the like advantage, the which oath she kept better than her former professed good will; and having now recovered her chamber (because she found her hurt to be nothing dangerous) I doubt not but she slept quietly the rest of the night, as F.J. also—persuading himself that he should with convenient leisure recover her from this hagger conceit,[4] took some better rest towards the morning than he had done in many nights forepast.

So let them both sleep whiles I turn my pen unto the before-named secretary, who, being (as I said) come lately from London, had made many proffers to renew his accustomed consultations; but the sorrow which his mistress had conceived in F.J. his sickness, together with her continual repair to him during the same, had been such lets[5] unto his attempts as it was long time before he could obtain audience.[6] At the last, these new accidents fell so favourably for the furtherance of his cause that he came to his mistress's presence, and there pleaded for himself.

Now, if I should at large write his allegations, together with her subtle answers, I should but cumber[7] your ears with unpleasant rehearsal of feminine frailty. To be short, the late disdainful mood which she had conceived against F.J., together with a scruple which lay in her conscience touching the eleventh article of her belief,[8] moved her presently with better will to consult with this secretary as well upon a speedy revenge of her late received wrongs as also upon the reformation of her religion. And in very deed, it fell out that the secretary, having been of long time absent, and thereby his quills and pens not worn so near as they were wont to be, did now prick such fair large notes, that his mistress liked better to sing faburden under him than to descant any longer upon F.J.'s plain song.[9] And thus they continued in good accord until it fortuned that Dame Frances came into her[10] chamber upon such sudden as she had like to have marred all the music. Well, they conveyed their clefs as closely as they could,[11] but yet not altogether without some suspicion given to the said dame Frances, who although she could have been content to take any pain in F.J.'s behalf, yet otherwise she would never

[1] pike a sharply pointed, long-handled weapon.

[2] enrage Hundred's errata sheet replaces the original "encourage" with "enrage."

[3] ward defence.

[4] hagger conceit wild or unruly thought, idea.

[5] lets obstacles, hindrances.

[6] obtain audience be granted a meeting.

[7] cumber burden.

[8] a scruple ... eleventh article of her belief The Thirty-Nine Articles, the body of reformed Church doctrine, was issued in 1563; the eleventh article states that man is justified only by his faith in Christ and not by his good works in the world. In Andreas Capellanus's The Art of Courtly Love, the eleventh article doesn't seem to apply to this context (one should not love a person whom one is too ashamed to marry).

[9] prick such fair large notes ... upon F.J.'s plain song A "faburden" is an undersong, sometimes also called a "false bass" since the voice is actually one octave lower than that of a true bass; "plain song" refers to a lyric's unadorned melody (when the singer is a man, the plain song is usually sung by a tenor); "descant" refers to the song which accompanies or counterpoints the plain song of the main tenor voice. The whole sentence is littered with sexual double entendre.

[10] her Elinor's.

[11] conveyed their clefs as closely as they could fig., they engaged in the singing of their respective parts as privately as possible (lit., they conducted their affair as secretly as they could).

have bestowed the watching about so worthless a prize.

[...]

[F.J., left to the care of Frances and the other gentlewomen of the household, finally regains his health. Since Elinor continues to reject him and refuses to see him, he is forced to resort to letters and poems. To one letter, asking her to consider granting him "another moonshine banquet or Friday's breakfast," he receives an answer which G.T. implies has been written by the secretary. Telling Frances that if he could see proof of his mistress's infidelity he would give her up, he subsequently barges into Elinor's bedchamber.]

And it happened one day amongst others that he resorted to his mistress's chamber and found her (allo solito[1]) lying upon her bed, and the secretary with Dame Pergo and her handmaid keeping of her company. Whereat F.J., somewhat repining, came to her and fell to dalliance,[2] as one that had now rather adventure to be thought presumptuous than yield to be accompted[3] bashful, he cast his arm over his mistress and began to accuse her of sluggishness, using some other bold parts, as well to provoke her as also to grieve the other. The lady seemed little to delight in his dallying, but cast a glance at her secretary and therewith smiled, whenas the secretary and Dame Pergo burst out into open laughter. The which F.J. perceiving, and disdaining her ingratitude, was forced to depart, and in that fantasy[4] compiled this sonnet.

G.T.

With her in arms that had my heart in hold,
I stood of late to plead for pity so,
And as I did her lovely looks behold,
She cast a glance upon my rival foe.
His fleering[5] face provoked her to smile,
When my salt tears were drowned in disdain:
He glad, I sad, he laughed (alas the while),
I wept for woe, I pined for deadly pain.
And when I saw none other boot[6] prevail,
But reason's rule must guide my skilful mind:
"Why then," quod I, "old proverbs never fail,
For yet was never good cat out of kind,[7]
Nor woman true but even as stories tell,
Won with an egg, and lost again with shell."[8]

F.J.

This sonnet declareth that he began now to accompt of her as she deserved, for it hath a sharp conclusion, and it is somewhat too general. Well, as it is he lost it where his mistress found it, and she immediately imparted the same unto Dame Pergo, and Dame Pergo unto others, so that it quickly became common in the house. Amongst others Mistress Frances, having recovered a copy of it, did seem to pardon the generality, and to be well pleased with the particularity thereof, the which she bewrayed one day unto F.J. in this wise:

"Of all the joys that ever I had, my good Trust," quod she, "there is none wherein I take more comfort than in your conformity.[9] And although your present rage is such that you can be content to condemn a number unknown for the transgression of one too well known, yet I do rather rejoice that you should judge your pleasure over many than to be abused by any."

"My good Hope," quod he, "it were not reason that after such manifold proofs of your exceeding courtesies I should use strange or contentious speech with so dear a friend, and indeed I must confess that the opinion which I have conceived

[1] allo solito Italian, "in [her] usual manner."

[2] repining feeling or showing discontent; dalliance amorous, light, or familiar talk; also, amorous sport or play, such as caressing or flirtation.

[3] accompted accounted.

[4] fantasy fancy, mood.

[5] fleering grinning; sneering.

[6] none other boot no other resource or alternative.

[7] For yet was never good cat out of kind Cf. the proverb, "That cat is out of kind that sweet milk (cream) will not lap (lick, steal)" (Tilley C167). "Cat" is also a slang term for prostitute, and thus the proverb, "Never does a prostitute change her nature."

[8] Won with an egg, and lost again with shell Proverb (i.e., a quick and easy conquest leads to a quick and easy loss [Tilley A295]).

[9] conformity i.e., F.J. conforms to the conventional behaviour of the rejected and despised lover.

of my mistress hath stirred my pen to write very hardly against all the feminine gender, but I pray you pardon me (quod he), and if it please you I will recant it, as also (percase) I was but cloyed with surquedry,[1] and presumed to think more than may be proved."

"Yea, but how if it were proved?" quod Dame Frances.

"If it were so, which God forbid," quod he, "then could you not blame me to conceive that opinion."

"Howsoever I might blame you," quod she, "I mean not to blame you, but I demand further—if it be as I think and you suspect, what will you then do?"

"Surely," quod F.J., "I have determined to drink up mine own sorrow secretly, and to bid them both adieu."

"I like your farewell better than your fantasy,"[2] quod she, "and whensoever you can be content to take so much pains as the knight which had a nightgown guarded with naked swords did take,[3] I think you may put yourself out of doubt of all these things."

By these words and other speech which she uttered unto him, F.J. smelt how the world went about, and therefore did one day in the grey morning adventure to pass through the gallery towards his mistress's chamber, hoping to have found the door open, but he found the contrary, and there attending in good devotion heard the parting of his mistress and her secretary with many kind words: whereby it appeared that the one was very loath to depart from the other. F.J. was enforced to bear this burden, and after he had attended there as long as the light would give him leave, he departed also to his chamber and, apparelling himself, could not be quiet until he had spoken with his mistress, whom he burdened flatly with this despiteful treachery, and she as fast denied it, until at last, being still urged with such evident tokens as he alleged, she gave him this bone to gnaw upon:

"And if I did so," quod she, "what then?"

Whereunto F.J. made none answer, but departed with this farewell: "My loss is mine own, and your gain is none of yours, and sooner can I recover my loss than you enjoy the gain which you gape after."

And when he was in place solitary, he compiled these following for a final end of the matter.

G.T.

"And if I did what then?
Are you aggrieved therefore?
The sea hath fish for every man,
And what would you have more?"

Thus did my mistress once
Amaze my mind with doubt,
And popped a question for the nonce[4]
To beat my brains about.

Whereto I thus replied,
"Each fisherman can wish
That all the sea at every tide
Were his alone to fish.

And so did I (in vain),
But since it may not be,
Let such fish there as find the gain,
And leave the loss for me.

[1] cloyed stuffed to the point of overload or nausea; surquedry arrogance.

[2] I.e., she likes his determination to end his affair with Elinor better than his belief that he can suffer silently.

[3] as the knight ... take Earlier, Frances has seen F.J. return to his room after his first bout of love-making with Elinor. Frances and her maid visit F.J. that morning only to find him asleep; she decides to take his sword and hide it in her room, as a "token" that they had visited. After dinner that day, F.J., Frances and Elinor go riding, and during the ride Frances tells F.J. about a dream she had early that morning. In the dream, she meets a gentleman in a silk nightgown "embroidered about with a guard [i.e., a decoration] of naked swords." She is afraid when he approaches, but he reassures her that he "uses[s] this garment only for [his] own defence," and he compares his manner of attire with that of Mars when he made love to Venus, thereby cuckolding Venus' husband, Vulcan.

[4] popped asked abruptly; for the nonce expressly.

And with such luck and loss
I will content myself,
Till tides of turning time may toss
Such fishers on the shelf.

And when they stick on sands,
That every man may see,
Then will I laugh and clap my hands,
As they do now at me."

F.J.

It is time now to make an end of this thriftless[1] history, wherein although I could wade much further, as to declare his departure, what thanks he gave to his Hope, etc., yet I will cease, as one that had rather leave it imperfect than make it too plain. I have passed it over with "quod he," and "quod she," after my homely manner of writing, using sundry names for one person, as "the dame," "the lady," "mistress," etc. "the lord of the castle," "the master of the house," and "the host." Nevertheless, for that I have seen good authors term every gentlewoman a lady and every gentleman domine,[2] I have thought it no greater fault than petty treason thus to intermingle them, nothing doubting but you will easily understand my meaning, and that is as much as I desire.

Now henceforwards I will trouble you no more with such a barbarous[3] style in prose, but will only recite unto you sundry verses written by sundry gentlemen, adding nothing of mine own but only a title to every poem, whereby the cause of writing the same may the more evidently appear. Neither can I declare unto you who wrote the greatest part of them, for they are unto me but a posy[4] presented out of sundry gardens; neither have I any other names of the flowers, but such short notes as the authors themselves have delivered; thereby, if you can guess them, it shall no way offend me.[5]

G.T.

[...]

I will now deliver unto you so many more of Master Gascoigne's poems as have come to my hands,[6] who hath never been dainty of his doings, and therefore I conceal not his name; but his word or posy he hath often changed, and therefore I will deliver his verses with such sundry posies as I received them.

[...]

Gascoigne's Lullaby

Sing lullaby, as women do
Wherewith they bring their babes to rest,
And lullaby can I sing too
As womanly as can the best.
With lullaby they still the child,
And if I be not much beguiled,
Full many wanton babes[7] have I
Which must be stilled with lullaby.

First lullaby my youthful years,
It is now time to go to bed,
For crooked age and hoary heares[8]
Have won the haven within my head:
With lullaby then youth be still,
With lullaby content thy will,
Since courage quails, and comes behind,
Go sleep, and so beguile thy mind.

Next lullaby my gazing eyes,
Which wonted were to glance apace:[9]
For every glass[10] may now suffice,
To show the furrows in my face.

---

[1] thriftless unfortunate; with a play on "useless" or "profitless."

[2] domine a lord.

[3] barbarous unpolished, crude, unsophisticated.

[4] posy See p. 340, note 1.

[5] For Gascoigne's revised introduction to and conclusion of "Adventures of Master F.J.," see the appendix, at the end of this entry.

[6] The "so many more" implies (of course) that all the previous poems (attributed to anonymous gentlemen) are also by Gascoigne.

[7] wanton babes collective reference to the subjects which dominate the following stanzas: "youthful years," "gazing eyes," "wanton will," and "loving boy."

[8] heares i.e., hairs.

[9] Which wonted were to glance apace which were accustomed to glance swiftly or quickly.

[10] glass mirror, looking-glass.

With lullaby then wink a while,
With lullaby your looks beguile.
Let no fair face nor beauty bright
Entice you eft[1] with vain delight.

And lullaby my wanton will,
Let reason's rule now reign thy thought,
Since all too late I find by skill,
How dear I have thy fancies bought.
With lullaby now take thine ease,
With lullaby thy doubts appease:
For trust to this, if thou be still,
My body shall obey thy will.

Eke[2] lullaby my loving boy,
My little Robin take thy rest,
Since age is cold and nothing coy,[3]
Keep close thy coin, for so is best.
With lullaby be thou content,
With lullaby thy lusts relent;
Let others pay which have more pence,
Thou art too poor for such expense.

Thus lullaby my youth, mine eyes,
My will, my ware,[4] and all that was;
I can no more delays devise,
But welcome pain, let pleasure pass.
With lullaby now take your leave,
With lullaby your dreams deceive,
And when you rise with waking eye,
Remember "Gascoigne's Lullaby."

Ever or Never.

[...]

I have heard Master Gascoigne's memory commended by these verses following, the which were written upon this occasion. He had (in the middest of his youth) determined to abandon all vain delights and to return unto Gray's Inn, there to undertake again the study of the common laws. And being required by five sundry gentlemen to write in verse somewhat worthy to be remembered before he entered into their fellowship, he compiled these five sundry sorts of meter upon five sundry themes[5] which they delivered unto him.

[...]

John Vaughan[6] delivered him this theme, Magnum vectigal parcimonia,[7] whereupon he wrote thus.

The common speech is, spend and God will send.[8]
But what sends he? a bottle and a bag,
A staff, a wallet and a woeful end,[9]
For such as list in bravery so to brag.[10]
Then if thou covet coin enough to spend,
Learn first to spare thy budget at the brink,
So shall the bottom be the faster bound:[11]
But he that list with lavish hand to link

---

1 eft again, a second time.

2 Eke also.

3 coy shy, reserved.

4 ware goods, commodities, possessions.

5 themes an assigned topic on which a prose piece was to be written; a standard exercise for Renaissance schoolboys.

6 John Vaughan no entry in DNB, DLB, or W.R. Douthwaite, Gray's Inn: Its History and Associations (London, 1886).

7 Latin, "Thrift produces wealth." Based on Cicero's Paradoxa Stoicorum, 6 [III], 49: O di immortales! non intelligunt homines, quam magnum vectigal sit parsimonia ("Heavens above! Don't people understand how much money thrift produces?"). In this paradox, Cicero compares himself with his income of 100 sestertia from his property with a man who makes 600 from his. However, the latter spends extravagantly on beautifying his house and is therefore always in debt, while Cicero is frugal and thus has income left over after he has paid for his needs: "So which of us is the richer ... the one who is always looking for more to maintain an ever-expanding estate or the one who is self-sufficient?" see On Stoic Good and Evil: De Finibus Bonorum et Malorum (Book III) and Paradoxa Stoicorum, ed. and trans. M.R. Wright (Warminster, 1991), pp. 100-05.

8 Proverb (Tilley G247).

9 bottle and a bag ... woeful end "To turn to bag and wallet" is an expression meaning "to become a beggar"; staff ... wallet traditional accoutrements of the poor wanderer.

10 list in bravery so to brag i.e., desire to brag [of their wealth or social status] by wearing fine clothes (bravery).

11 spare thy budget at the brink ... bottom ... faster bound don't spend your money when you have a great deal of it (when your purse [budget] is full to the brink), because when you've gone through the "top" of a pile of money the bottom of it comes quickly into view.

(In like expense) a penny with a pound,
May chance at last to sit aside and shrink
His harebrained head without[1] Dame Dainty's door.
Hick, Hob, and Dick, with clouts[2] upon their knee,
Have many times more goonhole groats[3] in store,
And change of crowns more quick at call than he
Which let their lease and took their rent before.[4]
For he that raps a royal[5] on his cap,
Before he put one penny in his purse,
Had need turn quick and broach a better tap,[6]
Or else his drink may chance go down the worse.
I not deny but some men have good hap,
To climb aloft by scales of courtly grace,
And win the world with liberality;
Yet he that yerks old angels[7] out apace,
And hath no new to purchase dignity,
When orders fall, may chance to lack his grace,[8]
For haggard hawks[9] mislike an empty hand:
So stiffly some stick to the mercer's[10] stall,
Till suits of silk have sweat out all their land;
So oft thy neighbours banquet in thy hall,
Till Davie Debet[11] in thy parlour stand,
And bids thee welcome to thine own decay.
I like a lion's looks not worth a leek[12]
When every fox beguiles him of his prey.
What sauce but sorrow serveth him a week,
Which all his cates[13] consumeth in one day?
First use thy stomach to a stound[14] of ale,
Before thy malmsey[15] come in merchants' books,
And rather wear (for shift) thy shirt of mail,[16]
Than tear thy silken sleeves with tenterhooks.[17]
Put feathers in thy pillows great and small,
Let them be prinked with plumes that gape for[18] plums,
Heap up both gold and silver safe in hooches,[19]
Catch, snatch, and scratch for scrapings and for crumbs,
Before thou deck[20] thy hat (on high) with brooches.
Let first thine one hand hold fast all that comes,
Before that other learn his letting fly.
Remember still that soft[21] fire makes sweet malt,
No haste but good (who means to multiply).
Bought wit is dear, and dressed with sour salt,
Repentance comes too late, and then say I,
Who spares the first and keeps the last unspent,
Shall find that sparing yields a goodly rent.[22]

Sic tuli.[23]

---

[1] without outside.

[2] I.e., the rustics, the rural clods; clouts patches.

[3] goonhole a type of coin ("gun-hole," OED); groats English coins worth about fourpence.

[4] let their lease sold their lease on a property for an immediate cash settlement; took their rent before perhaps, got their renters to pay their rent in advance?

[5] raps a royal hastens (to spend) a royal (a gold coin worth about 11 shillings) on a cap, an extravagant sum to spend on such an article.

[6] broach a ... tap to pierce (a cask, etc.) so as to draw liquor.

[7] yerks flings, throws out rapidly; angels gold coins worth about 6 to 10 shillings.

[8] I.e., when an office falls vacant he may lack the money necessary to purchase it or offer the necessary bribes to attain it.

[9] haggard hawks untamed hawks captured as adults, rather than raised in captivity from hatchlings or young birds; they were partly trained by using a bait or lure of food to get them to fly to the trainer's hand.

[10] mercer merchant.

[11] Davie Debet Davy Debt.

[12] not worth a leek Proverb (the leek is the type of something of little value [Tilley O66]).

[13] cates victuals, provisions.

[14] use accustom; stound i.e., a stand, a barrel which could contain as much as 13 gallons.

[15] malmsey a strong, sweet wine, imported from Italy or Madeira, much more expensive than ale.

[16] for shift as a makeshift or expedient. A shift was also a general term for an undergarment in the period; shirt of mail traditional protective garment of the soldier.

[17] tenterhooks hooks used to stretch cloth on a frame, often after it has been milled in order to allow it to dry evenly and without shrinking.

[18] prinked decked, adorned; that gape for that have a longing for.

[19] hooches hutches, chests, or coffers.

[20] deck adorn, decorate.

[21] soft slow, gentle.

[22] The last six lines are versions of a number of popular proverbs: "Soft fire makes sweet malt" (Tilley F280); "No haste but good" (Tilley H199); "Bought wit is dear" (Tilley W546); "Repentance never comes too late" (Tilley R80).

[23] Sic tuli Latin, "Thus I have borne [my misfortunes]."

Alexander Neville[1] delivered him this theme, Sat cito, si sat bene,[2] whereupon he compiled these seven sonnets in sequence, therein bewraying his own Nimis cito, and therewith his Vix bene,[3] as followeth:

1

In haste post haste[4] when first my wand'ring mind
Beheld the glistering court with gazing eye,
Such deep delights I seemed therein to find
As might beguile a graver guest than I.
The stately pomp of princes and their peers
Did seem to swim in floods of beaten gold;
The wanton world of young delightful years
Was not unlike a heaven for to behold,
Wherein did swarm (for every saint) a dame,
So fair of hue, so fresh of their attire
As might excel Dame Cynthia[5] for fame,
Or conquer Cupid with his own desire.
These and such like were baits that blazed still Before mine eye to feed my greedy will.

2

Before mine eye to feed my greedy will
Gan muster eke mine old acquainted mates,
Who helped the dish (of vain delight) to fill
My empty mouth with dainty delicates;
And foolish boldness took the whip in hand
To lash my life into this trustless trace,[6]
Till all in haste I leapt aloof from land,
And hoist up sail to catch a courtly grace.
Each ling'ring day did seem a world of woe
Till in that hapless haven my head was brought;
Waves of wanhope[7] so tossed me to and fro,
In deep despair to drown my dreadful thought:
Each hour a day, each day a year did seem,
And every year a world my will did deem.

3

And every year a world my will did deem,
Till lo, at last, to court now am I come,
A seemly swain, that might the place beseem,[8]
A gladsome guest embraced of all and some.
Not there content with common dignity,
My wand'ring eye in haste (yea post post haste)
Beheld the blazing badge of bravery,[9]
For want[10] whereof I thought myself disgraced.
Then peevish[11] pride puffed up my swelling heart,
To further forth so hot an enterprise;
And comely cost began to play his part
In praising patterns of mine own devise:
Thus all was good that might be got in haste,
To prink me up,[12] and make me higher placed.

4

To prink me up and make me higher placed,
All came too late that tarried any time.
Piles of provision pleased not my taste,
They made my heels too heavy for to climb.
Methought it best that boughs of boist'rous oak,
Should first be shred to make my feathers gay,[13]
Till at the last a deadly dinting stroke
Brought down the bulk with edgetools of decay.[14]
Of every farm I then let fly a lease,[15]
To feed the purse that paid for peevishness,
Till rent and all were fall'n in such disease
As scarce could serve to maintain cleanliness:

---

[1] Alexander Neville (1544-1614), brother to Thomas Neville, dean of Canterbury, author of a translation of Seneca's Oedipus (1560), De Furoribus (1575) and other works, later secretary to Archbishop Parker. He was also the poet Barnabe Googe's cousin.

[2] Latin, "If it be well, let it be [done] quickly" (i.e., a variant on the proverb, "No haste but good"). See Sonnets 6 and 7 in this sequence, p. 367 and p. 367, note 10.

[3] Nimis cito Latin, "too quickly"; Vix bene Latin, "scarcely well."

[4] In haste post haste with all possible speed; hastily.

[5] Cynthia another name for Diana, goddess of the moon, virginity, and the hunt.

[6] trustless trace uncertain path.

[7] wanhope hopelessness, despair.

[8] seemly swain fair, well-formed young man; beseem befit.

[9] bravery fine clothing.

[10] want lack.

[11] peevish foolish; headstrong, obstinate.

[12] prink me up dress or adorn with petty ornaments; to display ostentatiously.

[13] boughs of boist'rous oak ... gay i.e., he sold the forests on his estates to purchase finery.

[14] decay destruction.

[15] Of … lease another reference to the speaker's squandering of his property.

The bough, the body, fine, farm, lease and land,
All were too little for the merchant's hand.

5
All were too little for the merchant's hand,
And yet my bravery[1] bigger than his book.
But when this hot account was coldly scanned,
I thought high time about me for to look.
With heavy cheer I cast my head aback
To see the fountain[2] of my furious race,
Compared my loss, my living, and my lack,
In equal balance with my jolly grace,
And saw expenses grating on the ground
Like lumps of lead to press my purse full oft,[3]
When light reward and recompense were found
Fleeting like feathers in the wind aloft:
These thus compared, I left the court at large.
For why? The gains doth seldom quit the charge.[4]

6
For why? the gains doth seldom quit the charge,
And so say I, by proof[5] too dearly bought.
My haste made waste, my brave and brainsick[6] barge
Did float too fast to catch a thing of nought.
With leisure, measure, mean,[7] and many mo,
I might have kept a chair of quiet state,
But hasty heads cannot be settled so
Till crooked Fortune give a crabbed mate.[8]
As busy brains must beat on tickle toys,[9]
As rash invention breeds a raw device,
So sudden falls do hinder hasty joys;
And as swift baits do fleetest fish entice,
So haste makes waste, and therefore now I say,
"No haste but good," where wisdom makes the way.[10]

7
"No haste but good," where wisdom makes the way.
For proof whereof we see the silly[11] snail,—
Who sees the soldier's carcass cast away,
With hot assault the castle to assail—
By line[12] and leisure climbs the lofty wall,
And wins the turret's top more cunningly
Than doughty[13] Dick, who lost his life and all
With hoisting up his head too hastily.
The swiftest bitch brings forth the blindest whelps,[14]
The hottest fevers coldest cramps ensue,
The nakedst need hath ever latest[15] helps.
With Neville then I find this proverb true,
That "Haste makes waste," and therefore still I say,
"No haste but good," where wisdom makes the way.

Sic tuli.

[...]

And thus an end of these five themes, wherein hath been noted that as the themes were sundry and altogether diverse, so Master Gascoigne did accomplish them in five sundry sorts of meter, yea and that seemeth most strange he devised all these, amounting to the number of CCLVIII[16] verses, riding by the way, writing none of them until he came at the end of his journey, the which was no longer than one day in riding, one day in tarrying with his friend, and the third in returning to Gray's Inn, a small time for such a task, neither

[1] bravery finery, splendid clothing, and/or accoutrements.
[2] fountain spring, origin.
[3] Like … oft i.e., his heavy expenses are like pieces of lead which weigh his purse down to the ground.
[4] quit the charge recompense the expense.
[5] proof trial; the knowledge derived from experience.
[6] brave showy, fine, ostentatious; brainsick stupid, foolish; frantic.
[7] measure moderation, temperance; mean a synonym for "measure".
[8] crabbed ill-natured; angry; mate In chess, when a player makes the move known as "checkmate," he signals the total defeat of his opponent.
[9] beat on be wholly focused on, or preoccupied with; tickle toys frivolous and changeable notions.
[10] Proverb, "No haste but good" (Tilley H199).
[11] silly defenseless; weak, frail.
[12] By line with methodical accuracy. Proverb: "to work by line and level (measure)" (Tilley L305).
[13] doughty brave, stout, valiant.
[14] Proverb, "The hasty bitch brings forth blind whelps" (Tilley B425).
[15] latest tardiest, least timely, slowest.
[16] CCLVIII 258.

would I willingly undertake the like. The meters are but rough in many places, and yet are they true (cum licentia poetica[1]) and I must needs confess that he hath more commonly been over curious in delectation, than of haughty style in his dilatations. And therefore let us pass to the rest of his works.

[...]

Gascoigne's Good Morrow

You that have spent the silent night
In sleep and quiet rest,
And joy to see the cheerful light
That riseth in the east:
Now clear your voice, now cheer your heart,
Come help me now to sing:
Each willing wight[2] come bear a part,
To praise the heavenly King.

And you whom care[3] in prison keeps,
Or sickness doth suppress,
Or secret sorrow breaks your sleeps,
Or dolours[4] do distress:
Yet bear a part in doleful wise,[5]
Yea think it good accord,
And acceptable sacrifice,
Each sprite[6] to praise the Lord.

The dreadful night with darksomeness[7]
Had overspread the light,
And sluggish sleep with drowsiness,
Had over pressed our might:
A glass wherein we may behold
Each storm that stops our breath,
Our bed the grave, our clothes like mold,[8]
And sleep like dreadful death.

Yet as this deadly night did last
But for a little space,
And heavenly day, now night is past,
Doth show his pleasant face:
So must we hope to see God's face
At last in Heaven on high,
When we have changed this mortal place
For immortality.

And of such haps[9] and heavenly joys
As then we hope to hold,
All earthly sights, all worldly toys,
Are tokens to behold:
The day is like the day of doom,[10]
The sun, the Son of Man,[11]
The skies the Heavens, the earth the tomb
Wherein we rest till than.[12]

The rainbow bending in the sky,
Bedecked with sundry hues,
Is like the seat of God on high,
And seems to tell these news:
That as thereby he promised
To drown the world no more,[13]
So by the blood which Christ hath shed,
He will our health restore.

The misty clouds that fall sometime,
And overcast the skies,
Are like to troubles of our time,
Which do but dim our eyes:
But as such dews are dried up quite
When Phoebus[14] shows his face,

---

[1] Latin, "with poetic license" (the phrase is often attributed to Seneca, Quaestiones Naturales, 2.44.1).
[2] wight person, human being.
[3] care sorrow, grief.
[4] dolours griefs.
[5] doleful wise i.e., dolefully, sorrowfully.
[6] sprite i.e., spirit.
[7] Hundred's errata sheet replaces "darksome storms" with "darksomeness."
[8] mold earth, dust.
[9] haps events or occurrences that befall one.
[10] the day of doom the day of the Last Judgment.
[11] the Son of Man common epithet for Jesus Christ.
[12] than i.e., then.
[13] In Genesis 6.5-9.18, God sends a great flood to drown all of sinful mankind, with the exception of the righteous Noah and his family; God repents his actions, and places a rainbow in the sky, signalling his promise never again to flood the Earth.
[14] Phoebus the sun.

So are such fancies put to flight,
Where God doth guide by grace.

The carrion crow, that loathsome beast,
Which cries against the rain,
Both for her hue and for the rest
The Devil resembleth plain:[1]
And as with guns we kill the crow
For spoiling our relief,
The Devil so must we o'erthrow
With gunshot of belief.

The little birds which sing so sweet
Are like the angel's voice,
Which render God his praises meet,[2]
And teach us to rejoice:
And as they more esteem that mirth
Than dread the night's annoy,
So must we deem our days on earth
But hell to heavenly joy.

Unto which joys for to attain
God grant us all his grace,
And send us after worldly pain,
In Heaven to have a place.
Where we may still enjoy that light,
Which never shall decay:
Lord for thy mercy lend us might
To see that joyful day.
Haud ictus sapio.[3]

[1] The carrion crow ... resembleth plain The crow was traditionally a bird of ill-omen in the Renaissance, and its folklore was often confused with that of the raven. Classical writers (such as Theophrastus) held that ravens could foretell storms. In some European folktales "the devil appears as a raven or crow, or one of these birds is said to act as Satan's messenger." See E.A. Armstrong, The Folklore of Birds (London, 1958), pp. 72, 74, 85, and 87.

[2] meet appropriate.

[3] Haud ictus sapio Latin, "I gain no wisdom at all from blows" (i.e., I learn nothing at all from hard experience).

Gascoigne's Good Night

When thou hast spent the ling'ring day in pleasure and delight,
Or after toil and weary way dost seek to rest at night,
Unto thy pains or pleasures past add this one labour yet:
Ere sleep close up thine eye too fast, do not thy God forget,
But search within thy secret thoughts what deeds did thee befall,
And if thou find amiss in ought,[4] to God for mercy call.
Yea though thou find nothing amiss, which thou canst call to mind,
Yet evermore remember this, there is the more behind,
And think how well soe'er it be that thou hast spent the day,
It came of God, and not of thee, so to direct thy way.
Thus if thou try[5] thy daily deeds, and pleasure in this pain,
Thy life shall cleanse thy corn from weeds, and thine shall be the gain;
But if thy sinful sluggish eye will venture for to wink,[6]
Before thy wading will[7] may try how far thy soul may sink,
Beware and wake, for else thy bed, which soft and smooth is made,
May heap more harm upon thy head than blows of en'my's blade.
Thus if this pain procure thine ease, in bed as thou dost lie,
Perhaps it shall not God displease, to sing thus soberly:
"I see that sleep is lent me here to ease my weary bones,

[4] in ought in anything.

[5] try test; experience.

[6] wink to shut one's eyes (to something faulty, wrong, or improper); to be complaisant about wrongs.

[7] wading will sluggish or slow-moving will (as in wading through water).

As death at last shall eke appear to ease my grievous groans.
My daily sports, my paunch full fed, have caused my drowsy eye,
As careless[1] life in quiet led, might cause my soul to die.
The stretching arms, the yawning breath, which I to bedward use,
Are patterns of the pangs of death, when life will me refuse;
And of my bed each sundry part in shadows doth resemble
The sundry shapes of death, whose dart shall make my flesh to tremble.
My bed itself is like the grave, my sheets the winding sheet,[2]
My clothes the mold which I must have to cover me most meet;
The hungry fleas which frisk so fresh, to worms I can compare,
Which greedily shall gnaw my flesh, and leave the bones full bare;
The waking cock that early crows to wear the night away,
Puts in my mind the trump that blows before the Latter Day.[3]
And as I rise up lustily, when sluggish sleep is past,
So hope I to rise joyfully to judgment at the last."
Thus will I wake, thus will I sleep, thus will I hope to rise,
Thus will I neither wail nor weep, but sing in godly wise.[4]
My bones shall in this bed remain, my soul in God shall trust,
By whom I hope to rise again from death and earthly dust.

Haud ictus sapio.

[...]

[1] careless here, without due regard for one's condition; recklessly unconcerned about (one's spiritual state).
[2] winding sheet burial cloth.
[3] Latter Day the day of the Last Judgment.
[4] wise way, manner.

Gascoigne's Woodmanship

Written to the Lord Grey of Wilton[5] upon this occasion: the said Lord Grey delighting (amongst many other good qualities) in choosing of his winter deer, and killing the same with his bow, did furnish Master Gascoigne with a crossbow cum pertinenciis,[6] and vouchsafed to use his company in the said exercise, calling him one of his woodmen.[7] Now, Master Gascoigne shooting very often could never hit any deer, yea and oftentimes he let the herd pass by as though he had not seen them. Whereat when his noble lord took some pastime, and had often put him in remembrance of his good skill in choosing and readiness in killing of a winter deer, he thought good thus to excuse it in verse.

My worthy lord, I pray you wonder not
To see your woodman shoot so oft awry,
Nor that he stands amazed like a sot,[8]
And lets the harmless deer (unhurt) go by.
Or if he strike a doe which is but carren,[9]
Laugh not, good lord, but favour such a fault;
Take will in worth, he would fain hit the barren,[10]

[5] Lord Grey of Wilton When Gascoigne returned from fighting in the Low Countries, he began to cast around for a patron, and apparently found one in Arthur Grey, fourteenth Baron Grey of Wilton (1536-93), lord deputy of Ireland (1580-82), and soldier. Gascoigne's service in the Netherlands brought him in contact with John Zouche (Grey's kinsman through marriage) and Sir Edward Denny (Grey's cousin), and it is possible that these connections encouraged him to approach Grey. Grey was also a patron of Spenser, who wrote in defence of Grey's military actions in Ireland in A View of the Present State of Ireland; Grey is generally agreed to be allegorically figured in the knight Artegall (Faerie Queene, book 5). That Gascoigne went to stay at Grey's estate at Wilton and subsequently dedicated a series of works to this nobleman suggest that Gascoigne's bid for patronage was at least moderately successful (J. Lock, "Arthur Grey," DNB online, 2005).
[6] cum pertinenciis Latin, "with accessories."
[7] woodmen huntsmen.
[8] amazed bewildered, stupefied; sot blockhead, dolt.
[9] carren a doe with a faun, and therefore off-limits for hunting.
[10] Take will in worth treat [his] intention kindly; he would fain hit the barren he would rather hit the barren, a doe without a fawn, and therefore "fair game."

But though his heart be good, his hap is naught.[1]
And therefore now I crave your lordship's leave[2]
To tell you plain what is the cause of this:
First if it please your honour to perceive
What makes your woodman shoot so oft amiss,
Believe me, lord, the case is nothing strange
He shoots awry almost at every mark;
His eyes have been so used for to range,
That now God knows they be both dim and dark.
For proof he bears the note of folly now,
Who shot sometimes to hit philosophy,[3]
And ask you why? forsooth I make avow,[4]
Because his wanton wits went all awry.
Next that, he shot to be a man of law,[5]
And spent some time with learned Littleton,[6]
Yet in the end, he proved but a daw,[7]
For law was dark[8] and he had quickly done.
Then could he wish Fitzherbert such a brain
As Tully[9] had, to write the law by art,
So that with pleasure, or with little pain,
He might perhaps have caught a truant's part.
But all too late, he most misliked the thing
Which most might help to guide his arrow straight;
He winked wrong, and so let slip the string,
Which cast him wide for all his quaint conceit.[10]
From thence he shot to catch a courtly grace,[11]
And thought even there to wield the world at will,
But out, alas, he much mistook the place,
And shot awry at every rover[12] still.
The blazing baits which draw the gazing eye
Unfeathered[13] there his first affection;
No wonder then although he shot awry,
Wanting[14] the feathers of discretion.
Yet more than them, the marks of dignity
He much mistook and shot the wronger way,
Thinking the purse of prodigality
Had been best mean[15] to purchase such a prey.
He thought the flatt'ring face which fleereth[16] still
Had been full fraught with all fidelity,
And that such words as courtiers use at will
Could not have varied from the verity.
But when his bonnet[17] buttoned with gold,
His comely cap begarded[18] all with gay,
His bombast[19] hose, with linings manifold,
His knit silk stocks and all his quaint array,[20]
Had picked his purse of all the Peter pence[21]
Which might have paid for his promotion,
Then (all too late) he found that light expense[22]

---

1 his hap is naught his luck is nothing (i.e., bad).

2 leave permission.

3 I.e., he aimed at (shot at) being a philosopher or studying philosophy, perhaps a reference to Gascoigne's time at Cambridge.

4 make avow confess, explain.

5 man of law a reference to Gascoigne's time at Gray's Inn.

6 Littleton Sir Thomas Littleton (b. before 1417, d. 1481), justice of the court of Common Pleas, author of Littleton's Tenures, a standard law textbook in the period.

7 daw jackdaw, a kind of bird; fig. a simpleton or fool.

8 dark hard, difficult to understand.

9 Fitzherbert Sir Anthony Fitzherbert (c. 1470-1538), judge and legal writer, author of the massive and influential Magnum abbreviamentum (3 parts, 1514-17; later titled La graunde abridgement), a digest of 13,845 legal cases; Tully Marcus Tullius Cicero (106-43 BCE), Roman orator, politician and writer. Cicero's writings were central texts in the Renaissance, particularly those which treated philosophical and rhetorical topics. Gascoigne may be referring here to any of Cicero's eloquent legal orations.

10 winked wrong looked along the crossbow's sights incorrectly; let slip the string loosened the crossbow's string and missed ("cast him wide"); quaint conceit clever or insightful judgment.

11 courtly grace a reference to Gascoigne's attempt at a court career.

12 rover in archery, a mark selected at will or at random, and not at any fixed distance from the archer; here, the "moving targets" of the courtly ladies and gentlemen.

13 Unfeathered i.e., his arrows were not fitted with the feathers necessary to allow them to fly straight.

14 Wanting lacking, deprived of.

15 mean way, means.

16 fleereth laughs or smiles flatteringly or fawningly.

17 bonnet a brimless cap for men and boys.

18 begarded adorned or furnished with "gards" or facings, generally made of lace or embroidery.

19 bombast stuffed, padded, or puffed out.

20 stocks stockings; quaint array fashionable or elegant clothing, usually embroidered or elaborately worked.

21 picked his purse stolen; Peter pence a pre-Reformation tax which required every householder in England to pay a penny to the Pope; here, refers generally to bribe money.

22 light expense lack of extravagant spending.

Had quite quenched out the court's devotion.
So that since then the taste of misery
Hath been always full bitter in his bit.
And why? forsooth because he shot awry,
Mistaking still the marks which others hit.
But now behold what mark the man doth find:
He shoots to be a soldier in his age;
Mistrusting all the virtues of the mind,
He trusts the power of his personage,[1]
As though long limbs led by a lusty heart,
Might yet suffice to make him rich again.
But Flushing frays[2] have taught him such a part,
That now he thinks the wars yield no such gain.
And sure I fear, unless your lordship deign
To train him yet into some better trade,
It will be long before he hit the vein
Whereby he may a richer man be made.
He cannot climb as other catchers can,
To lead a charge before himself be led.
He cannot spoil the simple sakeless[3] man,
Which is content to feed him with his bread.
He cannot pinch the painful[4] soldier's pay,
And shear him out his share in ragged sheets.
He cannot stoop to take a greedy prey
Upon his fellows grovelling in the streets.
He cannot pull the spoil from such as pill,[5]
And seem full angry at such foul offence,
Although the gain content his greedy will,
Under the cloak of contrary pretence;
And nowadays the man that shoots not so
May shoot amiss, even as your woodman doth.
But then you marvel why I let them go,
And never shoot, but say farewell forsooth:
Alas, my lord, while I do muse hereon,
And call to mind my youthful years misspent,
They give me such a bone to gnaw upon,[6]
That all my senses are in silence pent.
My mind is rapt in contemplation,
Wherein my dazzled eyes only behold
The black hour of my constellation
Which framed me so luckless on the mold:[7]
Yet therewithal I cannot but confess
That vain presumption makes my heart to swell,
For thus, I think, not all the world (I guess)
Shoots bet[8] than I, nay some shoots not so well.
In Aristotle somewhat did I learn,
To guide my manners all by comeliness,
And Tully taught me somewhat to discern
Between sweet speech and barbarous rudeness.[9]
Old Parkins, Rastell, and Dan Bractons' books,
Did lend me somewhat of the lawless law;[10]
The crafty courtiers with their guileful looks,
Must needs put some experience in my maw:[11]
Yet cannot these with many mast'ries mo[12]
Make me shoot straight at any gainful prick,[13]
Where some that never handled such a bow
Can hit the white or touch it near the quick,[14]
Who can nor speak nor write in pleasant wise,[15]

---

1 personage body.

2 Flushing frays refers to Gascoigne's participation in the battles near Flushing in Holland in the summer of 1572. See C.T. Prouty, George Gascoigne: Elizabethan Courtier, Soldier and Poet (New York, 1942), pp. 49-51.

3 sakeless sackless: innocent, guileless.

4 pinch extort; painful careful, laborious.

5 pull the spoil from such as pill i.e., seize the booty from those who plunder, rob, or pillage (although he really does so not because he seeks to punish the soldiers, but because he wants the booty for himself).

6 a bone to gnaw upon i.e., something to worry about.

7 constellation ... on the mold i.e., he was born at an inauspicious hour when the stars were badly aligned, making him a luckless man on earth ("mold").

8 bet i.e., better.

9 barbarous rudeness un-civilized, unpolished, or rough speech.

10 John Perkins (or Parkins, d. 1545?), legal writer, author of a popular textbook on land law, Perutilis Tractatus (1528; 17 editions before 1660); William Rastell (or Rastall; 1508-65), printer and legal writer, member of Lincoln's Inn, compiler of an important student legal handbook (1534) and author of two important legal reference works, Collection of all the Statutes (1557) and Collection of Entrees (1566); Henry Bratton (or Bracton; d. 1268), justice; the legal treatise De legibus et consuetudinibus Angliae, medieval England's most complete survey of common law and its applications, is traditionally ascribed to him.

11 maw stomach, belly.

12 mast'ries mo i.e., more masteries: the mastery of more skills or bodies of knowledge.

13 prick a mark aimed at in shooting; the bulls-eye or spot in the centre of the target.

14 white the white target usually placed on the butt, a mound or other erection on which the target is set up; quick the exact centre or spot they are aiming at.

15 wise manner, way.

Nor lead their life by Aristotle's rule,[1]
Nor argue well on questions that arise,
Nor plead a case more than my Lord Mayor's mule,
Yet can they hit the marks that I do miss,
And win the mean[2] which may the man maintain.
Now when my mind doth mumble upon this,
No wonder then although I pine for pain;
And whiles mine eyes behold this mirror thus,
The herd goeth by, and farewell gentle does:
So that your lordship quickly may discuss
What blinds mine eyes so oft (as I suppose).
But since my Muse can to my lord rehearse
What makes me miss, and why I do not shoot,
Let me imagine in this worthless verse,
If right before me, at my standing's foot,
There stood a doe, and I should strike her dead,
And then she prove a carrion[3] carcass too,
What figure might I find within my head
To 'scuse the rage which ruled me so to do?
Some might interpret by plain paraphrase
That lack of skill or fortune led the chance,
But I must otherwise expound the case:
I say Jehovah did this doe advance,
And made her bold to stand before me so,
Till I had thrust mine arrow to her heart,
That by the sudden of her overthrow
I might endeavour to amend my part,
And turn mine eyes that they no more behold
Such guileful marks as seem more than they be;
And though they glister outwardly like gold,
Are inwardly but brass, as men may see;
And when I see the milk hang in her teat,
Methinks it sayeth, old babe now learn to suck,
Who in thy youth couldst never learn the feat
To hit the whites which live with all good luck.

Thus have I told, my lord (God grant in season),
A tedious tale in rhyme, but little reason.
Haud ictus sapio.

[...]

—1573

from The Posies of George Gascoigne

The Green Knight's Farewell to Fancy[4]

Fancy (quoth he) farewell, whose badge I long did bear,
And in my hat full harebrainedly[5] thy flowers did I wear.
Too late I find (at last) thy fruits are nothing worth,
Thy blossoms fall and fade full fast, though bravery[6] bring them forth.
By thee I hoped always in deep delights to dwell,
But since I find thy fickleness, Fancy (quoth he) farewell.

Thou mad'st me live in love, which wisdom bids me hate.
Thou bleared'st mine eyes and mad'st me think that faith was mine by fate.
By thee those bitter sweets did please my taste alway;
By thee I thought that love was light, and pain was but a play.
I thought that beauty's blaze was meet to bear the bell,[7]
And since I find myself deceived, Fancy (quoth he) farewell.

[1] In his Nichomachean Ethics, Aristotle discusses the mean as that middle point between excess and deficiency in particular virtues for which a person should strive in order to live a good life.

[2] mean i.e., here, monetary means.

[3] carrion see "carren," p. 370, note 9.

[4] The Green Knight Gascoigne's nickname; Fancy the imaginative, creative faculty.

[5] harebrainedly recklessly, madly.

[6] bravery the wearing of fine clothes.

[7] blaze praise; bear the bell Proverb, "He bears away the bell" (Tilley B275), meaning "he wins the prize."

The gloss of gorgeous courts, by thee did please mine eye:
A stately sight methought it was to see the brave[1]
go by,
To see their feathers flaunt, to make their strange device,
To lie along in ladies' laps, to lisp and make it nice.[2]
To fawn and flatter both, I liked sometimes well,
But since I see how vain it is, Fancy (quoth he)
farewell.

When court had cast me off, I toiled at the plough.
My fancy stood in strange conceits, to thrive I wot[3] not how:
By mills, by making malt, by sheep and eke[4] by swine,
By duck and drake, by pig and goose, by calves and keeping kine,[5]
By feeding bullocks fat, when price at markets fell—
But since my swains[6] eat up the gains, Fancy
(quoth he) farewell.

In hunting of the deer my fancy took delight.
All forests knew my folly still; the moonshine was my light.
In frosts I felt no cold, a sunburnt hue was best;
I sweat and was in temper still; my watching[7]
seemed rest.
What dangers deep I passed, it folly were to tell,
And since I sigh to think thereon, Fancy (quoth he)
farewell.

A fancy[8] fed me once to write in verse and rhyme,
To wray[9] my grief, to crave reward, to cover still my crime;
To frame a long discourse on stirring of a straw,
To rumble rhyme in raff and ruff, yet all not worth a haw;[10]
To hear it said "There goeth the man that writes
so well."
But since I see what poets be, Fancy (quoth he)
farewell.

At music's sacred sound my fancies eft[11] begun,
In concords, discords, notes and clefs, in tunes of unison;
In hierarchies and strains, in rests, in rule and space,
In monochords and moving modes, in burdens
underbass.
In descants and in chants I strained many a yell,[12]
But since musicians be so mad, Fancy (quoth he)
farewell.

To plant strange country fruits, to sow such seeds
likewise,
To dig and delve for new-found roots, where old
might well suffice;
To prune the water-boughs,[13] to pick the mossy trees
(Oh how it pleased my fancy once), to kneel upon my knees

---

1 the brave those showily, elaborately, or finely dressed.

2 along at full length; lisp here, to speak affectedly; make it nice to display reserve or reluctance.

3 conceits notions or thoughts; wot knew.

4 eke also.

5 kine cattle.

6 swains here, farm labourers or servants; elsewhere, often a term describing the prettified shepherd-lovers of pastoral verse.

7 in temper in good mental and physical condition; watching staying awake, keeping a vigil for some purpose.

8 fancy daydream, fantasy.

9 wray reveal, make known.

10 raff and ruff a phrase used to denote unsophisticated alliterative or rhyming verse; haw the fruit of the hawthorn tree; used as the type of a thing of no value.

11 eft then.

12 hierarchies presumably the ordering of singers in a choir (like the 3 major divisions of angels); strains a definite section of a piece of music; monochord a harmonious combination of sound; modes a kind or form of scale; a particular scheme or system of sound; burdens underbass the bass part which underlies the melody in a song; strained many a yell sang many a loud song or chant (see OED, "strain," v1, 22a; "yell," v1, 1c).

13 water-boughs the lower boughs of a tree; undergrowth.

To griff a pippin[1] stock, when sap begins to swell:
But since the gains scarce quit[2] the cost, Fancy
(quoth he) farewell.

Fancy (quoth he) farewell, which made me follow drums,
Where powdered[3] bullets serves for sauce, to every dish that comes;
Where treason lurks in trust, where hope all hearts beguiles,[4]
Where mischief lieth still in wait, where fortune friendly smiles;
Where one day's prison proves that all such heavens are hell:
And such I feel the fruits thereof—Fancy (quoth he) farewell.

If reason rule my thoughts, and God vouchsafe me grace,
Then comfort of philosophy shall make me change my race;
And fond I shall it find, that[5] Fancy sets to show,
For weakly stands that building still which lacketh grace below.[6]
But since I must accept my fortunes as they fell,
I say God send me better speed,[7] and Fancy now farewell.

[1] griff graft; pippin any one of a variety of apples grown from seed.
[2] quit requite, repay.
[3] powdered charged or fired by gunpowder; but also, "seasoned to taste" as in a dish of food.
[4] beguiles deceives.
[5] fond foolish; that i.e., that which.
[6] perhaps a reference to building castles in the air; where, "below" might refer to pragmatic earthbound testing of philosophy, but also concretely to that which lies below the building: the foundation.
[7] speed success.

Appendix: The Retitled and Revised Introduction and Conclusion of The Adventures of Master F.J.

The Pleasant Fable of Ferdinando Jeronimi and Leonora de Valasco, Translated Out of the Italian Riding Tales of Bartello[8]

In the pleasant country of Lombardy, and not far from the city of Florence, there was dwelling sometimes a lord of many rich seignories and dominions, who nevertheless bore his name of the castle of Valasco. This lord had one only son and two daughters: his son was called (during the life of his father) the heir of Valasco, who married a fair gentlewoman of the house of Bellavista named Leonora; the elder daughter of the lord of Valasco was called Francischina, a young woman very toward[9] both in capacity and other active qualities. Now the lord of Valasco, having already married his son and heir, and himself drawing in age, was desirous to see his daughters also bestowed before his death, and especially the eldest, who both for beauty and ripeness of age might often put him in remembrance that she was a collop[10] of his own flesh; and therefore sought means to draw unto his house Ferdinando Jeronimi, a young gentleman of Venice, who, delighting more in hawking, hunting, and such other pastimes than he did in study, had left his own house in Venice and was come into Lombardy to take the pleasures of the country. So that the lord of Valasco, knowing him to be of a very good parentage and therewithal not only rich but adorned with sundry good qualities, was desirous (as is said) to draw him home to his house (under pretence of hunting and hawking) to the end he might behold his fair daughter Francischina, who both for parentage and other worldly respects might no less content his mind than her beauty was likely to have allured his liking. But it fell out

[8] out of the Italian Riding Tales of Bartello Bartello and his "riding tales" are completely fictitious (Prouty, George Gascoigne, p. 79).
[9] toward promising.
[10] collop piece.

far contrary to his desire, for Ferdinando Jeronimi beholding the Lady Leonora, who was indeed very fair and of a very courtlike behaviour, became enamoured of her, and forgetting the courtesy that the lord of Valasco had showed him in entertaining him and his servants, with their horses, by the space of four months (which is a rare courtesy nowadays, and especially in such a country), he sought all means possible to make the heir of Valasco a becco.[1] And to the end that all men may perceive what fruits grow on such trees, and what issues come of such intents, I will set down in English the fable as it is written in Italian by Bartello. And because I do suppose that Leonora is the same name which we call Elinor in English, and that Francischina also doth import none other than Frances, I will so entitle them as to our own countrymen may be most perspicuous. Understand you then that Ferdinando having now a hot affection unto the said Dame Elinor, and thinking it meeter to utter his first conceits in writing than in speech did write unto her as followeth.

[...]

Thus Ferdinando being no longer able to bear these extreme despites resolved to absent himself, as well for his own further quiet as also to avoid the occasion of greater mischiefs that might ensue. And although the exceeding courtesies and approved fidelity of Dame Frances had been sufficient to allure the fast[2] liking of any man, especially considering that she was reasonably fair and descended of a worthy father, who now fell flatly to move and solicit the same, yet such sinister conceits had he taken by the fraility of Dame Elinor, as that rejecting all proffers, and contemning[3] all courtesies, he took his leave, and (without pretence[4] of return) departed to his house in Venice, spending there the rest of his days in a dissolute kind of life; and abandoning the worthy Lady Francischina, who (daily being galled with the grief of his great ingratitude) did shortly bring herself into a miserable consumption, whereof (after three years languishing) she died. Notwithstanding all which occurements the Lady Elinor lived long in the continuance of her accustomed change. And thus we see that where wicked lust doth bear the name of love it doth not only infect the light-minded, but it may also become confusion to others which are vowed to constancy. And to that end I have recited this fable, which may serve as example to warn the youthful reader from attempting the like worthless enterprise. I know not how my rude[5] translation thereof will delight the finest judgments, but sure as Bartello writeth it in Italian, it is both pleasant and profitable, the which hath made me adventure thus to publish the same in such simple style as I am able to indite,[6] desiring the gentle reader rather to take example of reformation therein, than to find fault at the homely[7] handling of the same.

Ever or never.

—1575

[1] becco Italian, "cuckold."

[2] fast secure, firm, unshakeable.

[3] contemning despising, scorning.

[4] pretence intention.

[5] rude unsophisticated, crude; lacking in literary merit.

[6] indite write.

[7] homely unsophisticated, simple.

Isabella Whitney
fl. 1566-1578

Tantalizingly little is known about the figure who could claim title as the first professional woman writer in England. Biographical detail about Isabella Whitney derives largely from what is known of her brother Geoffrey, author of the popular A Choice of Emblems (1586), or from evidence from within her works. In her poetic "Will and Testament," Whitney refers to being London-bred; however, the family estate—ultimately inherited by Geoffrey Whitney—was located in Coole Pilate, Cheshire.[1] This origin is supported by her dedicatory epistle to George Mainwaring, a member of a prominent Cheshire family. Evidence from the poems indicates that at some point the Whitney family may have lived in Smithfield, a market area in the commercial centre of the city of London; this region is explored in her "Will and Testament." From one of her verse epistles, it appears that, like many young women of the minor gentry and merchant classes, Isabella Whitney and her sisters spent some time in service in an aristocratic home. Unlike her sisters, however, Whitney indicates that she lost her position, an action that she says served to spur her foray into print publication. After the publication of The Copy of a Letter (1567), A Sweet Nosegay, Or Pleasant Posy Containing a Hundred and Ten Philosophical Flowers (1573), and "Lamentation upon the Death of William Gruffith" in Thomas Proctor's Gorgeous Gallery of Gallant Inventions (1578), Whitney disappears from view. Geoffrey Whitney's will (dated 1600), however, makes reference to his "sister Eldershae," who may be the now-married Isabella.[2]

Whitney's published work is characteristic of literary interests of the mid-sixteenth century. Her printer, Richard Jones, was known for publishing a variety of popular texts, including ballads, sensational pamphlets, and poetic miscellanies, the latter growing in popularity following the publication of Tottel's Songs and Sonnets in 1557.[3] In terms of genre, both of Whitney's volumes fit into this niche, as well as into a trend toward translation and creative adaptation of both classical and contemporary authors. Her Copy of a Letter is an example of female complaint (i.e., a lyric monologue in a woman's voice that laments her unfaithful lover). In this way it echoes the genre of Ovid's Heroides, a translation of which was published in the same year by George Turbervile.[4] Also in imitation of a popular genre, A Sweet Nosegay contains a verse redaction of Hugh Plat's collection of prose aphorisms, the Flowers of Philosophy (1572), along with another series of verse epistles and a fictional will, in which Whitney bequeaths parts of the city of London to its inhabitants. While she follows Plat quite closely, her revision of his aphorisms includes a reordering of them that appears to make a plea for her reinstatement into service to her lady after losing her position through another servant's slander.[5]

The poems in A Pleasant Nosegay also participate in contemporary debates around economics and gender, combining as they do the problems of masterlessness and femininity through their unemployed female narrator. Over the course of the sixteenth century, the rate of enclosure of common lands for the purpose of sheep farming and engrossing—in other words, for the amalgamation of adjacent farms—was on the increase. The result was an exponential growth in urban populations, especially in London, as the dispossessed sought new employment. In addition, soldiers returning maimed from Continental wars found themselves adrift when their services were no longer required. The consequences were an increase, real or perceived, in rates of crime and civil disorder, intense pressure on largely informal systems of poor relief, and dangerously overcrowded living conditions in the cities.[6] Elizabethan authorities enacted legislation directed at "rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars" that was intended to restore order by restricting movement, balancing urban and rural populations, and effectively criminalizing unemployment. In 1572, a new and more stringent

---

1 See R.J. Fehrenbach, "Isabella Whitney, Sir Hugh Plat, Geoffrey Whitney, and 'Sister Eldershae,'" English Language Notes 21 (1983): pp. 7-11, and Betty Travitsky, "Isabella Whitney," DLB 136, p. 341.

2 Fehrenbach, "Isabella Whitney," pp. 9-11.

3 R.J. Fehrenbach, "Isabella Whitney and the Popular Miscellanies of Richard Jones," Cahiers élisabéthains 19 (1981): pp. 85-87. For Tottel's Songs and Sonnets, see pp. 188-202.

4 P.A. Marquis, "Oppositional Ideologies of Gender in Isabella Whitney's Copy of a Letter," The Modern Language Review 90 (1995): p. 315.

5 L. Schleiner, Tudor and Stuart Women Writers (Indiana, 1994), pp. 4-7.

6 See P. Griffiths, Lost Londons: Change, Crime, and Control in the Capital City, 1550-1660 (Cambridge, 2008).

set of statutes for the relief of the poor was passed. These laws formalized support of the aged and dependent poor through local taxation, but increased penalties for vagrancy to include (on the third offence) hanging.[1] As a young woman, Whitney's speaker is doubly endangered because of the threat to her virtue wrought by her lack of both physical and moral containment. In these ways she both embodies the spectre of the unchaste and wandering woman imagined by Richard Hyrde and other writers on female education and behaviour, and raises the very real possibility of prostitution as a means of survival. Indeed, the accusations cited by the speaker do criminalize her, at least morally, and she shows unusual freedom of movement as she traverses London in her "Will and Testament." The act of making a will serves to underline the speaker's unusual status, given that only a femme sole, a woman unattached to either father or husband, could own or bequeath property. The mock will simultaneously contrasts the centrality of economic activity in the city with the consequences of its failure by enumerating both the locations of a plethora of businesses and a system of prisons and workhouses to which the destitute were relegated. Even as Whitney highlights her speaker's marginality and dispossession, however, she is also careful to indicate her adherence to conservative gendered norms, insisting in the verse epistles to her sisters on her desire to be contained by service or marriage. Indeed, the speaker's sense of self-regulation is extended to control over other women as she becomes an arbiter of female behaviour through her description of appropriate actions for her younger sisters in service in "An Order Prescribed."

EDITION: A sweet nosgay, or pleasant posye, contayning a hundred and ten phylosophicall flowers &c. London: Richard Jones, 1573. STC 25440. "The Lamentation of a Gentlewoman" in Thomas Proctor, A gorgious gallery of gallant inventions. London: Richard Jones, 1578. STC 20402.

from A Sweet Nosegay, or Pleasant Posy: Containing a Hundred and Ten Philosophical Flowers &c.

To the Worshipful and Right Virtuous Young Gentleman, George Mainwaring[2] Esquire: Is. W. Wisheth Happy Health with Good Success in All His Godly Affairs.

When I (good Master Mainwaring) had made this simple nosegay, I was in mind to bestow the same on some dear friend, of which number I have good occasion to accompt[3] you chief. But weighing with myself, that although the flowers bound in the same were good yet so little of my labour was in them that they were not (as I wished they should) to be esteemed as recompense for the least number of benefits, which I have from time to time (even from our childhood) hitherto received of you. Yet lest by me you might be occasioned to say, as Antipater[4] said by Demades of Athens,[5] that he should never fill him with giving, I would to show myself satisfied, gratify your gifts, and also by the same, make a confession: that by deeds you have deserved benefits, which (as Diogenes[6] said) is more worth than the giving or unworthy receiving of many. But ceasing to seek by benefits (which to do is not allotted me) to acquit your courtesies, I come to present you like the poor man, which having no goods, came with his hands full of water to meet

1 R. Byrne, Prisons and Punishments of London (London, 1989), p. 64.

2 George Mainwaring friend of Whitney's brother, Geoffrey and member of a prominent Cheshire family.

3 accompt count, account.

4 Antipater (?397-319 BCE), general to both Philip II of Macedon and Alexander the Great, who imposed oligarchy on Athens after Alexander's death (OCD).

5 Demades of Athens (c. 380-318 BCE), corrupt politician who favoured Philip II, but fought for Athens and influenced Alexander and Antipater in Athens' favour. He was executed by Alexander (OCD).

6 Diogenes (c. 400-c. 325 BCE), Cynic philosopher who argued that happiness is attained by satisfying one's natural needs as simply and cheaply as possible. Needs must be then as few and simple as possible and their satisfaction as idiosyncratic as required (OCD).

the Persian Prince[1] withal, who respecting the good will of the man did not disdain his simple gift. Even so, I being willing to bestow some present on you, by the same thinking to make part of amends for the much that you have merited, to perform the duty of a friend, to express the good will that should rest in country folk, and not having of my own to discharge that I go about (like to that poor fellow which went into another's ground for his water), did step into another's garden for these flowers, which I beseech you (as Darius[2] did,) to accept, and though they be of another's growing, yet considering they be of my own gathering and making up, respect my labour and regard my good will, and not only receive them, but vouchsafe to be a protector of them from the spiteful, which (perhaps) will envy that I either presented you, or gathered them, before they had done one, or both, and so might spoil this nosegay, and not to let it come so happily unto your hands, as I wish it may. And though the garden of your godly mind be full fraught[3] with virtuous flowers, which I know in your infancy to take root, and which all may see now to flourish, with an undoubted hope of their yielding fruit hereafter, yet ordain[4] to smell to these, and when you come into a pestilent[5] air that might infect your sound mind yet savour to these slips[6] in which I trust you shall find safety. And if you take pleasure in them, I shall not only be occasioned to endeavour myself to make a further viage[7] for a more daintier thing (than flowers are) to present you withal, but also have good hope that you will accept this my labour for recompense of all that which you are recompensed for, as knoweth God, who I beseech give unto you a long and lucky life with increase of all your virtuous studies.

From Abchurch Lane, the
20. of October. 1573.
By your well willing countrywoman, Is. W.[8]

The Author to the Reader.

This harvest time, I harvestless, and serviceless[9] also,
And subject unto sickness, that abroad I could not go,
Had leisure good (though learning lacked) some study to apply
To read such books, whereby I thought myself to edify.[10]
Sometime the Scriptures I perused, but wanting a divine[11]
For to resolve me in such doubts, as past this head of mine
To understand, I laid them by
and histories 'gan read,
Wherein I found that follies erst[12]
in people did exceed,
The which I see doth not decrease in this our present time.
More pity it is we follow them
in every wicked crime.
I straight wart[13] weary of those books,
and many other more,
As Virgil, Ovid, Mantuan[14]
which many wonders bore.
And to refresh my mazèd muse,
and cheer my bruisèd brain,
And for to try if that my limbs

[1] Persian Prince possibly Xerxes, son of Darius (see below, note 2), who ruled 486-445 BCE (OCD).

[2] Darius ruler of Persia (521-485 BCE), who extended the bounds of Persia to the Caucasus mountains and attempted to conquer Greece (OCD).

[3] fraught laden.

[4] ordain plan, contrive.

[5] pestilent injurious, infectious.

[6] slips sprigs or shoots from plants, here also literally "slips" of paper.

[7] viage voyage, journey.

[8] Is. W. Isabella Whitney.

[9] serviceless without a position serving in a household.

[10] edify instruct.

[11] divine clergyman, priest.

[12] erst in earlier times.

[13] wart obsolete dialect form of "was."

[14] Virgil, Ovid, Mantuan Virgil's Aeneid, Ovid's Heroides, and Baptista Spagnolo Mantuanus's Latin eclogues written from the 1460s to 1498 (Spenser Encycl.).

had got their strength again
I walkèd out, but suddenly a friend of mine me met
And said, if you regard your health out of this lane you get.
And shift you to some better air,
for fear to be infect
With noisome[1] smell and savours[2] ill,
I wish you that respect
And have regard unto your health, or else perhaps you may
So make a die,[3] and then adieu, your woeful friends may say.
I thanked him for his carefulness,[4]
and this for answer gave:
I'll neither shun, nor seek for death,
yet oft the same I crave.
By reason of my luckless life,
believe me this is true.
In that (said he) you do amiss,
then bade he me adieu,
For he was hasting out of town,
and could no longer bide.
And I went home all sole alone,
good Fortune was my guide.
And though she ever hath denied to hoist me on her wheel,
Yet now she stood me in some stead, and made me pleasures feel.
For she to Plat his plot[5] me brought,
where fragrant flowers abound,
The smell whereof prevents each harm,
if yet yourself be sound.
Amongst those beds so bravely decked with every goodly flower
And banks and borders finely framed,
I me reposed one hour.
And longer would, but leisure lacked,
and business bade me hie[6]
And come again some other time to fill my gazing eye.
Though loath, yet at the last I went,
but ere[7] I parted thence
A slip I took to smell unto,
which might be my defence
In stinking streets or loathsome lanes which else might me infect.
And since that time, I each day once have viewed that brave prospect.[8]
And though the master of the same
I yet did never see,
It seems he is a gentleman,
and full of courtesy.
For none that with good zeal[9] doth come do anyone resist
And such as will with order get may gather whilst they list.[10]
Then pity were it to destroy what he with pain did plant.
The moderate here may be sufficed,
and he no whit shall want,
And for my part, I may be bold
to come when as I will,
Yea, and to choose of all his flowers,
which may my fancy fill.
And now I have a nosegay got that would be passing rare,
If that to sort the same aright
were lotted to my share.
But in a bundle as they be,
(good reader) them accept.
It is the giver, not the gift,
thou oughtest to respect.
And for thy health, not for thy eye,
did I this posy frame
Because myself did safety find by smelling to the same.
But as we are not all alike,
nor of complexion one,

[1] noisome noxious, offensive.
[2] savours odours, smells.
[3] make a die die.
[4] carefulness attentiveness, solicitude.
[5] Plat his plot Hugh Plat's Flowers of Philosophy (1572), which Whitney adapts here.
[6] hie hasten.
[7] ere before.
[8] prospect outlook, view.
[9] zeal intent, will.
[10] list wish, desire.

So that which helpeth some we see,
to others good doth none.
I do not say it did me help,
I no infection felt,
But sure I think they kept me free,
because to them I smelt,
And for because I like them well,
and good have found thereby,
I for good will do give them thee,
first taste and after try.
But if thy mind infected be,
then these will not prevail.
Sir Medicus[1] with stronger herbs
thy malady must quell,
For these be but to keep thee sound,
which if thou use them well (Pains of my life) in healthy state thy mind shall ever dwell.
Or if that thy complexion
with them do not agree,
Refer them to some friend of thine till thou their virtue see.
And this I pray thee, whether thou infected wast afore,
Or whether with thy nature strong
they can agree no more,
That thou my nosegay not misuse,
But leave it to the rest,
A number may such pleasure find,
to bear it in their breast.
And if thyself would gather more than I have herein bound,
My counsel is that thou repair[2]
to Master Plat his ground.
And gather there what I did not,
perhaps thyself may light
On those which for thee fitter are,
than them which I recite.
Which if thou do, then render thanks to him which sowed the soil.
If not, thou needs must him commend when as thou viewest his toil.

In any wise, be chary[3] that thou lettest in no swine,
No dog to scrape, nor beast that doth to raven[4] still incline.
For though he make no spare[5] of them to such as have good skill
To slip, to shear, or get in time,
and not his branches kill,
Yet bars he out such greedy guts
as come with spite to toot[6]
And without skill both herb and flower
pluck rashly by the root.
So wishing thee to find such flowers
as may thee comfort bring,
And eke that he which framed the plot
with virtues still may spring,
I thee commend to mighty Jove,[7]
and thus I thee assure
No nosegay will increase no pain,
though sickness none it cure.
Wherefore, if thou it hap to wear and feel thyself much worse,
Promote me for no sorceress,
nor do me ban or curse.
For this I say: the flowers are good which I on thee bestow,
As those which wear them to the stalks,
shall by the sequel know.
One word, and then adieu to thee,
if thou to Plat his plot
Repair take heed it is a maze, to warn thee I forgot.

FINIS. quod[8] Is. W.

[1] Medicus doctor.
[2] repair return, go back.
[3] chary careful, cautious.
[4] raven plunder, voracious devouring.
[5] spare economy, restraint.
[6] toot peep at, spy.
[7] Jove chief of the Roman gods.
[8] quod Latin, "said."

T.B. in Commendation of the Author

Marching among the woods of fine delight
Where as the laurel branch[1] doth bring increase
Seld,[2] of ladies fresh, a solemn sight
I viewed, whose walks betokened all their ease
And how in friendly wise it did them please.
While some did twist the silk of lively hue
Some others slipped the branch for praises due.

Nor musing did not rest, nor scorn my sight,
nor pressed in haste to break their silence I
But as at first, they held their whole delight and casting mirth, said friend that passest by,
did never wreaths of love thee bind perdy[3]
As thus, who framed her plot in garland wise
So orderly, as best she might devise.

Not yet (quoth I) but you might force the same,
whose face doth stain the colour red as rose.
No Virgil this, nor Ovid[4] eke may blame,
For beauty pressing as the conduit flows was cause that Paris[5] greatest love arose who loved before, though never touchèd so,
As Ovid shows, with many writers moe.[6]

But ladies sure, my love consists in this my whole delight, and pleasure all I take
To deck the wight, that worthy praises is,
and sure my great good will must never slack
From Whitney. Lo, herein some party take
For in her work is plainly to be seen,
why ladies place in garlands laurel green.

She flattering fate too much, nor skies, doth trust.
Such labour lieth finished with the life.
She never did accompt Dame Fortune just that tosseth us with toys and plunges rife,
But her defieth, as author of her strife.
She doth not write the brute or force in arms,
Nor pleasure takes to sing of other's harms,

But mustered[7] hath and wrapped in a pack
a heap of flowers of philosophy.
No branch of perfect wisdom doth lack,
But that the bruisèd mind refreshed may be,
And that it is no fable, you shall see,
For here at large the sequel will declare
To countryward her love and friendly care.

The smelling flowers of an arbour sweet,
An orchard picked presented is to thee,
And for her second work, she thought it meet,
since maids with lofty style may not agree,
In hope hereby, something to pleasure thee,
And when her busy care from head shall lurk,
She practice will and promise longer work.

Now happy dames, if good deserveth well her praise for flowers philosophical,
And let your branches twinèd that excel her head adorn, wherein she flourish shall,
And Berrie so rests always at your call.
The purple blue, the red, the white I have,
To wrap amid your garlands fresh and brave.

FINIS. Tho. Bir.

---

1 laurel branch emblem of victory, either military or literary.

2 Seld seldom.

3 perdy truly, assuredly.

4 Virgil … Ovid Virgil recounts the story of Paris and his role in the Trojan War in the Aeneid (Book 2) and Ovid in his Heroides (Book 1).

5 Paris son of Priam, king of Troy, who was to award a golden apple to the fairest woman in the world. Rather than choosing among the goddesses, Hera, Athena, and Aphrodite, he selected Helen and, in one version of the story, took her back to Troy with him, an act that caused the Trojan War.

6 moe more.

7 mustered collected, assembled.

A Sweet Nosegay, or Pleasant Posy: Containing a Hundred and Ten Philosophical Flowers, etc.

The 97

Ask nothing of thy neighbour that thou wouldst not let him have,
Nor say him nay of that which thou wouldst get if thou didst crave.[1]

The 98

If that thou minded are to give ask not if they will have it,
For so they either must deny or seem that they do crave it.

The 99

It glorious is to give all things to him that nought doth crave,
So likewise let him nothing get that everything would have.

The 100

Whilst that thou hast free liberty to do what likes thee best,
Thou soon mayest see into thyself
what disposition[2] rest.

The 101

That lawyer, which is chose to plead for rich and mighty men,
Must either let the truth go by or lose their friendship then.

The 102

A little gold in law will make thy matter better speed
Than if thou broughtest of love as much as might in kindreds breed.

The 103

Gold savours well, though it be got with occupations vile.
If thou hast gold, thou welcome art,
though virtue thou exile.

The 104

Such poor folk as to law do go
are driven oft to curse,
But in meanwhile, the lawyer thrusts
the money in his purse.

The 105

A hasty tongue, which runs at large
not knowing any measure,
It is a wicked thing that makes the mind repent at leisure.

The 106

Two eyes, two ears, and but one tongue
Dame Nature hath us framed
That we might see and hear much more than should with tongue be named.

The 107

Keep well thy tongue and keep thy friend;
ill used, it causeth foes.
In uttering things, commit to thee thou faithful friends dost lose.

---

[1] crave desire.

[2] disposition temperament, tendency.

The 108

Seek not each man to please, for that is more than God bids do.
Please thou the best and never care,
what wicked say thereto.

The 109

Of wicked men to be dispraised,
for praise do it accompt.
If they commend, then art thou mad,
so doth their credit mount.

The 110

Whenas the wicked are in midst
of all their jollity,
Misfortune standeth at the door and scorns the same to see.

FINIS.

A Sovereign Receipt.[1]

The juice of all these flowers take and make thee a conserve.[2]
And use it first and last and it will safely thee preserve.

By IS. W. GENT.

A Farewell to the Reader

Good reader, now you tasted have and smelt of all my flowers,
The which to get some pain I took
and travailed many hours.
I must request you spoil them not,
nor do in pieces tear them,
But if thyself do loathe the scent,
give others leave to wear them.
I shall no whit be discontent,
for nothing is so pure
But one or other will mislike, thereof we may be sure.
If he for whom I gathered them,
take pleasure in the same,
And that for my presumption,
my friends do not me blame,
And that the savour take effect
in such as I do know,
And bring no harm to any else
in place where it shall go,
And that when I am distant far it worn be for my sake
That some may say, God speed her well that did this nosegay make,
And eke[3] that he who ought[4] the plot,
wherein they same did grow
Fume not to see them borne about,
and wish he did me know,
And say in rage, were she a man that with my flowers doth brag,
She well should pay the price, I would not leave her worth a rag.
If as I say, no harms do hap,
but that this well may speed
My mind is fully satisfied,
I crave none the other meed.[5]
So wishing thee no worse than those,
of whom I think none ill
I made an end and thee commend the living Lord until.

FINIS. IS. W.

[1] Receipt recipe.

[2] conserve medicinal or confectionary preparation of some part of a plant (as the flowers, leaves, roots, fruit) preserved with sugar.

[3] eke also.

[4] ought possessed, owned.

[5] meed reward.

CERTAIN FAMILIAR EPISTLES AND FRIENDLY LETTERS BY THE AUTHOR, WITH REPLIES.

To Her Brother, G.W.[1]

Good brother when a vacant[2] time
doth cause you hence to ride,
And that the fertile fields do make you from the city bide,
Then cannot I once from you hear nor know I how to send
Or where to hearken of your health and all this would be kenned.[3]
And most of me, for why I least of Fortune's favour find.
No yielding year she me allows,
nor goods hath me assigned.
But still to friends I must appeal
(and next our parents dear).
You are, and must be chiefest staff that I shall stay[4] on here.
Wherefore,[5] mine own good brother, grant me when that you are here
To see you oft and also hence
I may have knowledge where
A messenger to hark unto,
that I to you may write
And eke of him your answers have which would my heart delight.
Receive of me, and eke accept,
a simple token here,
A smell of such a nosegay as
I do for present bear Unto a virtuous lady, which till death I honour will.
The loss I had of service hers,
I languish for it still.

Your loving (though luckless)
Sister, Is. W.

To Her Brother, B.W.

Good brother Brooke, I often look,
to hear of your return,
But none can tell if you be well,
nor where you do sojourn,
Which makes me fear that I shall hear your health appairèd[6] is
And oft I dread that you are dead or something goeth amiss.
Yet when I think you cannot shrink,[7]
but must with master be,
I have good hope, when you have scope,[8]
you will repair to me.
And so the fear and deep despair
that I of you then had,
I drive away, and wish that day
wherein we may be glad,
Glad for to see, but else for me
will be no joy at all,
For on my side no luck will bide,
nor happy chance befall.
As you shall know, for I will show you more when we do speak
Then[9] will I write, or yet recite, within this paper weak.
And so I end and you commend to him that guides the skies,
Who grant you health, and send you wealth,
no less than shall suffice.

Your loving sister. Is. W.

---

1 G.W. Geoffrey Whitney, writer of emblem books, which combine images and phrases and were highly popular in the later sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries.

2 vacant free from, unoccupied with, affairs, business, or customary work; leisure.

3 kenned known.

4 stay rest.

5 Wherefore for which.

6 appairèd injured, impaired.

7 shrink retreat, slip away.

8 scope opportunity, liberty.

9 Then than.

An Order Prescribed, by Is. W. to Two of Her Younger Sisters Serving in London

Good sisters mine, when I shall further from you dwell,
Peruse these lines, observe the rules,
which in the same I tell.
So shall you wealth possess
and quietness of mind,
And all your friends to see the same,
a treble[1] joy shall find.

1. In mornings when you rise, forget not to commend Yourselves to God, beseeching him from dangers to defend
Your souls and bodies both,
your parents and your friends,
Your teachers and your governors,
so pray you that your ends
May be in such a sort
as God may pleasèd be,
To live to die, to die to live with him eternally.

2. Then justly do such deeds as are to you assigned.
All wanton toys, good sisters, now exile out of your mind.
I hope you give no cause,
whereby I should suspect,
But this I know too many live
that would you soon infect.
If God do not prevent,
or with his grace expel,
I cannot speak or write too much because I love you well.

3. Your business soon dispatch, and listen to no lies,
Nor credit every feignèd tale that many will devise.
For words they are but wind,
yet words may hurt you so,
As you shall never brook[2] the same,
if that you have a foe.
God shield you from all such as would by word or bill[3]
Procure your shame, or never cease till they have wrought you ill.

4. See that you secrets seal;
tread trifles underground.
If to rehearsal oft you come,
it will your quiet wound.
Of laughter be not much,
nor over solemn seem,
For then be sure they'll compt[4] you light or proud will you esteem.
Be modest in a mean,[5]
be gentle unto all,
Though cause they give of contrary yet be to wrath no thrall.[6]
Refer you all to him
that sits above the skies.
Vengeance is his, he will revenge,
you need it not devise.

5. And sith[7] that virtue guides, where both of you do dwell,
Give thanks to God, and painful[8] be to please your rulers well.
For fleeting is a foe,
experience hath me taught.
The rolling stone doth get no moss, yourselves have heard full oft.
Your business being done
and this my scroll perused,
The day will end, and that the night
by you be not abused,

---

1 treble threefold.

2 brook bear, tolerate.

3 bill document, petition to person in authority.

4 compt account.

5 mean quality, disposition.

6 thrall slave, captive.

7 sith since.

8 painful careful, painstaking.

I something needs must write,
take pains to read the same.
Henceforth my life as well as pen shall your examples frame.[1]

6. Your masters gone to bed, your mistresses at rest,
Their daughters all who haste about to get themselves undressed,
See that their plate be safe and that no spoon do lack.
See doors and windows bolted fast for fear of any wrack.[2]
Then help if need there be,
to do some household thing,
If not to bed, referring you unto the heavenly King,
Forgetting not to pray
as I before you taught,
And giving thanks for all that he hath ever for you wrought.
Good sisters when you pray,
let me remembered be,
So will I you, and thus I cease,
till I yourselves do see.

IS. W.

To Her Sister Mistress A.B.

Because I to my brethren wrote,
and to my sisters two,
Good sister Anne, you this might wot,[3]
if so I should not do
To you or ere I parted hence,
You vainly had bestowed expense.

Yet is it not for that I write,
for nature did you bind
To do me good, and to requite hath nature me inclined.
Wherefore, good sister, take in gree,[4]
These simple lines that come from me.

Wherein I wish you Nestor's[5] days,
in happy health to rest
With such success in all assays,
as those which God hath blessed.
Your husband with your pretty boys,
God keep them free from all annoys.

And grant if that my luck it be to linger here so long Till they be men that I may see,
for learning them so strong
That they may march amongst the best
Of them which learning have possessed.

By that time will my agèd years
perhaps a staff require
And quakingly as still in fears,
my limbs draw to the fire.
Yet joy I shall them so to see
If any joy in age there be.

Good sister, so I you command to him that made us all.
I know you housewifery intend,
though I to writing fall.
Wherefore no longer shall you stay
From business that profit may.

Had I a husband or a house
and all that 'longs thereto,
Myself could frame about to rouse[6]
as other women do,
But till some household cares me tie
My books and pen I will apply.

Your loving Sister. IS. W.

---

[1] frame shape, compose.
[2] wrack disaster.
[3] wot know.
[4] gree goodwill.
[5] Nestor in the Iliad, a respected elder statesman and much older than the other Greek leaders in the Trojan War (OCD).
[6] Myself ... rouse I could adapt myself to stir about (i.e., to act).

A Careful Complaint by the Unfortunate Author

Good Dido,[1] stint thy tears and sorrows all resign
To me that born was to augment misfortune's luckless line,
Or bring still the same,
good Dido do thy best,
In helping to bewail the hap
that furthereth mine unrest.
For though thy Trojan mate,
that Lord Aeneas hight,[2]
Requiting ill thy steadfast love, from Carthage took his flight
And foully broke his oath,
and promise made before,
Whose falsehood finished thy delight before thy hairs were hoar.[3]
Yet greater cause of grief
compels me to complain,
For Fortune fell[4] converted hath
My health to heaps of pain.
And that she swears my death
too plain it is (alas),
Whose end let malice still attempt to bring the same to pass.
O Dido, thou hadst lived a happy woman still
If fickle fancy had not thrilled thy wits to retchless[5] will.
For as the man by whom thy deadly dolours bred
Without regard of plighted troth
from Carthage city fled,
So might thy cares in time
be banished out of thought.
His absence might well salve the sore that erst[6] his presence wrought.[7]
For fire no longer burns,
than faggots[8] feed the flame.
The want of things that breed annoy
may soon redress the same,
But I unhappy most
and gripped with endless griefs
Despair (alas) amid my hope and hope without relief.
And as the sweltering heat,
consumes the war away,
So do the heaps of deadly harms
still threaten my decay.
O death, delay not long thy duty to declare.
The sisters three[9] dispatch my days
and finish all my care.

Is. W.

An Answer to Comfort Her, by Showing His Haps to Be Harder.

Friend Is.,[10] be now content and let my sorrows quell
The extreme rage and care thou restest in,
For wailing sprites,[11] ne[12] furies fierce in Hell
Nor grisly[13] souls that still in woe have been,
Have ever felt like storms that I sustain,
Frownst so I am, and dulled in deep despair,
That sure (me thinks) my extreme raging pain
Might gain thee health and set thee free from fear.

---

1 Dido Queen of Carthage who fell in love with Aeneas and killed herself when he left the city to continue his journey.
2 hight was called.
3 hoar white.
4 fell cruel, ruthless.
5 retchless reckless.
6 erst first.
7 wrought created.
8 faggots bundles of twigs or sticks.
9 sisters three the three Fates, Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos, who supervise destiny (Dict. Gods and Mortals).
10 Is. Isabella.
11 sprites spirits.
12 ne nor.
13 grisly grim, ghastly.

For Dido, thou, and many thousands more,
Which living feel the pangs of extreme care,
Though tottered much and torn in pieces small,
Whomever gripping death doth never spare.
Nor he that falsely Carthage city fled,
So fraught with wiles nor ye such sorrows taste
By thousand parts as I who rightly said
Do pine as wax before the fire wastes.
I freeze to ice, I heat with parching sun,
And torn with teen,[1] thus languishing in pain,
Do feel my sorrows ever fresher run
To flowing cares, that endless sorrows gain.
For what, for whom, and why this evil works,
Friend Is. W., time, nor silence, may it show
But once ere many days, my care that lurks
Shall blown[2] be, and thou the same shalt know.
Till then with silly[3] Dido be content,
And rip no more thy wrongs in such excess.
Thy Fortune rather wills thee to lament
With speedy wit till hope may have redress.

FINIS. T.B.

A Reply to the Same.

The bitter force of Fortune's frowardness[4]
Is painted out by B.[5] his changèd hue.
Report bewrays[6] that tyrant's doubleness,
Which I by trial prove (alas) too true.
Constrained I am on thy mishaps to rue
As oft as I consider thine estate,
Which differs far from that thou wast of late.
Where be thy wonted lively looks become,
Or what mischance hath dimmed thy beauty so?
There is no God that deals such doubtful doom.
No Jupiter hath brought thee down so low.
Thy hapless fate hath wrought thy overthrow,
For as Saturnas[7] reaves[8] the Berry's joy,
So Fortune strives to further thine annoy.

O Fortune false, O thrice[9] unsteady joys,
Why doth not man mistrust thy subtle shows
Whose proffers[10] prove in time to be but toys,
As this the fruit that from your blossom grows,
Then may you rightly be compared with those Whose painted speech professeth friendship still,
But time bewrays the meaning to be ill.

For time that shows what erst I could not see
Hath brought about that I suspected least,
Complaining still on our simplicity
Who headlong runs, as doth that careless beast
Till hunter's snares have laid his limbs to rest.
For when we least mistrust and dread deceit
Then are we snared with unsuspected bait.

---

1 teen trouble, suffering.
2 blown inflated, swollen.
3 silly deserving of pity or sympathy.
4 frowardness perversity.
5 B. Berry.
6 bewrays reveals, exposes.
7 Jupiter … Saturnas In Renaissance astrology, planets were associated with bodily states and dispositions. Jupiter and Saturn are opposites, linked to hot and moist and cold and dry, respectively, which in turn make up sanguine and melancholic character types.
8 reaves steals.
9 thrice three times.
10 proffers offers, signs.

As lately unto thee it did befall,
Whose hap enforceth me to rue thy chance,
For thou that flourished erst at beauty's stall
Hath felt the force of froward Fortune's lance,
Compelled to furnish out misfortune's dance,
So here the surety that belongeth aye,
To mortal joys whereon the world doth stay.

But live in hope that better hap may light,
For after storms Sir Phoebus'[1] force is seen,
So when Saturnus hath declared his might
And Winter stints[2] to turn the world to teen,[3]
Then pleasant Ver[4] shall clothe the ground in green
And lusty May shall labour to restore,
The things that Winter's spit had spoiled before.

Then shall the Berry cleave her wonted hue,
And eke my B. that long hath wrested pain
When Fortune doth her former grace renew
Shall hoisted be to happy state again
In .....[5]
Delighting oft among his friends and kin,
To tell what danger erst his life was in.

Which happy sight of mortal creatures, who Shall more rejoice, than I thy friend to see
And while dame Fortune yielded not thereto,
But doth proceed to prove her spite on thee,
Yet shall thou not so ill belovèd be,
But that thy fame, forever flourish shall,
If Is. her pen, may promise ought at all.

Farewell.

[THE AUTHOR ... MAKETH HER WILL AND TESTAMENT]

The author (though loath to leave the city) upon her friend's procurement[6] is contained[7] to depart, wherefore she feigneth as she would die and maketh her will and testament, as followeth, with large legacies of such goods and riches which she most abundantly hath left behind her and thereof maketh London sole executor to see her legacies performed.

A Communication Which the Author Had to London, Before She Made Her Will.

The time is come I must depart,
from thee O famous city;
I never yet to rue my smart did find that thou hadst pity.
Wherefore small cause there is, that I should grieve from thee to go:
But many women foolishly,
like me and other mo
Do such a fixèd fancy set on those which least deserve,
That long it is ere wit we get,
away from them to swerve.[8]
But time with pity oft will tell to those that will her try
Whether it best be more to mell,[9] or utterly defy.
And now hath time me put in mind
of thy great cruelness,
That never once a help would find to ease me in distress.

---

1 Phoebus the sun god, i.e., the sun.
2 stints ceases.
3 teen distress, trouble.
4 Ver spring.
5 In ..... This line appears to have been omitted from the printed text.
6 procurement arrangement.
7 contained situated.
8 swerve turn, depart.
9 mell mix, associate.

Thou never yet wouldst credit give to board me for a year,
Nor with apparel me relieve except thou payèd were.
No, no, thou never didst me good,
nor ever wilt I know,
Yet am I in no angry mood,
but will, or ere I go,
In perfect love and charity
my testament here write,
And leave to thee such treasury,
as I in it recite.
Now stand aside and give me leave to write my latest will
And see that none you do deceive, of that I leave them till.

The Manner of Her Will, and What She Left to London, and to All Those in It, at Her Departing.

I whole in body, and in mind,
but very weak in purse,
Do make and write my testament for fear it will be worse.
And first I wholly do commend,
my soul and body eke,[1]
To God the Father and the Son,
so long as I can speak.
And after speech, my soul to him
and body to the grave,
Till time that all shall rise again,
their judgment for to have.
And then I hope they both shall meet.
to dwell for aye[2] in joy,
Whereas I trust to see my friends released from all annoy.
Thus have you heard touching my soul,
and body what I mean;
I trust you all will witness bear,
I have a steadfast brain.
And now let me dispose such things,
as I shall leave behind,
That those which shall receive the same,
may know my willing mind.
I first of all to London leave because I there was bred,
Brave buildings rare, of churches store,
and Paul's[3] to the head.
Between the same fair streets there be,
and people goodly store.
Because their keeping craveth[4] cost,
I yet will leave him more.
First for their food, I butchers leave,
that every day shall kill.
By Thames you shall have brewers store,
and bakers at your will.
And such as orders do observe,
and eat fish thrice a week,
I leave two streets, full fraught therewith,
they need not far to seek.
Watling Street, and Canwick Street,
I full of woolen leave
And linen store in Friday Street,
if they me not deceive.
And those which are of calling such that costlier they require,
I mercers[5] leave, with silk so rich,
as any would desire.
In Cheap of them they store shall find and likewise in that street
I goldsmiths leave, with jewels such as are for ladies meet.
And plate to furnish cupboards with,
full brave there shall you find,
With pearl[6] of silver and of gold,
to satisfy your mind.
With hoods, bongraces,[7] hats or caps,
such store are in that street,
As if on th' one side you should miss the t'other serves you feat.[8]

[1] eke also.
[2] aye ever.
[3] Paul's St. Paul's Cathedral.
[4] craveth demands, requires.
[5] mercers dealers in textiles, especially fine materials like silk and velvet.
[6] pearl round drop or globule.
[7] bongraces shade or curtain formerly worn on the front of women's bonnet or cap to protect the complexion from the sun; a sunshade.
[8] feat fittingly, suitably, properly.

For nets[1] of every kind of sort
I leave within the Pawn:[2]
French ruffs, high purls,[3] gorgets[4] and sleeves of any kind of lawn.
For purse or knives, for comb or glass,
or any needful knack[5]
I by the Stocks[6] have left a boy, will ask you what you lack.
I hose do leave in Birchin Lane,
of any kind of size:
For women stitched, for men both trunks and those of Gascoyne guise.[7]
Boots, shoes or pantables[8] good store,
Saint Martin's hath for you.
In Cornwall, there I leave you beds,
and all that 'longs[9] thereto.
For women shall you tailors have,
by Bow the chiefest dwell.
In every lane you some shall find can do indifferent well.
And for the men, few streets or lanes
but bodymakers[10] be
And such as make the sweeping cloaks, with guards[11] beneath the knee.
Artillery at the Temple Bar,
and dagges[12] at Tower Hill,
Swords and bucklers[13] of the best,
are nigh the Fleet until.
Now when thy folk are fed and clad with such as I have named,
For dainty mouths, and stomachs weak some junckets[14] must be framed.
Wherefore I 'pothecaries leave,
with banquets in their shop,
Physicians also for the sick,
diseases for to stop.
Some roisters[15] still must 'bide in thee
and such as cut it out,
That with the guiltless quarrel will,
to let their blood about.
For them I cunning surgeons leave,
some plasters to apply,
That ruffians may not still be hanged,
nor quiet persons die.
For salt, oatmeal, candles, soap,
or what you else do want:
In many places, shops are full,
I left you nothing scant.
If they that keep what I you leave,
ask money when they sell it,
At Mint,[16] there is such store, it is impossible to tell it.
At Steelyard store of wines there be,
your dulled minds to glad,
And handsome men, that must not wed except they leave their trade.
They oft shall seek for proper girls,
and some perhaps shall find (That need compels, or lucre[17] lures)
to satisfy their mind.
And near the same, I houses leave,
for people to repair
To bathe themselves, so to prevent infection of the air.
On Saturdays I wish that those,
which all the week do drug,[18]
Shall thither trudge, to trim them up on Sundays to look smug.
If any other thing be lacked in thee, I wish them look,

[1] nets hairnets.
[2] Pawn gallery or covered upper walk in the Royal Exchange, where fabrics were sold.
[3] purls lace edging braided with a series of small loops or twists.
[4] gorgets coverings for the neck and breast.
[5] knack trinket, trifle.
[6] Stocks market in the centre of the city.
[7] Gascoyne guise wide, bag-like trousers.
[8] pantables slippers.
[9] 'longs belongs.
[10] bodymakers bodicemakers.
[11] guards ornamental borders.
[12] dagges heavy pistols or handguns of this period.
[13] buckler shield.
[14] junckets a dish consisting of curds sweetened and flavoured, served with a layer of scalded cream on the top.
[15] roisters swaggering, riotous fellows.
[16] Mint located in the Tower of London.
[17] lucre profit.
[18] drug drudge.

For there it is; I little brought but nothing from thee took.
Now for the people in thee left,
I have done as I may,
And that the poor, when I am gone,
have cause for me to pray,
I will to prisons portions leave,
what though but very small;
Yet that they may remember me,
occasion be it shall.
And first the Counter[1] they shall have,
lest they should go to wrack,
Some coggers,[2] and some honest men,
that sergeants draw aback.
And such as friends will not them bail,
whose coin is very thin,
For them I leave a certain hole[3]
and little ease within.
The Newgate[4] once a month shall have a sessions[5] for his share,
Lest, being heaped,[6] infection might procure a further care.
And at those sessions some shall 'scape,
with burning near the thumb,[7]
And afterward to beg their fees,
till they have got the sum.
And such whose deeds deserveth death,
and twelve have found the same,
They shall be drawn up Holborn Hill,[8]
to come to further shame.

Well, yet to such I leave a nag[9]
shall soon their sorrows cease,
For he shall either break their necks or gallop from the press.[10]
The Fleet,[11] not in their circuit is,
yet if I give him naught,
It might procure his curse, ere I unto the ground be brought.
Wherefore I leave some papist old to under prop his roof[12]
And to the poor within the same,
a box[13] for their behoof.[14]
What makes you standersby to smile and laugh so in your sleeve?
I think it is, because that I to Ludgate[15] nothing give.
I am not now in case to lie;
here is no place of jest.
I did reserve that for myself,
if I my health possessed
And ever came in credit so a debtor for to be.
When days of payment did approach,
I thither meant to flee,
To shroud myself amongst the rest
that choose to die in debt,
Rather than any creditor,
should money from them get.
Yet 'cause I feel myself so weak that none me credit dare,
I here revoke and do it leave some bankrupts to his share.
To all the bookbinders by Paul's because I like their art,

---

1 Counter two jails primarily for debtors and minor offenders.

2 coggers cheats, deceivers.

3 hole worst cells in the Counter where those without money had to beg food from passers-by through the grate.

4 Newgate notably harsh jail that received more serious criminal offenders.

5 sessions sittings of magistrates.

6 heaped i.e., crammed with prisoners.

7 burning near the thumb Those accused of capital crimes could claim "benefit of clergy" if they could prove their literacy, typically by reading Psalm 51. The result would be the transference of the trial from the secular courts to the more lenient Church courts. In order to prevent felons from claiming benefit of clergy repeatedly, they were branded on the thumb after the first instance.

8 Holborn Hill The route to Tyburn, the site for executions, from Newgate was up Holborn Hill, and criminals sat backwards on the horse as they took that route (Byrne, Prisons and Punishments, p. 188).

9 nag small horse (i.e., used either to bring the prisoner to be hanged or as a means of escape).

10 press crowd.

11 Fleet prison reserved for those committed by the court of the Star Chamber.

12 papist old to under prop his roof Roman Catholics were subject to harsh fines for failing to attend services in the Church of England. These fines could result in considerable debts to the Crown, the result of which was incarceration in the Fleet prison.

13 box i.e., a poor box for donations.

14 behoof benefit, use.

15 Ludgate also a prison for debtors.

They every week shall money have,
when they from books depart.
Amongst them all, my printer[1] must have somewhat to his share.
I will my friends these books to buy
of him, with other ware.
For maidens poor, I widowers rich
do leave, that oft shall dote,
And by that means shall marry them,
to set the girls afloat.
And wealthy widows will I leave,
to help young gentlemen,
Which when you have in any case,
be courteous to them then
And see their plate and jewels eke may not be marred with rust.
Nor let their bags too long be full,
for fear that they do burst.
To every gate under the walls,
that compass thee about,
I fruitwives leave to entertain such as come in and out.
To Smithfield I must something leave my parents there did dwell,
So careless for to be of it,
none would accompt it well.
Wherefore it thrice a week shall have of horse and neat[2] good store,
And in his 'spital,[3] blind and lame
to dwell for evermore.
And Bedlam[4] must not be forgot,
for that was oft my walk.
I people there too many leave,
that out of tune do talk.
At Bridewell[5] there shall beadles[6] be,
and matrons that shall still See chalk well chopped, and spinning plied, and turning of the mill.
For such as cannot quiet be,
but strive for house or land,
At th'Inns of Court,[7] I lawyers leave to take their cause in hand.
And also leave I at each Inn
of Court or Chancery
Of gentlemen a youthful rout[8]
full of activity,
For whom I store of books have left,
at each bookbinder's stall,
And part of all that London hath to furnish them withal.
And when they are with study cloyed,
to recreate their mind,
Of tennis courts, of dancing schools,
and fence they store shall find.
And every Sunday at the least,
I leave to make them sport
In diverse places players, that of wonders shall report.
Now London have I (for thy sake) within thee, and without,
As comes into my memory,
dispersèd round about
Such needful things, as they should have here left now unto thee.
When I am gone, with conscience
let them dispersèd be.
And though I nothing namèd have
to bury me withal,
Consider that above the ground
annoyance be I shall,
And let me have a shrouding sheet
to cover me from shame,
And in oblivion bury me
and never more me name.
Ringings nor other ceremonies,
use you not for cost,
Nor at my burial, make no feast,
your money were but lost.

[1] my printer Richard Jones.
[2] neat oxen.
[3] 'spital hospital, in this case St. Bartholomew's.
[4] Bedlam St. Mary of Bethlehem hospital, by this time a lunatic asylum.
[5] Bridewell former royal palace given to the city of London as a workhouse for poor women and prison for female vagabonds, prostitutes, and the generally indigent (Byrne, pp. 63-66).
[6] beadles officers, guards.
[7] th'Inns of Court law schools.
[8] rout band, troop.

Rejoice in God that I am gone out of this vale so vile,
And that of each thing left such store,
as may your wants exile.
I make thee sole executor because
I loved thee best.
And thee I put in trust, to give the goods unto the rest.
Because thou shalt a helper need,
in this so great a charge,
I wish good Fortune be thy guide, lest thou shouldst run at large.
The happy days and quiet times,
they both her servants be,
Which well will serve to fetch and bring such things as need to thee.
Wherefore (good London) not refuse,
for helper her to take.
Thus being weak, and weary both an end here will I make.
To all that ask what end I made,
and how I went away,
Thou answer may'st like those which here,
no longer tarry may.
And unto all that wish me well,
or rue that I am gone,
Do me commend, and bid them cease
my absence for to moan.
And tell them further, if they would my presence still have had,
They should have sought to mend my luck,
which ever was too bad.
So fare thou well a thousand times,
God shield thee from thy foe
And still make thee victorious, of those that seek thy woe.
And (though I am persuade) that I shall never more thee see,
Yet to the last, I shall not cease to wish much good to thee.
This twenty of October, I,
in Anno Domini
A thousand five hundred seventy three,
as almanacs descry,[1]

Did write this will, with mine own hand and it to London gave,
In witness of the standersby,
whose names if you will have.
Paper, Pen, and Standish[2] were
at that same present by,
With Time, who promised to reveal,
so fast as she could hie,
The same, lest of my nearer kin,
for anything should vary.
So finally I make an end
no longer can I tarry.

FINIS. BY IS. W.

—1573

The Lamentation of a Gentlewoman upon the Death of Her Late Deceased Friend, William Gruffith,[3] Gentleman[4]

With poet's pen I do not press to write,
Minerva's[5] mate I do not boast to be,
Parnassus[6] mount (I speak it for no spite)
Can cure my cursed cares, I plainly see,
For why my heart contains as many woes
As ever Hector[7] did amongst his foes.

Each man doth moan when faithful friends be dead,
And paint them out as well as wits do serve.
But I, a maid, am forced to use my head
To wail my friend, whose faith did praise deserve.

[1] descry observe, note.

[2] Standish inkpot, inkstand.

[3] William Gruffith unidentified.

[4] Whitney's authorship of this poem is not certain. However, both Fehrenbach ("Isabella Whitney and the Popular Miscellanies of Richard Jones") and R. Martin ("Isabella Whitney's 'Lamentation upon the death of William Gruffith'") put forward evidence to support the view that it is by Whitney.

[5] Minerva Roman goddess of wisdom.

[6] Parnassus mountain sacred to the Muses.

[7] Hector Trojan hero who was killed by Achilles and dragged around the walls of the city seven times.

Wit wants to will; alas, no skill I have,
Yet must I needs deplore my Gruffith's grave.

For William white, for Gruffith green, I wore,
And red long since did serve to please my mind.
Now black, I wear, of me not used before,
In lieu of love, alas, this loss I find.
Now must I leave both white and green and red,
And wail my friend who is but lately dead.

Yet hurtful eyes do bid me cast away
In open show this careful[1] black attire
Because it would my secret love bewray[2]
And pay my pate[3] with hatred for my hire.
Though outwardly I dare not wear the same,
Yet in my heart a web of black I frame.

You ladies all, that pass not for no pain,
But have your lovers lodged in your laps,
I crave your aids to help me mourn amain.[4]
Perhaps yourselves shall feel such careful claps,
Which God forbid that any lady taste,
Who shall by me but only learn to waste.

My wits be weak an epitaph to write,
Because it doth require a graver style;
My phrase doth serve but rudely to recite
How lover's loss doth pinch me all this while,
Who was as pressed to die for Gruffith's sake,
As Damon did for Pythias[5] undertake.

But William had a worldly friend in store,
Who writ his end to small effect, God knows,
But "I" and "H"[6] his name did show no more,
Rhyme rough it is (the common sentence goes);
It hangs at Paul's as every man goes by,
One rhyme too low, another ramps[7] too high.

He praised him out as worldly friends do use,
And uttered all the skill that God had sent.
But I am she that never will refuse,
But as I am, so will I still be bent.
No blasts shall blow my linked love awry,
O would the gods, with Gruffith I might die!

Then had it been that I, poor silly dame,
Had had no need to blot this scratched scroll,
Then virgin's fist had not set forth the same,
How God hath gripped my Gruffith's sacred soul.
But woe is me, I live in pinching pain,
No wight doth know what sorrows I sustain.

Unhappy may that drowsy day be named
Wherein I first possessed my vital breath,
And eke I wish that day that I was framed,
Instead of life I had received death.
Then with these woes I needed not to waste,
Which now, alas, in every vein I taste.

Some Zoilus sot[8] will think it lightly done
Because I moan my mate and lover so,
Some Momus[9] match this scroll will overrun,
But love is lawless, every wight doth know.
Sith love doth lend me such a friendly scope,
Disdainful dogs I may despise, I hope.

---

1 careful mournful, sorrowful.

2 bewray reveal, expose.

3 pay my pate i.e., bring down on my head.

4 amain violently, with full force.

5 Damon … Pythias pair whose friendship was legendary. When Damon was sentenced to death, Pythias offered himself in his friend's place so that Damon could go and put his affairs in order. Damon returned on time and the Emperor Dionysius was so impressed by the pair's devotion that he freed him. Whitney switches the names here.

6 "I" and "H" the initials of another writer.

7 ramps climbs.

8 Zoilus sot critical dolt.

9 Momus god of ridicule, hence a fault-finder, a captious critic.

Wherefore I do attempt so much the more
By this good hope to show my slender art,
And mourn I must (who, never marked before),
What fretting force do hold each heavy heart,
But now I see that Gruffith's greedy grave
Doth make me feel the fits which lovers have.

My mournful Muse, good ladies, take in worth,
And spare to speak the worse, but judge the best,
For this is all that I dare publish forth.
The rest recorded is within my breast,
And there is lodged forever to remain,
Till God doth grant, by death, to ease my pain.

And when that death is come to pay her due,
With all the pains that she can well invent,
Yet to my Gruffith will I still be true,
Hap death, hold life, my mind is fully bent.
Before I will our secret love disclose,
To Tantal's pains[1] my body I dispose.

So live I shall, when death hath spit her spite,
And Lady Fame will spread my praise, I know,
And Cupid's knights will never cease to write
And cause my name through Europe for to flow,
And they that know what Cupid can prevail,
Will bless the ship that floats with such a sail.

If I had part of Pallas'[2] learned skill,
Or if Calliope[3] would lend her aid,
By tract of time, great volumes I would fill,
My Gruffith's praise in wailing verse to spread.
But I, poor I, as I have said before,
Do wail to want Minerva's learned lore.

By help, I hope, these ragged rhymes shall go,
Entitled as lovers' lines should be,
And 'scape the chiding chaps of every foe,
To praise that man who was best liked of me.
Though death hath shaped his most untimely end,
Yet for his praise my tristive[4] tunes I send.

In hope the gods, who guide the heav'ns above,
His buried corpse alive again will make,
And have remorse of lady's linked love,
As once they did for good Admetus'[5] sake,
Or change him else into some flower to wear,
As erst they did transform Narcissus fair.

So should I then possess my former friend,
Restored to life, as Alcest[6] was from Hell,
Or else the gods some fragrant flower would send,
Which for his sake, I might both wear and smell.
Which flower out of my hand shall never pass,
But in my heart shall have a sticking place.

But woe is me, my wishes are in vain.
Adieu delight, come crooked cursed care!
To bluntish blocks I see I do complain,
And reap but only sorrow for my share,
For well I know that gods nor sprites can cure
The pains that I for Gruffith do endure.

---

[1] Tantal's pains Tantalus, king of Phrygia, was condemned, for revealing the secrets of the gods, to stand up to his chin in water, which constantly receded as he stooped to drink, and with branches of fruit hanging above him which continually eluded his grasp (OCD).

[2] Pallas Athena, goddess of wisdom.

[3] Calliope Muse of epic poetry.

[4] tristive sad, doleful, mournful.

[5] Admetus lover of Alcestis, whose father decreed an impossible task, yoking a lion and a boar to a chariot, in order to win her hand. Admetus achieved it with the help of Apollo (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

[6] Alcest Alcestis showed her love for her husband by offering herself to die in his place. In recognition of her devotion, Persephone returned her from the underworld (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

Since wailing no way can remedy me,
To make an end I therefore judge it best,
And drink up all my sorrow secretly,
And as I can, I will abide the rest.
And sith I dare not mourn to open show,
With secret sighs and tears my heart shall flow.

Some busy brain perhaps will ask my name,
Disposed much some tidings for to mark.
That dare I not, for fear of flying fame,
And eke I fear lest biting bugs will bark.
Therefore farewell, and ask no more of me,
For as I am, a lover will I die.

—1578

Elizabeth I, queen of England
1533-1603

Elizabeth Tudor, born 7 September 1533, was the daughter of Henry VIII and his second wife, Anne Boleyn. Her childhood was marked by her father's changing marital status. Her own position in the royal hierarchy received a blow with the execution of her mother on charges of adultery and treason in May 1536. She was declared a bastard with the birth of her brother Edward; when Edward succeeded to the throne at Henry's death in 1547, Elizabeth was again permitted to appear at Court, with the support of her step-mother, Katherine Parr. When her sister Mary became queen in 1553, Elizabeth became a focal point for Protestant rebellion, and was imprisoned in Woodstock on suspicion of involvement in the plots of Sir Thomas Wyatt, the younger (son of the poet, Sir Thomas Wyatt) in January 1554. On Mary's death, the 25-year-old Queen Elizabeth began her 45-year reign. One of Elizabeth's strengths was the humanist education she had received, which included a study of Latin, Greek, French, Italian, and rhetoric; one of her tutors was the renowned humanist Roger Ascham, whose instruction reveals itself in Elizabeth's many translations and her mastery of English rhetoric. This intellectual ability served Elizabeth well during her reign, and influences her complex, multilayered, and often purposefully ambiguous writing, whether in speeches or poetry. Elizabeth was not only an author herself—her "Doubt of Future Foes" was highly praised in George Puttenham's Art of English Poesy (1589) as the "last and principal figure of our poetical ornament"—but she also shaped the writings of many of the poets and playwrights of her reign. Also known as the "Virgin Queen," Elizabeth led England when many felt women had no place in public life, and she did so to a considerable degree through her ability to manipulate language.

EDITION: Elizabeth I: Collected Works. Ed. Leah S. Marcus, Janel Mueller, and Mary Beth Rose. Chicago: U of Chicago P, 2000.

Letter

To our Most Noble and Virtuous Queen Katherine, Elizabeth her humble daughter wishes perpetual felicity and everlasting joy.[1]

Not only knowing the affectuous[2] will and fervent zeal the which your Highness hath towards all godly learning, as also my duty towards you (most gracious and sovereign Princess), but knowing also that pusillanimity[3] and idleness are most repugnant unto a reasonable creature and that (as the Philosopher[4] saith) even as an instrument of iron or of other metal waxeth soon rusty unless it be continually occupied,[5] even so shall the wit of a man or woman wax dull and unapt to do or understand anything perfectly unless it be always occupied upon some manner of study, which things considered hath moved so small a portion as God hath lent me to prove what I could do. And therefore have I (as for assay[6] or beginning, following the right notable saying of the proverb aforesaid) translated this little book out of French rhyme into English prose, joining the sentences together as well as the capacity of my simple wit and small learning could extend themselves. The which book is entitled, or named, The Mirror or Glass of the Sinful Soul, wherein is contained how she[7] (beholding and contempling[8] what she is) doth perceive how of herself and of her own

[1] This is the prefatory letter to Elizabeth's English translation of Marguerite of Navarre's L'Âme Pécheresse, given as a New Year's gift to Katherine Parr, Henry VIII's last wife.

[2] affectuous both earnest in feeling and affectionate.

[3] pusillanimity a lack of courage and strength of mind.

[4] the Philosopher Aristotle, but the thought is proverbial.

[5] occupied used.

[6] assay attempt.

[7] she Marguerite of Navarre.

[8] contempling contemplating.

strength she can do nothing that good is, or prevaileth for her salvation, unless it be through the grace of God, whose mother, daughter, sister, and wife by the Scriptures she proveth herself to be. Trusting also that through his incomprehensible love, grace, and mercy she (being called from sin to repentance) doth faithfully hope to be saved. And although I know that as for my part which I have wrought in it (as well spiritual as manual) there is nothing done as it should be, nor else worthy to come in your Grace's hands, but rather all unperfect and uncorrect, yet do I trust also that howbeit it is like a work which is but new begun and shaped, that the file of your excellent wit and godly learning in the reading of it (if so it vouchsafe your Highness to do) shall rub out, polish, and mend (or else cause to mend) the words (or rather the order of my writing), the which I know in many places to be rude, and nothing done as it should be. But I hope that after to have been in your Grace's hands there shall be nothing in it worthy of reprehension and that in the meanwhile no other (but your Highness only) shall read it or see it, lest my faults be known of many. Then shall they be better excused (as my confidence is in your Grace's accustomed benevolence) than if I should bestow a whole year in writing or inventing ways for to excuse them. Praying God almighty, the maker and creator of all things, to grant unto your Highness this same New Year's day a lucky and prosperous year with prosperous issue and continuance of many years in good health and continual joy and all to his honour, praise, and glory. From Ashridge, the last day of the year of our Lord God, 1544.

—31 December 1544

Verse

Written on a Window Frame at Woodstock[1]

O Fortune, thy wresting,[2] wavering state
Hath fraught with cares my troubled wit,
Whose witness this present prison late
Could bear, where once was joy flown quite.[3]
Thou causedst the guilty to be loosed
From lands where innocents were enclosed,
And caused the guiltless to be reserved,
And freed those that death had well deserved.
But all herein can be naught wrought,
So God grant to my foes as they have thought.[4]

—composed, c. 1554-55

Written in Her French Psalter[5]

No crooked leg, no bleared eye,
No part deformed out of kind,
Nor yet so ugly half can be
As is the inward suspicious mind.

—composed, 1565?

---

[1] Window This poem is variously noted as being written on a wall, a shutter, and a window frame. Writing poetry or proverbs on these surfaces was not uncommon in the period; Woodstock Elizabeth, under suspicion for involvement in Sir Thomas Wyatt, the younger's plots against Mary, was placed under house arrest at Woodstock.

[2] wresting struggling, twisting.

[3] joy flown quite In other editions, this reads "joy's loan quit."

[4] So God ... thought In other editions, this line reads "so God send to my foes all they have taught."

[5] This poem is inscribed on the last leaf of Elizabeth's French psalter; Psalter a translation or version of the Book of Psalms. Though it has been dated as early as 1554, in Elizabeth I: Collected Works, the editors date this poem around 1565, potentially a record of Elizabeth's offense at the earl of Leicester; however, the poem is inscribed "Your loving mistress, Elizabeth R." The original does not break the lines at the rhymes.

The Doubt of Future Foes[1]

The doubt of future foes
Exiles my present joy
And wit me warns to shun such snares
As threaten mine annoy.

For falsehood now doth flow
And subjects' faith doth ebb,
Which should not be if reason ruled
Or wisdom weaved the web.

But clouds of joys[2] untried
Do cloak aspiring minds
Which turns to rain[3] of late repent
By changèd course of winds.

The top of hope supposed
The root upreared[4] shall be,
And fruitless all their grafted guile,
As shortly you shall see.

Their dazzled eyes with pride,
Which great ambition blinds,
Shall be unsealed by worthy wights[5]
Whose foresight falsehood finds.

The daughter of debate[6]
That discord aye doth sow
Shall reap no gain where former rule
Still peace hath taught to know.

No foreign banished wight
Shall anchor in this port;
Our realm brooks not seditious sects—[7]
Let them elsewhere resort.

My rusty sword through rest[8]
Shall first his edge employ
To poll[9] their tops who seek such change
Or gape for future joy.

—composed, c. 1568-71/87?

On Monsieur's Departure[10]

I grieve, and dare not show my discontent;
I love, and yet am forced to seem to hate;
I do, yet dare not say I ever meant,
I seem stark mute, but inwardly do prate.
    I am and not; I freeze and yet am burned,
    Since from myself another self[11] I turned.

My care is like my shadow in the sun—
Follows me flying, flies when I pursue it,
Stands and lies by me, doth what I have done;
His too familiar care doth make me rue[12] it.
    No means I find to rid him from my breast,
    Till by the end of things it be suppressed.

Some gentler passion slide into my mind,
For I am soft, and made of melting snow;
Or be more cruel, Love, and so be kind.
Let me or float or[13] sink, be high or low,
    Or let me live with some more sweet content,
    Or die, and so forget what love e'er meant.

—composed, c. 1582

---

[1] This poem was written in response to the threat of Mary, queen of Scots, who had a legitimate claim to the throne of England, and who became the focal point of Catholic protests against Elizabeth. This was probably written shortly after Mary's flight from Scotland to England in 1568, as it appeared in commonplace books early in the 1570s, though the poem has also been understood as a response to Mary's execution in 1587; Doubt dread or fear.

[2] joys Other editions read "toys" (trifles).

[3] rain Other editions read "rage," though "rain" continues the metaphor of the clouds and repentant tears.

[4] upreared Other editions read "of rue" (sorrow, distress).

[5] wights people.

[6] The daughter of debate Mary, queen of Scots.

[7] Our realm brooks not seditious sects Other editions read "Our realm it brooks not stranger's force"; brooks tolerates.

[8] rusty sword through rest i.e., the sword is rusty because unused.

[9] poll crop or cut.

[10] This poem was written in response to the final departure of Elizabeth's French suitor, François, duke d'Alençon, in 1582.

[11] another self Other editions read "my other self."

[12] rue regret.

[13] or ... or either ... or.

When I Was Fair and Young[1]

When I was fair and young, and favour graced me,
Of many was I sought their mistress for to be.
But I did scorn them all and answered them therefore,
"Go, go, go, seek some other where,
Importune me no more."

How many weeping eyes I made to pine with woe,
How many sighing hearts I have no skill to show,
But I the prouder grew, and answered them therefore,
"Go, go, go, seek some other where,
Importune me no more."

Then spake fair Venus' son,[2] that proud victorious boy,
And said: "Fine dame, since that you be so coy,
I will so pluck your plumes that you shall say no more
"Go, go, go, seek some other where,
Importune me no more."

When he had spoke these words, such change grew in my breast
That neither night nor day since that, I could take any rest.
Then lo, I did repent that I had said before,
"Go, go, go, seek some other where,
Importune me no more."

—composed, c. 1580s

[1] The date of this poem is uncertain, and some editors have doubted its authenticity.

[2] Venus' son Cupid.

Selected Speeches

To the Troops at Tilbury[3]

My loving people, I have been persuaded by some that are careful of my safety to take heed how I commit myself to armed multitudes, for fear of treachery. But I tell you that I would not desire to live to distrust my faithful and loving people. Let tyrants fear. I have so behaved myself that under God I have placed my chiefest strength and safeguard in the loyal hearts and goodwill of my subjects. Wherefore I am come among you at this time but for my recreation and pleasure, being resolved in the midst and heat of the battle, to live or die amongst you all, to lay down for my God and for my kingdom and for my people mine honour and my blood even in the dust. I know I have the body but of a weak and feeble woman, but I have the heart and stomach of a king, and of a king of England too, and take foul scorn that Parma[4] or any prince of Europe should dare to invade the borders of my realm. To the which rather than any dishonour shall grow by me, I myself will venter my royal blood;[5] I myself will be your general, judge, and rewarder of your virtue in the field. I know that already for your forwardness you have deserved rewards and crowns, and I assure you in the word of a prince, you shall not fail of them. In the meantime, my lieutenant-general[6] shall be in my stead, than whom never prince commanded a more noble or worthy subject. Not doubting but by your concord in the camp and valour in the field and your obedience to myself and my general, we

[3] Although at this point in the fighting the Spanish Armada had been dissipated, there were fears they would regroup, and as preparations continued at Tilbury, one observer noted that Elizabeth "rode through all the squadrons of her army as armed Pallas attended by noble footmen" and gave this speech.

[4] Parma The Duke of Parma was regent of the Spanish Netherlands at the time.

[5] A different version reads, "I myself will take up arms."

[6] lieutenant-general Robert Dudley, the earl of Leicester, and Elizabeth's favourite, who would die a few months later.

shall shortly have a famous victory over these enemies of my God and of my kingdom.

—delivered, 1588

The Golden Speech[1]

Mr. Speaker,[2] we have heard your declaration and perceive your care of our estate by falling into the consideration of a grateful acknowledgement of such benefits as you have received, and that your coming is to present thanks unto us, which I accept with no less joy than your loves can have desire to offer such a present. I do assure you there is no prince that loveth his subjects better, or whose love can countervail[3] our love. There is no jewel, be it of never so rich a price, which I prefer before this jewel—I mean your loves. For I do more esteem it than any treasure or riches: for that we know how to prize, but love and thanks I count invaluable. And though God hath raised me high, yet this I count the glory of my crown: that I have reigned with your loves. This makes me that I do not so much rejoice that God hath made me to be a queen, as to be a queen over so thankful a people. Therefore I have cause to wish nothing more than to content the subjects, and that is a duty which I owe. Neither do I desire to live longer days than that I may see your prosperity, and that is my only desire. And as I am that person which still yet under God hath delivered you, so I trust by the almighty power of God that I shall be his instrument to preserve you from envy, peril, dishonour, shame, tyranny, and oppression, partly by means of your intended helps, which we take very acceptably, because it manifesteth the largeness of your loves and loyalties unto your sovereign.

Of myself I must say this: I never was any greedy, scraping grasper, nor a strait,[4] fast-holding prince, nor yet a waster. My heart was never set on worldly goods, but only for my subjects' good. What you do bestow on me I will not hoard up, but receive it to bestow on you again. Yea, mine own properties I account yours to be expended for your good and your eyes shall see the bestowing of all for your good. Therefore render unto them from me, I beseech you, Mr. Speaker, such thanks as you imagine my heart yieldeth, but my tongue cannot express.

Mr. Speaker, I would wish you and the rest to stand up, for I shall yet trouble you with longer speech.[5]

Mr. Speaker, you give me thanks, but I doubt me[6] that I have more cause to thank you all than you me; and I charge you to thank them of the Lower House[7] from me, for had I not received a knowledge from you, I might have fallen into the lapse of an error only for lack of true information. Since I was queen, yet did I never put my pen to any grant but that upon pretext and semblance made unto me it was both good and beneficial to the subjects in general, though a private profit to some of my ancient servants who had deserved well. But the contrary being found by experience, I am exceedingly beholding to such subjects as would move the same at the first. And I am not so simple to suppose but that there be some of the Lower House whom these grievances never touched, and for them I think they speak out of zeal to their countries[8] and not out of spleen or malevolent affection, as being parties grieved. And I take it exceedingly grateful from them, because it gives us to know that no respects or interests had moved them other than the minds they bear to suffer no diminution of our honour and our subjects' love unto us, the zeal of which affection,

---

[1] There are several versions of this speech; this one is based on a transcription by one of the members of Parliament, Hayward Townshend. This Parliamentary speech was Elizabeth's most celebrated, and in it she states her recognition of the people's right—and even duty—to raise grievances over royal policies. Here, Elizabeth addresses grievances raised over monopolies, which, because they favoured certain individuals, were often economically detrimental to many.

[2] Mr. Speaker The speaker of the House at the time was Sir John Croke (1553-1620).

[3] countervail equal.

[4] strait severe, strict.

[5] Townshend's transcription here indicates that all listeners have been kneeling so far.

[6] doubt me do not doubt.

[7] Lower House House of Commons.

[8] countries counties.

tending to ease my people and knit their hearts unto me, I embrace with a princely care.

For above all earthly treasures I esteem my people's love, more than which I desire not to merit. That my grants should be grievous unto my people and oppressions to be privileged under colour of our patents, our kingly dignity shall not suffer it. Yea, when I heard it, I could give no rest unto my thoughts until I had reformed it. Shall they (think you) escape unpunished that have thus oppressed you and have been respectless of their duty and regardless of our honour? No, no, Mr. Speaker, I assure you, were it not more for conscience's sake than for any glory or increase of love that I desire, these errors, troubles, vexations, and oppressions done by these varlets[1] and low persons (not worthy the name of subjects) should not escape without condign[2] punishment. But I perceive they dealt with me like physicians who, ministering a drug, make it more acceptable by giving it a good aromatical savour; or, when they give pills, do gild[3] them all over.

I have ever used to set the Last Judgement Day before my eyes and so to rule as I shall be judged, to answer before a higher judge. To whose judgement seat I do appeal that never thought was cherished in my heart that tended not unto my people's good. And now if my kingly bounties have been abused and my grants turned to the hurts of my people, contrary to my will and meaning, or if any in authority under me have neglected or perverted what I have committed to them, I hope God will not lay their culps[4] and offenses to my charge. Who, though there were danger in repealing our grants, yet what danger would I not rather incur for your good than I would suffer them still to continue? I know the title of a king is a glorious title, but assure yourself that the shining glory of princely authority hath not so dazzled the eyes of our understanding but that we well know and remember that we also are to yield an account of our actions before the great judge.

To be a king and wear a crown is a thing more glorious to them that see it than it is pleasant to them that bear it. For myself, I was never so much enticed with the glorious name of a king or royal authority of a queen as delighted that God hath made me his instrument to maintain his truth and glory, and to defend this kingdom, as I said, from peril, dishonour, tyranny, and oppression. There will never queen sit in my seat with more zeal to my country, care to my subjects, and that will sooner with willingness venture her life for your good and safety, than myself. For it is not my desire to live nor reign longer than my life and reign shall be for your good. And though you have had and may have many princes more mighty and wise sitting in this seat, yet you never had or shall have any that will be more careful and loving. Shall I ascribe anything to myself and my sexly weakness? I were not worthy to live then, and of all most unworthy of the mercies I have had from God, who hath ever yet given me a heart which never yet feared any foreign or home enemy. I speak it to give God the praise as a testimony before you, and not to attribute anything unto myself. For I, O Lord, what am I, whom practices and perils past should not fear? Or what can I do that I should speak for any glory? God forbid.

This, Mr. Speaker, I pray you deliver unto the House, to whom heartily recommend me, and so I commit you all to your best fortunes and further counsels. And I pray you, Mr. Comptroller,[5] Mr. Secretary, and you of my Council, that before these gentlemen depart into their countries, you bring them all to kiss my hand.

—delivered, 30 November 1601

---

[1] varlets knaves, rogues.

[2] condign appropriate, deserved.

[3] gild cover with gold, "sugar-coat."

[4] culps guilt, sins.

[5] Mr. Comptroller variant spelling of "Controller"; a title of office, a steward.

John Dee
1527-1609

Scientist, astrologer, mathematician, technologist, natural philosopher, and converser with angels, John Dee remains one of Renaissance England's most fascinating and controversial figures. Born into a London gentry family of Welsh origin in 1527, Dee entered St John's College (Cambridge) in 1542, graduating with his MA in 1548. After travels in Europe—his public lectures on Euclid in Paris were especially well-received—Dee returned to England. During a period of intense study, Dee undertook considerable amounts of writing, amassed the most impressive library and laboratory of his day, and attempted to gain both position and patronage at Elizabeth's court. While he served Elizabeth I in the capacity of astrologer, mathematician, and emissary, his hopes for preferment were often frustrated, and his advice—over such diverse matters as the revision of the Julian calendar and the need for a British navy to safeguard England and its imperial possessions—was often disregarded. In the early 1580s, Dee began to experiment with a more direct method of discovering the secrets of the universe. His transcriptions of his conversations with angels—through a number of mediums, but in particular Edward Kelly—remained in manuscript until long after Dee's death.

From 1581 to 1586, Dee and Kelly worked together, and in 1583 they (along with their families) went on a prolonged European tour at the invitation of Albertus Alasco (Albrecht Laski), palatine of Sieradz in Poland. Disappointed in his hopes for patronage from King Stephen of Poland and Holy Roman Emperor Rudolf II, Dee returned to England in 1589, his always-fraught relationship with Kelly having finally ended. During Dee's absence, his house at Mortlake had been broken into, apparently by two disgruntled former associates. Many of Dee's books and scientific instruments had been stolen or damaged, although he later managed to retrieve some of the books. Dee did not regain his status at court after the death of Elizabeth in 1603. His reputation as a magician and sorcerer continued to dog him until his death, in poverty, in March 1609.

Although his first marriage was childless, his second (to Jane Fromond[s], d. 1605) produced eight children, although only two were to outlive him.

Meric Casaubon's edited version of Dee's manuscript account of his angelic conversations, A True and Faithful Relation of What Passed for Many Years between Dr. John Dee ... and Some Spirits (London, 1659), is coloured by the conviction that Kelly and Dee were conversing not with angels but with devils, and this implication blackened Dee's character for hundreds of years. More recently, he has struggled to emerge from the more general taint of being a 'spirit converser,' a representation that has long overshadowed Dee's real contributions to science, mathematics, and educational theory. The challenge for scholars, however, remains how to treat Dee's angelic conversations in terms of his other intellectual and scientific works. As Deborah Harkness notes, the angel diaries remain "one of the early modern period's most enduring intellectual mysteries: why would a Cambridge graduate who boasted the title 'Queen's philosopher' engage in such a seemingly fruitless, apparently groundless, and enormously time-consuming activity?"[1] Scholars such as Frances Yates, Christopher Whitby, William Sherman, Peter French, Deborah Harkness and Nicholas Clulee have all offered re-evaluations of Dee's contributions to science and natural philosophy, suggesting that Dee is very much a part of his sixteenth-century intellectual milieu, and that his angelic conversations are by no means as eccentric and unprecedented as they may at first appear. Yates sees Dee's mysticism as part of a typical approach to the new science in the period, an approach which also relied on material from Hermetic and Neoplatonic writings; French proposes for Dee the label of "Elizabethan England's great magus," a philosopher magician in the line of Ficino and Pico della Mirandola.[2] Sherman represents Dee as having "set himself up in what was perhaps the first English think tank [i.e., his extraordinary library]" and "acted as a retailer of special (often secret) knowledge."[3] Harkness links the angelic conversations with late sixteenth-century apocalypticism,[4] where the search

---

1 D.E. Harkness, John Dee's Conversations With Angels: Cabala, Alchemy, and the End of Nature (Cambridge, 1999), p. 1.

2 John Dee: The World of an Elizabethan Magus (London, 1972), p. 1.

3 John Dee: The Politics of Reading and Writing in the English Renaissance (Amherst, 1995), p. xiii.

4 John Dee's Conversations with Angels, p. 4.

for signs of the end times was not just a preoccupation of the common people, but of educated men like Dee. Dee still awaits, however, widespread recognition for his contributions to English educational theory, particularly in his championing of mathematics and science as a central part of a university education.

EDITIONS: Excerpts from John Dee's Actions with Spirits, 23 December 1581 to 23 May 1583. 2 vols. Ed. Christopher Whitby (New York, 1988) are reproduced by kind permission of the editor, Christopher Whitby; a free download of this marvellous edition is now available at the British Library EthOS – Beta: Electronic Theses Online Service <http://ethos.bl.uk>; John Dee, General and rare memorials pertayning to the perfect arte of navigation annexed to the paradoxal cumpas, in playne: now first published: 24. yeres after the first invention thereof. [London: John Day, 1577]. STC 6459.

ADDITIONAL ONLINE TEXTS: John Dee. From "The Mathematical Preface to Euclid's Elements of Geometry" (1570).

from General and Rare Memorials Pertaining to the Perfect Art of Navigation

Annexed to the Paradoxal Compass, in Plain: Now First Published: 24 Years, after the First Invention Thereof.[1]

In the accompanying facsimile of the title page, the foreign words translate as follows:

1) The oval around the title: Plura latent quam patent (Latin, "More things are hidden than plain"), with the Queen's arms at the top.

2) The border reads Hieroglyphicon Brytanicon (Greek, "British Hieroglyphic").

3) On Elizabeth's ship is the word Europa (Greek, "Europe"), although the arms of England are inscribed on the ship's rudder; the figure beside Elizabeth's ship—the woman on the bull—is the common mythological representation of Europa.

4) The sun in the upper, right-hand corner contains the Hebrew Tetragrammaton (the sacred four-letter name of God), generally transliterated as YHWH.

5) On the angel, the identification "Michael" (in Hebrew); his shield bears St. George's cross, an important English national emblem.

6) On the banner beneath the figure on the island fortress, to whom Elizabeth stretches out her hand: to tēs aspheleias phrourion (Greek, "the fortress of security").

---

[1] STC suggests J. Day as the publisher and 1577 as the date of publication. Although Dee's name does not appear on the title page, there are a number of places in the text itself where his name appears and which make it clear that he is the author. The work's print-run, however, was very small: perhaps as many as 100 or as few as 50 copies were produced (STC, p. 291). Aimed at that limited, elite audience comprised of those with the influence to put its plan into action, Memorials was closely supervised by Dee through the printing process, and he later added "emendations by hand" to some of the copies, suggesting that Memorials "is better considered as a manuscript than a printed book" (W. Sherman, John Dee: The Politics of Reading and Writing in the English Renaissance [Amherst, MA, 1995], p. 156).

General and Rare Memorials Pertaining to the Perfect Art of Navigation was originally the title of a number of volumes all of which have been lost except for the first, excerpted here: The British Monarchy or Hexameron Brytannicum. Dee's discussion of the "paradoxal compass" was part of the second volume, which was not printed and which no longer survives (John Dee's Actions with Spirits, 23 December 1581 to 23 May 1583. 2 vols. Ed. Christopher Whitby [New York, 1988], vol. 1, p. 25).

Dee imagines the Petty-Navy-Royal that he discusses in The British Monarchy as an instrument of "imperial expansion" and domestic protection (particularly in terms of the British fishing industry), suggestions which make Dee "'the literary pioneer of the claims to the sovereignty of the sea which were put forth by England in the seventeenth century'" (T. Fulton, The Sovereignty of the Sea [Edinburgh, 1911], p. 99, quoted in Whitby, vol. 1, pp. 25-26). Sherman describes Dee's Petty-Navy-Royal as a "permanent coast guard" (p. 130).

The frontispiece to John Dee's General and Rare Memorials Pertaining to the Perfect Art of Navigation (London, 1577) [shelf-mark: Reserve VK551 D4 1577 fol.] is reproduced by the kind permission of the National Library and Archives of Canada.

7) On the banner held by the kneeling figure, stolos exōplísmenos (Greek, "armed journey").

The figure on the island fortress, identified as "Occasion" or "Opportunity" (specifically, Elizabeth's opportunity to establish a navy and sea-empire) may also be a Nike figure, since she holds the laurel wreath of military victory. One foot stands on a pyramid, a Neoplatonic symbol of the striving for divine perfection, as well as an emblem of antiquity and eternal durability;[1] the other stands on a tower, perhaps representing general security and strength. At the end of his text, Dee identifies the kneeling figure as the British Commonwealth (Britannica). Note that the two masts of Elizabeth's ship are surmounted by the "chi-rho" (also known as the labarum). This symbol—incorporating the Greek letters X and P, the first two letters in the Greek "Christ"—is traditionally ascribed to the emperor Constantine (d. 337 CE), to whom the symbol appeared in a dream. Placing it prominently on the arms of his soldiers, Constantine went on to defeat his rival Maxentius, thus ending the persecution of Christianity, and encouraging its adoption across the empire. Thus the "chi-rho" is a symbol of Christendom as a holy empire.

Close by the kneeling figure "is a stem of wheat full eared, with the root upwards, probably to denote an artificial scarcity, and consequently a great dearth; whereby many of the poor became nearly famished, indicated by half a skull seen on the other side of her, close to the outer margin."[2] Another suggestion is that since "wheat is a Hermetic symbol for man, its inverted position here could represent the disrupted state of Europe at the time," while the skull might be an ominous emblem of "the troubles that Dee envisions if Elizabeth does not grasp the hair of opportunity and establish a strong British navy and empire."[3]

In the left foreground a ship rides at anchor, flying Dutch colours, and in the bottom left-hand corner there are four soldiers carrying lighted torches, accompanied by a mounted officer holding a spear; this section of the picture also includes an additional craft: positioned near the bottom of the river is a small boat, its occupant attempting to push it towards the opposite shore using a boat-hook. He faces two men on shore; one dressed as a Dutchman offers the other a purse. Further to the right are two men journeying towards the city in the picture's right-hand corner.[4] The presence of the Dutch "may suggest that Dee advocate[s] an open alliance with the Netherlands."[5] Taking together the picture's "mixture of favorable religious and astrological portents," French concludes that it "implies that Elizabeth has a sacred obligation to implement Britannica's entreaties and that no forces on earth can thwart her if she undertakes the task."[6]

[...]

The Perfect Art of Navigation

[...] what true and sound member is there of this commonwealth, and faithful desirer of the blessed peaceable security of England and Ireland, under our sovereign Empress, our most gracious Elizabeth, who will not (in a manner) be willing the charges to be borne (part and part like) the whole realm throughout?[7] Wherewith, to bestow meat and drink on them continually that refuse no one day or a moment (if occasion be offered) to adventure their heart blood, life, and limbs for us? And on seaboard continually to endure hard diet

---

1 See G. Chapman's "Ovid's Banquet of Sense," p. 1168, note 3.

2 J. Ames, Typographical Antiquities or The History of Printing in England, Scotland, and Ireland, ed. T.F. Dibdin, 18 vols (rept. Hildesheim, 1969), vol. 4, p. 141.

3 P. French, John Dee: The World of an Elizabethan Magus (London, 1972), p. 184.

4 Ames, Typographical Antiquities, pp. 141-42.

5 French, John Dee, p. 184.

6 For more information about the title page, see Ames, Typographical Antiquities, pp. 140-43. Thanks to Michael Treschow (UBC-O, English) for transliterating Dee's Greek and Hebrew, and for valuable suggestions about the title-page's emblematic significance. See also, Dee's explication in this selection, p. 411.

7 the charges … throughout i.e., the expenses involved in creating and maintaining the Petty-Navy-Royal, which Dee's text discusses.

and lodging for commodities[1] innumerable of both these whole kingdoms?

[2]But it is not so meant as to have any farther contribution of purse than is before spoken of.[3] But what is he? Yea, what is he, I say again? Is he a sound member of the commonwealth, a faithful subject to our good Queen Elizabeth, or a charitable Christian that either would (in this commonwealth's service, or at any time else)*[4] hide corn or other victual from public aid and reliefs? Or else would not be content to receive the due value and reasonable price thereof very gladly? But most miserably, wretchedly, covetously, yea unChristianly (I will not say traitorously) would desire (now chiefly) to enhance the price of corn and victuals to the great pinching of the poor at home, and perchance for a traitorous means to hinder the victualing of the foresaid Petty-Navy-Royal, or to make it odious or doubtfully thought of to some, as though it were a just occasion of prices of corn and victuals starting up more now than before?[5] O vain, blind, covetous miser (whosoever he be that is so minded)! Thou and thy like—and that of late days[6] when no army or navy hath been to be victualed—hast on the sudden and in the time of great store all the realm over—even then, God knoweth, upon what wicked intent or misconstruing or light credit giving to conjecture found in some new three-halfpenny prognostication[7]—hast most unreasonably enhanced the prices of corn, butter and cheese, and at other times of beefs and muttons, etc.

I pray thee be reasonable, and think truly, and make reckoning with me Christianlike, and like a good member of this commonwealth, and as a true subject to our sovereign.

[...]

[...] the selfsame British and English commons—man, woman, and child—with wringing hands most pitifully lamenting a remediless inconvenience[8] and heinous absurdity already and too long committed, would most humbly and dutifully make petition that presently[9] such impartial providence[10] may be used:*[11] That from henceforth the private commodity of a few shall not cause the brains of many a thousand of true and faithful English subjects to fly in the air; Brains—say they—arms, legs, limbs, and lives of the commons to be (as the case may fall out, which God forbid) sold after a sort, though not directly and willingly, yet indirectly and unwillingly (in respect of our countrymen's intents therein), seeing the chiefest instruments wherewith to work so woeful a spoil and calamity are daily (almost) from this kingdom conveyed.[12]

---

1 commodities advantages, benefits.

2 <*> ☞ [Dee's note].

3 than is before spoken of Dee earlier suggests a method of taxation which would fund the Petty-Navy-Royal without constituting a burden on the Crown or on ordinary English citizens.

4 <*> Solomon Proverb 11. Qui abscondit Frumenta, maledicetur in populis: Benedictio autem super Caput Vendentium [Dee's note]. Latin, "The people curse him who holds back grain, but a blessing is on the head of him who sells it" (Vulgate, Proverbs 11:26).

5 <*> ☞ [Dee's note.]

6 of late days recently.

7 three-halfpenny prognostication petty, contemptible, or vile prediction.

8 inconvenience harm, injury, misfortune.

9 presently immediately.

10 providence wise arrangement, management, or governance.

11 <*> Facta, Infecta fieri non possunt. Proinde (Serò Saltem) Sapiant Phryges: Ast, non nimis Serò [Dee's note]. Latin, "Once something's done, it can't be undone. Accordingly, though the Phrygians learn too late, (let them not learn) beyond measure too late." This is partly based on the Latin proverb, Sero sapiunt Phryges ("the Phrygians learn wisdom too late"). See Erasmus, Adages, I.i.28. A notoriously stubborn people, the Phrygians became a byword for those who do not learn from experience and only become wise after catastrophic events. For Dee, his compatriots are like the fabled Phyrgians in that they have had ample proof of the need for a standing navy/coast guard in the foreign raids on their coastal communities and the pillaging of their fish stocks, but they have not learned wisdom from these experiences. Thanks to Michael Treschow (UBC-O, English) for assistance with this note.

12 chiefest instruments ... conveyed W.W.E. Slights refers to an added marginal note by Dee, "pasted on to page 35 of all the copies I am aware of except the one in the Cambridge University Library," which "is a frontal attack on privateers who are 'Abusing ... this Commonwealth, by carrying OUR GUN-POWDER out of this Realm.'" This smuggling of "war materiel ... out of Britain into France," a treasonable "redirection" from "the Lowland Protestants whom he wished to see supported," may indeed constitute the practice which Dee condemns here. See "The Cosmopolitics of Reading: Navigating the Margins of John Dee's General and Rare Memorials," The Margins of the Text, ed. D.C. Greetham (Ann Arbor, 1997), p. 215.

[...]

The third and last doubt is of the due, true, and just bestowing of such a mass of treasure which yearly will be ordinarily contributed, and oddly[1] otherwise, now and then, as by gift while men are living or by legacy after their decease, and sundry other ways. The meaning hereof is this: that the treasure contributed may sundry ways be abused, as partly through the corrupt nature and very falsehood of such as should in office have the fingering of it, being not contented with their sufficient salary and due allowance; or by indiscreet bestowing some part thereof; by wasting it to other purposes or uses than it is meant, intended, and contributed for, one time or other; or by feigned robberies; or loss by negligent ways. Or, (perhaps) the poor commons and body of the realm may (too scrupulously) settle in their fancies a special doubt herein, which they dare not expressly declare: as might be, to consider many things which have been in times past liberally given to uses public and to God's great honour (as, in those days, Christian religion was rated), and the same gifts, then, most circumspectly also by the best advice of lawyers (in tenor of words) ordered and with many other circumstances confirmed. Yet notwithstanding all that assurance and the force of legacy law, many a thousand pounds rent of such free gifts have been in our days by act of Parliament turned from the first appointed uses. And, therefore, herein also might the like alteration be doubted.

Easily and probably their fantasies[2] might, in this their doubt, be satisfied.[3] First, the cases are very unlike. For, there, either without advice and consent of the whole state or of a simple intent, but vainly, (in respect of the means to obtain that their intent) such gifts were first given. But in this our gift and public oblation, the whole realm is privy; the whole realm consenting; the whole realm aiding; and the whole realm certainly feeling the public commodity of peace, wealth, and of blessed security thereby enjoyed. And seeing the case so standeth, who can doubt[4] that ever hereafter in any Parliament all the Parliament senators, or the more part, will be so much corrupted in their judgements as either to mislike the continual guard of this monarchy by the foresaid Petty-Navy-Royal, or to solicit it to be laid aside in part or in all, And would (notwithstanding) have the commons and realm urged to the continuance of the foresaid perpetual benevolence,[5] for sea security only meant and given?

[...]

[...] so soon as any of them[6] shall be sufficiently convicted of falsehood in their office used, rigorous and sharp judgement (according to the greatness of the fault) shall pass against them, and they utterly be disabled forever from all public function of office within the realm of England and Ireland, upon a bond of recognizance[7] taken of their hands to that intent. And the matter, process, and conclusion fully to be recorded in two books, with the offender's name subscribed with his own hand—as sundry other things else are, for safety and readiness, to be twice or oftener registered. And if any officer shall twice or thrice be found a trespasser by his own negligence or of any under him in any matter of importance touching his office, after due amends shall by him or his sureties be made to the public treasury, that negligent officer shall be put out of his office immediately. And after this or some better rate, all faults and offences of falsehood, and negligences, and such like in every kind of officers (to the Petty-Navy-Royal belonging) shall diligently (by apt sur-

1 oddly irregularly, periodically.

2 fantasies suppositions resting on no firm grounds.

3 <*> An Answer to this Doubt of the Commons [Dee's note].

4 doubt believe; suspect.

5 benevolence a tax or monetary imposition.

6 them any of the officials appointed to deal with the financing of the Petty-Navy-Royal.

7 bond of recognizance a legally binding obligation, entered into and recorded before a court or magistrate, by which a person engages himself to perform some act or observe some condition; also, a sum of money pledged as a surety for such performance and rendered forfeit by neglect of it.

veyors) be seen to and quickly espied, narrowly sifted and duly corrected. So that (undoubtedly) such justice being impartially and speedily used shall make that, ere long, all these officers, from the lowest to the highest, shall be tried, approved, grave, honest, discreet, and circumspect men; who will deal so justly, carefully, and diligently as their oaths received shall bind them;[1] And their sufficient sureties shall be answerable for; And, as the whole commons will heartily request them for to do, and will most faithfully promise unto them and gladly perform (upon their good service and due desert) such extraordinary rewards and so great, as may encourage any Christian man to deal truly and justly in so weighty affairs public; And may also rejoice any godly man's heart else to see excellent virtue receive such public honour, credit, and guerdon.[2]

To conclude: who doubteth but that our King and God, of his infinite mercy, may grant us, even at our first discreet and circumspect choice and assigning, to find all sorts of those officers, so wise, faithful, just, careful, and diligent, as it may be accounted his very handiwork and great blessing herein? Whose merciful providence at no time is wanting in matters Cosmopolitical,[3] of great importance; and which also incomparably surpasseth all human policy, though the same be most careful used, for matters tending greatly and chiefly to his glory and honour, as undoubtedly this doth.

[...]

Therefore, seeing no doubt or objection (worthy of consideration, or of any importance) is remaining to the contrary of that most zealous WISH or rather SUPPLICATION, which (certainly) is agreeable to the hearty desire of the most part of all natural and faithful subjects of this kingdom at this very present—upon our own state, both, in itself, chiefly and absolutely, and also in respect of our foreign neighbors, their unassured friendship, being considered—:[4] why should not we HOPE that RES-PUBL[ICA] BRITANNICA, on her knees, very humbly and earnestly soliciting the most excellent Royal Majesty of our ELIZABETH, (Sitting at the HELM of this Imperial Monarchy, or rather at the Helm of the IMPERIAL SHIP of the most part of Christendom) if so it be her Grace's pleasure shall obtain (or perfect policy may persuade her Highness) that which is the pith or intent of RES-PUBL[ICA] BRITANNICA, her supplication? Which is, that, STOLOS EXŌPLÍSMENOS[5] may help us, not only to TO PHROURION TĒS ASPHELEIAS,[6] but make us also partakers of public commodities innumerable, and (as yet) incredible. Unto which the HEAVENLY KING for these many years last past hath, by MANIFEST OCCASION, most graciously not only invited us, but also hath made EVEN NOW the way and means most evident, easy, and compendious: Inasmuch as, (besides all our own sufficient furniture,[7] ability, industry, skill, and courage) our friends are become strong, and our enemies sufficiently weak, and nothing royally furnished, or of ability for open violence using—though their accustomed confidence in treason, treachery, and disloyal dealings be very great. Wherein, we beseech our HEAVENLY PROTECTOR, with his GOOD ANGEL, to guard us with SHIELD AND SWORD, now and ever. Amen.

—1577

[1] <*> ☞ [Dee's note].

[2] <*> ☞ [Dee's note]. guerdon reward, requital, recompense.

[3] Cosmopolitical relating to all states and polities; belonging to universal polity.

[4] The following description refers to the work's decorative title page, here reproduced. See headnote, above, p. 407. Beside Dee's explication of the title page is the marginal Greek HIEROGLYPHICON BRYTANICON ("The British Hieroglyphic"), the same words that surround the ornamental woodcut on the title page.

[5] Greek, "armed journey."

[6] Greek, "fortress of security."

[7] furniture here, intellectual faculties or aptitudes.

from John Dee's Actions with Spirits[1]

Note on the text: These selections are based on Christopher Whitby's carefully edited transcription of this manuscript, which also contains a splendid introduction and indispensable commentary that places Dee in his biographical, cultural, and intellectual milieu—John Dee's Actions With Spirits, 22 December 1581 to 23 December 1583, 2 vols (New York, 1988). Spelling has been modernized, abbreviations expanded, and superscript words (as well as Dee's interlinear additions) have been incorporated; Dee's deletions have been noted in the text through the use of a "strike through" (e.g., ~~better~~). I have also silently incorporated those words Whitby includes from an early transcription of the manuscript before sections became damaged and illegible. Punctuation, capitalization, and underlining have been retained as in the original manuscript, with the exception of added possessive markings. Any other additional punctuation added for the sake of readability has been indicated through the use of { }.

Anno 1581 : 1582
Mysteriorum
Liber Primus.
Mortlaci[2]

[...]

Ad Deum Omnipotentem Protestatio fidelis:
ad perpetuam rei memoriam A° . 1582.[3]

O God Almighty, thou knowest, and art my director, and witness herein, That I have from my youth up, desired and prayed unto thee for pure and sound wisdom and understanding of some of thy truths natural and artificial:[4] such, as by which, thy wisdom, goodness and power bestowed in the frame of the world might be brought, in some bountiful measure under the Talent[5] of my Capacity, to thy honour and glory, and the benefit of thy Servants, my brethren and Sistern, in, and by thy Christ our Saviour: And for as much as, many years, in many places, far and near, in many books,

---

[1] For the tale of the manuscript's provenance, loss, and recovery in the late seventeenth century, see Whitby, vol. 1, pp. 1-7. "Actions" consists of the records of "visions of angels and other spirits and the messages delivered by them as seen and heard by the scryers [principally Edward Kelley (1555-95)] with the aid of a crystal ball, and then immediately related to Dee, who though present saw and heard nothing" (p. 1). Whitby notes that Dee's belief in and representation of angelic or more generally spiritual communication spring from the "doctrines of natural magic" (where the individual philosopher actively harnessed planetary influences for particular ends) and a "combined exegetical and philosophical tradition of conceiving the Creation in terms of formal number." However, Dee's use of scrying is "not based upon any tradition of natural magic nor upon a mathematical conception of the universe." Even though "Actions" bears the stamp of the beliefs and doctrines of natural magic as well as mathematics, "the calling of angels into a crystal belongs not to an intellectual but rather to a popular tradition of magic" (p. 74). For a fuller account of magic and scrying in the Renaissance, see Whitby, vol. 1, pp. 63-93.

Of Edward Kelly, Dee's principal scryer in this selection, we know little apart from what Dee relates in his Diary. Before presenting himself to Dee as a scryer, he seems to have received training as an apothecary, and studied at Oxford. Although he served as secretary to the learned magus Thomas Allen, he also fell afoul of the law, suffering corporal punishment for forgery or coining around 1580. For a full account of Kelly's relationship with Dee, as recorded in Dee's Diary, see Whitby, vol. 1, pp. 43-49.

[2] Latin, "The First Book of the Mysteries of Mortlake." Mortlake was Dee's home, which also contained his library and laboratory.

[3] Latin, "To the almighty God, an assertion of fidelity/faithfulness: for [the purposes of] a perpetual remembering [memory] of this matter, the year 1582."

[4] truths natural and artificial "In the '[Mathematical] Preface,' (see Online Additional Texts) Dee divides the world into the supernatural, the natural, and the mathematical, defining the natural as that which is 'material, compounded, divisible, corruptible, and changeable' and perceived by the exterior senses. Dee is searching for greater truths than those which the five senses can provide and his terminology here is that of the corpus of 'natural philosophy,' largely gathered together by Agrippa. Natural truths are those of the world as God created it and include all occult properties and influences which Agrippa defined as having much form and little matter (Occ. Phil. I, x, p. 24). Artificial truths are those that arise from the combining of natural properties in a way that does not occur in the world under ordinary circumstances, except through the agency of man. Whereas one might learn natural truths by studying the properties, both visible and occult, of say mercury and sulphur, the lesson learned from heating them together to form mercuric sulphide would be an artificial truth" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 195).

[5] Talent "'Power' rather than 'ability'" (ibid., p. 196).

and sundry languages, I have sought, and studied; and with sundry men conferred,[1] and with my own reasonable discourse laboured, whereby to find or get some inkling, glims[2] or beam of such the foresaid radical truths: But, (to be brief) after all my foresaid endeavour I could find no other way, to such true wisdom attaining, but by thy extraordinary gift: and by no vulgar School doctrine, or human Invention. And, Seeing, I have read in thy books, and records, how Enoch[3] enjoyed thy favour and conversation, with Moses thou wast familiar:[4] And also that to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Joshua, Gideon, Esdras, Daniel, Tobias, and sundry other,[5] thy good Angels were sent, by thy disposition,[6] to instruct them, inform them, help them, yea in worldly and domestical affairs, yea and sometimes to satisfy their desires, doubts and questions of thy Secrets: And furthermore Considering, the Show-stone, which the high priests did use, by thy own ordering: wherein they had lights and Judgements in their great doubts:[7] and considering also that thou (O God) didst not refuse to instruct thy prophets, (then, called Seers) to give true answers to common people of things aeronomicall,[8] as Samuel, for Saul, seeking for his father's asses being gone astray:[9] and of other things vulgar true predictions, whereby to win credit in some thy weightier affairs: And thinking with myself, the lack of thy wisdom, to me, to be of more importance, than the Value of an Ass or two, could be to Cis (Saul his father): And remembering what good counsel thy Apostle James giveth, saying, Si quis autem vestrûm indiget sapientia, postulet a Deo etc.[10] And that Solomon the Wise, did so, even immediately by thyself, attain to his wonderful wisdom:[11] Therefore, Seeing I was sufficiently taught and confirmed, that this wisdom could not be come by at man's hand or by human power, but only from thee (Ô God) mediately or immediately).[12] And

---

[1] In "Compendious Rehearsal," one of his autobiographical accounts, Dee includes the following scholars amongst his foreign acquaintance: Gemma Frisius, Gerardus Mercator, Gaspar à Miricia, Antonius Gogava, Orontius, Jacobus Sylvius, Petrus Ramus and Fernelius, among others.

[2] glims glimpses (not in OED with this precise meaning).

[3] Enoch Mentioned in the list of the descendants of Adam, Enoch "walked with God" and instead of dying was taken up by Him into heaven (Genesis 5:24). Enoch is traditionally the author of the apocalyptic deuterocanonical books 1 and 2 Enoch. In 1 Enoch (chapters 17-36), Enoch, guided by an angel, goes on a series of "terrestrial and extra-terrestrial journeys" and is granted various revelations by God concerning "the secrets of the heavenly realms and of the nether world, of Hades or Sheol and of Paradise." See M. Black, "Introduction," The Book of Enoch or I Enoch: A New English Edition, trans. and ed. M. Black with J.C. Vanderkam (Leiden, 1985), p. 15.

[4] Moses has many personal encounters with God in Scripture. See Exodus 3-4; Exodus 19:18-24; and 33:9-11.

[5] For some of the relevant episodes in Scripture, see Genesis 17 and 18 (Abraham), Genesis 26:2 and 26:24 (Isaac), Genesis 28:10-17; 32:1-2 and 24-32 (Jacob), Joshua 5:13-15, Judges 6:11-24 (Gideon), 2 Esdras 2:42-48 and 2 Esdras 4; 5:31ff.; 10:28-29, Daniel 6:22; 9:21ff. and 10:5-6 (Daniel); Tobit 3:16ff. (Tobias is guided and instructed by the angel Raphael.) The "sundry other" could refer to many Scriptural figures who have angelic or more generally divine encounters, such as Hagar (Genesis 16:7), Samuel (1 Samuel 3:1-18), Balaam (Numbers 22:31-35), Samson's parents (Judges 13:3-24), Elijah (1 Kings 19:5-8; 2 Kings 1:3), and Lot (Genesis 19:1ff).

[6] disposition direction, dispensation.

[7] the Show-stone ... great doubts "The high priests of Israel are supposed to have used the stones of the breastplate described in Exodus 28 for divinatory purposes" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 199).

[8] aeronomicall Whitby notes that the word "presumably derives from aer, 'air,' and numen, 'divine will or power,' and therefore means 'of celestial and divine origin,' proceeding from the breath (or word?) of God" (vol. 1, p. 200). It is not in the OED.

[9] thy prophets, (then, called Seers) ... Saul ... astray When Saul goes in search of his father Kish's lost asses, he and his servant seek out the prophet Samuel, of whom (in an aside) the book's editor notes: "(Formerly in Israel, when a man went to inquire of God, he said, 'Come, let us go to the seer'; for he who is now called a prophet was formerly called a seer.)" (1 Samuel 9:9). Samuel is successful in guiding Saul to his father's lost livestock, but God has arranged this meeting so that Samuel can anoint Saul king of Israel (1 Samuel 10:1).

[10] The complete verse is Si quis autem vestrum indiget sapientiam, postulet a Deo qui dat omnibus affluenter et non inproperat et dabitur ei (Latin, "If any of you lacks wisdom, let him ask God, who gives to all men generously and without reproaching, And it will be given him" [Vulgate, James 1:5]).

[11] Solomon Early in his tenure as king of Israel, Solomon has a dream in which God offers to give Solomon whatever he asks for. Solomon pleases God greatly when he asks for "an understanding mind to govern thy people, that I may discern between good and evil" (1 Kings 3:5-12). That Solomon gains this wisdom in an instant is emphasized by the famous story of the division of the child that immediately follows (verses 16-28).

[12] that this wisdom ... immediately "'But where shall wisdom be found? And where is the place of understanding? Man does not know the having always a great regard and care to beware of the filthy abuse of such as willingly and weetingly,[1] did invocate and consult (in diverse sorts) Spiritual creatures of the damned sort: angels of darkness, forgers and patrons of lies and untruths: I did fly unto thee by hearty prayer, full oft, and in sundry manners: sometimes Crying unto thee, Mittas lucem tuam et veritatem tuam, que me ducant etc.{;}[2] sometimes Recte sapere et intelligere doceto me, Nam sapientia tua totum est quod volo: etc.{;}[3] sometimes, Da verbum tuum in ore meo et sapientiam, tuam in corde meo fige, etc.[4] And having perceived by some slight experience with two diverse persons,[5] that thou hadst a special care to give me thy light, and truth, by thy holy and true Ministers Angelic and Spiritual: and at length hearing of one,[6] (A Master of Arts, a preacher of thy word admitted) accounted as a good Seer, and scryer[7] of Spiritual apparitions, in Crystalline receptacles, or in open air, by his practice, procured: and trusting to frame him, by my earnest and faithful prayers unto thee (my God) to some my help in my foresaid Studies: till, thou (o heavenly father) wouldest by thy unsearchable providence, send me some better apter man or means thereto. Thereupon trying him and using him, I found great diversity ~~between~~ his private usual manner, and intents of practice, and my pure, sincere, devout, and faithful prayer unto thee only. And therefore often and fervently I exhorted him ~~and rebuked him~~ to the good; and reproved both him, and his ministers, with my no small danger, but that thou (in manner unheard of) didst pitch thy holy tents to my defence, and comfort, in conflict most terrible: as thou best knowest O God, and I willed him thereupon to preach thy Mercies, and the verity of the kingly prophet his testimony Castra metatur Angelus Domini, in Circuitu timentium eum.[8] And out of Roger Bacon his book written De mirabili potestate Artis et Naturae,[9] ~~I warned~~ (where he writeth against the wicked Devil Callers) I noted unto him that sentence, Facilius way to it, and it is not found in the land of the living'" (Job 28:12-13) [Whitby, vol. 1, p. 201]; mediately by or through the intervention of an intermediary; immediately without an intermediary or intervening agency.

1 weetingly wittingly, knowingly.

2 Vulgate, Psalm 42:3, but not an exact quotation: Emitte lucem tuam et veritatem tuam ipsa me deduxerunt et adduxerunt in montem sanctum tuum et in tabernacula tua. (Latin, "Oh send out thy light and thy truth; let them lead me, let them bring me to thy holy hill and to thy dwelling!" Psalm 43:3).

3 source unknown (not from the Vulgate). Latin, "Teach me to know and understand rightly, for your wisdom is all that I want." Thanks to Michael Treschow (UBC-O, English) for assistance with this note.

4 Latin, "Put thy word in my mouth, and fasten thy wisdom in my heart." The exact source is unknown, but cf. Vulgate, Judith 9.18: Memento Domine testamenti tui et da verbum in ore meo et in corde meo consilium corrobora ut domus tua in tua sanctificatione permaneat ("Remember, O Lord, thy covenant, and put thou words in my mouth, and strengthen the resolution in my heart, that thy house may continue in thy holiness" [Douay-Rheims trans.]).

5 two diverse persons Dee apparently employed two scryers before he began his brief partnership with Barnabas Saul (see p. 412, note 1) and his later and longer-lasting personal and professional relationship with Edward Kelly. Whitby observes that the two scryers might be from among the following: Roger Cook, William Emery, John Brown, Master Henrick, and Robert Gardner. Roger Cook was a young boy and one who had served as Dee's assistant in various "alchemical experiments." Whitby notes that traditionally a young boy was thought the ideal medium for spiritual communication through a scrying stone and that Cook's melancholic nature was "the humor ... regarded as most suitable for such experiments as scrying" (Whitby, "Introduction," vol. 1, pp. 52-53). William Emery was also a young boy, whose father Dee accused of "'most unhonest, hypocritical, and devilish dealings and devices' (Diary, 18 October 1579)" (ibid., p. 54). Of the others we know very little, each receiving a single telling mention in Dee's Diary, suggesting that they may be the scryers to which he is here referring (ibid., p. 54).

6 one Barnabas Saul. We know very little about Barnabas Saul, apart from what we can gather from the "Actions" and Dee's Diary. He had become Dee's scryer possibly as early as 1579, but had ceased to act in this capacity "by at least 6 March 1582" (Whitby, "Introduction," vol. 1, p. 50). With one exception, all of Dee's records of his scrying with Saul have been lost (ibid., p. 51).

7 scryer one who sees images in pieces of crystal, water, etc. which reveal the future or secrets of the past or present; a crystal-gazer.

8 Vulgate, Psalm 33:8, but not an exact quotation: Vallabit angelus Domini in circuitu timentium eum et eripiet eos (Latin, "The angel of the Lord encamps around those who fear him, and delivers them" [Psalm 34:7]). The "kingly prophet" is David, traditional author of the Book of Psalms.

9 Latin, "On the Miraculous Power of Art and Nature." Roger Bacon (c. 1214-92?), English Franciscan friar, philosopher, and teacher, was viewed with some suspicion by his contemporaries for his scientific explorations.

(sine comparatione a *[1] Deo impetrandum foret, vel a bonis spiritibus, quicquid homo utile reputare etc{,}[2] which my counsel he promised me to follow, as thou art witness, ô our true and almighty God. And ~~albeit~~ as thy good Spiritual Creatures neither had delight in the man, neither would so plainly and priestly give me their answers or informations by him, that he might be able to perceive the pith thereof: So was he at length very unwilling to hear himself rebuked for his naughtiness, and to be barred from the Mysteries of thy ~~God's~~ truth's understanding; which were the only things that I desired, through thy grace, o our most merciful God. Therefore, as well for a Memorial, answerable to the premisses,[3] as for the better warrant of my Such exercises to be made account of, hereafter: (leaving all unto thy infinite mercies, and unsearchable providence,) I have thought it not impertinent, to note down, even in this place one of the last Actions,[4] which I had with the foresaid preacher: when I made earnest and faithful petition unto thee (o the true and Almighty God) for sending, unto my comfort and erudition, (if it were thy blessed will,) thy holy, and mighty Angel Annael:[5] of whom as of all the Hierarchies heavenly all prayer honour and thanks, be rendered unto thy divine majesty: now and ever: and world without end. Amen. Amen. Amen.[6]

[...]

—1581-82

Liber Mysteriorum Quintus

Maundy Thursday, after None. hor. 3½[7]

[...]

Δ[8] As concerning the Calendar to be reformed,[9] I am grieved that her Majesty will not reform it in the best terms of Verity{.}[10] And as for the privilege for Master Adrian Gilbert his Voyage, I think not well of it, that Royalties should not be granted{.}[11] Therefore both these points, respect-

---

[1] <*> Numquid non est / Deus in Israël, / ut eatis ad con= / sulendum Beelze= / bub, deum Accaron: / Reg. 4. cap. 1. [Dee's note]. Latin, "Is it not because there is not a God in Israel, that ye go to inquire of Baalzebub the god of Ekron" (2 Kings 1:4). "Dee's reference [to] the fourth book of Kings stems from the earlier naming of the first and second books of Samuel as the first and second books of Kings, and the present first and second books of Kings as the third and fourth books" (Whitby, vol. 1, pp. 203-04).

[2] "The English translation, Friar Bacon His Discovery of the Miracles of Nature, and Magic (London, 1659), reads: 'without all question the way is incomparably more easy to obtain any thing that, is truly good for men, of God, or good angels, than of wicked Spirits' (pp. 3-4)" (Whitby, vol. 1., pp. 202-03).

[3] premisses "The premisses implied in the visitation of angels to the Patriarchs, namely that God does not disdain to communicate with man through spirits" (ibid., p. 203).

[4] "This is probably not the very last Action with Saul, since he did not leave Dee's service until 6 March 1582 (Diary)" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 203).

[5] Annael Annael appears only once in "Actions" (22 December 1581); he is "the angel of the month of December" (ibid., p. 117), and Dee earlier describes him as "governor 'of this great period,' by which he means that Annael governs the period of world history in which Dee lived" (ibid., p. 193).

[6] all prayer ... Amen a variation on the conclusion of the Lord's Prayer.

[7] Maundy Thursday, after None. hor. 3 ½ Maundy Thursday is Holy Thursday, the day before Good Friday in the Liturgical Calendar. Liber Mysteriorum Quintus is Latin for "The Fifth Book of the Mysteries"; after None afternoon. "None" is the ninth hour of the day (after about 3 o'clock in the afternoon).

[8] Dee uses this symbol to represent himself in the various conversations he records.

[9] "Dee had been requested to prepare details concerning the reformation of the Julian Calendar and give his opinion concerning the scheme propounded by Pope Gregory XIII. He had delivered his treatise to the Lord Treasurer on 26 February 1583 (Diary) to whom it was also dedicated. The work caused much controversy, although Dee's calculations were generally approved by contemporary mathematicians. Pope Gregory's scheme (which was finally adopted by Chesterfield's Act of 1751) advocated that eleven days should be dropped from the Julian Calendar, whereas Dee proposed that ten days should be omitted. The Queen, advised by the bishops, did not accept either scheme" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 463).

[10] <*> The reformation / of the Calendar [Dee's note].

[11] And as for ... not be granted "Concerning the voyage to discover a North-West Passage Dee had noted on 16 July 1582 that Sir George Peckham 'promised me of his gift and of his patient [sic for "patent"] ... of the new conquest' (Diary), while he had already been granted 'the royalties of discovery all to the North above the parallel of the 50 degrees of latitude' by Humphrey Gilbert on 10 September 1580 (Diary). Dee is officially named in the request of 1582 that a patent be given for the North-West voyage" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 463).

ing her Majesty, I would gladly have counsel, such as in the Judgment of the highest might be most for my behoof,[1] to follow.

Me.[2] In one government there are sundry principal parts: Every part in subdivision containeth many and sundry offices. Many Offices require many disposers: yet hath every disposition continually some partition in his quality. All things, one thing: And one thing, something: some thing many things, and many things, most innumerable{.}[3] The heavens in proportion are governed universally of a few; particularly of many: each place possesseth his division: and every thing divided, his property. Princes are governors which move and stir them up to work, as it is provided, and to behold in speculation[4] how every particular Action shall have due, perfect, and appropriated Local being, motion and Condition{.} Subjects, (yea, the Highest,) are stirred up, by their proper Angels:[5] The inferior sort do follow the disposition of their leaders{.} Virtue and Vice dwell everywhere. Light and darkness, are always intermeddled{.} Consider, How I speak it. The minds of all that move, even unto the least quality in Nature, have of themselves proper virtues: and therefore proper Instigators.[6] I call to memory thy words, the manner of thy speech, and the secret purpose or meaning, whereunto it is uttered. I see thy Infirmities, and know what thou desirest. But mark me, Whom God commonly chooseth,[7] shall be whom the Princes of the Earth do disdain.[8] Consider, how the prophet that slew that Monstrous Giant, had his election.[9] God respecteth not princes, particularly, so much as the state of his whole people. For in Princes' mouths, is there poison, as well as proverbs. And in one heart, more Sin, than a whole world can contain. it is not mine office to meddle with their vanities, neither is it a part of my pageant to touch anything that tasteth not of Medicine{.}[10] But what? doth thy mind reply? Dost thou think, that my counsel herein, to a grieved mind, is, (though it can be) Medicinal?[11] Peradventure thou thinkest I am not, [in] thy marrow: yea, I have been long in the highest part of thy body, and therefore am something persuaded[12] of thy meaning[.]

Δ Indeed, I thought that your good Counsel, was or might be a remedy and a medicine to my afflicted mind, for this unseemly doing, in the two former points expressed.[13]

Me Behold, whereunto thy earthly man would seduce thee. Dost thou think, that if it please god, it shall not please the Prince? if it be necessary, all ready prepared?[14]

---

[1] behoof benefit, advantage.

[2] Me the abbreviation for Raphael (Medicina Dei: "the Medicine of God"); this abbreviation is surmounted by a small cross in a box with no top. Raphael is one of the four major angels who instruct Dee through Kelly, the others being Uriel, Gabriel, and Michael. According to Agrippa's De occulta philosophia, they are "the four angels who stand before the face of God and govern the four 'corners of the world.'" On the other angels and spirits who appear throughout "Actions," see Whitby, vol. 1, pp. 117-18.

[3] All things ... innumerable "These lines may be paraphrased as 'all things have a share in an overall quality, but taken separately many different qualities are seen to make up this unity'" (ibid., p. 464).

[4] in speculation "looking forward to the effects" (ibid., p. 464).

[5] <*> Angeli / proprii [Dee's note]. Latin, "Proper angels."

[6] <*> Peculiar and / proper Instiga = / tors [Dee's note]. Whitby notes that "these instigators or causes might be temporal or spiritual" (ibid., p. 464).

[7] <*> God his Elect [Dee's note].

[8] I call to memory ... do disdain "There is a difference between worldly advantage and spiritual advantage. Raphael offers no worldly help concerning Dee's setbacks, but offers comfort in the form of spiritual advancement, though with an accompanying disappointment in worldly affairs" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 464).

[9] Consider, how the prophet that slew that Monstrous Giant, had his election David killed the giant, Goliath, in single combat (1 Samuel 17:1-58), and he was chosen by God to be king of Israel when he was still a lowly shepherd, tending his father's flocks (1 Samuel 16:1-7; 16:12-13). Saul, the present king, displeased God, and God in turn displaced Saul's descendants, choosing David, and not Saul's son Jonathan, as the next king of Israel (1 Samuel 15:26-16:1).

[10] <*> Medicine [Dee's note].

[11] As Whitby points out, this question should surely read: "Dost thou not think, that my counsel herein, to a grieved mind, is, (though it can be) Medicinal?" (vol. 1, p. 465).

[12] <*> Δ / Raphael long / time visiting / my head [Dee's note].

[13] the two former points expressed See p. 415, note 9, where Dee talks about Elizabeth's reluctance to reform the Calendar according to his specifications and his misgivings about the discovery patents given to Gilbert.

[14] <*> A secret [Dee's note].

secretum duo[1]

For all things are Limited, with a full mensuration, and unsearchable foresight: yea, I say, all ready,[2] unto the end. Be not discomforted. Quail not at the blast of a small tempest: For those that speak thee fair, have dissembling hearts,[3] and privily do they shoot at thee, with arrows of reproach. When they shall have need of thee: I mean, of the help of God,[4] through thee, (some shut up, some entangled, some gadding like masterless Dogs,) Then shall they gladly seek thee[5] and desire to find thee. They shall smell out thy foot steps, and thou shalt not see them. The key of their Cares shalt thou be Master of: and they themselves shall not unlock their own grievousness. yea they shall say, Oh let the earth devour us.[6] But I am too long. I answer thee, although it be not my office,[7] to declare that[8] thou desirest: yet for that thou desirest my Medicine, I say, Thou shalt prevail against them, yea even against the Mightiest.[9] As thou wilt, so shall it be in God his blessings. Beware of Vain glory. Use few words{.} Thy weapons, are small, but thy Conquest shall be great.[10] Lo. Doth this satisfy thee? Have a firm faith:[11] It is the greatest lesson. Be it unto thee as thou hast delivered{.}[12] One thing, I answer thee, for all Offices.[13] Thou hast in Subjection all Offices:[14] Use them when it please thee, And as thy Instruction hath been.

I have said.

Δ As things be planted here,[15] for preparation of Table, sigillum Dei{,} etc which things are not portable with ease: so, because I think, that some services to be done in god's purposes by me, will require other places than this house, so shall divers my practices[16] have (as I think) a more compendious manner,[17] and ready to be executed in any place etc

Me Truly thou hast said, and so shall it fall unto thee. As I am here in this place, and yet indeed not, So, here: so shall it fall out, and follow in the Mysteries[18] of your Associated Operation. The other[19] shall be, but, as necessary help to the first Practices, to plant the Tree: which being confirmed and strongly[20] rooted shall bring forth fruit, most abundantly. The Earth and the tree,[21]

---

[1] Latin, "a double secret"? Whitby suggests tentatively "a twofold secret" (ibid., vol. 1, p. 465).

[2] Whitby notes that the two occurrences of "all ready" are joined here by a line (Whitby, vol. 2, p. 256).

[3] <*> Lingua dolosa [Dee's note]. Latin for "deceitful speech or language."

[4] <*> England [Dee's note].

[5] <*> Misery to = / come [Dee's note].

[6] Be not discomforted ... devour us "Dee is promised a future role of power as one of God's elect" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 465).

[7] <*> Note. each in his / office [Dee's note].

[8] that that which.

[9] <*> Praevalescentia [Dee's note]. This is Latin for "having superior power." Whitby suggests "prevailing" (vol. 1, p. 467).

[10] <*> conquest [Dee's note].

[11] <*> a firm faith [Dee's note].

[12] as thou hast delivered This may mean either "as you have said" or "as it has been delivered to you."

[13] <*> All Offices [Dee's note].

[14] all Offices "The 49 spirits who govern the world" (ibid., p. 466).

[15] As things be planted here "Either Dee has collected the various items for making the magical instruments or he is merely referring to the instructions written ('planted') in the manuscript" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 466).

[16] divers my practices several of my practices.

[17] compendious manner "'Abridged.' Dee thinks that a form of operation more suitable for travelling is required, which operation will not use the large Holy Table. Dee may already have been contemplating his Continental voyage" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 466). The Holy Table and the Sigillum Dei—"the seal of God," sometimes also called Sigillum Emeth, "seal of truth"—were the two principal magical instruments that the angels instructed Dee to make. The Holy Table was an actual physical table, made to the angels' specifications, which was inscribed with letters in the Enochian (angelic) language. For a full description of the Table, see ibid., pp. 149-54. Both the Table and the Sigillum Dei "contain the names of both 'traditional' angels and the spirits unique to Dee's 'Actions' with spirits" (ibid., p. 116). The precise use of these magical instruments in "Actions," however, remains somewhat unclear.

[18] <*> Δ: and E K, / and / A. Gilbert. [Dee's note]. A line connects this marginalia to the word "other," just below (Whitby, vol. 2, p. 257).

[19] The other Adrian Gilbert (Whitby notes that Dee has drawn a line from "other" to Gilbert's name in the marginal note).

[20] <*> The earth 1. E K
The Tree 2. Δ
The planter 3. A G [Dee's note].

[21] The Earth and the tree "Kelly and Dee. Gilbert as the planter is not absolutely necessary to the Actions" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 467).

can not be separated{.}[1] This is the end, and true it is. Let him be record, whom I bear record of here,[2]

And so, with thee. Amen.

I must help thee. Learn jointly the Elements or grounds[3] of this heavenly doctrine; the end and Consummation of all thy desired thirst: in the which God shall perform thee, thy Philosophical Harmony[4] in Δ^*prayer.[5] Thou knowest what I mean. The Aeternal physician minister his heavenly grace and continual blessings upon you, to the Glory of his name, execution of your proceedings, and holy and insatiable desires.

Δ Amen: Omnipotenti Deo, nostro Creatori Redemptori et sanctificatori, omnis honor laus et gratiarum actio.[6]
Amen

[...]

Aprilis 6. Saturday after none

Δ The Table, Chair, book and fire appeared{.} And while I went into my oratory to pray, fire came thrice out of the stone upon E K, as he was at prayer, at my table in my study. E K heard a voice out of the fire, saying{,} Why do the Children of men prolong the time of their perfect felicity: or why are they dedicated to vanity? Many things are yet to come: Notwithstanding, the Time must be shortened,

I AM THAT I AM[7]

A VOYCE — Veniat Vox eius, ut dicat filiis hominem quae ventura sunt.[8]

E K There is a man, in white, come in, like Uriel, who came first into the stone

Δ Benedictus qui venit in nominem Domine[9] — UR: Amen

UR — I teach: E K said that he turned toward me

UR. What wilt thou I shall answer thee, as concerning this work?

E K He hath a ball of fire in his left hand and in his right hand a Triangle of fire[10]

Δ What is most needful for us to learn herein, that is my chief desire.

URIEL — Four months, are yet to come: The fifth is the beginning of great misery, to the heavens,[11] to the earth and to all living Creatures.[12] Therefore

[1] <*> The Planter / may be separa / ted: from / Tree and Earth [Dee's note].

[2] Let him be record, whom I bear record of here "God is invoked as a witness" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 467).

[3] <*> Note Learn / The Alphabet. [Dee's note].

[4] God shall perform thee, thy Philosophical Harmony "God will answer Dee's prayer for help and angelic visitation" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 467).

[5] <> Δ^ Philosophical Harmony / in prayer, is meant / by the prayer which / I daily use, and often. / Deus in. a.m. In. / D.a.a.m.f. G.p. / e. F.e.s. etc. [Dee's note]. Dee's abbreviations above refer to the following Latin prayer: "'Deus, in adiutorium meum intende: Domine ad adiuuandum me festina: Gloria [Deo], Patri, et Filio et spiritui [Sancto]'" (trans., "God, reach down to help me: Lord hasten to my aid: Glory be to God, the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit" (ibid., p. 467).

[6] "'To almighty God, our creator, redeemer and sanctifier, be all honour, praise and act of thanks'" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 467).

[7] God's words to Moses in Exodus 3.14, when He appears in the form of a bush that burns but is never consumed. This theophany is one of the most important and famous in the Old Testament.

[8] "'May his voice come that he may tell the sons of men what is to come.' The speaker is Uriel" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 495).

[9] "Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord." In the Gospels, these words are said by the crowd who welcomes Jesus into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday, the beginning of his Passion. See Matthew 21:9 and Mark 11:9. Jesus repeats the words in Matthew 23:39 and Luke 13:35, in his lament over Jerusalem.

[10] <*> O Δ [Dee's note]. "These (the ball of fire and the triangle) may perhaps represent Kelly and Dee (so often represented by Δ), imbued with God's knowledge" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 495).

[11] <*> A prophecy / Very dreadful / now at hand [Dee's note].

[12] Four months ... all living Creatures "The month of misery will therefore be September 1583, and on the 21st day of that month Dee left Mortlake with his wife and children, Kelly and his family, and Albert Lasky, for the Continent (Diary)" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 495).

must thou needs attend upon the will of God: Things must then be put in practice. A thing that knitteth up all must of force contain many celestial Virtues{.} Therefore, in these doings, must things be furnished speedily,[1] and with reverence. This, is the light, wherewith thou shalt be Kindled{.}[2] This is it, that shall renew thee: yea again and again, and sevenly seven times,[3] again{.} Then shall thy eyes be cleared from the dimness{.} Thou shalt perceive these things which have not been seen, No, not amongst the Sons of men. This other[4] have I brought, whereof I will, now,[5] bestow the seventieth part[6] of the first part of seventy seven. The residue shall be fulfilled, in, and with thee; In, I say, and together, with thee.[7] Behold (sayeth the lord) I will breathe upon men, and they shall have the spirit of Understanding{.}[8] In 40 days must the book of the Secrets, and key of this world be Written:[9] even as it is manifest to the one of you in sight, and to the other[10] in faith. Therefore have I brought it to the window of thy senses, and doors of thy Imagination: to the end he may see and perform the time of God his Abridgment.[11] That shalt, thou, write down in his proper and sanctified distinctions. This other, (pointing to E K) shall have it always before him, and shall daily[12] perform the office to him committed. Which if he do not,[13] the Lord shall raze his name from the number of his blessed, and those that are anointed with his blood{.}[14] For, behold, what man, can speak, or talk with the spirit of God? No flesh is able to 1 <*> Speedily and / reverently [Dee's note].

---

2 <*> Δ. Uriel held / up now the / Triangle of / fire [Dee's note]. This, is the light, ... Kindled "Uriel holds up the triangle of fire which may represent Dee inspired with heavenly wisdom" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 496).

3 sevenly seven times forty-nine. "The number 49 is significant to the book containing the angelic language" (ibid., p. 496).

4 This other "The ball of fire" (ibid., p. 496).

5 <*> Δ / Uriel now / Holding up / the Ball of / fire in his / left hand, / said as / here written [Dee's note], with ☛ and joined by an integral to the marginal note numbered 2, above.

6 [A] line joins "seventieth part" to "Uriel took" (Whitby, vol. 2, p. 305).

7 This other ... and together, with thee "Whereas Dee is to receive the knowledge that will 'renew' him many times, Kelly is given a fraction of the wisdom symbolised by the round ball of fire. Kelly's proportion is 1/5390 if 'the first part of seventy seven' means 1/77. Apart from the customary significance attached in magic to the number seven, ... I can find no importance in these numbers" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 496).

8 When Jesus sent out his disciples to spread the good news, "he breathed on them, and said to them, 'Receive the Holy Spirit. If you forgive the sins of any, they are forgiven; if you retain the sins of any, they are retained'" (John 20:22-23). Of the four gospels only John contains this incident and these words, although a different version of the arrival of the Holy Spirit can be found in Acts 2:1-4.

9 <*> Liber / [Dee's note], accompanied by a drawing of a small book with a superscript number "40"; In 40 days ... Written Whitby notes that this book, called the Book of Enoch, apparently had "several purposes," but most importantly "in conjunction with the Holy Table" it was supposed "to herald in a new age upon earth that would precede the end of all things. The details of how the book was to be used for this purpose were never delivered and ['Actions'] continually delay[s] imparting specific information as to the precise use of the Book of Enoch in this respect" (Intro., vol. 1, p. 144). It is also the book which presents the angelic language and alphabet: "it is supposed to be the language that the angels taught to Adam ... the language in which things are named as they are, rather than as they seem to be." As "the language of the angels, Enochian [as Dee calls it] is seen as a language of creation, far more powerful than any corporeal object or action" (ibid., p. 145). For a full description/discussion of Enochian, see ibid., pp.141-49.

10 <*> Δ if from the first day of / writing we account / then from Good Friday the / reckoning doth begin. / and so end this [Dee's note; a marginal note, written vertically].

11 <> The Abridge= / ment of time [Dee's note]; <> speaking to Δ [Dee's note]; the time of God his Abridgement "The writing of the book is to hasten the coming of God's kingdom upon Earth" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 496).

12 "daily" is very emphatically underlined in the text.

13 <*> The danger / threatened, if / E K do not / his duty [Dee's note].

14 the Lord shall raze ... with his blood This is the punishment with which God threatens the Israelites for their making and worshiping of the golden calf at Mount Sinai. When Moses attempts "to make atonement for [the people's] sin," the Lord replies, "'Whoever has sinned against me, him will I blot out of my book. But now go, lead the people to the place of which I have spoken to you; behold, my angel shall go before you. Nevertheless, in the day when I visit, I will visit their sin upon them.'" Moses relates God's punishment for the Israelites' continued "stubbornness" and lack of faithfulness in Deuteronomy 9:14 ("Let me alone, that I may destroy them and blot out their name from under heaven") and 29:20. The book which contains the names of God's elect also occurs in Revelation; the damned have their names "blot[ted] ... out of the book of life" (Revelation 3:5).

stand, when the voice of his Thunder[1] shall present the part of the next Leaf[2] unto sight{.} You have wavering minds, and are drawn away with the World: But brittle is the state thereof: small therefore are the Vanities of his Illusion. Be of sound faith. Believe. Great is the reward of those that are faithful{.} God Will not be dishonoured,[3] neither will suffer them to receive dishonour, that honour him in holiness. Behold, Behold, Mark ô and Behold: Each line[4] hath stretched himself, even to his end:[5] and the Middst is glorious to the good, and dishonour to the wicked. Heaven and earth must decay: so, shall not the words of this Testimony.

Δ Ecce servus et misellus homuncio Dei nostri, fiat mihi iuxta beneplacitum voluntatis suae. etc[6]

Δ Uriel took a little of the fire in his left hand and flung it at E K:[7] and it went in at his mouth

UR. My message is done.

[...]

Quinti Libri Mysteriorum
Appendix[8]

Aprilis 20 — Saturday

Δ This Saturday had been great and eager[9] pangs between E K and me: while he would utterly discredit the whole process of our actions: as, to be done by evil and illuding[10] spirits: seeking his destruction. saying that he hath often heretofore been told things true, but of illuding devils: and Now, how can this be other, than a mockery, to have a cornered dark cloud to be showed him instead of the plain writing which hitherto he had written out of? and that when they should do good in deed that then they shrank from us.[11] and that he was not thus to lose his time: But that he is to study, to learn some knowledge, whereby he may live: and that he was a cumber[12] to my house, and that he dwelled here as in a prison:

[...]

With a great deal of more matter, melancholic, and cross overthwartly[13] to the good and patient using of ourselves to the accomplishing of this action. I replied, and said, that we might find ourselves answered ~~yest~~ on thursday, as, That God would clear when it pleased him: and that we were not to appoint God a time to perform his mysteries and mercies in; ~~shot~~ shorter than he hath spoken of: And that undoubtedly, the occasion of this black cloud, was some imperfection of ours, to be amended and that then, all, would be to our

---

1 <*> Note a / terrible / thing [Dee's note].

2 "Leaf" is very emphatically underlined in the text.

3 Galatians 6:7.

4 Each line "Each line of letters in the angelic language" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 497).

5 <*> The / end of / all. [Dee's note].

6 "Behold the servant and wretched little man of our God; let it be done to me according to the pleasure of his will" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 497). As Whitby notes, this line echoes part of Mary's speech upon the angelic revelation that she is to be the mother of the messiah, Jesus Christ: "Behold, I am the handmaid of the Lord; let it be to me according to your word" (Luke 1:38).

7 Note, by / the place / here before / what measure / in proportion / of power and / understanding / this was, in / respect of / the white ball / of fire. [Dee's note]. "Presumably this is reported by Kelly rather than seen by Dee. The fire comes from the ball and not the triangle" (ibid., p. 497).

8 Latin, "Appendix to the Fifth Book of Mysteries."

9 eager keen, biting.

10 illuding deceiving, cheating.

11 This Saturday ... shrank from us "The cause of Kelly's conviction that the spirits are all devils is the lack of communication from the angels presaged by the black heptagonal cloud. In this MS no spirit discovered as an illuder has uttered words of truth and so his statement must refer to experiences outside those in this MS, either prior to his meeting Dee or during Dee's absences" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 527).

12 cumber encumbrance, hindrance, burden.

13 overthwartly Whitby suggests "opposed" (vol. 1, p. 529); but perhaps, also, "in a perverse manner."

further comfort. And as concerning his doubting the goodness of the creatures, (dealing with us) he was to blame, to say ~~the~~ or doubt the tree to be ill that bringeth forth good fruit. for of these creatures, from the beginning of their dealing with us unto the last hour,[1] we never heard other than the praise of god, instructions and exhortations to humility, patience, constancy, faith etc. The things they promise be such as god can perform, and is for his service and glory to perform: and such as have been imparted to man before: and therefore neither impossible for man to enjoy again, nor unmete[2] for us to hope for. and though his troubled mind did doubt, yet my quiet mind, which god hath made ~~straight~~ joyful through his mercies, and which accuseth me not in this action of any ambition, hypocrisy, or disorderly longing, but only is bent and settled in awaiting the Lord his helping hand to make me wise for his service, (according as long time my daily prayer to him hath been.) and seeing I have and do ask wisdom[3] at the lord his hands, and put my trust in him, he will not suffer me to be so confounded:[4] neither will he offer a stone to his seely[5] children, when in time of need they ask bread at his hands:[6] besides that Voluntatem timentium se faciet deus:[7] and (by his graces) I fear him so, and am so careful, to do that should please him, that I make no account of all this world possessing, unleast[8] I might enjoy his favour, his mercies and graces{.}[9] And whereas he complained of want, I said, my want is greater than his: for I was in debt all of 300 pounds,[10] had a greater charge than he,[11] and yet for all my 40 years course of study,[12] many hundred pounds spending, many hundred miles travelling, many an incredible bite and forcing of my wit[13] in study using to learn or to bolt out[14] some good living, ye etc. yet for all this I would be very well pleased to be deferred yet longer, (a year or more) and to go up and down England clothed in a blanket, to beg my bread, so that I might, at the end be assured to attain to godly wisdom, whereby to do God some service for his glory. And to be plain, that I was resolved, either willingly to leave this world presently[15] that, so, I might in spirit enjoy the bottomless fountain of all wisdom, or else to pass forth my days on earth with god's favour and assurance of enjoying here his merciful mighty blessings, to understand his mysteries, mete[16] for the performing of true actions, such as might set forth his glory, so, as it might be evident and confessed, that such things were done Dextera Domini.[17] And many other discourses and answers made unto his objections and doubts: Afterward I began to speak of the troubles and misery foreshowed to be near at hand [...]

[...]

1 <*> ☛ [Dee's note].

2 unmete inappropriate, improper.

3 <*> Sapientia [Dee's note]. Latin for "Wisdom."

4 and put my trust ... confounded "An echo of the last line of the Te Deum: 'O Lord in thee have I trusted: let me never be confounded'" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 529); confounded discomfitted, abashed, put to shame.

5 seely "poor," but also "innocent."

6 Matthew 7:9.

7 Vulgate, Psalm 144:19: Voluntatem timentium se faciet et deprecationem eorum exaudiet et salvos faciet eos (Latin, "He fulfils the desire of all who fear him, he also hears their cry, and saves them" [Psalm 145:19]).

8 unleast unless.

9 that I make no account ... graces "See Matthew XVI, 26: 'What is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul'" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 529).

10 <*> ls / 300 debt [Dee's note]. "ls" is "an abbreviation for 'pounds'" (ibid., p. 530). "Dee's expenditure on his library and alchemical laboratories caused him to be constantly in debt" (ibid., p. 530).

11 a greater charge than he i.e., for the "upkeep of his house in Mortlake and provision for his family" (ibid., p. 530). Kelly and his family were also residing with Dee.

12 my 40 years course of study "Dee entered Cambridge in November 1542 at the age of fifteen" (ibid., p. 530).

13 bite ... wit bite here, "a sharp cutting action as in sharpening one's wit" (ibid., p. 530.); forcing utmost endeavouring or striving.

14 using ... out using being accustomed; bolt out to separate by sifting, as through a sieve; fig. to find out or separate out by sifting.

15 presently immediately, at once.

16 mete appropriate, fitting.

17 Dextera Domini Latin, "by God's right hand."

Aprilis 29 Monday, a meridie[1]

[After a long and complex Action, Dee appends the following note.]

Note

Δ After that these things were finished, ~~and~~ E K rose up from the table and went to the west window, to read a letter which was, even then, brought him from his wife:[2] which being done, he took a little prayer *[3] book (in english meter made by one William Hunnis which Master Adrian Gilbert had ~~left~~ here and it lay on the Table by us all the while of this last action) and with this book, he went into his bedchamber, intending to pray on it, a certain prayer, which he liked: and as he opened the book, his eye espied strange writing in the spare white paper at the book's end and beholding it, judged it verily to be his own letters, and the thing of his own doing: but being assured that he never saw the like of this Character[4] [for Conciliation], and that other, (notified by the heart or Centre, skin and flesh before this present hour, he became astonied,[5] and in great wrath; and behold, suddenly, One appeared to him and said, Lo, this is as good as that other. meaning that, which we had received, and is here before set down on the former page. With this news came E K to me, as I was writing down fair this last Action, and said, I have strange matter to impart unto you: Then said I what is that? and at the first (being yet tossed in his mind with this great injury of the subtle supplanter of man,[6] ~~and~~ ambitiously intruding himself, to rob god of his glory) he said, you shall know, and at length showed me this little paper, here, by, being the one of the white leaves in the end of the foresaid little prayer book. And I viewing it to be meant to be the counterfeit of ours; but, withal, imperfect diverse ways, after the order of our method: yea though the words, out of which it had sprung had been good, and sufficient: and thereat laughed at, and derided the Wicked enemy, for his envy, his ass-headed foolish ambition, and indeed mere blindness to do anything well. To conclude, we found, that with an incredible speed this Devilish figure was written down by some Wicked spirit, to bring our perfect doings in doubt with us: thereby either to provoke us to utter undue speeches of god's good creatures, or to wavering minds of the Worthiness and goodness of the same things received, and so either to leave off, or with faint-hearted wavering to proceed. But I by god's grace (contrary to such inconveniency[7]) ~~being~~ was armed with constancy, and confident good hope, that God would not suffer me, (putting my trust in his goodness and mercy, to receive wisdom from him) to be so unjustly dealt withal or unkindly or unfatherly used at his hands etc. and intended after supper to make my earnest complaint to the divine Majesty ~~of~~ against this wicked intrusion and temptation of the Illuding[8] devil: and so we went to supper.

—1583

[1] a meridie Latin, "towards midday."

[2] "This is the first reference to Kelly's wife. Evidently she had not yet moved into Dee's household" (Whitby, vol. 1, p. 552).

[3] <*> * / The Title of the / book was Seven / sobs of a sorrowful / soul for sin [Dee's note]. Seven Sobs of a Sorrowful Soul for Sin: The Psalms Called Poenitential Reduced into Meter by W. Hunnis (London, 1583) was a popular work; it had gone through nine editions by 1630.

[4] he opened the book ... Character As Whitby notes, "this 'automatic writing' is highly suspicious. Being alone in his bedchamber, Kelly could easily have written this to deceive Dee, presumably to increase Dee's belief in what the angels had delivered during the Action" (ibid., p. 553). In addition, "the character resembles that" found elsewhere in the MS (ibid., p. 553).

[5] astonied stunned.

[6] subtle supplanter of man Satan, the Devil.

[7] contrary to such inconveniency opposed or resistant to such absurdity/intended harm.

[8] Illuding deceiving, cheating.

Barnabe Googe
1540-1594

Born into the gentry in 1540, Barnabe Googe lost both of his parents before he reached the age of 18. He received a good education, progressing from grammar school to Christ's College, Cambridge (1555) to Staple Inn, London (1559). His extended family included the eminent lawyer and judge, Sir James Hales; the pious gentlewoman, Lady Hales; the writer and translator, Alexander Neville (see p. 424, note 1); and the Queen's trusted advisor and secretary, Sir William Cecil (later Lord Burghley).

Although all these individuals helped shape Googe's life and views, it was his relationship with Cecil that proved the most influential, both personally and professionally. During Googe's minority, Cecil was his guardian, and he later intervened to help Googe win his chosen wife (Mary Darrell) over the opposition of her family. Cecil also provided Googe with opportunities at court, sending him to Spain with the new ambassador Sir Thomas Chaloner in 1561, and later employing him in Ireland as provost marshal of Connaught (1582). Cecil introduced him to a circle of learned men, including the humanist scholar Sir Roger Ascham and the poet and translator Arthur Golding. And finally, Cecil encouraged Googe's literary ambitions, and to him Googe dedicated one of his earliest works, a translation of Palingenius (1560).[1] Googe's most famous work, Eclogues, Epitaphs, and Sonnets (1563), was published soon after his return from Spain in 1562.

Between his marriage in 1564 and his retirement to Alvingham in 1584, Googe published the rest of his works. These included a new edition of Palingenius' Zodiacus Vitae in 1560, with two later editions, (enlarged and revised) published in 1576 and 1588. Googe also published three other translations: The Popish Kingdom, or, Reign of Antichrist (1570) by Thomas Kirchmeyer (Naogeorgus); The Overthrow of the Gout (1577) by Christopher Balista; and Four Books of Husbandry (1577) by Conrad Heresbach—the latter two of which were probably spurred by Cecil's own interests and concerns (horticulture as well as his own case of gout).[2] Googe also contributed a prose preface to Barnabe Riche's pamphlet, An Alarm to England (1578).

Googe's contemporaries praised him more for his translations than his original verse, and Eclogues, Epitaphs, and Sonnets is presently better known for its historical rather than literary significance. This significance, however, is not negligible: the first singly-authored anthology of personal lyric poetry published in England and during its author's lifetime, Eclogues contains pastoral eclogues that were important forerunners of Spenser's eclogues in Shepheardes Calender. In addition, Googe's verse generally employs a non-ornate style later, carrying on the tradition of Gascoigne, and looking forward to the work of Greville and Donne.[3]

EDITIONS: Eglogs, epytaphes, and sonettes. London: By Thomas Colwell for Raffe Newbery, [1563]. STC 12048; George Turberville, "To Master Googe's Fancy" in Epitaphes, epigrams, songs and sonets. London: Henry Denham, 1567. STC 24326.

[1] See J.M. Kennedy, "Introduction," Eclogues, Epitaphs and Sonnets (Toronto, 1989), pp. 10-14.
[2] Ibid., p. 15.
[3] Ibid., p. 17.

from Eclogues, Epitaphs, and Sonnets

[...]

To the Right Worshipful Master William Lovelace, Esquire, Reader of Gray's Inn,[1] Barnabe Googe Wisheth Health.

How loath I have been, being of long time earnestly required, to suffer these trifles of mine to come to light, it is not unknown to a great number of my familiar acquaintance, who both daily and hourly moved[2] me thereunto, and little of long time prevailed therein. For I both considered and weighed with myself the grossness[3] of my style which, thus committed to the gazing show of every eye, should forthwith[4] disclose the manifest folly of the writer; and also I feared and mistrusted the disdainful minds of a number both scornful and carping correctors, whose heads are ever busied in taunting judgements, lest they should otherwise interpret my doings than indeed I meant them. These two so great mischiefs utterly dissuaded me from the following of my friends' persuasions and willed me rather to condemn them[5] to continual darkness, whereby no inconvenience could happen, than to endanger myself in giving them to light, to the disdainful doom[6] of any offended mind. Notwithstanding, all the diligence that I could use in the suppression thereof could not suffice; for I myself being at that time out of the realm,[7] little fearing any such thing to happen, a very[8] friend of mine, bearing, as it seemed, better will to my doings than respecting the hazard of my name, committed them, altogether unpolished, to the hands of the printer. In whose hands, during his absence from the city till his return of late, they remained. At which time he declared the matter wholly unto me, showing me that, being so far past and paper provided for the impression thereof, it could not without great hindrance of the poor printer be now revoked. His sudden tale made me, at the first, utterly amazed,[9] and doubting a great while what was best to be done. At the length, agreeing both with necessity and his counsel, I said with Martial, Iam sed poteras tutior esse domi.[10] And calling to mind to whom I might chiefly commit the fruits of my smiling Muse, suddenly was cast before my eyes the perfect view of your friendly mind, gentle Master Lovelace, unto whom, for the numbered heaps of sundry friendships accounting myself as bound, I have thought best to give them, not doubting but that they shall be as well taken as I do presently[11] mean them.

Desiring you herein, as all such as shall read them, especially to bear with the unpleasant form of my too hastily finished "Dream,"[12] the greater part whereof with little advice I lately ended because the beginning of it, as a senseless head separated from the body, was given with the rest to be printed. And thus, desiring but for recompense the friendly receiving of my slender gift, I end, wishing unto you, good Master Lovelace, in this life the happy enjoying of prosperous years and hereafter the blessed estate of never-ceasing joy.

Yours assuredly,
Barnabe Googe.

---

[1] William Lovelace was admitted to Gray's Inn in 1548, became a barrister in 1551, an "ancient" (one of the senior members forming the governing body of the Inn) in 1552, a reader (lecturer on law to the students of the Inn) in 1562 and 1567, and finally a sergeant-at-law (member of a superior order of barristers from which common law judges were always chosen) in 1567. See W.R. Douthwaite, Gray's Inn: Its History and Associations (London, 1886; rept. Littleton, CO, 1987), p. 55. Googe's dedication reflects his connections with Gray's Inn, such as his friendship with Alexander Neville (his cousin and a member of Gray's Inn) cultivated during his own period at Staple Inn.

[2] moved persuaded.

[3] grossness lacking refinement, sophistication, or delicacy.

[4] forthwith immediately.

[5] I.e., his writings.

[6] doom judgement.

[7] Googe was on a diplomatic mission at the time. See above, p. 423.

[8] very true, faithful, staunch.

[9] amazed astonished; perplexed.

[10] Latin, "But you might have been safer at home." See Martial, Epigrams, ed. and trans. D.R. Shackleton Bailey, vol. 1 (Cambridge, MA, 1993), I. iii. 12.

[11] presently now, at this time.

[12] "Dream" i.e., "Cupido Conquered," the dream vision which concludes the 1563 volume.

[...]

An Epitaph of the Death of Nicholas Grimald[1]

Behold this fleeting world, how all things fade,
How everything doth pass and wear away.
Each state of life, by common course and trade,
Abides no time, but hath a passing day.
For look: as Life, that pleasant dame, hath brought
The pleasant years and days of lustiness,[2]
So Death, our foe, consumeth all to nought,
Envying these, with dart[3] doth us oppress.
And that which is the greatest grief of all,
The greedy gripe[4] doth no estate respect,
But where he comes he makes them down to fall;
Ne stays he at[5] the high, sharp-witted sect,
For if that wit or worthy eloquence
Or learning deep could move him to forbear,
O Grimald, then thou had'st not yet gone hence,
But here had'st seen full many an aged year.
Ne had the Muses lost so fine a flow'r.[6]
Nor had Minerva[7] wept to leave thee so.
If wisdom might have fled the fatal hour,
Thou had'st not yet been suffered for to go.
A thousand doltish geese we might have spared,
A thousand witless heads Death might have found,
And taken them, for whom no man had cared
And laid them low in deep, oblivious ground.
But Fortune favours fools,[8] as old men say,
And lets them live, and takes the wise away.

[...]

[1] Nicholas Grimald (b. 1519/20-d. in or before 1562), dramatist, humanist, scholar, reformist; friend of John Bale, Grimald is most famous for his contributions to Tottel's Songs and Sonnets, an important sixteenth-century verse miscellany. See above, pp. 188, 201-02.

[2] lustiness vigour, energy.

[3] dart spear; arrow.

[4] gripe clutch, grasp.

[5] Ne stays he at nor stops he at.

[6] flow'r i.e., flower.

[7] Minerva Roman goddess of wisdom and learning.

[8] Fortune favours fools Proverb (Tilley F600).

To Doctor Bale[9]

Good, aged Bale, that with thy hoary hairs
Dost yet persist to turn the painful book!
O happy man, that hast obtained such years
And leav'st not yet on papers pale to look!
Give over now to beat thy wearied brain,
And rest thy pen that long hath laboured sore.[10]
For aged men unfit, sure, is such pain,
And thee beseems to labour now no more;
But thou, I think, Don Plato's part will play,
With book in hand to have thy dying day.[11]

Of Edwards of the Chapel[12]

Divine Camenes,[13] that with your sacred food
Have fed and fostered up from tender years
A happy man that in your favour stood,
Edwards, in court that cannot find his feres,[14]
Your names be blessed that in this present age
So fine a head by art have framed out,
Whom some hereafter, helped by poet's rage,[15]
Perchance may match, but none shall pass,[16] no doubt.
O Plautus,[17] if thou wert alive again,
That comedies so finely didst endite;[18]

[9] Doctor Bale John Bale (1495-1563), bishop of Ossory, Protestant polemicist, ardent promoter of the Reformation, dramatist and prose writer.

[10] sore with great exertion or effort.

[11] Don Plato's ... day Cicero's De senectute ("On Old Age") notes that Plato "died in his eighty-first year while still actively engaged in writing."

[12] Richard Edwards (1525-66), poet and playwright, master of the children of the Chapel Royal (1561-66). His comedy Damon and Pithias was very popular, performed at court and at Lincoln's Inn (Christmas 1564/65). Palamon and Arcite (perf. 1566) reportedly delighted Queen Elizabeth.

[13] Camenes i.e., Camenae, goddesses of a spring meadow and grove near ancient Rome; they were identified with the Muses (OCD, p. 283).

[14] feres comrades.

[15] poet's rage i.e., the furor poeticus, that state of divinely-inspired, creative frenzy which the classical world attributed to poets.

[16] pass surpass, excel.

[17] Plautus (c. 254-184 BCE), Roman comic dramatist.

[18] endite compose, write.

Or Terence,[1] thou that with thy pleasant brain
The hearer's mind on stage didst much delight:
What would you say, sirs, if you should behold,
As I have done, the doings of this man?
No word at all, to swear I durst be bold,
But burn with tears that which with mirth began;
I mean your books, by which you gat[2] your name,
To be forgot you would commit to flame.
Alas, I would, Edwards, more tell thy praise,
But at thy name my Muse amazed stays.[3]

[...]

To the Translation of Palingen.[4]

The labour sweet that I sustained in thee,
O Palingen, when I took pen in hand,
Doth grieve me now as oft as I thee see
But half hewed out before mine eyes to stand;
For I must needs (no help) a while go toil
In studies that no kind of muse delight,
And put my plough in gross untilled soil,
And labour thus with overwearied sprite;[5]
But if that God do grant me greater years
And take me not from hence before my time,
The Muses nine, the pleasant singing feres,
Shall so inflame my mind with lust to rhyme
That Palingen, I will not leave thee so,
But finish thee according to my mind.
And if it be my chance away to go,
Let some thee end, that here remain behind.

[...]

Of Money[6]

Give money me, take friendship whoso list,
For friends are gone come once adversity,
When money yet remaineth safe in chest,
That quickly can thee bring from misery;
Fair face show friends when riches do abound;
Come time of proof, farewell, they must away;
Believe me well, they are not to be found
If God but send thee once a louring[7] day.
Gold never starts aside, but in distress
Finds ways enough to ease thine heaviness.

Going towards Spain

Farewell, thou fertile soil that Brutus[8] first out found
When he, poor soul, was driven clean;
from out his country ground;
That northward lay'st thy lusty sides
amid the raging seas,
Whose wealthy land doth foster up
thy people all in ease,
While others scrape and cark[9] abroad,
their simple food to get,
And sely[10] souls take all for good that cometh to the net,[11]
Which they with painful pains do pitch
in barren, burning realms,
While we have all without restraint
among thy wealthy streams.
O blest of God, thou pleasant isle,
where wealth herself doth dwell,
Wherein my tender years I passed,
I bid thee now farewell.

---

1 Terence (c. 185-after 160 BCE), Roman comic dramatist.

2 gat got.

3 stays stops, breaks off, ceases.

4 A reference to the first part of Googe's translation of Marcellus Palingenius' Zodiacus Vitae (The Zodiac of Life), "a philosophical, scientific, satirical epic ... which appealed to Elizabethan reformers because it was placed on the Catholic Church's list of banned books in 1558." See R. Lyne, "Barnabe Googe," DNB online, 2005.

5 sprite spirit.

6 For Turbeville's reply to this poem, see the end of this section, p. 427.

7 louring gloomy, threatening.

8 Brutus the mythical ancestor of the Britons, the great-grandson of the Trojan hero, Aeneas, founder of Rome. English histories recount how Brutus founded London.

9 cark labour anxiously.

10 sely seely: deserving of pity, compassion.

11 sely ... net a variation on the proverb, "All is fish that comes to the net," said of those who make good use of everything (Tilley A136).

For fancy drives me forth abroad and bids me take delight
In leaving thee and ranging far to see some stranger sight.
And sayeth, I was not framed here
to live at home with ease,
But passing forth for knowledge sake,
to cut the foaming seas.

[...]

Coming Homeward out of Spain

O raging seas and mighty Neptune's reign,
In monstrous hills that throwest thyself so high,
That with thy floods dost beat the shores of Spain
And break the clives[1] that dare thy force envy!
Cease now thy rage and lay thine ire aside,
And thou that hast the governance of all,
O mighty God, grant weather, wind, and tide,
Till in my country coast our anchor fall.

—1563

Appendix: From George Turberville's Epitaphs, Epigrams, Songs and Sonnets[2]

To Master Googe's Fancy That Begins "Give money me, take friendship whoso list."

Friend Googe, give me the faithful friend to trust,
And take the fickle coin fro me that lust;[3]
For friends in time of trouble and distress
With help and sound advice will soon redress
Each growing grief that gripes[4] the pensive breast,
When money lies locked up in covert chest.
Thy coin will cause a thousand cares to grow,
Which if thou hast no coin thou couldst not know.
Thy friend no care but comfort will procure;
Of him thou mayst at need thyself assure.
Thy money makes the thief in wait to lie,
Whose fraud thy friend and falsehood will descry.[5]
Thou canst not keep unlocked thy careful[6] coin
But some from thee thy money will purloin.
Thy faithful friend will never start aside,
But take his share of all that shall betide.[7]
When thou art dead thy money is bereft,
But after life thy trusty friend is left:
Thy money serves another master then,
Thy faithful friend links with none other man.
So that, friend Googe, I deem it better, I,
To choose the friend and let the money lie.

—1567

---

1 clives cliffs.

2 George Turberville [Turbervile] (c. 1543/44-d. in or after 1597), poet, translator of Ovid, and author of a book on hunting.

3 fro me that lust i.e., from me that desire (to do so).

4 gripes clutches, grips hard.

5 descry discover, reveal.

6 careful i.e., causing care or worry.

7 betide occur, happen, befall.

Margaret Tyler
fl. 1558-1578

We know very little about Margaret Tyler, the first Englishwoman to translate secular romance and to offer a published defence of the intellectual seriousness of women's writing. Tyler's social class and religion remain topics of controversy. Her prefatory letters to her translation of Diego Ortùñez de Calahorra's Spanish romance Espejo de principes y cavalleros [El Caballero del Febo] (translated as The Mirror of Princely Deeds and Knighthood) indicate that she was a servant in the household of the aristocratic Howard family. Louise Schleiner dates Tyler's service there to the early 1560s, during the lifetime of the powerful matriarch Margaret Audley Howard, duchess of Norfolk. Tyler may have been the wife of one of the family's other servants, John Tyler, who was responsible for the duke's tenant land records, and her evident skill with language and translation suggests that she came from the emerging middle and merchant classes. On the basis of a will dated 1595 and other documentary evidence, it seems likely that Tyler later served in the households of the Woodhouses and Bacons in the 1570s, bore a son named Robert (to whom she left all her worldly goods) and a daughter (who eventually married a man named Ross).[1]

Tyler died in 1595 at Castle Camps, a town near the Cambridge estates of Thomas, Lord Howard, son of her employers and her translation's main dedicatee. Tyler's knowledge of Spanish is unusual, but should not necessarily be taken as conclusive evidence of her Catholicism. Fluency in Spanish would have been highly prized in English merchant circles, given Spain's economic importance at the time; as result, merchants' daughters were sometimes instructed in this language. In addition, Tyler's service in the Catholic Howard family occurred during the tenure of Howard's second wife, the only one of his three wives who was not a Catholic.[2]

The preface to Tyler's translation has been called one of the earliest feminist tracts in English, arguing as it does for Tudor women's right to translate material other than the religious and devotional works to which they were so often confined. Tyler's choice of material would have been immediately controversial given the routine condemnations of Continental romance in sixteenth-century England (see above, for example, Ascham's The Schoolmaster, pp. 337-38 and Vives's The Instruction of a Christian Woman, pp. 106-09). Apart from a fear that the narratives were "tainted" with Catholic ideas and sympathies, English Protestant and humanist writers alike were naturally uneasy with a genre that focused on courtly love. These narratives dramatized the spectacle of woman's erotic dominance over man, challenging some of the period's conventional assumptions about the roles of women. Moreover, the common romance trope of cross-dressing offered the additional and disturbing spectacle of the fluidity and indeterminacy of gender itself. However, Calahorra's Spanish original is unusually thorough in its moralizing comment on conventional romance action and themes, perhaps suggesting why Tyler selected this particular romance for translation.[3]

EDITION: The mirrour of princely deedes and knighthood. London: Thomas East, [1578]. STC 18859.

[1] L. Schleiner, Tudor and Stuart Women Writers (Bloomington, 1994), pp. 19, 22.

[2] L. Schleiner, "Margaret Tyler, Translator and Waiting Woman," English Language Notes 29.3 (1992): 2-5.

[3] D. Eisenberg, An Edition of a Sixteenth-Century Romance of Chivalry: Diego Ortùñez de Calahorra's "Espejo de principes y cavalleros [El Caballero del Febo]" (Baltimore, 1971), p. 122.

from The Mirror of Princely Deeds and Knighthood[1]

To the Right Honourable the Lord Thomas Howard.

Not being greatly forward of mine own inclination, Right Honourable, but forced by the importunity of my friends to make some trial of myself in this exercise of translation, I have adventured upon a piece of work not indeed the most profitablest, as entreating[2] of arms, nor yet altogether fruitless, if example may serve, as being historical, but the while[3] either to be borne withal for the delight or not to be refused for the strangeness. Farther I mean not to make boast of my travail,[4] for the matter was offered not made choice of, as there appeared likewise little liberty in my first yielding. The earnestness of my friends persuaded me that it was convenient to lay forth my talent for increase, or to set my candle on a candlestick, and the consideration of my insufficiency drove me to think it better for my ease either quite to bury my talent—thereby to avoid the breaking of thriftless debts—or rather to put my candle clean out than that it should bewray every unswept corner in my house; but the opinion of my friends' judgement prevailed above mine own reason.

So upon hope to please them, I first undertook this labour, and I have gone through withal the rather to acquaint myself with mine old reading: whereto since the dispatch thereof, I have made my friends privy,[5] and upon their good liking with request thereto, I have passed my grant unto them for the publication, reserving to myself the order for the dedication, so as I should think best either for the defence of my work or for some particular merit towards me. And herein I took no long leisure to find out a sufficient personage, for the manifold benefits received from your honourable parents, my good lord and lady, quickly eased me of that doubt, and presented your Honour unto my view, whom by good right I ought to love and honour in especial, as being of them begotten at whose hands I have reaped especial benefit. The which benefit if I should not so gladly profess openly as I willingly received being offered, I might well be challenged of unkindness. But were I as able to make good my part, as I am not ignorant what may be required at my hands, I would hope not to be found ungrateful.

In the meantime, this my travail I commend unto your lordship, beseeching the same, so to accept thereof as a simple testimony of that good will which I bear to your parents while they lived, then being their servant, and now do owe unto their offspring[6] after their decease, for their demerits.[7] Under your Honour's protection, I shall less fear the assault of the envious, and of your Honour's good acceptation I have some hope in the mildness of your lordship's nature, not doubting but that as your lordship hath given no small signification in this your noble youth of wisdom and courage to so many as know you—it being the only support of your ancestors' line—so the same likewise will maintain your ancestors' glory and the hope of your own virtues with affability and gentleness, which was the proper commendation of your parents. The Almighty increase this hope with the other virtues before named to the good hope of your country's peace, your princess's safety, and your own honour, with the joy of your kindred and friends, whom not a few your parents' good deserving hath assured unto you, and of whose earnest prayers you shall not fail, to further your well doing. Amongst them (though last in worthiness, yet with the foremost in well-wishing

---

[1] The title and subtitles read: The Mirror of Princely Deeds and Knighthood, Wherein is showed the worthiness of the Knight of the Sun, and his brother Rosicleer, sons to the great Emperor Trebatio: With the strange love of the beautiful and excellent princess Briana, and the valiant acts of other noble princes and knights. Now newly translated out of Spanish into our vulgar [i.e., vernacular] English tongue, by M.T.

[2] entreating i.e., treating.

[3] the while for the time, meanwhile.

[4] travail labour, work.

[5] I have made my friends privy i.e., I have made them aware of, made them acquainted with.

[6] offspring descent, derivation, origin.

[7] demerits i.e., merits, virtues.

and desire of well-deserving), your Honour shall find me

Your Honour's humbly most assured,
Margaret Tyler.

M.T. to the Reader.

Thou hast here, gentle reader, the history of Trebatio, an emperor in Greece: whether a true story of him indeed or a feigned fable I wot[1] not, neither did I greatly seek after it in the translation, but by me it is done into English for thy profit and delight.[2] The chief matter therein contained is of exploits of wars, and the parties therein named are especially renowned for their magnanimity and courage. The author's purpose appeareth to be this: to animate thereby and to set on fire the lusty courages of young gentlemen to the advancement of their line by ensuing such like steps. The first tongue wherein it was penned was the Spanish, in which nation by common report the inheritance of all warlike commendation hath to this day rested, the whole discourse in respect of the end not unnecessary, for the variety and continual shift of fresh matter very delightful, in the speeches short and sweet, wise in sentence,[3] and wary in the provision of contrary accidents.[4] For I take the grace thereof to be rather in the reporter's device than in the truth of this report, as I would that I could so well impart with thee the delight which myself findeth in reading the Spanish; but seldom is the tale carried clean from another's mouth.

Such delivery as I have made I hope thou wilt friendly accept, the rather for that it is a woman's work, though in a story profane and a matter more manlike than becometh my sex.[5] But as for the manliness of the matter, thou knowest that it is not necessary for every trumpeter or drumsler[6] in the war to be a good fighter. They take wage only to incite others, though themselves have privy[7] maims and are thereby recureless.[8] So, gentle reader, if my travail in Englishing this author may bring thee to a liking of the virtues herein commended, and by example thereof in thy prince's and country's quarrel to hazard thy person and purchase good name, as for hope of well deserving myself that way, I neither bend myself thereto nor yet fear the speech of people if I be found backward. I trust every man holds not the plough which would the ground were tilled, and it is no sin to talk of Robin Hood though you never shot in his bow. Or be it that the attempt were bold to intermeddle in arms (so as the ancient Amazons did, and in this story Claridiana doth, and in other stories not a few), yet to report of arms is not so odious but that it may be borne withal, not only in you men which yourselves are fighters, but in us women to whom the benefit in equal part appertaineth of your victories, either for that the matter is so commendable that it carrieth no discredit from the homeliness of the speaker, or for that it is so generally known that it fitteth every man to speak thereof, or for that it jumpeth[9] with this common fear on all parts of war and invasion. The invention, disposition, trimming, and what else in this story is wholly another man's, my part none therein but the translation, as it were only in giving entertainment to a stranger before this time unacquainted with our country guise.[10] Marry, the worst perhaps is this: that among so many strangers as daily come over—some more ancient, and some but new set forth, some penning matters of great weight and sadness in divinity or other studies (the profession whereof more nearly beseemeth my years),[11] other some discoursing of matters more easy and ordinary in common talk, wherein a gentlewoman may honestly employ her travail—I have notwithstanding made counte-

[1] wot to know, understand.
[2] <*> The commendation of the story [Mirror's note].
[3] sentence pithy or pointed saying; an aphorism or wise maxim.
[4] accidents occurrence, incident.
[5] <*> That a woman may write of war [Mirror's note].
[6] drumsler drummer (German derivation).
[7] privy private, concealed, secret.
[8] recurless incurable.
[9] jumpeth agrees, is in concordance with.
[10] guise custom, habit, or practice; the ways of a nation.
[11] <*> That a woman of your years may write in this argument [Mirror's note].

nance[1] only to this gentleman, whom neither his personage might sufficiently commend itself unto my sex, nor his behaviour (being light[2] and soldierlike) might in good order acquaint itself with my years.

So that the question now ariseth of my choice not of my labour, wherefore I preferred this story before matter of more importance. For answer whereto, gentle reader, the truth is that as the first motion to this kind of labour came not from myself, so was this piece of work put upon me by others, and they which first counselled me to fall to work took upon them also to be my taskmasters and overseers lest I should be idle. And yet because the refusal was in my power, I must stand to answer for my easy yielding, and may not be unprovided of excuse, wherein if I should allege for myself that matters of less worthiness by as aged years have been taken in hand, and that daily new devices are published in songs, sonnets, interludes, and other discourses, and yet are borne out without reproach only to please the humour[3] of some men: I think I should make no good plea therein, for besides that I should find thereby so many known enemies as known men have been authors of such idle conceits,[4] yet would my other adversaries be never the rather quieted, for they would say that as well the one as the other were all naught. And though peradventure[5] I might pass unknown amongst a multitude and not be the only gaze or the odd party in my ill-doing, yet because there is less merit of pardon if the fault be excused as common, I will not make that my defence which cannot help me and doth hinder other men. But my defence is by example of the best, amongst which many have dedicated their labours—some stories, some of war, some physic,[6] some law, some as concerning government, some divine matters—unto divers[7] ladies and gentlewomen. And if men may and do bestow such of their travails upon gentlewomen, then may we women read such of their works as they dedicate unto us. And if we may read them, why not farther wade in them to the search of a truth? And then much more why not deal by translation in such arguments, especially this kind of exercise being a matter of more heed than of deep invention or exquisite learning? And they must needs leave this as confessed: that in their dedications they mind not only to borrow names of worthy personages but the testimonies also for their further credit, which neither the one may demand without ambition nor the other grant without overlightness. If women be excluded from the view of such works as appear in their name, or if glory only be sought in our common inscriptions, it mattereth not whether the parties be men or women, whether alive or dead. But to return, whatsomever the truth is—whether that women may not at all discourse in learning, for men lay in their claim to be sole possessioners of knowledge, or whether they may in some manner that is by limitation or appointment in some kind of learning—my persuasion hath been thus: that it is all one for a woman to pen a story as for a man to address his story to a woman. But amongst all my ill-willers, some I hope are not so strait[8] that they would enforce me necessarily either not to write or to write of divinity.[9] Whereas neither durst I trust mine own judgement sufficiently if matter of controversy were handled, nor yet could I find any book in the tongue which would not breed offence to some.

But I perceive some may be rather angry to see their Spanish delight turned to an English pastime. They could well allow the story in Spanish, but they may not afford it so cheap, or they would have it proper to themselves.[10] What natures such 1 made countenance to assume or have a certain demeanour or attitude; to comport oneself towards.

---

2 light of persons: not commanding respect by position or character; frivolous; when used of women: wanton and unchaste.

3 humour predominant temper or disposition.

4 conceits conception, notion.

5 peradventure perhaps.

6 physic medicine; the medical profession.

7 divers various, sundry, several.

8 strait severe, stern, exacting.

9 <*> That you may not write of divinity [Mirror's note].

10 <*> That you meant to make a common benefit of your pains [Mirror's note].

men be of, I list[1] not greatly dispute, but my meaning hath been to make other partners of my liking, as I doubt not, gentle reader, but if it shall please thee after serious matters to sport thyself with this Spaniard, that thou shalt find in him the just reward of malice and cowardice, with the good speed of honesty and courage,[2] being able to furnish thee with sufficient store of foreign example to both purposes. And as in such matters, which have been rather devised to beguile[3] time than to breed matter of sad learning, he hath ever borne away the prize which could season such delights with some profitable reading, so shalt thou have this stranger an honest man when need serveth, and at other times either a good companion to drive out a weary night or a merry jest at thy board.[4]

And thus much as concerning this present story, that it is neither unseemly for a woman to deal in, neither greatly requiring a less staid age than mine is. But of these two points, gentle reader, I thought to give thee warning, lest perhaps understanding of my name and years thou mightest be carried into a wrong suspect of my boldness and rashness, from which I would gladly free myself by this plain excuse, and if I may deserve thy good favour by like labour, when the choice is mine own I will have a special regard of thy liking.

So I wish thee well.

Thine to use, M.T.

Chapter 38.
The Gentlewomen Brought the Body of Brandagedeon to the Court, and the Princesses Received the Letters of Their Knights.

Great was the grief which the Princess Olivia felt by the absence of Rosicleer, that neither her high estate nor the courtly disports sufficed to make her forget her care or help her to cover her liking, but in her lodging she would be without company in the day and in the night without sleep, ever wishing to see him again whom she loved more than herself, for her mind prophesied to her that she should not see him very quickly; and as it is natural for the patient to communicate his grief with the physician, judging this some ease where the principal remedy wanteth, so the fair princess, as unacquainted and to begin in such passions, not being able at the first to counsel herself otherwise, thought it best to discover her grief to one of her gentlewomen named Fidelia, the faithfullest and most secret of her household, the which many times had importuned her to know the cause of her sorrow; and one night, as she was alone with her, the Princess said to her:

"Thou knowest, my Fidelia, how among all the ladies and gentlewomen which I have, I have chosen thee only for the faithful treasurer of my secrets, and I have not done nor thought the thing which I have not imparted with thee, which hath come to pass only by the loyal and good service wherein I have always found thee pliant and diligent. With the like confidence unto that which I always have reposed in thee, I will unfold unto thee a secret, which none in the world myself except and thyself shall learn at my hand, in the concealing whereof unto this day I have a thousand times endured little less than death. And the matter is such that it is unfitting for anyone to be a dealer therein but myself and thyself whom I account as myself. At a word, my Fidelia, that tyrant love, which spareth neither high nor low, hath taken possession of me by the great prowess and beauty of the new knight, and I am sure that but my death nothing can set me free. Although I have studied all possible means of my liberty, and thereto have set the defence of my honesty and great estate to withstand this conceit, yet for all that I can do as long as this knight's race[5] is unknown I cannot ease myself, my former remedies serving me only against the temptation of the

[1] list desire, wish.

[2] <*> The use and profit of this Spanish translation [Mirror's note].

[3] beguile to spend, waste.

[4] board table used for meals, usually referring to one spread with food.

[5] race lineage; family, house, kin.

flesh and not to drive out the remembrance of his personage, whence my desire springeth. And truly I cannot persuade myself other than that this knight's offspring[1] is right noble, he being of so courtlike behaviour and knightly prowess, the truth hereof being somewhat more incredible than the lying fables of our ancient poets. Now if he be a prince born, the only hope to have him for husband, my father and he being therewith pleased, may yield one some comfort in the meantime, while opportunity serveth for the final accomplishment. Wherefore, mine own Fidelia, seeing that I have fully laid open the bottom of my heart, that which remaineth on thy part is to travail with his squire or some other to wit[2] of what parentage Rosicleer is."

Fidelia had listened very attentively to that which her lady had said, and as she was very wise, so perceiving by the drift of the speech that neither her mistress's malady could be removed by counsel nor that she would accept of it if it were bestowed (besides that, that her desire was lawful to match with Rosicleer, if there were no disparage[3] in his stock), she could not gainsay her mistress in flat terms, but made answer that sith[4] her Grace had laid that charge upon her, she was content to receive, as also ready to offer her service in any other thing for this matter which she now moved. She said that sith her Grace's purpose was so good, she should not need to remember her farther in it, for that so soon as Rosicleer should return she would be in hand with his squire to boult out[5] the truth of everything.

"And yet," sayeth she, "I cannot believe by reason of his magnanimity but that he is descended from some noble progeny, which if it so be I like very well that your Grace is so affectioned towards him; otherwise, I dare not advise you, but yet I will tell you my fancy: it were better for you to abide some pain than to make your head of your underling." The beautiful Princess was well apaid[6] at this counsel so jumping with her former determination, and it greatly assuaged the malice[7] of her passion in that she had bewrayed it to her trusty servant.

The next day the gentlewomen entered into the palace, driving a horse before them loaded with the giant's body. At their entrance the hurly-burly in the court was so great, every man running to see the wonder, that the king with all those which were with him and the Princess Olivia with her gentlewomen ran to their windows to see what the matter was, and when they saw the giant they knew him, and, as newly abashed at Rosicleer's virtues, they began to commend of him as of the best knight in the world. The gentlewomen presently were brought before the King, which received them courteously, and they in order declared unto him and the rest that which had chanced to Rosicleer since his departure from the city. The King liked very well of all, save that when they told him that the knights could not return presently as minding to pursue adventures. For the King feared, lest by being so much inclined to knightly deeds, their good success would carry them farther off than should be for his pleasure. But the gentlewomen departed from the king to do their message unto the Princess Olivia, whom they found in her chamber with the two other princesses in her company. Coming before her, they delivered their message with commendations from Rosicleer and the two princes, which had sent her that giant so dead as a satisfaction in some part for the detaining of her jewels. The Princess, pleasantly laughing at that present, caused the gentlewomen to go on in that story and to make report of all occurrences in their journey, which they did so faithfully that the princess in the telling was not able to colour her affection towards Rosicleer. This tale ended, Arinda gave into her hands the packet, which the Princess opened, and turning over the jewels found a letter, which she put in her bosom taking it to be

[1] offspring descent.
[2] wit know.
[3] disparage inequality (in rank); disparagement, dishonour.
[4] sith seeing that, since.
[5] to boult out to separate by sifting, as through a sieve or bolting-cloth.
[6] apaid satisfied, contented, pleased.
[7] malice virulence; harmfulness.

Briana's, and in like sort the gentlewoman of Lusitania made delivery of Bargandel and Liriamandro's letters unto their ladies, with the coffer unto Rodasilva. The two princesses Silverina and Rodasilva, being great friends, went both together in a closet to read without interruption their loves' letters, so eloquent and so fraught with amorous speeches, which much rejoiced the young ladies to be beloved of so good knights; and not to break off their several commendations of their knights and lords, we will speak of the Princess Olivia, who, being left alone for the company of the two princesses, dispatched her other gentlewomen into divers parts of the chamber, to have a more secret survey of Briana's letters.

When she had read on through that which was delivered with the packet, she took that other out of her bosom, which she had found in ransacking the packet, and opening it she saw in capital letters ROSICLEER subscribed, whereby she knew it to be his, and somewhat troubled she folded it up quickly again, minding to learn by what means that letter was hid among the jewels. And therefore calling Arinda she asked if that anyone had unlocked the coffer after that her lady had delivered it unto her. Arinda, supposing that the Princess had wanted[1] something, answered:

"No truly, madam, for I have always kept the keys, and nobody ever had them at my hands but Rosicleer, which requested to see the jewels when we were in the keeper's lodge, and in my presence he shut it, restoring me the keys and not taking out ought whereof I can accuse him."

The Princess, smelling out Rosicleer's shift, and somewhat smiling withal to hear whereunto Arinda had construed her meaning, replied merely thus: "I asked it not, gentle friend, for that I thought there wanted anything in the coffer, for it was wholly lost when it was in Brandagedeon's power, but I asked it for that I marvelled it fell out so well, when Brandagedeon was the keeper."

Arinda waxing bold hereat: "Nay marry," sayeth she, "with your favour, noble Princess, Brandagedeon misgiving in his mind how little time he should enjoy it took little care for the opening."

So this question who opened it was concluded in a laughter, and little talk continued after. The Princess thinking long till she might alone read Rosicleer's letter, and therefore somewhat earlier than she was wont, she withdrew herself into her bedchamber with only Fidelia in her company to see her in bed. When the door was fastened, she drew out Rosicleer's letter, and, not having power herself to read it, she gave it unto Fidelia. The tenor of the loving letter was this, which hereafter followeth:

Unto the Most Excellent Princess,
the Princess Olivia,

That which is appointed by God, mighty Princess, may not by man's power be altered or perverted, as in myself I prove it, for since that mine eyes first told me of your beauty, and my judgement gave consent thereto, and that my will hath procured liking thereof in my affection, I have felt an alteration in me so incurable that, striving with it both by art and nature, I have not hitherto found my remedy. Which thing, good madam, I trust cannot seem more unlikely to you,[2] than it hath been to me in the feeling terrible. The clap of the thunder is the greater when it meeteth with the thicket able to make more resistance, longer lasts the kindled fire in the builded oak than in the parched straw, and more vehement is the fight between two enemies than when the one yieldeth. What force love hath as I could well wish your ladyship to consider in me or to feel in yourself, so at least I beseech you to weigh by others and to believe report: how that with light assaults he beateth down the stoutest courages, and with gentle cords bindeth the biggest arms; that his force neither the wisest nor the mightiest were able to resist; that from his subjection not Julius Caesar, the great monarch of the world, could free himself;[3] that he

[1] wanted lacked.

[2] you Obscured in the first edition, this word is supplied from the second (The First Part of the Mirror of Princely Deeds and Knighthood, 1580).

[3] Julius Caesar ... himself perhaps referring to Julius Caesar's ancient reputation as a womanizer.

quelled the pride of the mighty Carthaginian in the delights of Capua,[1] and fettered Mars and Jupiter[2] (two gods of the Gentiles) in chains of iron; that he transformeth men into sundry shapes, and as it were by sudden enchantment framed the arm-strong Hercules[3] to the distaff and spindle, Aristotle to be bridled and saddled;[4] that he climbeth the highest towers and stretcheth to the lowest valley; that he divideth the hard rocks and bloweth through the easy passages: to conclude, nothing so strong and invincible, but that love can overthrow, and doth what him listeth. So that if I confessed myself yielden under so mighty a conqueror, I should yet be blameless for my cowardice. Yet what have I not attempted, if either counsel of friends or mine own wit, either physic's cure or mirth of company might have warranted my quietness? So God, good madam, speed my writing, as I meant not to trouble you with my letters. But the weak complain, and the diseased seek remedy, as what grief is so great or wound so wide but it hath some redress or other provided in nature. To you, therefore, good madam, thus boldly have I discovered my unrest, that by your means (whence only I may hope for it) I may receive comfort. And so attending your Highness's answer, either of life or death, I humbly kiss your princely hand.

The resolved to love or not to live,
Poor Rosicleer.

Rosicleer penned this letter either not well in his wits or else greatly perplexed in his thought so hard it is to find an issue,[5] but I believe rather that it came from heart to hand, and was so set down, without farther advice.[6] Yet in the meantime that Fidelia read the letter, the fair Princess broad awake to hear those amorous words, and feeling them in her heart with the like love wherein Rosicleer wrote them. When it was ended, heaping out abundance of sighs upon the argument of the letter, she said unto Fidelia:

"Ah Fidelia, what force may a tender gentlewoman as I am have for to resist the tyranny of love, when so many famous and so mighty princes could never conquer him? How may I overcome him which hath had the mastery of so many? Tell me, Fidelia, and counsel me what I have to do in this matter, for I mistrust my own wisdom, and very selde[7] is the passionate's judgement very sure and requisite."

Fidelia, nothing wondering at that effect which love had wrought in the Princess, her lady, for she rather wished herself worthy of so glorious pain, answered her thus: "Madam, to counsel you aright were to will you to defy love, and to abandon Rosicleer's company, and yet the words of this letter leaveth in me a doubt thereof if the matter be as true as the words importeth. Next were to desire you to have an eye unto your high estate, which yet me thinketh is not necessary, for I know you to be so wise as that you will hazard death rather than commit a thing so prejudicial to your honour. Now there remaineth only to learn out Rosicleer's lineage, that if he be such a one as may marry you without disworship, you may then begin the

[1] the mighty Carthaginian in the delights of Capua When the Carthaginian general Hannibal, having invaded Italy, was on the verge of marching on Rome, he retired to the pleasure city of Capua, notorious for its enervating voluptuousness.

[2] Mars and Jupiter Mars, god of war, had an affair with Venus, goddess of love; her husband, Vulcan, god of fire and the forge, trapped them in bed with a net, exposing them to the ridicule of the gods; Jupiter, king of the gods, had numerous sexual affairs with mortal women.

[3] Hercules classical hero; as a slave to Omphale, queen of Lydia, he was dressed in women's clothes and forced to do women's work, such as spinning and weaving.

[4] Aristotle to be bridled and saddled In the popular and frequently retold medieval tale about Aristotle, Alexander, and Alexander's mistress Phyllis, Alexander heeds Aristotle's advice to stop neglecting his public duties by spending all of his time with Phyllis. Phyllis revenges herself on Aristotle by using all her wiles to cause the philosopher to fall in love with her. When he begs her to have sex with him, she says she will do so only on one condition: that he will allow himself to be bridled and saddled like a horse and then carry her around on his back. Having agreed to watch from a window, Alexander reproaches Aristotle, who replies that if a wise philosopher can be besotted by desire, then a young man (like Alexander) needs to be doubly cautious when dealing with a beautiful woman.

[5] issue the outcome or upshot of an argument.

[6] advice consideration, deliberation.

[7] selde i.e., seldom ("sielde" in original).

redress of both your wrongs; otherwise, if he fail in that point, the first counsel will be most convenient: to eschew his presence, which shall in time do away this affection, as in time all things are forgotten."

Here the Princess, interrupting Fidelia's speech, replied in this manner: "Ah Fidelia, you think me not such a one but that although the love which I bear unto Rosicleer be such that it procureth me to will his presence, if he fail in gentry, I will rather chastise his boldness with perpetual exile out of this land, than give him comfort to the impair of my credit,[1] and sooner will I die a hundred times, than bestow a countenance upon such a one. But this I judge of Rosicleer by the pure and loyal love which he meaneth towards me: that it is likely he may merit me for wife, otherwise it is to be thought that in a knight so virtuous there cannot lie hidden such impudency as to move a lady unto her dishonour."

In such like talk after the letter read the Princess and Fidelia passed the most part of the night till Fidelia took her leave, the Princess notwithstanding still canvassing[2] over the letter of Rosicleer, and every sweet word which he had written, and she prayed to God with all her heart that he might prove such a one as was not unfitting for a queen's marriage.

Chapter 45.
The Three Princes Which Went in the Quest of Rosicleer Were Transported into the Empire of Trabisond, Where Chanced to Them a Fair Adventure.

As the valiant deeds of Rosicleer while he was there caused great joy in the court of King Oliverio, so no less was the grief there for his sudden departure amongst his friends; yet all these sorrows joined in one might not be equal to that which the fair Olivia felt, for she, seeing she had been the cause thereof, took thereat such inward grief that she became both weak and pale and her father with the whole court greatly lamented for her. In this general sorrow for the loss of Rosicleer, you must think that the princesses Rodasilva and Silverina were not free, for the loss of Rosicleer procured the absence of their loves. So as the history recounteth that they two together with the valiant Prince Zoylo took upon them the search of him, and therefore let us leave the court of King Oliverio to tell you of them.

Thus it is, that after they were all embarked in the haven which was nearest to London they sailed forwards a month's sailing, not desiring to bend either this way or that way. At the end of the month, rather upon chance than their purpose, they were driven upon the coast of Trabisond, where yet glad they were when the country was descried to see it and to abide there. Coming to land armed with their rich armour and their esquires accompanying them, they took their horse, and riding through a beaten path at the side of a pleasant wood they heard a noise, whereat being moved they turned back to see what it might be.

Out of the thickest of the wood they saw a wild boar driving so fast as possibly it might, and in the pursuit thereof a young gentlewoman upon a mighty courser and a boar spear in her right hand. Her hunter's weed was all of green velvet, her tresses hanging down in colour like the gold of Araby, in her left hand a wand of gold and two rich pearls hanging at her ears. She came spurring her horse in such wise and with such courage to overtake the boar that she much delighted them, and at such time as the boar crossed the way between them and her she struck the boar on the flank, that her spear appeared at the other side of the boar.

The game was got, and the lady not taking heed of the other knights, perhaps shadowed by the trees, returned with soft paces to her company, but the knights overtook her and (as I may say) abashed at that which they had seen, at her graces and beauty, they only gazed one upon the other not once making offer to salute her, whereat the lady more bold than the men, as it were to awake

---

1 impair of my credit injuring of my reputation.

2 canvassing scrutinize, examine.

them out of their dreams, took and winded a fair horn, which hung at her neck, so loud and shrill that all the forest and valleys rang thereof, and when she had thus done she came to the three princes, in her seeming the properest knights that ever she set eye on, whom she friendly welcomed on this wise:[1] "God save you, gentle knights, and send you the comfort of your loves, for by your sad and demure looks it seems you are either strangers or others' thrall."

The knights turning towards her made their courteous obeisance, and for them the valiant Tartarian spoke in this manner: "Madam, we have stood astonished neither for strangeness nor for ill success in love, which some of us have not yet tried, but only for the thought of your beauty, being a lady huntress as if you were Diana,[2] which in like attire was wont to hunt the forests. But as you say we are strangers indeed, and because we would carry somewhat worth the telling, we crave your name and the fashions of the country."

The lady, delighted in the good behaviour of the three knights and tickled with the words of the Tartarian, in great majesty answered him: "Assuredly, sir knight, I know no cause you have to marvel at me, but rather I at you. For if I seem to you like to Diana, the goddess of the Gentiles, you likewise seem to me the three sons of Priamus—Hector, Paris and Troilus[3]—not far inferior in renown to the gods themselves. Whereas you desire me to make you know who I am, I will do it gladly but yet conditionally, that afterwards you tell me your name and country. This shall be one for one, and by just exchange we shall hereafter find peace. Wit[4] you now that I am called Claridiana, the daughter to Theodoro, lord of this empire, and to the Empress Diana, queen of the Amazons, which two having been mortal enemies, as by long wars appeareth continued hotly on either part, they were after great friends, meeting in a pitched field,[5] either being then young and unmarried. I am their only child, which since my young years have been brought up in hunting, and I am promised to be made knight, for my mother being but young achieved such enterprises that in her time there was no knight more famous, and I am desirous to be somewhat like unto her especially in that point. And now, sir knights, tell me who you are, for I would well accompany such lusty knights."

The Tartarian, who had first taken in hand to speak, answered: "Noble Princess, we were sure enough that there wanted not in you the divinity we spoke of, but yet we failed in the name, for so many graces which accompany you could not be in a lady of less estate, as my religion being paganisive[6] would rather have induced me to take you for the daughter of Jupiter[7] than of the Emperor Theodoro. And now sith your Excellency hath showed us such undeserved favour as to tell us who you are, it is reason that we obey in telling who we are and where we were born. This knight (pointing to Bargandel) sayeth he is the Prince Bargandel, the king's son of Bohemia, this (by Liriamandro) sayeth he is the Prince of Hungary called Liriamandro, and I am called Zoylo, son to the king of Tartary. We have joined for adventure, beginning in the great Britain, to find a new knight, a friend of ours, taken from us we wot[8] not how. Him we are determined to look in the world, and we have already sailed a month since we left England, so this morning we landed here very glad to have found your Highness."

"God be praised," said the Princess, "for the names of so high princes ought not to be concealed, especially here where the Emperor, my father, would be glad of such knights for the honour which his court should receive thereby, and I for my part would think it a great courtesy in you

---

1 on this wise i.e., in this way or manner.

2 Diana goddess of virginity and the hunt.

3 sons of Priamus—Hector, Paris and Troilus sons of the king of Troy, all warriors during the Trojan war.

4 Wit know.

5 pitched field one decided upon in advance and prepared in an orderly manner for a battle.

6 paganisive pagan.

7 daughter of Jupiter Minerva, goddess of wisdom, war, and the liberal arts, who sprung full-grown out of the head of her father.

8 wot know.

if you would stay here till I were knighted, for by such noble princes might I be honoured. In the meanwhile, the courtesy which our court can afford shall be accomplished to the full, and after that you may turn you to your purposed journey."

The Princess had thus said, and straightways there came from the forest thirty gentlewomen on rich palfreys[1] and in long weeds[2] of green taffeta, among them also a troop of more than thirty knights all surely armed with their spears in their hands, coming to seek the Princess, which being better horsed than they had killed the boar long before their approach.

The Princess when she saw them said to the three princes: "My good lords, if you thought it not amiss, I would see what my knights would do in my defence."

Bargandel answered, "Noble lady, the thing cannot displease us which contenteth you. We will endanger our persons to serve you."

The Princess then called her knights and said unto them: "In good time, my friends, are you come. These three knights whom you see here would have carried me away against my will. But I prayed them not to offer such wrong to a gentlewoman, and, if they would therewith satisfy themselves, I offered them that of my knights so many as they should hurl down or unhorse, they should have so many of my gentlewomen for reward, and themselves or any of them were overthrown that then the party faulting should forfeit horse and harness. Hereto they have agreed. Now do the best you can to defend the gentlewomen which are in your company."

Here the Prince Zoylo which knew the Princess's meaning said unto her: "Nay, madam, let us first know whether the gentlewomen will yield to our covenant or no, and let their knights speak for them."

"Marry,"[3] answered the knights, "we are content."

"Yea, but so are not we," said the gentlewomen. "Shall we say they venture imprisonment upon our knights and they lose nothing, they may betray us if they will, but we fear rather that it will not be in their power."

"Yea, marry," answered the knights, "you are now wise! But if you be so fearful, we pray you alter the jousts to the trial of the sword, and you shall see presently these knights both ashamed and unhorsed."

"Nay, but yet," quoth the gentlewomen, "we had need of better warrants than your words. But if you will deal with our knights as we would have you, you must wager your horse and armour to be given them with us if you fail, and hereto we request these knights strangers otherwise to discharge the princess of her promise."

The three princes feigned to mislike the gentlewomen's device,[4] and the knights of the country were angry to see how little hope their gentlewomen had in them. So coming unto the three princes, they said unto them: "Sir knights, you may behold here that our gentlewomen are not content with the first match. Therefore, we will unbind it and lose as much as you should; therefore, take to yourselves so much of the field as you shall think good, and let us to the joust, for we will deceive the women of the little hope they have in our virtue." Three of the knights at this alarm prepared themselves to joust and the three princes did as much, glad to show there their manhood.

The three first knights were borne down horse and man to the great discomfit of the ladies, whereof one mocked her knight for his courage crying, "Marry, it seems, sir knight, that I might have been safe between your arms when you know not how to sit sure within your saddle." Which words caused as great laughter in the Princess as shame and confusion to the knights which were on the ground.

Then came three others which doing as much as the others were in like manner welcomed. So that, to make short tale, from three to three the princes unhorsed [the] whole thirty, and no man

[1] palfreys saddle-horses for ordinary riding as distinguished from warhorses; especially small saddle-horses for ladies.

[2] weeds garments.

[3] Marry "Why, to be sure!"

[4] device plan, scheme, project.

offered a second course. But yet the shame of their falls so egged them on that they demanded the combat with the swords. Hereat the knights, which knew well enough the Princess' purpose, made a great stay, as it were to consult with their power, being strangers and but three. In the end say they, "You know that the price which was ordained at these jousts were your horse and armour, the which you have lost. If you will, therefore, needs urge us to the combat with the swords, lay away your horse and armour, which are ours, and come your ways. Otherwise, you must beg the use of them at these gentlewomen, to whom we surrender our whole title."

"Marry," said one of the gentlewomen, "my lords, we accept of your courtesy, and here we else stay the combat, for we will not give them leave the second time to lose both themselves[1] and us." The knights were so ashamed, as well for[2] the princes' words as for the gentlewoman's rebuke, that altogether with their swords drawn they would have rushed upon the strangers, if the Princess coming between had not stayed them, speaking to the strangers that this was sufficient, and it greatly liked her that they had thus showed their valour.

Whereto Prince Zoylo answered, "Madam, we have besides to demand our prizes which we will not otherwise remit but to yourself." Whereat smiling, they all unbuckled their helmets, Bargandel and Liriamandro being then of the age of twenty years, seeming so beautiful that as well the gentlewomen as the knights were amazed at them. After them the Tartarian showed himself, who although he was a Morian born, and somewhat of colour tawny, yet had he a manly countenance, and therewithal pleasant, that he pleased them as well as his companions.

"With this there are no more foes to be feared as it appeareth," said the Princess, "if you challengers unarm yourselves. But if it be no grief to you, let us go together to the city of Trabisond, not being far off, for at your instance I may the sooner receive the order."[3] The princes thanking the lady for that favour prepared themselves to obey her command, so rid they on with the Princess towards Trabisond, where they stayed about fifteen days, much increasing their honour at the feasts proclaimed for the knighting of the inheritress, they being made known to none but to the Princess; here likewise the great prowess which the Princess Claridiana showed were such that every man was amazed at them.

Albeit the three princes never jousted against her, but hereafter you shall hear sufficiently of her and them. Now to the two princes Brandizel and Clavergudo, whom we left in the kingdom of Persia very sad for the loss of their dear friend, the worthy Knight of the Sun.

—1578

[1] themselves Obscured in the first edition, this word is supplied from the second.

[2] as well for Obscured in the first edition, these words are supplied from the second.

[3] order i.e., the order of knighthood.

Richard Rogers
1551-1618

Richard Rogers was born into a family of tradesmen: his father was a joiner and his grandfather a carpenter.[1] The youngest of three children, Rogers went on to become a highly respected Puritan minister and writer, of whom fellow nonconformist Nathaniel Vincent wrote in 1677 that "England hardly ever brought forth a man that walked more closely with God."[2] After attending Cambridge University (Christ's College) as a "sizar" (a poor student who paid his way by acting as a servant for fellow students) and graduating with a Bachelor's degree in 1570/71, he was ordained.

Rogers went on to Caius College (Cambridge), taking a Master's degree in 1574. His first posting was as a curate to William Harrison (author of The Description of England), and during his time in Radminster (Essex) "he mobilized prosperous godly men to assist him in governing the parish."[3] Around 1577, he became a lecturer at Wethersfield, Essex, where he spent the rest of his life. Although Rogers was clearly appointed by local Puritan sympathizers to deliver weekly sermons, his diary suggests that he was also the acting minister in the parish, the curate for the non-resident incumbent, John Ludham.[4]

Like many Puritan divines Rogers came into conflict with the Church hierarchy, experiencing alternating periods of toleration and persecution depending on the sympathies of particular bishops and archbishops. His diary entries reflect a deep involvement in "that associational movement of clergy" that has come to be known as "presbyterian or classical," with Rogers becoming "a noted leader of the regional conference."[5] He was suspended—in other words, Archbishop Whitgift (c. 1530-1604) forbade him from preaching—in 1583; brought before the ecclesiastical commission in 1598; and punished yet again in 1603 for refusing to take the ex officio oath (an oath which required the accused to swear to answer truthfully any questions asked him, with no provision against self-incrimination). Each time important patrons intervened on his behalf, among them Sir Robert Wroth and William, Lord Knollys. From 1604 to 1607, Rogers experienced a less rigorous episcopal discipline under Bishop Richard Vaughan, but renewed persecution followed under Vaughan's successor.[6]

Rogers married twice. There is some uncertainty about the identity of his first wife.[7] There is evidence that Rogers and his first wife had a number of children, six of whom survived him.[8] He does not seem to have had any children with his second wife, Susan Ward, although he acquired a number of stepchildren.[9] He died and was buried in Wethersfield on 21 April 1618.

Richard Rogers published a number of works, the most famous of which was Seven Treatises, which was published in five editions between 1603 and 1630, and amounted to "a systematic treatise on Christian living, based largely on his own experience."[10] Rogers' diary remained in manuscript until Knappen's selected edition in 1966.

EDITION: Excerpts from Richard Rogers's diary in Two Elizabethan Puritan Diaries by Richard Rogers and Samuel Ward. Ed. M.M. Knappen (Gloucester, MA, 1966) are reprinted with the permission of Peter Smith Publisher, Inc., Gloucester, MA.

---

1 M.M. Knappen, "The Life of Richard Rogers," in Two Elizabethan Puritan Diaries by Richard Rogers and Samuel Ward, ed. and introduction by M.M. Knappen (Gloucester, MA, 1966), p. 19.

2 Ibid., p. 34.

3 F.J. Bremer, "Richard Rogers [1551-1618]," DNB online, 2005.

4 Knappen, "The Life of Richard Rogers," p. 20.

5 Bremer, "Richard Rogers."

6 "Richard Rogers [1550?-1618]," DNB, p. 138.

7 On the evidence of the diary, Knappen states that Rogers's first wife was named "Barbara" (see, for example the entry for 29 November 1587, below), but that the manuscript gives no indication of her last name. However, Francis J. Bremer, Rogers's most recent DNB biographer, says that Rogers's first wife was Mary Duckfield ("Richard Rogers," DNB online, 2005).

8 Knappen, "The Life," pp. 32-33.

9 Ibid., p. 23

10 Ibid., p. 32.

from The Diary of Richard Rogers[1]

[...]

July [?], 1587. [...] O Lord, whither should I run if thou didst not mercifully draw me back? This I wrote this evening. And good change by sensible feeling of mine unworthiness there was in remembering and setting down these things, over[2] there was before, for before I had gone about this I was utterly unsettled both in study and mind and nothing could be gone about roundly.[3] I saw from day to day that many things in me were to be called into exam[ination], but I could not clearly see into them nor willingly go about the looking into them. Thus was I holden off[4] a long time, although it had been meet[5] for me to have set down mine estate[6] for this month long before. Yet so many things were molesting me, one after another, that, being very profitable for me and nearly concerning me, I took this in hand, persuading myself that I should neither have called myself to an account about these matters now neither many other times about the like if I had not tied myself to this course of writing.[7] And thus although with too much negligence it be looked after of me, as most other things also are, yet this profit I have oft reaped of the using of it: that sometime I am drawn to not the time past in writing, having propounded it with myself, whereas otherwise I fear I should have entered into no considerations at all about such matters as did necessarily give me cause to weigh them deeply. To be sure I should soon forget them. And this morning I do more throughly[8] see into the goodness of my God in not punishing these my trespasses in some grievous manner, as by giving me over into some presumptuous sin, or delivering me into their hands, again to be baited and brought to make better use of my time, by whom heretofore I have been, with others, unmercifully dealt withal.[9] [...] One thing this time I remember that going among a company of bad fellows [...] [illegible] I prayed espec[ially] for wisdom and grace if I should have to deal with them. I by means of that did, in reasoning with one young man who is become a very atheist, receive a sensible blessing of my prayer that I was not thrust through by him for being earnest against his atheism, who stiffly held that all the sort of profess[ors] were rank hippocr[ites] and the worst of any.

Thus I have set down some part of those things which have fallen out this month and the sweet peace which I find and feel since I wrote this, which seasoneth mine heart with aptness and willingness to do duty aright, differeth unspeakably from that untowardness[10] which before was in me. For in this estate my mind is on some good thing with delight and upon transitory things with[11] little regarding them. But before it was my chiefest delight[12] to be thinking upon any profit or vain pleasure, even long before I had to do with

---

[1] A note on the text: the editors would like to thank Peter Smith Publishers (Gloucester, MA, 1966) for permission to print the following excerpts from "Rogers's Diary." For his kind assistance, the editors would also like to thank Dr. David Wykes, director of the Dr. Williams' Library, which holds both the original manuscript (Baxter MSS 61.13*) and the Knappen typescript. Knappen noted Rogers's marginal annotations, corrections, additions, and textual underlining, as well as places where the original is torn and stained and consequently unreadable. We reproduce Knappen's own square brackets that denote his alterations to Rogers's text. These alterations primarily indicate possible expansions of uncertain abbreviations (e.g., Rogers's "hippocr" becomes Knappen's "hippocr[ites]").

[2] over more than, above or beyond that.

[3] <*> This writing of my estate was a kind of repenting [Rogers's note]. roundly completely, in a thorough manner.

[4] holden off delayed.

[5] meet fitting, appropriate.

[6] estate here, his moral and spiritual state.

[7] <*> Note an especial use of continuing this course of writing [Rogers's note].

[8] throughly fully, completely, thoroughly.

[9] On Rogers's persecution, see p. 440.

[10] untowardness perversity, obstinacy.

[11] with "which" in Knappen.

[12] "my chiefest delight" later crossed out and "too ready" written above the line [Knappen's note.]

them. Yet thus I must say that whensoever I have weltered in any looseness[1] or security,[2] yes such wherein I have been unwilling to be awaked, yet I thought even in the same time that God would bring it against me some one time or other, and the longer that I have deferred it, the greater is my torment, and then I have no sound peace until I return. [...][3]

[...]

Oct 30, 1587. [...] Among other medit[ations] this was one in this month: that I beholding how graciously the Lord hath hedged me in on every side, what sweet knowledge of his will, in comparison of that which I was like to have attained to, he hath given me, and other bless[ings], good will and a good name with the godlier sort, communion with them and such manifold comfort in my life and with his people, with liberty in my ministry, I looked back to the year 1570 and thereabout, how like it was that all this should have been holden from me and I, before I had either learning or goodness, to have been drawn to mar[ry] and to have lived in that dunghill of abomination where I was born,[4] whereas by all likelihood I must have been undone[5] both in body and soul.

Then this one thing much occupied me, that, as I and some other of us here have obtained mercy of the Lord to believe in him, to be comforted exceedingly by him so that we might grow and that our profiting might appear to all men, that we might see in what partic[ulars] we were changed as well concerning knowledge as pract[ice]. Somewhat in the right use of the world I seemed to myself to have gotten of myself, to determine in this great abomi[nation] not to be hunting, gaping for more with discontent[ment], torment, or such affections as might hinder my course in godliness, wherein, since our last fast, I thank God I may say with some comfort that I have been better in watchfulness about my heart and life more continual and staid,[6] more constant also in keeping that my covenant of wary walking with the Lord. [...]

[...]

Nov 17, 1587. [...] By fearful noise of war[7] and trouble in our land I laboured to bring mine heart to a more near drawing of it to the deeper contempt of the world and sincerity through my whole life. Some savour I thank God I have of it. Many also strangely visited[8] about us, some half senseless, some otherwise, methinks do give good cause to us to think that God would awaken us and bring us nearer to him. But among all griefs which this long time fell to me none was like this: that so sweet a blossom, as of his years I never

---

1 looseness freedom from constraint; laxity of principles or practice; security here, a culpable absence of anxiety; carelessness.

2 <*>: Ps. 2:5 [Rogers's note].

3 Although Knappen modernizes punctuation, he does maintain Rogers's spelling, and so we have included part of the first entry here: "[...] Oh lord, whither should I run if thou didest not mercifully drawe me backe. This I wrot this eveninge. And good chaunge by sensible feeleinge of mine unworthines there was in remembring and settinge downe theise thinges, over there was before, for before I had gone about this I was utterly unsetled both in study and minde and nothing coulde be gone about roundly. I saw from day to day that many thinges in me were to be called into exam[ination], but I could not cleerely see into them nor willingly goe about the lookeing into them. Thus was I holden of a longe time, although it had been meet for me to have set downe mine estat for this month longe before. Yet so many thinges were molestinge me, one after an other, that, being veary profitable for me and neerly concerning me, I tooke this in hande, perswadeing my self that I should nether have called my self to an account about these matters now neither many other times about the like if I had not tyed my selfe to this course of writeinge. And thus although with too much negligence it be looked after of me, as most other thinges allso are, yet this profit I have oft reaped of the useinge of it that sometime I am drawen to not the time past in writeinge, haveinge propounded it with my self, whereas otherwise I feare I should have entred into no consideracions at all about such matters as did necessarily geve me cause to weigh them deepely. To be sure I should soone forget them. And this morning I doe more throughly see into the goodnes of my god in not punishing these my tresspasses in some grevous manner, as by geveing me over into some presumptuous sin, or deliveringe me into their handes, againe to be bayted and brought to mak better use of my time, by whome heretofore I have been, with other unmercifuly delt withal."

4 <*> At Chelmsford [Rogers's note].

5 undone ruined, utterly destroyed.

6 staid steadfast; free from whim or caprice.

7 a reference to the coming war with Spain, culminating in the Spanish Armada in the summer of 1588.

8 visited afflicted with illness; attacked by plague or other epidemic.

heard, in judgement, discretion, and all toward[1] points of a faithful min[ister],[2] is taken out of this woeful world which was not worthy of him, Master Fennour.[3] And I pray God I may joy less in the world for this cause. I have firmly purposed[4] to make my whole life a meditation of a better life, and godliness in every part even mine occupation and trade,[5] that I may from point to point and from step to step with more watchfulness walk with the Lord. Oh, the infinite gain of it!

No[6] small help hereto was our whetting on[7] one the other who being four days together communicated many things together: our wants, our poverty[8] in the practice of religion, which thing yet we saw more apparently in others.[9] We spoke of the favouring of ourselves and what liberty we take in our thoughts and words, as also deeds, how hardly[10] we enter into watchful[ness] over ourselves against any inward or outward evil, and how soon we wax weary of that course, and what a prison it is to the flesh. Also how we lose many happy and good days in familiarity and near communion with the Lord for the momentary enjoying of our fond[11] desires and that hereby we had made[12] our profession the less glorious to men. As is to be seen how slightly even the better sort of men beautify the religion. In a word, hitherto it tended principally that, seeing the Lord had granted to us some sight of the coldness and half service of his [sic] which is in the world, and ourselves also much carried away with it,[13] that thus we would renew our covenant more firmly with the Lord, than we had done, to come nearer to the practice of godliness and oftener to have our conversation in heaven, our minds seldomer and more lightly upon the things of this life, to give to ourselves less liberty in the secretest and smallest provocations to evil, and to endeavour after a more continual watch from thing to thing that as much as might be we might walk with the Lord for the time of our abiding here below. These and such like we communed of together, I may not say in vain, but with great inflaming of our hearts far above that which is common with us.

[...]

Nov 29, 1587. [...] In my return home my mind by the way was taken up in very heavenly sort, rejoicing not a little that the Lord had so enlarged mine heart as that mine old and accustomed dreams and fantasies of things below were vanished and drowned. The medit[ations] of mine heart were such as carried me to the Lord, and full graciously seasoned me against[14] my coming home. Yet ceasing but a little from good doing some way I began to wax[15] cold, the which grew upon me by reason of lingering after[16] ba[rbara?] wherewith I feared that I should be enforced to remit somewhat of my former covenant, which to think was as grievous to me as it was comfortable to hope for the continuance of it. And although I found gracious deliver[ance] again, yet I see that I shall be, without especial grace, in great danger. But

[1] toward promising.

[2] <*> Think of it ofttimes [Rogers's note].

[3] "Dudley Fenner matriculated as a fellow-commoner at Peterhouse in 1575 and so would be only about twenty-eight at this time, which explains Rogers's comment on his 'years.' He was an extreme Puritan for his time, and withdrew to the Netherlands where he renounced his Anglican orders. He died at Middelburg (See DNB)" (Knappen, p. 64, n15).

[4] <*> A covenant renewed [Rogers's note].

[5] <*> Note [Rogers's note].

[6] "The ink and writing are slightly different from this point on and this is evidently a later entry, though it continues on the same line on which the former sentence ends" [Knappen's note].

[7] whetting on urging on (to say or to do [something]).

[8] poverty deficiency.

[9] <*> I have thought oft that if I were not holden in by overseeing my famil[y] that I would, as I could, visit them priv[ately] hereabout whom I have taught publ[icly] [Rogers's note].

[10] hardly not easily, with difficulty.

[11] fond foolish, silly.

[12] <*> This is good to whet on. [Rogers's note].

[13] <*> In some things and for awhile I find sweet savor in this estate which is mentioned in my writ[ings], but I know not how the strength of desire is cooled many ways. I so fear about provis[ion] and losing that which I have and so decaying. Take hold once it eateth deeply, so p [Rogers's note].

[14] seasoned me against i.e., tempered/disciplined me in preparation for.

[15] wax grow.

[16] lingering after longing for, desiring.

thus it must be till our sins be better looked to and their strength better diminished in us.

In this time again I felt the rebellion arising, so that I see not how one may safely grow secure and bold but one danger or other may hold him from it, if he look well about him. Indeed I did not a little rejoice before in the late preferment[1] which the Lord had brought upon me, and lest I should have been too joyful the Lord did show me my weakness that I might still be holden under with it, and be driven to him as in times past. And it was very good for me to be thus abased. After I recovered myself yet I felt some print of my weakness in that I was not so fruitful as before.

[...]

Jan 12, 1587/88. By occasion of the strange visit[ation] of one of our neigh[bours], Mrs. A.,[2] I, seeing by much pain in wi[fe] and near childb[irth] many likelihoods of our separation, considered how many uncomfortablenesses the Lord had kept from me hitherto by those which I then saw must needs come if he should part us, that I might more thankfully use the benef[it] if it should be continued, and acquaint myself with thinking on some of them before, that they might not be altogether sudden, but alas this latter is hard.

First, the fear of marrying again, dangerous as two mar[riages] are.

Want of it in the meanwhile.

Forgoing so fit a companion for religion, housewifery, and other comf[orts].

Loss and decay in subst[ance].[3]

Care of household matters cast on me.

Neglect of study.

Care and looking after children.

Forgoing our boarders.

Fear of losing friendship among her kindred.

These are some. The Lord may cast me down with them also in sick[ness]. [...]

[...]

Feb 7, [1587/1588.] It came to my mind this day, as I was musing alone, that being unapt to study and in body not well, yet I felt not loathsomeness to all good duties as at some such times I have felt, but a very frank and hearty abhorring of such fond and foolish pleasures as have mightily prevailed against me, and as my former book[4] especially doth declare. And it came to my mind that, whereas I have been made very sorrowful by the things which I have set down there about these matters because my weakness therein is exceedingly bewrayed,[5] it may please my God to grant me that grace and strength against them whereby I might be as much comforted[6] as ever I was made sorrowful at the reading and writing of them. And then I should see great reason why the Lord set me about this work, which end I had not before mine eyes when I first went about it. And yet many of these my writings in which I have set down God's graces and other benefits bestowed on me may be hard[7] witnesses against me hereafter if worse things should be found in me than have been.

[...]

April 20, 1588. I fear my sin at Br[idewell][8] hath provoked the Lord to hold his mercies from me that I cannot settle to study but wander in idleness and unprofit[ableness], no good th[ing] taking hold of me or if it do yet not long continuing with me as yesternight. I was in indifferent good case[9]

---

[1] late preferment recent ecclesiastical appointment (a post or appointment which involved social or pecuniary advancement). The exact nature of this preferment remains unidentified.

[2] <*> Lying like one senseless, no cheer, nor words, which strook us that were present. Mrs. Arg. died Jan. 5 [Rogers's note].

[3] subst[ance] possessions, goods, wealth.

[4] former book Rogers is probably referring to a manuscript book, since his first published work did not appear until 1603.

[5] bewrayed revealed, disclosed, made public.

[6] <*> Let there be had especial care of this that if God will it may come to pass [later]and look for it [Rogers's note].

[7] hard severe, harsh, unmerciful.

[8] Unidentified [Knappen's note].

[9] indifferent good case fairly good condition, estate; in good case well off financially.

considering well of mine estate, and concluding that I would yet take hold again on a good course, but alas it is far from me. This mor[ning] to break off my med[itation] when I was well entered into it a wonderful swarm of troublesome matters[1] oppressed me, and turned me till 9 of the clock into a mopish and dumpish sorrow till I being wearied with it turned myself to empty my heart by writing, when I saw that I could not do it by complaining nor praying. Yet hearty and sensible sorrow for these, which might make my heart to melt, and so to cast me down in more humil[ity], I could find none but only desiring it.[2] [...]

[...]

Dec 16, 1588. In this time God visited my wi[fe], never more near to death, whereby all the former considerations, Januar[y] last the 5, were revived.[3] And this fell out[4] in a time in which had been broken or discontinued the keeping of some coven[ants] betwixt us made and entered into, as private [differences?], some harshn[ess],[5] not that pleasantness[6] in that behalf required. I saw also that this was much out of the way a week or more before, and waited opportun[ity] to cut it off, but too slowly, and though it was no such thin[g] as was noted of any, or so much as betwixt ourselves,[7] only I saw there was some abating of the affec[tion][8] which had been, yet I would not wil[lingly] see it so again, nor that we had so[9] parted. And hereby[10] it may be seen that many of our oversights, which pass us without any check, do come to remembr[ance] sometime after, with great grief.

[...]

—composed, c. 1586-90

[1] <*> Fullers woorck. Rest, inabil[ity] to study, little sound prac[tice] of godliness, etc. [Rogers's note]. Editor's note: If "Fuller" refers to Nicholas Fuller (c. 1557-1623), Hebraist and theologian, then the "work" may be Miscellaneorum theologicorum ... tres libri (first edition in 1612; reprinted in 1616, 1617), a commentary on various biblical texts that either contained interpretive cruces or had proven controversial. It was the only work by Fuller published before Rogers's own death in 1618. See G.L. Jones, "Nicholas Fuller (c. 1557-1623)," DNB online, 2005.

[2] <*> Oh what ———— [worn]s arise that way [Rogers's note].

[3] <*> A new coven[ant] after this deliv[erance] with God and betwixt ourselves [Rogers's note].

[4] fell out happened, chanced, occurred.

[5] "harshn[ess]" later altered to "hardn[ess]" [Knappen's note]; harshness severity, rigorousness, unfeelingness; hardness obdurateness; callousness; hard-headedness.

[6] "not that pleasantness" is later crossed out [Knappen's note].

[7] "so much as betwixt ourselves" is later crossed out [Knappen's note].

[8] "affec[tion]" is later crossed out and "state" written above [Knappen's note].

[9] "had so" is later altered, but blotted and so the addition is illegible [Knappen's note].

[10] From hereby to the end of the entry is underlined in the ms. [Knappen's note].

Stephen Gosson
1554-1625

Stephen Gosson was educated at Oxford University; though he did not graduate, his education in the classics formed the basis for his criticism of poetry and plays outlined in The School of Abuse, entered in the Stationers' Register on 22 July, 1579. The School of Abuse contributes to an argument which judged art on moral grounds, and sought to raise suspicions about poetry and the stage. Gosson agreed with humanists that poetry should move people to virtue, but he argued that it rarely did. He not only emphasized the social dangers of the stage and the dubious motives of playwrights and players, but was also doubtful of the audience's abilities to discern good from bad theatre. This first pamphlet was very much concerned to depict himself as a judicious and clever writer. It is notable for its use of the popular euphuistic style of sententiae, repetition, and closed, balanced rhythms.

The dedication to Sir Philip Sidney might indicate that Gosson was looking for patronage, but Sidney's A Defence of Poetry refutes many of Gosson's points. School sparked a lively response from detractors; actors responded by staging some of Gosson's own plays in the hopes of discrediting him, and wrote a stage defence of drama in The Play of Plays. Thomas Lodge (see p. 969) also wrote Defence of Poetry, Music, Stage Plays (1579-80). Gosson replied to this opposition with An Apology of the School of Abuse (1579) and Plays Confuted in Five Actions (1582). Using the five-act structure associated with plays, this last pamphlet repeats many of the earlier arguments, but the high, moral tone is far from the often playful style of School. This was the end of Gosson's brief but controversial career as a literary critic; he soon took holy orders and for the remainder of his life enjoyed a successful career in the Church.

EDITIONS: The shoole of abuse. London: [Printed] by Thomas Woodcock, 1579. STC 12097; Stephen Gosson, Playes confuted in five actions. London: Imprinted for Thomas Gosson, [1582]. STC 12095.

from The School of Abuse,

Containing a Pleasant Invective Against Poets, Pipers, Players, Jesters, and Such Like Caterpillars of a Commonwealth: Setting up the Flag of Defiance to Their Mischievous Exercise, and Overthrowing Their Bulwarks, by Profane Writers, Natural Reason, and Common Experience: A Discourse as Pleasant for Gentlemen That Favour Learning, as Profitable for All That Will Follow Virtue.

To the Reader

Gentlemen and others, you may well think that I sell you my corn and eat chaff, barter my wine and drink water, since I take upon me to deter you from plays when mine own works are daily to be seen upon stages as sufficient witnesses of mine own folly and severe judges against myself. But if you saw how many tears of sorrow my eyes shed when I behold them, or how many drops of blood my heart sweats when I remember them, you would not so much blame me for misspending my time when I knew not what I did, as commend me at the last for recovering my steps with graver counsel. Afterwits[1] are ever best; burnt children dread the fire. I have seen that which you behold, and I shun that which you frequent. And that I might the easier pull your minds from such studies, draw your feet from such places, I have sent you a school of those abuses which I have gathered by observation.

[...]

The School of Abuse

[...] they that never go out of their houses for regard of their credit, nor step from the university

[1] Afterwits those who have knowledge after an event; hindsight.

for love of knowledge, seeing but slender offences and small abuses within their own walls, will never believe that such rocks are abroad, nor such horrible monsters in playing places. But as (I speak the one to my comfort, the other to my shame, and remember both with a sorrowful heart) I was first instructed in the university, after drawn like a novice to these abuses, so will I show you what I see, and inform you what I read of such affairs. Ovid saith that Romulus built his theatre as a horsefair for whores, made triumphs and set out plays to gather the fair women together, that every one of his soldiers might take where he liked a snatch for his share; whereupon the amorous schoolmaster bursteth out in these words:—

Romule, militibus solus dare praemia nosti:
Haec mihi si dederis commoda, miles ero.

Thou, Romulus, alone knowest how thy soldiers to reward:
Grant me the like, myself will be attendant on thy guard.[1]

It should seem that the abuse of such places was so great, that for any chaste liver to haunt them was a black swan and a white crow.[2] Dion[3] so straightly forbiddeth the ancient families of Rome and gentlewomen that tender their name and honour to come to theatres, and rebukes them so sharply when he takes them napping, that if they be but once seen there, he judgeth it sufficient cause to speak ill of them and think worse. The shadow of a knave hurts an honest man, the scent of the stews[4] a sober matron, and the show of theatres a simple gazer.

[...]

If we gather grapes among thistles, or seek for this food at theatres, we shall have a hard pittance and come to short commons.[5] I cannot think that city to be safe that strikes down her portcullises, rams up her gates, and suffereth the enemy to enter the postern.[6] Neither will I be persuaded that he is any way likely to conquer affection which breaketh his instruments, burneth his poets, abandons his haunt, muffleth his eyes as he passeth the street, and resorts to theatres to be assaulted. Cooks did never show more craft in their junkets[7] to vanquish the taste, nor painters in shadows to allure the eye, than poets in theatres to wound the conscience.

There set they abroach[8] strange consorts of melody to tickle the ear, costly apparel to flatter the sight, effeminate gesture to ravish the sense, and wanton speech to whet desire to inordinate lust. Therefore of both barrels I judge cooks and painters the better hearing, for the one extendeth his art no farther than to the tongue, palate and nose, the other to the eye, and both are ended in outward sense, which is common to us with brute beasts. But these by the privy entries of the ear slip down into the heart, and with gun-shot of affection gall the mind, where reason and virtue should rule the roost.

[...]

Consider with thyself (gentle reader) the old discipline of England: mark what we were before, and what we are now. Leave Rome a while, and cast thine eye back to thy predecessors, and tell me how wonderfully we have been changed since we were schooled with these abuses. Dion saith that Englishmen could suffer watching and labour, hunger and thirst, and bear of all storms with head and shoulders; they used slender weapons,

---

1 from Ovid, Art of Love, 1.131-32.

2 black swan ... white crow i.e., extremely rare.

3 Dion Dio Cassius (c. 150-235 CE), Roman historian and administrator, wrote a history of Rome. Nineteen of the original 80 books survive.

4 stews brothels; houses of prostitution.

5 short commons insufficient rations of food.

6 portcullises heavy iron gates; postern backdoor.

7 junkets sweet, creamy dishes.

8 set ... abroach give vent to; also, vessels are broached or pierced to let the liquor run through: this could refer to "both barrels" in the next sentence, although the world "barrels" here may also connect to the later "gun-shot."

went naked, and were good soldiers; they fed upon roots and barks of trees; they would stand up to the chin many days in marshes without victuals, and they had a kind of sustenance in time of need, of which if they had taken but the quantity of a bean, or the weight of a pea, they did neither gape after meat, nor long for the cup a great while after. The men in valour not yielding to Scythia, the women in courage passing the Amazons.[1] The exercise of both was shooting and darting, running and wrestling, and trying such masteries as either consisted in swiftness of feet, agility of body, strength of arms, or martial discipline.

But the exercise that is now among us is banqueting, playing, piping, and dancing, and all such delights as may win us to pleasure, or rock us in sleep. Quantum mutatus ab illo?[2] Oh, what a wonderful change is this? Our wrestling at arms is turned to wallowing in ladies' laps, our courage to cowardice, our cunning to riot, our bows into bowls, and our darts to dishes. We have robbed Greece of gluttony, Italy of wantonness, Spain of pride, France of deceit, and Dutchland[3] of quaffing. Compare London to Rome and England to Italy, you shall find the theatres of the one, the abuses of the other, to be rife among us.

[...]

[...] they that lack customers all the week, either because their haunt is unknown, or the constables and officers of the parish watch them so narrowly that they dare not queatche,[4] to celebrate the Sabbath flock to the theatres, and there keep a general market of bawdry. Not that any filthiness in deed is committed within the compass of that ground, as was once done in Rome, but that every wanton and [his] paramour, every man and his mistress, every John and his Joan, every knave and his quean[5] are there first acquainted, and cheapen the merchandise in that place which they pay for elsewhere, as they can agree. These worms when they dare not nestle in the peasecod[6] at home find refuge abroad and are hid in the ears of other men's corn.

[...]

How often hath her Majesty, with the grave advice of her whole Council, set down the limits of apparel to every degree,[7] and how soon again hath the pride of our hearts overflown the channel? How many times hath access to theatres been restrained, and how boldly again have we reentered? Over-lashing[8] in apparel is so common a fault that the very hirelings of some of our players, which stand at reversion of vi s. by the week,[9] jet under gentlemen's noses in suits of silk, exercising themselves to prating on the stage, and common scoffing when they come abroad, where they look askance over the shoulder at every man of whom the Sunday before they begged an alms. I speak not this as though everyone that professeth the quality so abused himself, for it is well known that some of them are sober, discreet, properly learned, honest householders and citizens well thought on among their neighbours at home, though the pride of their shadows (I mean those hangbyes whom they succour with stipend) cause them to be somewhat ill talked of abroad. And as some of the players are far from abuse, so some of their plays are without rebuke.

[...]

Now, if any man ask me why myself have penned comedies[10] in time past, and inveigh so eagerly

---

1 Scythians and Amazons were proverbial for valour and courage, respectively.

2 Quantum mutatus ab illo? this is translated in the next sentence.

3 Dutchland the Netherlands.

4 queatche move or make a sound.

5 quean immodest, ill-behaved woman.

6 peasecod pea pod.

7 Sumptuary laws regulated what style, fabric, and colour of clothing the different classes and genders could wear.

8 Over-lashing extravagance.

9 stand at reversion of vi s. by the week i.e., paid a salary of 6 shillings per week.

10 Gosson mentions two of his own plays—The Comedy of Captain Mario and Praise at Parting—in Plays Confuted in Five Actions. None of his plays are extant.

against them here, let him know that Semel insanivimus omnes.[1] I have sinned, and am sorry for my fault; he runs far that never turns; better late than never.

[...]

As I would that offences should not be hid for going unpunished, nor escape without scourge for ill example, so I wish that every rebuker should place a hatch before the door, keep his quill within compass. He that holds not himself contented with the light of the sun, but lifts up his eyes to measure the bigness, is made blind; he that bites every weed to search out his nature may light upon poison and so kill himself; he that loves to be sifting of every cloud may be struck with a thunderbolt if it chance to rent;[2] and he that taketh upon him to show men their faults may wound his own credit, if he go too far. We are not angry with the clerk of the market if he come to our stall and reprove our balance when they are faulty, or forfeit our weights when they are false: nevertheless, if he presume to enter our house and rig[3] every corner, searching more than belongs to his office, we lay hold on his locks, turn him away with his back full of stripes, and his hands loaded with his own amends. Therefore I will content myself to show you no more abuses in my school than myself have seen, nor so many hundreds as I have heard of. Lions fold up their nails when they are in their dens, for wearing them in the earth and need not; eagles draw in their talons as they sit in their nests, for blunting them there among dross. And I will cast anchor in these abuses, rest my bark in the simple road, for grating my wits upon needless shelves.[4] And because I accuse other[s] for treading awry, which since I was born never went right; because I find so many faults abroad, which have at home more spots in my body than the leopard, more stains on my coat than the wicked Nessus,[5] more holes in my life than the open sieve, more sins in my soul than hairs on my head: if I have been tedious in my lecture, or yourselves be weary of your lesson, hearken no longer for the clock, shut up the school, and get you home.

—1579

from Plays Confuted in Five Actions

Proving That They Are Not to Be Suffered in a Christian Commonweal,[6] by the Way Both the Cavils of Thomas Lodge, and the Play of Plays, Written in Their Defence, and Other Objections of Players' Friends, Are Truly Set Down and Directly Answered.[7]

To the Right Worshipful Gentlemen and Students of Both Universities,[8] and the Inns of Court

[...] I was very willing to write at this time, because I was informed by some of you which heard it with your ears, that since my publishing the School of Abuse, two plays of my making were brought to the stage: the one was a cast of Italian devices, called The Comedy of Captain Mario, the other a moral, Praise at Parting.[9] These they very impudently affirm to be written by me since I had set out my invective against them. I cannot deny they were both mine, but they were both penned two years at the least before I forsook them, as by their own friends I am able to prove, but they have got such a custom of counterfeiting upon the stage that it is grown to an habit and will not be left. God knoweth, before whom to you all I do protest, as I shall answer to him at the Last Day when all hidden secrets shall be discovered, since

[1] Semel insanivimus omnes Latin, "all of us are mad at some time."
[2] rent rend or tear (i.e., through the clouds).
[3] rig ransack.
[4] bark boat; shelves ledges of rock.
[5] Nessus a centaur slain by Hercules. Hercules was consumed by fire when he wore a tunic soaked in Nessus's blood.
[6] Commonweal commonwealth.
[7] Gosson dedicated this work to Sir Francis Walsingham, principal secretary to Elizabeth; Cavils frivolous objections.
[8] both universities Oxford and Cambridge.
[9] These plays are non-extant.

the first printing of my invective to this day, I never made play for them nor any other. Therefore if ever they be so shameless and graceless to belie[1] me again, I beseech God, as he hath given me more wit to spend my time well, so to send to them more honesty to speak a truth. I could purge myself of this slander in many words, both how I departed from the city of London and bestowed my time in teaching young gentlemen in the country, where I continue with a very worshipful gentleman and read to his sons in his own house, but the men are so vain, and their credit so light, that the least word I speak is enough to choke them. He that reprehends a vice and shuns it not, snuffs the lamp to make it burn, but puts in no oil to nourish the flame. Therefore as soon as I had inveighed against plays, I withdrew myself from them to better studies, which so long as I live I trust to follow.

Thus submitting my book and myself to your judgment, I leave to trouble you any farther, craving this at your hands before we part: that if any player belie me in your hearing upon the stage, you would rather consider of the person than of the speech, for a player is like to a merchant's finger that stands sometime for a thousand, sometime for a cipher,[2] and a player must stand as his part falls, sometime for a prince, sometime for a peasant.

The First Action

[...] the abominable practices of plays in London have been by godly preachers, both at Paul's Cross[3] and elsewhere, so zealously, so learnedly, so loudly cried out upon to small redress, that I may well say of them, as the philosophers report of the moving of the heavens, we never hear them because we ever hear them.[4] Whereby I gather that the wisdom of man is able to rule anything but man, for the savage and brute beasts neither grudge to feed where they are appointed, nor resist when they are driven from those places where they love most of all to bite. But whether our ears be wilfully stopped and our eyes muffled, that in hearing we hear and not understand, in seeing we see and not perceive; or whether the Devil, our ancient enemy, hath stricken so deep and so venomous a tooth into the heart of man as hath infected and wounded the soul to death, I know not well. Yet sure I am, and have sufficient warrant by the word of God, that being watered with the preaching of the Gospel, if the fruit we yield be thorns and briars, it is a very earmark of reprobates and of such as are given over by the Lord to their own sense, to follow destruction with full sail.[5] The word of God is lively,[6] and mighty in operation: being lively, if it do not quicken and stir us up to a newness of life, it is a token that we have no life, but are already stone dead in the works of darkness; being mighty in operation, both the players and we must be persuaded that their idle occupation, having so stout, so strong, so puissant, so mighty an enemy as the word of God, though the honour and authority of their masters hold them up for a time, yet in the end they must have a fall. For neither strongholds, nor inventions of men, nor any high thing that is exalted against the knowledge of God, shall be able to stand when the foot of his prophets comes against it. Amongst all the favourers of these uncircumcised Philistines—I mean the players, whose hearts are not right—no man till of late durst thrust out his head to maintain their quarrel but one: in wit, simple; in learning, ignorant; in attempt, rash; in name, Lodge; whose book, as it came not to my hands in one whole year after the privy printing thereof, so I confess that to it before this time I answered nothing, partly because he brought nothing, partly because my heart was too big to wrestle with him that wanteth arms. Therefore considering with myself that such kind

[1] belie to falsely represent, to slander.

[2] The merchant's finger proverbially shortened the length of cloth or added weight to the scale.

[3] Paul's Cross Paul's Cross was a stone cross in the churchyard of St Paul's Cathedral, and it had been used as the site for sermons since at least the fourteenth century.

[4] Pythagorean philosophers argued that humans could not hear the music of the spheres, created by the planets as they moved in their heavenly circuits.

[5] <*> Hebrews 4:12 [Gosson's note].

[6] <*> Hebrews 6:8 [Gosson's note].

of sores might be lanced too soon, I chose rather to let him ripen and break of himself, that vomiting out his own disgrace, and being worn out of favour among his own friends, I might triumph in the cause and shed no blood. Though some of his acquaintance have vaunted to cut and hew me I know not how, yet having greater regard to the souls of many than to the threatenings of few, to the honour of God than to the pride of overbragging and busy players, by God's assistance I will prove unto you, that stage plays are not to be suffered in a Christian commonweal. Which I trust I shall be able sufficiently to perform if I give you a taste both of the causes of plays and of the effects: of the causes, which I find by reading; of the effects, which I know by my own experience. I hope that no Christian will be so shameless to say that the doctrine and invention of the Devil is to be suffered in that commonweal where the glad tidings of grace [are] truly preached. For to maintain the doctrine and invention of the Devil is a kind of apostasy[1] and falling from the Lord. For God hath made us to his own likeness,[2] which likeness consisteth not in lineaments and proportion of the body, but in holiness and singleness of life. Therefore receiving the doctrine and inventions of the Devil, between whom and God there can be no truce, no league, no manner of agreement, because the one is holy, the other impure; the one good, the other evil; the one light, the other darkness, we forsake our God; forsaking of him, we lose his image and likeness; losing his image we are not his children, and consequently have no part nor fellowship with Christ in the world to come. That stage plays are the doctrine and invention of the Devil may be gathered by Tertullian,[3] who noteth very well that the Devil, foreseeing the ruin of his kingdom, both invented these shows and inspired men with devices to set them out the better thereby to enlarge his dominion and pull us from God.

And Thomas Lodge in that patched[4] pamphlet of his wherein he taketh upon him the defence of plays, little perceiving how lustily the chips fly in his face whilst he heweth out timber to make the frame, confesseth openly that plays were consecrated by the heathens to the honour of their gods, which indeed is true, yet serveth it better to overthrow them than establish them, for whatsoever was consecrated to the honour of the heathen gods was consecrated to idolatry. Stage plays by his own confession were consecrated to the honour of heathen gods, therefore consecrated to idolatry. Being consecrated to idolatry, they are not of God; if they proceed not from God, they are the doctrine and inventions of the Devil. This will be counted new learning among a great many of my gay countrymen, which bear a sharper smack[5] of Italian devices in their heads than of English religion in their hearts. [...]

The Second Action

[...] The best play you can pick out is but a mixture of good and evil; how can it be then the schoolmistress of life?[6] The beholding of troubles and miserable slaughters that are in tragedies drive us to immoderate sorrow, heaviness, womanish weeping, and mourning, whereby we become lovers of dumps[7] and lamentation, both enemies to fortitude. Comedies so tickle our senses with a pleasanter vein, that they make us lovers of laughter and pleasure without any mean,[8] both foes to temperance. What schooling is this? Sometimes you shall see nothing but the adventures of an amorous knight, passing from country to country for the love of his lady, encountering many a terrible monster made of brown paper, and at his return is so wonderfully changed that he cannot be

[1] apostasy abandonment of one's religious faith.

[2] <*> Ephesians 4:24 [Gosson's note].

[3] Tertullian (c. 160-c. 225) born at Carthage, one of the early Christian writers in Latin.

[4] patched pieced together.

[5] sharper smack an oxymoron meaning "deeper smattering."

[6] Lodge had argued that a play was "the schoolmistress of life."

[7] dumps fits of melancholy or depression.

[8] mean moderation.

known but by some poesy in his tablet,[1] or by a broken ring, or a handker[chief], or a piece of a cockle shell. What learn you by that? When the soul of your plays is either mere trifles or Italian bawdry, or wooing of gentlewomen, what are we taught? [...]

The Third Action

[...] Whatsoever he be that looketh narrowly into our stage plays or considereth how and which way they are represented, shall find more filthiness in them than players dream of. The law of God very straitly[2] forbids men to put on women's garments.[3] Garments are set down for signs distinctive between sex and sex; to take unto us those garments that are manifest signs of another sex is to falsify, forge,[4] and adulterate, contrary to the express rule of the word of God, which forbiddeth it by threatening a curse unto the same. [...]

[...] The proof is evident, the consequence is necessary, that in stage plays for a boy to put on the attire, the gesture, the passions of a woman; for a mean person to take upon him the title of a prince with counterfeit port and train,[5] is by outward signs to show themselves otherwise than they are, and so within the compass of a lie, which by Aristotle's judgment is naught of itself and to be fled. [...]

The Fourth Action

[...] the poets send their verses to the stage upon such feet as continually are rolled up in rhyme at the fingers' ends,[6] which is plausible to the barbarous and carrieth a sting into the ears of the common people [...] because tragedies and comedies stir up affections, and affections are naturally planted in that part of the mind that is common to us with brute beasts.

He that travaileth[7] to advance the worst part of the mind is like unto him that in government of cities gives all the authority to the worst men, which being well weighed is to betray the city and the best men into the hands of the wicked. But the poets that write plays and they that present them upon the stage study to make our affections overflow, whereby they draw the bridle from that part of the mind that should ever be curbed from running on [a]head, which is manifest treason to our souls and delivereth them captive to the Devil. [...]

[...] for the better understanding both of that which is spoken in defence of plays and of that which by me shall be brought against them, you must consider that there are two sorts of delight, the one belonging to the body, the other to the mind;[8] that is carnal, this spiritual. Carnal delight is the rest of sensual appetite in the thing desired when it is felt. If this be not governed by the rule of God's word, we are presently carried beyond ourselves; therefore ought we to follow the counsel of St. Paul, which exhorteth us earnestly to suppress the same.[9] [...]

The Fifth Action

[...] Great is the hardness of our hearts when neither fathers, nor councils, nor God himself strikes us with any shame of that which every good man is ashamed to remember. Mine eyes thoroughly behold the manner of theatres when I wrote plays myself and found them to be the very markets of bawdry, where choice without shame hath been as free as it is for your money in the Royal Exchange,[10] to take a short stock or a long,

---

1 poesy in his tablet writing or rhyme on paper or jewellery.

2 straitly strictly.

3 See Deuteronomy 22:5.

4 forge imitate.

5 port and train bearing and retinue.

6 at the fingers' ends meaning "ready at hand" or "at one's finger tips"; fingers could refer to toes (attached to the earlier "feet"). This awkward image exemplifies the awkwardness of which Gosson complains.

7 travaileth labours.

8 See Romans 8:4-7.

9 See Colossians 3:5.

10 Royal Exchange a building in which merchants gathered for business.

a falling band, or a French ruff.[1] The first building of theatres was to ravish the Sabines,[2] and that they were continued in whoredom ever after, Ovid confesseth in these words: Scilicet ex illo solennia more theatra nunc quoq; formosis insidiosa manent.[3]

As at the first, so now, theatres are snares unto fair women. And as I told you long ago in my School of Abuse, our theatres and playhouses in London are as full of secret adultery as they were in Rome. In Rome it was the fashion of wanton young men to place themselves as nigh as they could to the courtesans, to present them pomegranates, to play with their garments, and wait on them home when the sport was done. In the playhouses at London, it is the fashion of youths to go first into the yard[4] and to carry their eye through every gallery, then like unto ravens, where they spy the carrion thither they fly, and press as near to the fairest as they can. Instead of pomegranates they give them pippins,[5] they dally with their garments to pass the time, they minister talk upon all occasions, and either bring them home to their houses on small acquaintance, or slip into taverns when the plays are done. He thinketh best of his painted sheath[6] and taketh himself for a jolly fellow that is noted of most to be busiest with women in all such places. This open corruption is a prick in the eyes of them that see it, and a thorn in the sides of the godly when they hear it. This is a poison to beholders and a nursery of idleness to the players.

Most of the players have been either men of occupations which they have forsaken to live by playing, or common minstrels, or trained up from their childhood to this abominable exercise and have now no other way to get their living. A commonweal is likened to the body, whose head is the prince; in the body, if any part be idle, by participation the damage redoundeth[7] to the whole; if any refuse to do their duty, though they be base, as the guts, the gall, the bladder, how dangerous it is both to the body and to the head, every man is able to conjecture. [...]

Plays are the inventions of the Devil, the offerings of idolatry, the pomp of wordlings, the blossoms of vanity, the root of apostasy, the food of iniquity, riot and adultery: detest them.

Players are masters of vice, teachers of wantonness, spurs to impurity, the sons of idleness; so long as they live in this order, loathe them. God is merciful; his wings are spread to receive you if you come betimes.[8] God is just; his bow is bent and his arrow drawn,[9] to send you a plague if you stay too long.

—1582

[1] stock stocking; falling band flat collar; French ruff frilly cuffs. These were all trendy fashions.

[2] Sabines There are various versions of the story of the rape of the Sabine women, who were gathered together at an event—whether the theatre, the circus, or a festival in celebration of a god—when they were abducted by Romans looking for wives.

[3] See Ovid, Art of Love 1.133-34: "From that first age the Theatre hath bin, / Even like a trap to take fair wenches in." Translation from Love's School (1625) by Nicolas Iansz Visscher (STC 18935.5).

[4] yard the pit of the theatre, or yard of an inn where a play is staged.

[5] pippins a variety of apple.

[6] sheath exterior.

[7] redoundeth has an effect on.

[8] betimes in time; see Psalms 36:7.

[9] See Psalms 18:14, 38:2.

Anne Wheathill
fl. 1584

In the preface to A Handful of Wholesome (Though Homely) Herbs, Gathered out the Goodly Garden of God's Most Holy Word, the author identifies herself as a gentlewoman writing for an audience of gentlewomen. However, beyond this tidbit, almost nothing is known of Anne Wheathill. She is, however, notable as the first woman outside the aristocracy to produce a collection of private prayers, a class of books very popular in the latter half of the sixteenth century.[1] Her publisher, Henry Denham, was well known for printing these books in attractive editions, and Wheathill's is especially elegant, with a decorative border surrounding each of its pages.

Wheathill faces the dual problem of her class position and her status as a woman, and in her dedicatory epistle both establishes and justifies herself as a writer. As a gentlewoman, she lacks powerful connections among the aristocracy and ecclesiastical hierarchy of the sort other writers invoke to authorize their work. Instead, Wheathill bases her authority, paradoxically, on the humble nature of her offering and the zeal with which it has been produced. The title of the volume recalls the traditionally female genre of the "herbal," a household book that lists the medicinal properties of various plants and recipes for their use. Its efficacy as a spiritual prophylactic thus justifies its composition. At the same time, Wheathill deflects moral concerns about her position as a woman of good reputation by claiming to be a virgin, and also arguing that working on her book has prevented her from descending into spiritually dangerous idleness. Although these statements comply with prevailing standards of female behaviour, by directing her work outward, Wheathill assumes responsibility for the spiritual life of her audience—a position of some authority.

The prayers that make up the collection deal with topics typical of the period: praise of God, confession of sin, pleas for forgiveness, and desire for connection with the divine.[2] While Wheathill opens with prayers for particular times of day and includes some that make reference to events that seem autobiographical, the collection as a whole is structured around a very different principle. Wheathill organizes her work numerologically,[3] writing 49 prayers, a number that is the square of seven, which is in turn the sum of three (the number of the Trinity) and four (the number of four corners and four winds of the earth). Within Christian tradition, seven is the number of the days of creation, the sacraments, the words of Christ on the cross, the deadly sins, and the wounds of Christ, among others. In the Christian calendar, the interval between Easter and the great celebration of Pentecost is 49 days. Wheathill's prayers are clustered in groups of seven, in a narrative that moves from awareness of sin and desire for mercy through the belief that salvation is possible only by hearing and accepting God's word to praise for God's grace and redemption of the world through Christ.

EDITION: A handfull of holesome (though homelie) hearbs. London: Henry Denham, 1584. STC 25329.

[1] C.B. Atkinson and J.B. Atkinson, "Anne Wheathill's A Handfull of Holesome (though Homelie) Hearbs (1584): The First English Gentlewoman's Prayer Book," Sixteenth-Century Journal 27 (1996): pp. 660-62.

[2] Ibid., p. 668.

[3] See C.B. Atkinson and J.B. Atkinson, "Numerical Patterning in Anne Wheathill's A Handfull of Holesome (though Homelie) Hearbs (1584)," Texas Studies in Language and Literature 41 (1999): pp. 1-25.

from A Handful of Wholesome (Though Homely) Herbs, Gathered out of the Goodly Garden of God's Most Holy Word

by Anne Wheathill, Gentlewoman.

To All Ladies, Gentlewomen, and Others, Which Love True Religion and Virtue, and Be Devoutly Disposed, Grace, Mercy, and Peace in Christ Jesus.

For a testimonial to the world, how I have and do (I praise God) bestow the precious treasure of time, even now in the state of my virginity or maidenhood, lo here I dedicate to all good ladies, gentlewomen, and others, who have a desire to invocate[1] and call upon the name of the Lord, a small handful of gross[2] herbs, which I have presumed to gather out of the garden of God's most holy word. Not that there is any unpureness therein, but that (peradventure)[3] my rudeness may be found to have plucked them up unreverently, and without zeal.[4]

Whereupon of the learned I may be judged gross and unwise, in presuming, without the counsel or help of any, to take such an enterprise in hand; nevertheless, as God doth know, I have done it with a good zeal, according to the weakness of my knowledge and capacity. And although they be not so pleasant in taste, as they can find out, to whom God hath given the spirit of learning, yet do I trust, this small handful of gross herbs, wholesome in operation and working, shall be no less acceptable before the majesty of almighty God than the fragrant flowers of others, gathered with more understanding.

But without presumption I may boldly say, they have not sought them with a more willing heart and fervent mind, nor more to the advancement of God's glory, and the desire of acceptation,[5] than I have done. Which if I may obtain, with the good judgment and liking of all my brethren and sisters in the Lord, I shall think my time most happily bestowed. For that thereby I did avoid idleness, to the pleasing of almighty God, and have gained those, whom I know not, as well strangers to me, as my acquaintance, to be my friends, that shall taste these gross herbs with me.

The Lord Jesus Christ, who moisteneth all his elect with his most precious blood, give us all a sweet taste in him, whom I humbly beseech, from the bottom of my heart, to give unto those that are virtuously bent a desire to increase therein, and those, which have not yet reached thereunto, I pray the Holy Ghost to inspire their hearts from above, that they and we may be worthy to meet together in the blessed kingdom of our heavenly Father, which his dear Son our Saviour Jesus Christ did purchase for us, whose blessed name, with the living Father, and the Holy Ghost, be praised and magnified, now and forever, Amen, Amen.

Yours in Christ,

Anne Wheathill,
Gent.

21. A Prayer of the Creation of Mankind, of the True Samaritan, and for Strength against Temptation.

O Father of Heaven, of power almighty, which with thine only word didst create and make all the whole world, and all for the profit and service of man, whom thou didst create of all other a most noble and perfect creature, giving him power upon earth, the waters, and all the fowls and birds of the air. Thou madest him also after thine own similitude and likeness, induing[6] him with a reasonable soul, and all the powers thereof; thou also didst put him in the pleasant garden of paradise, excepting nothing from him, but the eating of the only tree of knowledge of good and evil, and further, for his help, comfort, and company, of a rib of his

[1] invocate invoke.
[2] gross wanting in fineness or delicacy.
[3] peradventure by chance or accident.
[4] zeal intense ardour in the pursuit of an end.
[5] acceptation acceptance.
[6] induing investing, endowing.

side thou madest for him a woman, and gavest her to him to be his wife.

There had they instructions given them, and the law of life for an heritage. Before them was laid both life and death, good and evil, with a free will given them to take which liked them best. But their frailty was such that they, through a small enticement, chose the evil, and left the good; they left life, and chose death. Thus Lord, through sin and breaking of thy commandments, man lost the free will that was given him in his creation, and purchased death to all his posterity.

In the way as he went to Jerusalem and Jericho, he fell in the hands of thieves, who hurting and wounding him sore, departed, leaving him half dead so that he could have help of none, but only of the good Samaritan,[1] who, as he passed by the same way, poured wine and oil into his wounds and took the cure of him.[2]

This only Samaritan was thy dear son, Christ, which took upon him all the iniquities of mankind and laid them on his back by his death, purging and cleansing him, not only from the original sin of our father Adam, but also from all our sins which we commit from time to time, by the virtue of his passion, and the sacrament of Baptism upon our repentance. For as by Adam death came to mankind, so by Jesus Christ was mankind restored to life.

For this great and high benefit of thy Son's blessed passion for our redemption, we thy poor creatures praise and thank thee, most humbly acknowledging his inestimable love towards us, in that thou vouchsafest[3] to die for us, being then sinners and thy mortal enemies. Nevertheless, most merciful Father, we are of ourselves not able to do anything that good is, no not so much as to think a good thought, without thine aid and assistance. We wander here miserably, in the low parts of the vile earth; our strength will not serve us to climb to the high of the hills, where thou dwellest in thy Mount Sion,[4] a place prepared for thine elect,[5] a chosen inheritance of thy faithful servant Abraham, and his seed.[6]

Wherefore since we, being burthened[7] with the effects of worldly pleasures, and also with other cares and troubles, can by no means ascend to thee, that art on the top of so high a mountain, (so many legions of angels attending on thy majesty) we have no remedy, but with the prophet David[8] now to lift the eyes of our hearts and minds towards thee, and to cry for help to come down from thee to us thy poor and wretched servants.

We wander here below, as lost sheep, having no shepherd; we are assailed on every side with manifold[9] enemies; the Devil ravening and hungering, seeketh whom he may devour; the world allureth us also to her deceitful vanities; our flesh also, which we carry about us, is our enemy ready and prone to draw us unto all vices and pleasures. From this can we by no means be defended, but by thee Lord.

Send us therefore thy help and holy angel to assist and strengthen us, for of thee most merciful Father floweth all bounty and goodness. Thou, O Lord God, madest heaven and earth for thine honour and man's commodity; establish therefore, good Lord, the chosen works of thy hand with thy eternal help. From Heaven send us down the wellspring of thy grace, and thy strong angel to aid us by his help, that no assault of our spiritual enemies do prevail against us, but from all evils by thy word defend us, Lord, both touching the body, and also the soul, that no temptation prevail against us.

---

1 good Samaritan Luke 10:30-37.

2 took the cure of him cared for him.

3 vouchsafest grant, agree graciously.

4 Mount Sion literally, Jerusalem and the site of King David's temple; figuratively, the city of God.

5 elect chosen by God for salvation or eternal life.

6 Abraham, and his seed Abraham was given a promise (Genesis 12:2) that he would be the father of a great nation (the Jews) with innumerable descendants that would become other nations, a promise read by Protestants to include Reformed Christianity.

7 burthened burdened.

8 David writer of the psalms. What follows is a paraphrase of Psalm 102, verses 1-2: "Hear my prayer, O Lord; let my cry come to thee! Do not hide thy face from me in the day of my distress! Incline thy ear to me; answer me speedily in the day when I call!"

9 manifold varied, diverse.

Thou hast been our protector, even from our mother's womb, and our trust is that thou wilt so continue all the days of our life, and specially at the hour of our death, that we may ascend to the heavenly Jerusalem, where we shall rest in the bosom of our father Abraham,[1] the father of all faithful believers, there to praise thee, and thy loving Son, and the Holy Ghost, world without end, Amen.

31. A Prayer that We May Hear the Word of God and Keep It.

I am thy servant, Lord, give me understanding, that I may learn thy law and decrees. Incline my soul to the words of thy mouth, because thy talk floweth like unto dew. The Israelites said unto Moses: "Speak thou unto us, and we will hear thee, but let not the Lord speak, lest we die."[2] Howbeit,[3] I pray not so, O Lord, but rather with the prophet Samuel I do humbly and earnestly beseech thee thus: "Speak on Lord, for thy servant doth hearken, for thou art the giver and inspirer of life, who art able without any to instruct me."[4]

Thy ministers speak for thee thy secrets, but thou unlockest the understanding of the things pronounced; they rehearse to us thy commandments, but it is thy aid and help that giveth strength to walk over the same, and givest light unto the minds. Wherefore, because thou art the everlasting truth, speak thou Lord my God unto me, lest I die and be made unfruitful, for thou hast the words of everlasting life. Speak therefore that thing, which may bring both comfort unto my soul, and amendment unto my life, and also may cause glory and immortal honour unto thee. For man doth perish, but thy truth endureth, O God, forever.

Blessed are they therefore, whom thou instructest and givest knowledge unto, O Lord, and dost teach thy law, that thou mayest help them in time of trouble, that they perish not. Look favourably upon me, O God, and grant (I pray thee) that thy truth may teach me, keep me, and bring me unto a happy end. Let the same deliver me from all wicked lusts and from inordinate love. Thou hast infinite means and all creatures are at thy commandment; therefore, good Lord, show some sign, whereby I shall be delivered, and send thine holy angel before me to keep me in thy way and to bring me to the place which thou hast provided for me, that I may live with thee everlastingly, world without end, Amen.

—1584

---

[1] bosom of our father Abraham According to the Old Testament, at death one goes to be with his/her father. Since Abraham was the father of the Jews, this idea was concretized as going to father Abraham or Abraham's bosom. It depicts the blessedness of the believer in paradise after death.

[2] Israelites … we die Exodus 20:19. After God appeared in a cloud to pronounce the ten commandments, the Israelites were terrified and asked Moses to act as intermediary.

[3] Howbeit nevertheless, however.

[4] Speak on … instruct me 1 Samuel 3:10. Samuel was the first prophet after Moses. As a boy serving the priest, Eli, when God first called him, Samuel did not recognize the voice and went to Eli. Eli told him to lie down and listen for God to call and then to reply "Speak, Lord, for thy servant hears," which Samuel did and was given his first prophetic message.

John Lyly
1554-1606

Born into a successful and committed humanist family, John Lyly received an excellent education (BA, 1573; MA, 1575, both from Magdalen College, Oxford University). With his family background he seemed headed for an inevitable career in academia, and indeed he wrote to William Cecil, Lord Burghley in 1574, asking for Burghley's assistance in obtaining a university fellowship. However, he was disappointed in his desire for a life of scholastic achievement and university preferment. In 1578-79 he arrived in London to pursue a career at court.

With the publication of his enormously popular prose fiction Euphues: The Anatomy of Wit (1578; 2nd revised edition, 1579) and its sequel Euphues and His England (1580), Lyly came to the attention of Burghley, who seems to have obtained some employment for him. Lyly also drew the attention of the influential courtier Edward de Vere, seventeenth earl of Oxford, who became his patron. Sometime before 1584 until 1590, Lyly was engaged in writing plays for the children's companies associated with the Chapel Royal and St Paul's, most of which were performed at court. The best known of these gracious dramas, which often incorporated celebrations of Elizabeth herself, and were grounded in myth and ancient history, include Campaspe, Sapho and Phao, Galathea, and Endymion. While Lyly gained literary fame in the years leading up to 1590, the court position he most desired—master of the Revels—eluded him, and he wrote little after this date. Instead, he seems to have turned his energies to local politics, and to seeking some compensation for his long years of service to Elizabeth's Court. He was returned four times as a member of Parliament, and in 1593 he married Beatrice Browne, heiress and Burghley's kinswoman with whom he had three children.[1] Lyly himself died in 1606, having complained futilely to the Queen some six years earlier, that he had been "thirteen years your Highness' servant and yet nothing."[2]

It would be hard to overstate the literary sensation caused by Lyly's Euphues: An Anatomy of Wit; it and its sequel each went through ten editions by 1600, and numerous reprints in the 1580s.[3] Lyly's style seems to have been largely the attraction; characterized by rhetorically balanced units and the use of "'figures of sound,' such as 'isocolon' (successive phrases of equal length), 'parison' (correspondence of parts of speech), and 'paramoion' (similarity in sound—alliteration, assonance, rhyme),"[4] the style's "most distinguishing characteristic ... for Lyly's contemporaries was its liberal use of similes drawn from natural history," where "the effect of such rhetorical abundance is even further enhanced by Lyly's frequent use of proverbs."[5] However, while euphuism, as Lyly's enemy Gabriel Harvey scornfully termed it, attracted immediate praise and frequent imitation, it went out of fashion almost as quickly as it had come in. Lyly found, in turn, his literary reputation sinking almost as quickly as it had risen. By the mid 1580s, Lyly's style was being attacked by writers ranging from William Webbe to Sidney to Robert Greene and Shakespeare (both of whom parodied euphuism).

Lyly's fictions have fared little better today. In the nineteenth century, George Saintsbury called euphuism "eccentric and tasteless," while C.S. Lewis described Euphues as a "'monstrosity' and a 'fatal success.'"[6] With recent interest in the relationship between patronage, courtship, and male friendship, however, Lyly's fictions have begun to attract more critical attention from scholars like Lorna Hutson and D.B. Alwes.

EDITION: Euphues. The anatomy of wit. London: For Gabriel Cawood, [1579]. STC 17052.

[1] D.B. Alwes, "John Lyly," DLB 167, p. 114
[2] Ibid., p. 114.
[3] Ibid., p. 102, 112.
[4] Ibid., p. 113.
[5] Ibid., p. 113.
[6] Ibid., p. 112.

from Euphues: The Anatomy of Wit.[1]

To the Right Honourable, My Very Good Lord and Master, Sir William West, Knight, Lord Delaware,[2] John Lyly Wisheth Long Life with Increase of Honour

Parrhasius,[3] drawing the counterfeit of Helen,[4] Right Honourable, made the attire of her head loose; who being demanded why he did so, he answered, she was loose.[5] Vulcan was painted curiously, yet with a polt-foot;[6] Leda cunningly, yet with her black hair.[7] Alexander, having a scar in his cheek, held his finger upon it that Apelles might not paint it. Apelles painted him with his finger cleaving to his face.

"Why,"[8] quoth Alexander, "I laid my finger on my scar because I would not have thee see it."

"Yea," said Apelles, "and I drew it there because none else should perceive it; for if thy finger had been away, either thy scar would have been seen or my art misliked."[9]

Whereby I gather that in all perfect works as well the fault as the face is to be shown.[10] The fairest leopard is made with his spots, the finest cloth with his list, the smoothest shoe with his last.[11] Seeing then that in every counterfeit as well the blemish as the beauty is coloured,[12] I hope I shall not incur the displeasure of the wise, in that in the discourse of Euphues I have as well touched the vanities of his love as the virtues of his life.

The Persians, who above all their kings most honoured Cyrus, caused him to be engraven as well with his hooked nose as his high forehead.[13] He that loved Homer best concealed not his flattering, and he that praised Alexander most bewrayed his quaffing.[14] Demonides must have a

---

[1] Euphues Greek, "well-endowed" (i.e., one possessing intellectual gifts and physical beauty, strength, etc.). See G.K. Hunter, John Lyly: The Humanist as Courtier (Cambridge, MA, 1962), p. 49. The subtitle reads: 'Very pleasant for all gentlemen to read, and most necessary to remember, wherein are contained the delights that wit followeth in his youth, by the pleasantness of love, and the happiness he reapeth in age, by the perfectness of Wisdom. By John Lyly, Master of Arts. Corrected and Augmented.' The notes to the following selections try to identify as many of Lyly's proverbial expressions as possible. In addition to Morris Palmer Tilley's A Dictionary of the Proverbs in England in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries (citations from which appear in the form 'Tilley L566'), we have also used Tilley's Elizabethan Proverb Lore in Lyly's Euphues and Pettie's Petite Pallace (citations from which appear in the form 'Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 490').

[2] There seems to be almost nothing known about Sir William West, Lord Delaware ("de la Warr") or his relationship with Lyly (Hunter, John Lyly, pp. 67-68), although some have speculated that Lyly may have tutored Delaware's children (D.B. Alwes, "John Lyly," DLB 167, p. 105). The sequel to Euphues, Euphues and His England (1580), is dedicated instead to Edward de Vere, the seventeenth earl of Oxford, the son-in-law and protégé of Burghley, both of whom were Lyly's patrons (Hunter, p. 69).

[3] Parrhasius (fl. 397 BCE), Greek painter, famous for his ability to represent fierce passions.

[4] counterfeit of Helen Wife of Menelaus, Helen was abducted by Paris, son of King Priam of Troy, and was the ostensible cause of the Trojan war and the eventual destruction of Troy itself.

[5] loose i.e., sexually wanton, unchaste.

[6] curiously with much attention to artistry; polt-foot clubfoot. Vulcan was the god of the forge, son of Jupiter and Juno. By some accounts, Vulcan's deformed foot was caused when Jupiter threw him to earth from Olympus. Jupiter had been enraged by Vulcan's attempt to free his mother from an imprisonment imposed by Jupiter for her insolence.

[7] Leda wife of Tyndarus, king of Sparta; Jupiter fell in love with Leda and disguised himself as a swan to seduce her; black hair blonde hair was generally thought an essential attribute of the beautiful woman in Renaissance England.

[8] Why here, an interjection expressing surprise and protest.

[9] Alexander III (the Great)—king of Macedon (356-323 BCE), conqueror of the Persian Empire, patron of the arts and lover of Homer's poetry—granted Apelles—the most famous of classical Greek painters—the exclusive right to paint his portraits.

[10] Proverb (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 181).

[11] list border or edge of a cloth, usually of a different and here—though not always—inferior material from the body of the cloth; last physical imperfection or flaw.

[12] coloured represented.

[13] On the high esteem in which classical and Renaissance writers held Cyrus the Great (d. 530 BCE), founder of the Persian Empire, see p. 719, note 3.

[14] See p. 464, note 13. Even though Plutarch praises Alexander's discipline and self-control, the ancient writer's generally laudatory biography cannot avoid revealing ("bewraying") the conqueror's tendency to drunkenness ("quaffing").

crooked shoe for his wry foot,[1] Damocles[2] a smooth glove for his straight hand. For as every painter that shadoweth a man in all parts giveth every piece his just proportion, so he that deciphereth the qualities of the mind ought as well to show every humour in his kind,[3] as the other doth every part in his colour. The surgeon that maketh the anatomy[4] showeth as well the muscles in the heel as the veins of the heart.

If then the first sight of Euphues shall seem too light[5] to be read of the wise, or too foolish to be regarded of the learned, they ought not to impute it to the iniquity of the author, but to the necessity of the history. Euphues beginneth with love as allured by wit, but endeth not with lust as bereft of wisdom. He wooeth women, provoked by youth, but weddeth not himself to wantonness as pricked[6] by pleasure. I have set down the follies of his wit without breach of modesty, and the sparks of his wisdom without suspicion of dishonesty. And, certes,[7] I think there be more speeches which for gravity will mislike the foolish,[8] than unseemly terms which for vanity may offend the wise.

Which discourse, Right Honourable, I hope you will the rather pardon for the rudeness,[9] in that it is the first, and protect it the more willingly if it offend, in that it might be the last. It may be that fine wits will descant[10] upon him that, having no wit, goeth about to make the anatomy[11] of wit; and certainly their jesting, in my mind, is tolerable. For if the butcher should take upon him to cut the anatomy of a man because he hath skill in opening an ox, he would prove himself a calf;[12] or if the horse-leech[13] would adventure to minister a potion to a sick patient, in that he hath knowledge to give a drench to a diseased horse, he would make himself an ass. The shoemaker must not go above his latchet,[14] nor the hedger meddle with anything but his bill.[15] It is unseemly for the painter to feather a shaft, or the fletcher[16] to handle the pencil. All which things make most against me,[17] in that a fool hath intruded himself to discourse of wit. But as I was willing to commit the fault, so am I content to make amends. Howsoever the case standeth, I look for no praise for my labour, but pardon for my goodwill; it is the greatest reward that I dare ask, and the least that they can offer. I desire no more, I deserve no less.

Though the style nothing delight the dainty ear of the curious sifter,[18] yet will the matter recreate the mind of the courteous reader. The variety of the one will abate the harshness of the other. Things of greatest profit are set forth with least price.[19] Where the wine is neat, there needeth no ivy bush.[20] The right coral needeth no colour-

---

[1] In Plutarch's De audiendis poetis 3 (Moralia, 18D), he refers to a man named Demonides, a cripple with misshapen feet. When Demonides' shoes are stolen, the cripple curses the thief by hoping that the shoes will fit him (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 146).

[2] Damocles The precise reference here is obscure, although the actual meaning is clear enough. The most famous Damocles was the Syracusan nobleman (fl. mid 4th century BCE) and flattering courtier of Dionysius II, tyrant of Syracuse (reigned 367-357 BCE). Although his role in the story of the sword of Damocles is well-known, it seems to have little relevance to the allusion here, to the beauty of this young man.

[3] every humour in his kind i.e., every aspect of his nature.

[4] maketh the anatomy i.e., constructs a representation of the inner body.

[5] light trivial, insubstantial.

[6] pricked urged on, prompted.

[7] certes certainly, without a doubt.

[8] which for … foolish i.e., the foolish will dislike these speeches because of their weightiness or seriousness.

[9] rudeness roughness of style, lack of sophistication.

[10] descant make observations; remark.

[11] anatomy detailed examination or analysis.

[12] calf stupid person; dolt.

[13] horse-leech horse-doctor, veterinarian.

[14] The shoemaker … latchet Proverb, "Let not the cobbler (shoemaker) go beyond his last" (i.e., let no man participate in or make pronouncements upon those activities for which he has not been trained). The proverb is "taken from the famous story of Apelles, who could not bear that the cobbler should correct any part of his picture beyond the slipper" (Tilley C480).

[15] bill hedging bill (a tool used to trim hedges and trees).

[16] shaft i.e., the shaft of an arrow; fletcher one who makes arrows.

[17] make most against me i.e, testify most against me.

[18] curious sifter overly particular or unduly inquisitive examiner.

[19] Things … price Proverb (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., Appendix A, no. 182).

[20] wine is neat … ivy bush A bush of ivy or representation of it was placed outside a tavern to indicate that wine was sold there. Thus, the proverbial expression arose, "Good wine needs no bush (ivy bush, ing.[1] Where the matter itself bringeth credit, the man with his gloss winneth small commendation. It is therefore, methinketh, a greater show of a pregnant[2] wit than perfect wisdom in a thing of sufficient excellency to use superfluous eloquence. We commonly see that a black ground doth best beseem a white counterfeit.[3] And Venus, according to the judgment of Mars, was then most amiable when she sat close by Vulcan.[4] If these things be true which experience trieth—that a naked tale doth most truly set forth the naked truth,[5] that where the countenance is fair there need no colours,[6] that painting is meeter for[7] ragged walls than fine marble,[8] that verity then shineth most bright when she is in least bravery[9]—I shall satisfy mine own mind, though I cannot feed their humours which greatly seek after those that sift the finest meal and bear the whitest mouths.[10]

It is a world to see how Englishmen desire to hear finer speech than the language will allow, to eat finer bread than is made of wheat,[11] to wear finer cloth than is wrought of wool.[12] But I let pass their fineness which can no way excuse my folly. If your lordship shall accept my good will, which I have always desired, I will patiently bear the ill will of the malicious, which I never deserved.

Thus committing this simple pamphlet to your lordship's patronage, and your honour to the Almighty's protection, for the preservation of the which, as most bounden, I will pray continually, I end.

Your lordship's servant to command,
J. Lyly

To the Gentlemen Readers

I was driven into a quandary,[13] gentlemen, whether I might send this my pamphlet to the printer or to the peddler. I thought it too bad for the press and too good for the pack. But seeing my folly in writing to be as great as others', I was willing my fortune should be as ill as any's. We commonly see the book that at midsummer lieth bound on the stationer's stall[14] at Christmas to be broken in the haberdasher's shop; which, since it is the order of proceeding, I am content this summer to have my doings read for a toy,[15] that in winter they may be ready for trash.

It is not strange, whenas the greatest wonder lasteth but nine days,[16] that a new work should not endure but three months. Gentlemen use books as gentlewomen handle their flowers, who in the morning stick them in their heads and at night strew them at their heels. Cherries be fulsome[17] sign)" (Tilley W462), meaning that "good things need no commendation of any outward badge or token." "Neat" means pure or unadulterated by the addition of water.

---

[1] Proverb (Tilley C649). Lyly's is the earliest use Tilley cites.

[2] pregnant imaginative, inventive, resourceful.

[3] Proverb, "Black best sets forth white" (Tilley B435).

[4] I.e., Venus, the goddess of love and the most beautiful of the goddesses, seemed most desirable to her lover, Mars, the god of war, when she was seated next to her husband, Vulcan, a deformed cripple.

[5] Proverb, "The truth shows best being naked" (Tilley T589). See the related proverbs, T561, T575, and T593.

[6] Proverb, "A good face needs no paint [i.e., colours, cosmetics]" (Tilley F7).

[7] meeter for more suited to.

[8] Proverb, "The fine marble needs no painting" (Tilley M639).

[9] bravery finery, fine clothes.

[10] those that sift the finest meal and bear the whitest mouths i.e., those that sift flour that has already been sifted in order to produce an extremely fine texture and (those) that hold the bit most carefully in their mouths; the former metaphor is clear enough, but the latter refers to fine and sensitive horses whose mouths remain undamaged by the bit (fig. those who search with extreme care to find the most refined literary works, and who possess [to aid them in their search] the most refined literary tastes).

[11] Proverb, "He would eat finer bread than is made of wheat" (Tilley B622), a reference to those who are so overly-fastidious that they cannot be reasonably satisfied even with the best that it is possible to offer. See the related proverb, K183.

[12] a variation of the above proverb, included in the quotations attached to Tilley B622.

[13] Proverb, "to be in a quandary" (Tilley Q1).

[14] stationer's stall bookseller's shop. Unsold books would be sold as waste paper (for wrapping orders, etc.) to a variety of merchants, particularly haberdashers (merchants who sold various small articles) and grocers. See Ben Jonson, "Epigram II: To My Book," Works (1616).

[15] toy trifling or light entertainment.

[16] Proverb, "A wonder lasts but nine days" (Tilley W728).

[17] fulsome filling, tending to cloy or surfeit; also coarse, unsuited to a dainty palate; perhaps, even nauseating.

when they be through ripe because they be plenty, and books be stale when they be printed in that they be common.[1] In my mind, printers and tailors are bound chiefly to pray for gentlemen: the one hath so many fantasies to print, the other such divers fashions to make, that the pressing-iron[2] of the one is never out of the fire, nor the printing press of the other any time lieth still. But a fashion is but a day's wearing and a book but an hour's reading;[3] which seeing it is so, I am of the shoemaker's mind, who careth not so the shoe hold the plucking on, nor I so my labours last the running over.[4]

He that cometh in print because he would be known is like the fool that cometh into the market because he would be seen. I am not he that seeketh praise for his labour, but pardon for his offence; neither do I set this forth for any devotion in print,[5] but for duty which I owe to my patron. If one write never so well, he cannot please all; and write he never so ill, he shall please some. Fine heads will pick a quarrel with me if all be not curious,[6] and flatterers a thank if anything be current.[7]

But this is my mind: let him that findeth fault amend it,[8] and him that liketh it use it. Envy braggeth but draweth no blood; the malicious have more mind to quip than might to cut. I submit myself to the judgment of the wise and little esteem the censure of fools. The one will be satisfied with reason, the other are to be answered with silence. I know gentlemen will find no fault without cause, and bear with those that deserve blame; as for others, I care not for their jests, for I never meant to make them my judges.

Farewell

[1] Proverb, "Cherries and news fall price soonest" (Tilley C278).

[2] pressing-iron i.e., clothes-iron.

[3] Proverb, "Tailors and writers must mind the fashion" (Tilley T24).

[4] running over skimming or going through (reading).

[5] in print in a precise and perfect way; with exactness or precision. See Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 504.

[6] curious ingenious, clever.

[7] I.e., "flatters will pick a thank [curry favour with me] if anything be current" (if anything in the work is in vogue).

[8] a variation on the proverb, "He may find fault that cannot amend" (Tilley F110).

To My Very Good Friends, the Gentlemen Scholars of Oxford[9]

There is no privilege that needeth a pardon;[10] neither is there any remission to be asked where a commission is granted.[11] I speak this, gentlemen, not to excuse the offence which is taken, but to offer a defence where I was mistaken.[12] A clear conscience is a sure card;[13] truth hath the prerogative to speak with plainness and the modesty to bear with patience.[14]

It was reported by some and believed of many that in the education of Ephebus, where mention was made of universities, that Oxford was too much either defaced or defamed.[15] I know not what the envious have picked out by malice, or the curious[16] by wit, or the guilty by their own galled[17] consciences; but this I say, that I was as far from thinking ill as I find them from judging well. But if I should now go about to make amends, I were [9] To My Very Good Friends … Oxford This dedication is not in the 1578 edition; Lyly added it in response to the attacks on Euphues by those who saw it as insulting the university and its faculty. See p. 462, note 15 below.

[10] Proverb, "Where no fault is there needs no pardon" (Tilley F116).

[11] Proverb (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., Appendix A, no. 184).

[12] mistaken misunderstood, misconstrued.

[13] Proverb (Tilley C596), meaning that a clear conscience is a certain means to achieve one's desired goal (Lyly's is the earliest use Tilley cites.)

[14] partly a variation on the proverb, "Truth's tale is simple (Truth is plain)" (Tilley T593). See p. 461, note 5.

[15] Ephebus … Oxford … defaced or defamed In a section of Euphues called "Euphues and His Ephebus," Euphues offers a treatise on the education of youths, derived largely from Plutarch's Moralia ("On the Education of Children") (Hunter, p. 266). There, Euphues criticizes his own education in Athens, which was thought by some to be a veiled attack on Lyly's own education at Oxford. See Hunter, John Lyly, pp. 42-44. Ironically, as Alwes notes, Euphues "can perhaps best be read ... as an elaborate plea for academic preferment" (p. 105), since "Euphues' critique of the abuses at Athens [i.e., Oxford] ... concludes with the self-serving observation: 'How such abuses should or might be redressed in all universities, especially in Athens, if I were of authority to command, it should be seen, or of credit to persuade those that have the dealings with them, it should soon be shown" (p. 107).

[16] curious overly exacting; nitpickers.

[17] galled rubbed, sore.

then faulty in somewhat amiss,[1] and should show myself like Apelles' prentice,[2] who, coveting to mend the nose, marred the cheek; and not unlike the foolish dyer, who never thought his cloth black until it was burned. If any fault be committed, impute it to Euphues, who knew you not, not to Lyly, who hates you not.

Yet may I of all the rest most condemn Oxford of unkindness[3]—of vice I cannot—who seemed to wean me before she brought me forth, and to give me bones to gnaw before I could get the teat to suck; wherein she played the nice[4] mother in sending me into the country to nurse, where I tired[5] at a dry breast three years and was at the last enforced to wean myself. But it was destiny; for if I had not been gathered from the tree in the bud, I should, being blown, have proved a blast;[6] and as good it is to be an addle-egg as an idle bird.[7]

Euphues at his arrival, I am assured, will view Oxford, where he will either recant his sayings or renew his complaints. He is now on the seas, and how he hath been tossed I know not; but whereas I had thought to receive him at Dover, I must meet him at Hampton.[8] Nothing can hinder his coming but death, neither anything hasten his departure but unkindness.

Concerning myself, I have always thought so reverently of Oxford, of the scholars, of the manners, that I seemed to be rather an idolater than a blasphemer. They that invented this toy[9] were unwise, and they that reported it unkind, and yet none of them can prove me unhonest.[10]

But suppose I glanced at some abuses. Did not Jupiter's egg bring forth as well Helen, a light huswife[11] in earth, as Castor, a light star in heaven? The ostrich, that taketh the greatest pride in her feathers, picketh some of the worst out and burneth them.[12] There is no tree but hath some blast,[13] no countenance but hath some blemish; and shall Oxford, then, be blameless? I wish it were so, yet I cannot think it is so. But as it is, it may be better; and were it badder, it is not the worst. I think there are few universities that have less faults than Oxford, many that have more, none but hath some.

But I commit my cause to the consciences of those that either know what I am, or can guess what I should be: the one will answer themselves in construing friendly; the other, if I knew them, I would satisfy reasonably.

---

1 faulty in somewhat amiss guilty of some error, mistake.

2 prentice apprentice.

3 unkindness i.e., "unnaturalness" (especially given the following metaphor).

4 nice overly refined or fastidious. The practice of wet-nursing was common among upper-class Renaissance mothers, who rarely breast-fed their own babies.

5 tired tugged.

6 for if I had not been gathered … blast i.e., if I had not been picked while I was still in bud, when I flowered, I would have proven to be already blighted or ruined (cf. Tilley B702, "To nip in the bud [blossom]").

7 Proverb, "As good be an addled egg as an idle bird" (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 185). An addled egg was a rotten or putrid egg which produced no chicken. The idea of abortiveness led to many word-plays on addle and idle, where idle means "empty-headed" or "stupid."

8 Hampton Southampton. Although there may be an obscure biographical reference here (Hunter notes that Southampton was near to Lord Delaware's country estate [p. 68]), Lyly may also be hinting at Euphues' later reformation from wild youth to sober man: while both Dover and Southampton were port towns, Dover was by far the busier, close to London, and a main port to arrive from and depart for the Continent; Southampton, on the other hand, had a reputation for being a quieter port for Continental journeys (Topographical Dict., p. 155; p. 475). Lyly may simply suggest that the sequel to Euphues, which he thought was almost finished (close at hand, like Dover to London) is actually far from complete (far distant, like Southampton from London). See Hunter, John Lyly, pp. 64-66.

9 toy foolish or idle tale.

10 unhonest dishonourable.

11 huswife hussy: a pert and sexually loose woman or girl. When Jupiter in the form of a swan seduced Leda, wife of the King of Sparta, she produced two eggs; from one was born Helen of Troy and Pollux, from the other, Castor and Clytemnestra. For Helen, see p. 465, note 16. Castor led an exemplary heroic life, and as a reward was transformed, along with his brother Pollux, into the constellation Gemini when he died. Cf. the proverb, "To come of the same egg (nest)" (i.e., "of one father and mother, or brought up under one master, or in one school" [Tilley E81]).

12 not an especially common notion about ostriches (the idea that they hide their heads in the sand and eat iron is often cited). See Pliny, Natural History, 1.270.

13 blast damaged or diseased bud.

Thus, loath to incur the suspicion of unkindness in not telling my mind, and not willing to make any excuse where there need no amends, I can neither crave pardon lest I should confess a fault, nor conceal my meaning lest I should be thought a fool. And so I end.

Yours assured to use,
John Lyly.

Euphues

There dwelt in Athens a young gentleman of great patrimony and of so comely a personage that it was doubted whether he were more bound to nature for the lineaments of his person or to fortune for the increase of his possessions. But nature, impatient of comparisons, and, as it were, disdaining a companion or copartner in her working, added to this comeliness of his body such a sharp capacity of mind that not only she proved fortune counterfeit, but was half of that opinion that she herself was only current.[1] This young gallant, of more wit than wealth,[2] and yet of more wealth than wisdom, seeing himself inferior to none in pleasant conceits,[3] thought himself superior to all in honest conditions,[4] insomuch that he thought himself so apt to all things that he gave himself almost to nothing but practicing of those things commonly which are incident to these sharp wits: fine phrases, smooth quips, merry taunts, jesting without mean,[5] and abusing mirth without measure.

As therefore the sweetest rose hath his prickle,[6] the finest velvet his brack,[7] the fairest flour his bran,[8] so the sharpest wit hath his wanton will and the holiest head his wicked way. And true it is that some men write, and most men believe, that in all perfect shapes a blemish bringeth rather a liking every way to the eyes than a loathing any way to the mind.[9] Venus had her mole[10] in her cheek which made her more amiable; Helen her scar in her chin which Paris called cos amoris, the whetstone of love; Aristippus his wart;[11] Lycurgus his wen.[12] So likewise in the disposition of the mind, either virtue is overshadowed with some vice or vice overcast with some virtue: Alexander valiant in war, yet given to wine;[13] Tully[14] eloquent in his glozes, yet vainglorious; Solomon wise, yet too, too wanton;[15] David

---

1 counterfeit … current The image here is taken from coining—i.e., Nature's gifts to Euphues showed that fortune was falsely given the credit for his excellence, and Nature [came] to partly believe that she herself was the only genuine or true influence upon his character and personage.

2 playing on the proverb, "Better wit than wealth" (Tilley W544) and "Wisdom (Knowledge) is better than riches" (W526). See the related proverb, W534.

3 conceits ideas, notions.

4 conditions personal qualities.

5 mean moderation.

6 Proverb, "No rose without a thorn (prickle)" (Tilley R182). See related proverbs, M839, P420, R179, and W466.

7 a variation on the proverb, "The purest lawn has frets" (Tilley L121a); brack flaw.

8 Proverb, "All flour has its bran" (Tilley F383). Lyly's is the earliest use Tilley cites.

9 Cf. pp. 468-69, note 12.

10 Venus had her mole Thomas Dekker's The Gull's Hornbook refers to "the mole on Helen's cheek, being cos amoris," but we have been unable to trace the source of this common allusion. See R.B. McKerrow, ed. (London, 1904; rept. New York, 1971), p. 17.

11 Aristippus his wart Aristippus, ancient Greek philosopher, associate of Socrates, and proverbially flattering courtier of Dionysius II, tyrant of Syracuse. Sometimes credited with founding the Cyrenaic school of philosophy, he combined a dedication to philosophy with unbridled hedonism. Diogenes Laertius' life of Aristippus gives many anecdotes about his devotion to philosophy and his love of luxury but makes no mention of a prominent wart. See Laertius vol. 1, 2.8, pp. 195-233.

12 Lycurgus his wen (i.e., cyst). Here, the famously austere founder of classical Sparta's constitution; thus, the man responsible for Sparta's dedication to the values of self-discipline, self-denial, and patriotic self-sacrifice. His cyst is not mentioned by any of the major classical writers we have consulted.

13 On Alexander's overfondness for wine, see p. 459, note 14.

14 Tully Marcus Tullius Cicero (106-43 BCE), Roman orator, lawyer, politician, and writer, famous for his elegant and persuasive expositions ("glozes"). Plutarch reports that Cicero's main flaw was a vain tendency to tirelessly praise himself and magnify his achievements.

15 Solomon's wisdom is proverbial; he also, however, had 700 wives and 300 concubines; many of these women worshiped foreign gods, and Solomon was slowly drawn away into idolatry (1 Kings 11:1-13).

holy, but yet a homicide;[1] none more witty than Euphues, yet at the first none more wicked.

The freshest colours soonest fade,[2] the teenest razor soonest turneth his edge,[3] the finest cloth is soonest eaten with moths,[4] and the cambric[5] sooner stained than the coarse canvas.[6] Which appeared well in this Euphues, whose wit being, like wax, apt to receive any impression, and bearing the head in his own hand,[7] either to use the rein or the spur, disdaining counsel, leaving his country, loathing his old acquaintance, thought either by wit to obtain some conquest, or by shame to abide some conflict; who, preferring fancy before friends and his present humour before honour to come, laid reason in water, being too salt for his taste,[8] and followed unbridled affection,[9] most pleasant for his tooth.

When parents have more care how to leave their children wealthy than wise, and are more desirous to have them maintain the name than the nature of a gentleman; when they put gold into the hands of youth where they should put a rod under their girdle;[10] when instead of awe they make them past grace, and leave them rich executors of goods and poor executors of godliness—then is it no marvel that the son, being left rich by his father's will, become reckless by his own will.

But it hath been an old said saw,[11] and not of less truth than antiquity, that wit is the better if it be the dearer bought,[12] as in the sequel of this history shall most manifestly appear. It happened this young imp to arrive at Naples, a place of more pleasure than profit and yet of more profit than piety, the very walls and windows whereof showed it rather to be the tabernacle of Venus than the temple of Vesta.[13] There was all things necessary and in readiness that might either allure the mind to lust or entice the heart to folly: a court more meet for an atheist than for one of Athens,[14] for Ovid than for Aristotle,[15] for a graceless lover than for a godly liver, more fitter for Paris than Hector,[16] and meeter for Flora than Diana.[17] Here my youth—whether for weariness he could not, or for wantonness would not go any farther—determined to make his abode; whereby it is evidently seen that the fleetest fish swalloweth the delicatest bait, that the highest soaring hawk traineth to the lure,[18] and that the wittiest brain is inveigled with the sudden view of alluring vanities.

Here he wanted[19] no companions which courted him continually with sundry kinds of devices whereby they might either soak his purse to reap commodity[20] or soothe his person to win

---

[1] David, king of Israel, one of God's favourites, nevertheless arranged the death of Uriah so that he (David) could take Uriah's wife, Bathsheba, as his own (2 Samuel 11).

[2] Proverb, "The fairest flowers (freshest colours) soonest fade" (Tilley F391).

[3] teenest OED notes that Lyly's use of "teen" here is a corruption of "keen"; thus, "keenest" or "sharpest"; turneth his edge becomes dull. Although this saying sounds proverbial, it is not in Tilley.

[4] Proverb, "The finest cloth is eaten by moths" (Tilley C429).

[5] cambric fine white linen.

[6] Proverb, "The finest lawn (cloth) will be the soonest stained" (Tilley L120). See the related proverbs, C56, S450, S781.

[7] bearing the head in his own hand The image is from horsemanship, where Euphues is represented as the rider being in full control of his mount (his own course in life).

[8] laid reason in water … taste Proverb, "to lay a [or sometimes 'in'] water," meaning "to lay aside" (Tilley W108). Euphues rejects the salty—thus, distasteful—dictates of reason.

[9] affection passion (i.e., emotion as opposed to reason).

[10] a rod under their girdle i.e., beat them in order to instil discipline and cement their moral education. Cf. the proverb, "Spare the rod and spoil (spill) the child. (He that spares the rod hates the child)" (Tilley R155). See the related proverb, C326.

[11] said saw a spoken traditional maxim or proverb.

[12] Proverb, "Wit is never good till it be bought (dearly bought)" (Tilley W567). See the related proverb, W545.

[13] I.e., dedicated to pleasure (represented by Venus, the goddess of love) rather than to chastity and self-restraint (represented by Vesta, the goddess of sexual purity and the family hearth).

[14] Athens was famed as a city of philosophical learning, dedicated to and named after the goddess Athena.

[15] I.e., for the classical world's premier erotic poet than for its most famous philosopher.

[16] I.e., for a lover (Paris stole away Helen, the wife of Menelaus, out of love for her, triggering the Trojan War) than a warrior (Hector, Paris' brother, was Troy's pre-eminent warrior who could be brought down only by the great Achilles).

[17] I.e., more suitable for the goddess of spring, fertility, and reproduction than for the goddess of chastity.

[18] Proverb, "In time all hawks will stoop to the lure" (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 330).

[19] wanted lacked.

[20] soak his purse to reap commodity i.e., drain or exhaust his money to gain their own profit.

credit, for he had guests and companions of all sorts. There frequented to his lodging as well the spider to suck poison of his fine wit as the bee to gather honey,[1] as well the drone as the dove, the fox as the lamb, as well Damocles to betray him as Damon to be true to him.[2] Yet he behaved himself so warily that he singled his game wisely.[3] He could easily discern Apollo's music from Pan his pipe, and Venus' beauty from Juno's bravery, and the faith of Laelius from the flattery of Aristippus.[4] He welcomed all, but trusted none. He was merry, but yet so wary[5] that neither the flatterer could take advantage to entrap him in his talk, nor the wisest any assurance of his friendship.

Who, being demanded of one what countryman he was, he answered, "What countryman am I not? If I be in Crete, I can lie;[6] if in Greece, I can shift;[7] if in Italy, I can court it.[8] If thou ask whose son I am also, I ask thee whose son I am not. I can carouse with Alexander,[9] abstain with Romulus,[10] eat with the Epicure, fast with the Stoic,[11] sleep with Endymion,[12] watch with Chrysippus"[13]—using these speeches and other like.

An old gentleman in Naples, seeing his pregnant wit, his eloquent tongue somewhat taunting yet with delight, his mirth without measure yet not without wit, his sayings vainglorious yet pithy, began to bewail his nurture and to muse at his nature, being incensed against the one as most pernicious and inflamed with the other as most precious. For well he knew that so rare a wit would in time either breed an intolerable trouble or bring an incomparable treasure to the commonweal; at the one he greatly pitied, at the other he rejoiced. Having, therefore, gotten opportunity to communicate with him his mind, with watery eyes (as one lamenting his wantonness) and smiling face (as one loving his wittiness) encountered him on this manner:[14]

---

[1] Proverb, "Where the bee sucks honey, the spider sucks poison" (Tilley B208). See the related proverb, B205.

[2] Damocles and Damon are figures from the classical past who represent, respectively, hypocritical, flattering sycophancy (see p. 460, note 2) and true, undying friendship. Damon, the Pythagorean philosopher, was condemned to death by the tyrant Dionysius; he was allowed to return home and settle his affairs before his execution, only because the philosopher Pythias promised to die in his place if Damon did not return at the appointed time. When Damon appeared for his execution, Dionysius was so impressed at the bond of friendship between the two men that he released them both. In the Renaissance, they became a common archetype of ideal friendship. For other such archetypes, see p. 476, note 5.

[3] singled his game wisely The image is taken from hunting, where a hunter separates one deer, etc. from the herd; here, he wisely singled out the individual who was the object of his pursuit or interest from the rest of the crowd.

[4] Since Apollo was the god of music and the arts, his music produced on the lyre would be more divine than that produced on the rural pipes of Pan, god of shepherds and herdsmen; Venus' beauty was supreme, and Juno attiring herself in finery (bravery) is no substitute; on Aristippus' reputation for flattery, see p. 464, note 11. Laelius Gaius Laelius (c. 235-c. 160 BCE), Roman consul, and one of the main speakers in Cicero's dialogue, De Amicitia ("On Friendship"). Cicero uses Laelius' relationship with Scipio Africanus (the younger), famed Roman general, to exemplify the true nature of ideal friendship.

[5] Proverb, "Good to be merry and wise" (Tilley G324).

[6] Proverb, "Cretans are liars (Use craft against Cretans)" (Tilley C822).

[7] shift deceive, live by fraud. The proverb "Grecian faith" (Tilley F31) refers to Greeks as the proverbial archetype of faithlessness and treachery. See p. 466, note 6.

[8] court it play or act the courtier; Euphues' answer plays upon the proverb, "When you are at Rome do as they do at Rome" (Tilley R165).

[9] See p. 459, note 14.

[10] Romulus, one of the two mythic founders of Rome, famed for his piety, military valour, and political acuity. His life-long reputation for abstemiousness alluded to here probably springs from the legend that he and his twin brother Remus, exposed as infants, were suckled by a she-wolf and fed with crumbs by a hitwaw [i.e., hickwall or woodpecker].

[11] The Epicurean philosophers and their followers were popularly perceived in the Renaissance as hedonists, while the Stoics were viewed as embodying the virtues of self-abnegation and asceticism.

[12] Endymion In classical mythology, a beautiful young shepherd sleeping on Mount Latmos was spied by the moon, who fell instantly in love with him. She caused him to sleep eternally so that she could gaze on his beauty forever. Lyly's play Endymion (1585) uses this figure as part of a graceful celebration of Elizabeth I.

[13] Chrysippus of Soli (c. 280-207 BCE), Stoic philosopher. His reputation for wakefulness might be traced to Laertius' attribution of an astounding 705 works to him. See Laertius, vol. 2, 7.7.

[14] encountered him on this manner addressed him in this way.

"Young gentleman, although my acquaintance be small to entreat you, and my authority less to command you, yet my good will in giving you good counsel should induce you to believe me, and my hoary hairs (ambassadors of experience) enforce you to follow me; for by how much the more I am a stranger to you, by so much the more you are beholding to me. Having, therefore, opportunity to utter my mind, I mean to be importunate with you to follow my meaning.

"As thy birth doth show the express and lively image of gentle blood, so thy bringing up seemeth to me to be a great blot to the lineage of so noble a brute;[1] so that I am enforced to think that either thou didst want[2] one to give thee good instructions, or that thy parents made thee a wanton with too much cockering:[3] either they were too foolish in using no discipline, or thou too froward[4] in rejecting their doctrine; either they willing to have thee idle, or thou willful to be ill-employed. Did they not remember that which no man ought to forget, that the tender youth of a child is like the tempering of new wax—apt to receive any form?[5] He that will carry a bull with Milo must use to carry him a calf also;[6] he that coveteth to have a straight tree must not bow him being a twig.[7] The potter fashioneth his clay when it is soft,[8] and the sparrow is taught to come when he is young.[9] As, therefore, the iron being hot receiveth any form with the stroke of the hammer, and keepeth it[10] being cold forever, so the tender wit of a child, if with diligence it be instructed in youth, will with industry use those qualities in his age.

"They might also have taken example of the wise husbandmen, who in their fattest[11] and most fertile ground sow hemp before wheat, a grain that drieth up the superfluous moisture and maketh the soil more apt for corn; or of good gardeners, who in their curious knots[12] mix hyssop with thyme as aiders the one to the growth of the other (the one being dry, the other moist); or of cunning painters, who for the whitest work cast the blackest ground, to make the picture more amiable. If, therefore, thy father had been as wise a husbandman as he was a fortunate husband, or thy mother as good a housewife as she was a happy wife—if they had been both as good gardeners to keep their knot as they were grafters to bring forth such fruit, or as cunning painters as they were happy parents—no doubt they had sowed hemp before wheat (that is, discipline before affection); they had set hyssop with thyme (that is, manners with wit, the one to aid the other); and to make thy dexterity more, they had cast a black ground for their white work (that is, they had mixed threats with fair looks).

"But things past are past calling again; it is too late to shut the stable door when the steed is stolen.[13] The Trojans repented too late when their

---

[1] brute referring to Brute, or Brutus, the legendary great-grandson of Aeneas (legendary founder of the Roman people), and reputed the first king of Britain, and the founder of London; thus, an individual of noble or worthy descent.

[2] want lack.

[3] cockering indulgence.

[4] froward perverse, unmanageable, obstinate.

[5] Proverb, "Soft wax will take any impression" (Tilley W136); "Youth and white paper take any impression" (Y44). See the related proverbs, W135, W138.

[6] Proverb, "He may bear (carry) a bull that hath borne (carried) a calf" (Tilley B711), meaning that a person who becomes accustomed to doing little things, gradually becomes able to do greater ones. Milo was a disciple of Pythagoras and famed six-time Olympic champion, one of whose feats was to carry a bullock forty yards, kill it with a single blow, and consume it in one day (Classical Dict., p. 412).

[7] Proverb, "Young twigs may be bent but not old trees" (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 654). Two variations are: "Best to bend while it is a twig" (Tilley T632); and "Thraw (i.e, twist) the wand while it is green" (W27). Renaissance proverbs about the raising of children often emphasize the necessity of discipline, warning that unless a child is moulded in youth—when he or she is pliable—they will be obstinate and immoveable in their maturity. See p. 465, note 10.

[8] Proverb, "The potter fashions his clay when it is soft" (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 500); "A young child like new wax easily receives any form" (no. 90, p. 97).

[9] Proverb, "Old sparrows are ill to tame" (Tilley S716).

[10] Proverb, "Strike while the iron is hot" (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 594; Tilley I94).

[11] fattest richest.

[12] curious knots artistically arranged, formal gardens.

[13] Proverb, "When the steed (horse) is stolen shut the stable door" (Tilley S838). Cf. Caxton, Fab. Avian (1484) 24, p. 245: "It was not time to shut the stable when the horses been lost and gone." See the related proverbs, M809, T305; proverb, "Things past cannot be recalled" (Tilley T203). See the related proverbs, C921, T200, T204, T332, Y31.

town was spoiled.[1] Yet the remembrance of thy former follies might breed in thee a remorse of conscience and be a remedy against farther concupiscence. But now to thy present time. The Lacedaemonians were wont to show their children drunken men and other wicked men, that by seeing their filth they might shun the like fault, and avoid the like vices when they were at the like state.[2] The Persians, to make their youth abhor gluttony would paint an Epicure sleeping with meat in his mouth and most horribly overladen with wine, that by the view of such monstrous sights they might eschew the means of the like excess.[3] The Parthians, to cause their youth to loathe the alluring trains of women's wiles and deceitful enticements, had most curiously carved in their houses a young man blind, besides whom was adjoined a woman so exquisite that, in some men's judgment, Pygmalion's image[4] was not half so excellent, having one hand in his pocket as noting her theft, and holding a knife in the other hand to cut his throat.

"If the sight of such ugly shapes caused a loathing of the like sins, then, my good Euphues, consider their plight and beware of thine own peril. Thou art here in Naples a young sojourner, I an old senior; thou a stranger,[5] I a citizen; thou secure, doubting no mishap; I sorrowful, dreading thy misfortune. Here mayest thou see that which I sigh to see: drunken sots wallowing in every house, in every chamber, yea, in every channel.[6] Here mayest thou behold that which I cannot without blushing behold, nor without blubbering utter: those whose bellies be their gods,[7] who offer their goods as sacrifice to their guts, who sleep with meat in their mouths,[8] with sin in their hearts, and with shame in their houses. Here, yea, here, Euphues, mayest thou see, not the carved vizard[9] of a lewd woman, but the incarnate visage of a lascivious wanton; not the shadow of love, but the substance of lust. My heart melteth in drops of blood to see a harlot with the one hand rob so many coffers, and with the other to rip so many corpses. Thou art here amidst the pikes,[10] between Scylla and Charybdis, ready if thou shun Syrtis to sink into Symplegades.[11] Let the Lacedaemonian, the Persian, the Parthian, yea, the Neapolitan, cause thee rather to detest such villainy at the sight and view of their vanity.

[...]

"One drop of poison infecteth the whole tun of wine, one leaf of coloquintida marreth and spoileth the whole pot of porridge, one iron-mole defaceth the whole piece of lawn.[12] Descend into

---

[1] Proverb, "Like the Trojans, we were wise too late" (Tilley T528). See the related proverbs, E192 and P649.

[2] The Lacedaemonians … the like state Plutarch reports that the Lacedaemonians (i.e., the Spartans) would force their slaves (the Ilotes) to drink to excess as an object lesson about the vice of drunkenness.

[3] The Persians … the like excess We have not been able to trace this allusion. However, Roger Ascham's The Schoolmaster (1570) celebrates the Persians' system of education for the opposite reason: that it strove to maintain youthful innocence by protecting young men from exposure to examples of vice. See English Works, ed. W.A. Wright (Cambridge, 1904; rept., 1970), pp. 203, 206, and 210.

[4] The classical sculptor Pygmalion created the statue of a woman so beautiful that he fell in love with it. Venus brought it to life and Pygmalion named her Galatea, married her, and had a son by her. We have not been able to trace the source of the Parthian reference.

[5] stranger foreigner.

[6] channel gutter.

[7] Philippians 3:19: "Their end is destruction, their god is the belly, and they glory in their shame, with minds set on earthly things."

[8] Psalm 78:29-31 describes God feeding the Israelites with manna in the desert and their subsequent ingratitude and disobedience: "So they did eat, and were well filled: for he gave them their own desire; they were not estranged from their lust. But while their meat was yet in their mouths, the wrath of God came upon them, and slew the fattest of them, and smote down the chosen men of Israel."

[9] vizard mask.

[10] pikes peaks, pointed rocks (equivalent dangers).

[11] Proverb, "between Scylla and Charybdis" (Tilley S169), meaning to be caught between two equal dangers. See the related proverb, H62. The Syrtis or Syrtes was the name of two bays on the north coast of Africa; their dangerous sandbanks and shallows were a famous peril for mariners. The Symplegades or "the clashing rocks" refers to "the cliffs at the entrance of the Thracian Bosporous which were supposed to clash together and destroy ships attempting to pass through the Straits" (Topographical Dict., p. 496-98).

[12] Proverb, "One drop of poison infects the whole tun of wine" (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 496); "a little coloquintida [i.e., the colocynth, a very bitter apple] (one ill, wicked weed; one crop of a turd) mars thine own conscience and consider with thyself the great difference between staring and stark-blind,[1] wit and wisdom, love and lust. Be merry, but with modesty;[2] be sober, but not too sullen; be valiant, but not too venturous. Let thy attire be comely, but not costly;[3] thy diet wholesome, but not excessive. Use pastime as the word importeth: to pass the time in honest recreation. Mistrust no man without cause, neither be thou credulous without proof. Be not light to follow every man's opinion, nor obstinate to stand in thine own conceit.[4] Serve God, love God, fear God, and God will so bless thee as either thy heart can wish, or thy friends desire. And so I end my counsel, beseeching thee to begin to follow it."

This old gentleman having finished his discourse, Euphues began to shape him answer in this sort:

"Father and friend—your age showeth the one, your honesty the other—I am neither so suspicious to mistrust your goodwill nor so sottish[5] to mislike your good counsel; as I am, therefore, to thank you for the first, so it stands upon me[6] to think better on the latter. I mean not to cavil with you as one loving sophistry, neither to control[7] you as one having superiority: the one would bring my talk into the suspicion of fraud, the other convince me of folly.

"Whereas you argue—I know not upon what probabilities, but sure I am upon no proof—that my bringing-up should be a blemish to my birth, I answer and swear to that, you were not therein a little overshot. Either you gave too much credit to the report of others, or too much liberty to your own judgment. You convince[8] my parents of peevishness in making me a wanton, and me of lewdness in rejecting correction. But so many men, so many minds:[9] that may seem in your eye odious which in another's eye may be gracious. Aristippus a philosopher, yet who more courtly?[10] Diogenes[11] a philosopher, yet who more carterly? Who more popular than Plato, retaining always good company?[12] Who more envious than Timon, denouncing all human society?[13] Who so severe as the Stoics, which like stocks[14] were moved with no melody? Who so secure as the Epicures, which wallowed in all kind of licentiousness? Though all men be made of one metal, yet they be not cast all in one mould.[15] There is framed of the selfsame clay as well the tile to keep out water, as the pot to contain liquor; the sun doth harden the dirt and melt the wax;[16] fire maketh the gold to shine and (spoils) a whole pot (a potful) of porridge (pottage)" (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 96; Tilley W240). All are variations on "One ill condition mars all the good" (Tilley C585). For the converse of these proverbs, p. 464, notes 6-10.

1 Proverb, "There is a difference between staring and stark-blind (stark-mad)" (Tilley D334).

2 Proverb, "Good to be merry and wise" (Tilley G324).

3 Proverb, "Comely not gaudy" (Tilley C541).

4 This paragraph develops the proverbial wisdom behind "The golden mean [i.e., the middle path or way] is best" (Tilley M792), meaning everything in moderation, and nothing in excess. See the related proverbs, M793, M804, M806, V80. Cf. Polonius' advice to his son Laertes, Hamlet, 1.3.58-80.

5 sottish foolish, stupid, dull.

6 it stands upon me i.e., it is my duty, or it is incumbent upon me.

7 control rebuke, reprove.

8 convince convict.

9 Latin proverb, Quot homines tot sententiae ("There are as many opinions as men") (Terence, Phormio, 2.4.14). Also a popular English proverb, "so many men, so many minds" (Tilley M583); "so many heads so many wits" (H279).

10 Aristippus … courtly See p. 464, note 11. When Aristippus took up his position as one of Dionysius' courtiers, he was roundly criticized by his fellow philosophers, particularly by Diogenes of Sinope (Laertius, 2.8.67-68).

11 Diogenes Diogenes of Sinope (c. 412/403-324/321 BCE), Greek philosopher of the Cynic school, famous for his extremely ascetic lifestyle, for his rejection of polite conventions, and for the scorn he poured on his fellow philosophers, saying, among other things, that Plato's lectures were a waste of time (Laertius, 6.2.22-33; 27-44); carterly befitting a carter; rude, boorish, ill-bred.

12 perhaps a reference to the convivial nature of Plato's dialogues. Diogenes Laertius reports of Plato that the philosopher always wanted "to leave a memorial of himself behind, either in the hearts of his friends or in his books" (Laertius, 3.39-41).

13 Timon of Athens (fl.5th century BCE), in the Renaissance a stock figure of the misanthrope. His story is recounted in Lucian's satirical dialogue "Timon" and in Plutarch's "Life of Marcus Antonius"; after his defeat at Actium, Antony resolved to emulate Timon's misanthropic, hermitic existence.

14 stocks tree stumps.

15 Proverb, "All men are made of the same metal" (Tilley M501). See the related proverb, A119.

16 Proverb, "The same sun softens (melts) wax and hardens clay" (Tilley S980).

the straw to smother;[1] perfumes doth refresh the dove and kill the beetle,[2] and the nature of the man disposeth that consent of the manners.[3]

"Now whereas you seem to love my nature and loathe my nurture, you bewray[4] your own weakness in thinking that nature may any ways be altered by education;[5] and as you have examples to confirm your pretence,[6] so I have most evident and infallible arguments to serve for my purpose. It is natural for the vine to spread; the more you seek by art to alter it, the more in the end you shall augment it. It is proper for the palm-tree to mount; the heavier you load it, the higher it sprouteth.[7] Though iron be made soft with fire, it returneth to his hardness; though the falcon be reclaimed to the fist, she retireth to her haggardness.[8] The whelp of a mastiff will never be taught to retrieve the partridge.[9] Education can have no show where the excellency of nature doth bear sway. The silly mouse will by no manner of means be tamed;[10] the subtle fox may well be beaten but never broken from stealing his prey.[11] If you pound spices, they smell the sweeter;[12] season the wood never so well, the wine will taste of the cask.[13] Plant and translate the crab-tree where and whensoever it please you, and it will never bear sweet apple[14]—unless you graft by art, which nothing toucheth nature. Infinite and innumerable were the examples I could allege and declare to confirm the force of nature and confute these, your vain and false forgeries, were not the repetition of them needless, having showed sufficient or bootless (seeing those alleged will not persuade you).[15] And can you be so unnatural, whom Dame Nature hath nourished and brought up so many years, to repine, as it were, against nature?

[...]

"But why go I about to praise nature, the which as yet was never any imp so wicked and barbarous, any Turk so vile and brutish, any beast so dull and senseless, that could, or would, or durst[16] dispraise or contemn?[17] Doth not Cicero conclude and allow that if we follow and obey nature we shall never err?[18] Doth not Aristotle allege and confirm that nature frameth or maketh nothing in any

[1] Proverb, "The same fire which purifies gold burns straw" (Tilley F279). Lyly's is the earliest use Tilley cites.

[2] Proverb, "Bad odors attract the vulture (beetle), perfumes repel him" (Tilley O13). See the related proverb, B221.

[3] I.e., a man's nature determines his behaviour.

[4] bewray reveal, betray.

[5] Proverb, "Nature passes nurture" (Tilley N47). See the related proverbs, "Better fed than taught" (F174); and "Nurture is above (passes) nature" (N357).

[6] confirm your pretence i.e., support your argument.

[7] Proverb, "The straighter (higher) grows the palm the heavier the weight it bears" (Tilley P37). See the related proverb, C34, p. 474, note 9.

[8] haggardness wildness (of an untamed hawk or falcon that has never been trained to come to the falconer's fist).

[9] Proverb (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., Appendix A, no. 197).

[10] Proverb (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 736). Tilley cites Erasmus's Similia as the source (I. 614 F); silly weak, helpless.

[11] Proverb, "A wolf (fox) may change his hair but not his heart (nature, malice)" (Tilley W616). See the related proverbs, F638 and W613.

[12] Proverb, "If you beat (pound) spice it will smell the sweeter" (Tilley S746). See the related proverb, F665.

[13] Proverb, "With what liquor a vessel (cask) is first seasoned, it will long keep the scent of it." Tilley notes that Euphues offers the converse of this proverb (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 658). Cf. Horace, Epistles, 1.2.69-70; Quintilian, Institutio Oratoria ("Education of an Orator"), 1.1.5.

[14] Proverb, "Plant the crab tree where you will, it will never bear sweet apples" (Tilley C788). Lyly's use is the earliest one Tilley cites.

[15] I.e., either the examples I've given are sufficient or it is in vain (bootless) to offer any others.

[16] durst dared.

[17] contemn despise.

[18] Cicero … err Cicero defines friendship as only possible between virtuous men: "... such men [i.e., those who embody the virtues of loyalty, uprightness, fairness, and generosity] let us consider good ... and also entitled to be called by that term because, in as far as that is possible for man, they follow Nature, who is the best guide to good living." Laelius: De Amicitia ("On Friendship"), 5.19, pp. 128-29. Similarly, in De Senectute ("On Old Age"), the aged Cato notes, "I am wise because I follow Nature as the best of guides and obey her as a god" (2.5, pp. 12-13). See W.A. Falconer, trans., De Senectute, De Amicitia, De Divinatione, in Cicero's Works, 28 vols. (Cambridge, MA, 1923), vol. 20. See also the popular proverb, "He that followeth Nature is never out of the way [i.e, is never in error, led astray]" (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 457).

point rude, vain, or imperfect?[1] Nature was had in such estimation and admiration among the heathen people that she was reputed for the only goddess in heaven.

"If nature, then, have largely and bountifully endued me with her gifts, why deem you me so untoward[2] and graceless? If she have dealt hardly[3] with me, why extol you so much my birth? If nature bear no sway, why use you this adulation? If nature work the effect, what booteth any education?[4] If nature be of strength or force, what availeth discipline or nurture? If of none, what helpeth nature? But let these sayings pass as known evidently and granted to be true, which none can or may deny, unless he be false or that he be an enemy to humanity.

"As touching my residence and abiding here in Naples, my youthly affections, my sports and pleasures, my pastimes, my common dalliance, my delights, my resort and company which daily use to visit me: although to you they breed more sorrow and care than solace and comfort because of your crabbed age, yet to me they bring more comfort and joy than care and grief, more bliss than bale,[5] more happiness than heaviness, because of my youthful gentleness. Either you would have all men old as you are, or else you have quite forgotten that you yourself were young or ever knew young days; either in your youth you were a very vicious and ungodly man, or now (being aged) very superstitious and devout above measure.[6]

"Put you no difference between the young flourishing bay-tree and the old withered beech? No kind of distinction between the waxing and the waning of the moon, and between the rising and the setting of the sun? Do you measure the hot assaults of youth by the cold skirmishes of age, whose years are subject to more infirmities than our youth? We merry, you melancholy; we zealous in affection, you jealous[7] in all your doings; you testy without cause, we hasty for no quarrel; you careful, we careless; we bold, you fearful; we in all points contrary unto you, and you in all points unlike unto us.

"Seeing, therefore, we be repugnant each to the other in nature, would you have us alike in qualities? Would you have one potion ministered to the burning fever and to the cold palsy, one plaster to an old issue[8] and a fresh wound, one salve for all sores, one sauce for all meats?[9] No, no, Eubulus![10] But I will yield to more than either I am bound to grant, either thou able to prove. Suppose that which I never will believe, that Naples is a cankered storehouse of all strife, a common stews[11] for all strumpets, the sink of shame, and the very nurse of all sin. Shall it therefore follow of necessity that all that are wooed of love should be wedded to lust? Will you conclude, as it were ex consequenti,[12] that whosoever arriveth here shall be enticed to folly and, being enticed, of force[13] shall be entangled? No, no, it is the disposition of the thought that altereth the nature of the

---

[1] In the context of arguing "that man is more of a political animal than bees or any other gregarious animals," Aristotle notes: "Nature, as we often say, makes nothing in vain, and man is the only animal whom she has endowed with the gift of speech" (Politics in The Basic Works of Aristotle, 1.2.1253A). Later he asserts, "Now if nature makes nothing incomplete, and nothing in vain, the inference must be that she has made all animals for the sake of man" (1256B). Cf. "Neither by nature, then, nor contrary to nature do the virtues arise in us; rather we are adapted by nature to receive them, and are made perfect by habit" (Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, 2.1.1103A); rude unfinished.

[2] untoward intractable, unruly, perverse.

[3] hardly severely, in the sense of "meanly," or "ungenerously"; not having lavished me with her gifts.

[4] what booteth any education? i.e., what is the point of having any education?

[5] bale suffering, unhappiness.

[6] There are at least two proverbs glanced at here and in the following two paragraphs: "Youth and age will never agree" (Tilley Y43) and "He that in youth no virtue uses, in age all honour him refuses" (Y37).

[7] jealous suspicious, apprehensive of evil, fearful.

[8] issue a suppurating wound.

[9] Proverb, "He has but one salve for all sores" (Tilley S82). See the related proverb, S83.

[10] Eubulus Greek, "wise counsellor."

[11] stews brothel.

[12] Latin, "from what follows upon; as a necessary consequence of."

[13] of force necessarily, inevitably.

thing.[1] The sun shineth upon the dunghill and is not corrupted;[2] the diamond lieth in the fire and is not consumed; the crystal toucheth the toad and is not poisoned;[3] the bird trochilus liveth by the mouth of the crocodile and is not spoiled;[4] a perfect wit is never bewitched with lewdness, neither enticed with lasciviousness.

"Is it not common that the holm tree springeth amidst the beech? That the ivy spreadeth upon the hard stones? That the soft feather bed breaketh the hard blade? If experience have not taught you this, you have lived long and learned little,[5] or if your moist brain[6] have forgot it, you have learned much and profited nothing. But it may be that you measure my affections by your own fancies, and knowing yourself either too simple to raise the siege by policy, or too weak to resist the assault by prowess, you deem me of as little wit as yourself, or of less force; either of small capacity, or of no courage. In my judgment, Eubulus, you shall as soon catch a hare with a tabor[7] as you shall persuade youth with your aged and overworn eloquence to such severity of life, which as yet there was never Stoic so strict, nor Jesuit[8] so superstitious, neither votary so devout but would rather allow it in words than follow it in works, rather talk of it than try it.[9] Neither were you such a saint in your youth that, abandoning all pleasures, all pastimes and delights, you would choose rather to sacrifice the first fruits of your life to vain holiness than to youthly affections. But as to the stomach quatted[10] with dainties all delicates seem queasy,[11] and as he that surfeiteth with wine useth afterward to allay with water, so these old huddles,[12] having overcharged their gorges with fancy, account all honest recreation mere folly and, having taken a surfeit of delight, seem now to savour it with despite.

"Seeing, therefore, it is labour lost[13] for me to persuade you, and wind vainly wasted for you to exhort me, here I found you and here I leave you,[14] having neither bought nor sold with you, but changed ware for ware.[15] If you have taken little pleasure in my reply, sure I am that by your counsel I have reaped less profit. They that use to steal honey burn hemlock to smoke the bees from their hives, and it may be that to get some advantage of me you have used these smoky arguments, thinking thereby to smother me with the conceit of strong imagination. But as the chameleon though he have most guts draweth least breath,[16]

---

[1] Proverb, "A man is weal or woe as he thinks himself so" (Tilley M254). Cf. Hamlet: "There is nothing either good or bad but thinking makes it so" (2.2.253-54). See the related proverb, N298.

[2] Proverb, "The sun is never the worse for shining on a dunghill" (Tilley S982).

[3] The notion that toads were poisonous and bore the antidote to this poison in their own bodies is found both in proverbial lore ("The foul toad hath a fair stone in its head" [Tilley, Eliz. Prov. no. 634; cf. no. 177]), and in the period's natural history: it was believed that toads possessed a stone (the so-called "toad-stone," usually located on the top of the head) which was an antidote to poison, if worn next to a person's skin. See T. Browne, Pseudodoxia Epidemica ("Vulgar Errors"; 1646), Book 3, chapter 13, pp. 149-52, who traces this idea from the ancients.

[4] Both Herodotus (An Account of Egypt: Being the Second Book of His Histories called Euterpe, para. 25) and Aristotle (History of Animals, Book 9, part 6) describe the symbiotic relationship between the crocodile and the trochilus, where the little bird eats the leeches which infest the crocodile's mouth, or simply cleans its teeth; spoiled killed, destroyed.

[5] Proverb, "Live and learn" (Tilley L379). See the related proverb, L393.

[6] moist brain A moist-brained person is dull or stupid.

[7] Proverb, "You shall as soon catch a hare with a tabor" (Tilley H160), one of many proverbial expressions suggesting the impossibility of a projected action. A tabor was a small drum. See the related proverb, W416.

[8] Jesuit a priest of the Roman Catholic order, the Society of Jesus, popularly represented in Protestant England as embodying what it saw as all the vices of that religion: superstition, authoritarianism, and duplicity.

[9] Proverb, "Few words and many deeds" (Tilley W797); "The greatest talkers are the least (not the greatest) doers" (T64); "not words but deeds" (W820).

[10] quatted glutted, stuffed.

[11] Proverb, "To him that has lost his taste, sweet is sour." Cf. Erasmus, Similia, I. 624 F (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 744).

[12] huddle surly old person.

[13] Proverb, "You lose your labor" (Tilley L9).

[14] Proverb, "Here I found you and here (As I found you) I leave you" (Tilley F224). See the related proverb, V5.

[15] ware for ware goods for goods (speech for speech).

[16] perhaps a reference to the contradiction in Pliny's description of this lizard: he repeats the common idea that the chameleon lived on nothing more substantial than air, but he also talks about the uses to which people have put chameleon dung (the product of the guts) [Natural History, 2.315b]. See also the proverb, "The chameleon lives on air (changes color)" (Tilley, Eliz. Prov. no. 83).

or as the elder tree though he be fullest of pith is farthest from strength,[1] so though your reasons seem inwardly to yourself somewhat substantial and your persuasions pithy in your own conceit, yet being well weighed without,[2] they be shadows without substance[3] and weak without force. The bird taurus hath a great voice but a small body,[4] the thunder a great clap yet but a little stone,[5] the empty vessel giveth a greater sound than the full barrel.[6] I mean not to apply it, but look into yourself and you shall certainly find it. And thus I leave you seeking it; but were it not that my company stay my coming,[7] I would surely help you to look it, but I am called hence by my acquaintance."

Euphues, having thus ended his talk, departed, leaving this old gentleman in a great quandary; who, perceiving that he was more inclined to wantonness than to wisdom, with a deep sigh, the tears trickling down his cheeks, said:

"Seeing thou wilt not buy counsel at the first hand good cheap, thou shalt buy repentance at the second hand at such an unreasonable rate that thou wilt curse thy hard pennyworth and ban[8] thy hard heart.[9] Ah, Euphues, little dost thou know that if thy wealth waste, thy wit will give but small warmth; and if thy wit incline to willfulness, that thy wealth will do thee no great good. If the one had been employed to thrift, the other to learning, it had been hard to conjecture whether thou shouldest have been more fortunate by riches or happy by wisdom, whether more esteemed in the commonweal for wealth to maintain war or for counsel to conclude peace. But, alas, why do I pity that in thee which thou seemest to praise in thyself?"

And so saying, he immediately went to his own house, heavily bewailing the young man's unhappiness.

Here ye may behold, gentlemen, how lewdly[10] wit standeth in his own light,[11] how he deemeth no penny good silver but his own,[12] preferring the blossom before the fruit, the bud before the flower, the green blade before the ripe ear of corn, his own wit before all men's wisdoms.[13] Neither is that geason,[14] seeing for the most part it is proper to all those of sharp capacity to esteem of themselves as most proper.[15] If one be hard in conceiving,[16] they pronounce him a dolt; if given to study, they proclaim him a dunce; if merry, a jester; if sad, a saint; if full of words, a sot; if without speech, a cipher. If one argue with them boldly, then is he impudent; if coldly, an innocent. If there be reasoning of divinity, they cry, Quae supra nos, nihil ad nos[17] if of humanity, Sententias loquitur carnifex.[18] Hereof cometh such great familiarity between the ripest wits when they shall see the disposition the one of the other, the sympathia

---

[1] Proverb, "The elder tree is fullest of pith and farthest from strength" (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., Appendix A, no. 206).

[2] without i.e., when viewed from the outside, objectively.

[3] glances at the proverb, "Lose not the substance for the shadow" (Tilley S951).

[4] Pliny says "there is a bird called Taurus (because it loweth like a bull or cow)," probably the bittern (Natural History, 1.293a). As the OED suggests, the bittern's booming-voice was well-known; it is mentioned by Chaucer (Wife of Bath's Tale, l.116), Skelton (Philip Sparrow, l. 432), and T. Browne (Pseudodoxia Epidemica, Book 3, chapter 25).

[5] thunder ... stone thunder-bolt; cf. the proverb, "The thunderbolt has but his clap" (Tilley T278). Pliny notes that generally the louder the thunder, the less severe the accompanying lightning (Natural History, 1.20-21).

[6] Proverb, "Empty vessels sound most" (Tilley V36); "Full vessels sound least" (V37). See the related proverb, B488.

[7] stay my coming await my arrival.

[8] ban curse, chide angrily.

[9] Proverb, "He that refuses to buy counsel cheap shall buy repentance dear" (Tilley C689). See the related proverbs, R81-2 and W546.

[10] lewdly wickedly; perhaps, with the much earlier sense of "foolishly."

[11] Proverb, "to stand in one's own light" (i.e., said of a person whose actions injure his or her own interests) (Tilley L276).

[12] Proverb, "He thinks his penny (farthing, halfpenny) good silver" (Tilley P194); that is, he thinks well of himself with little reason. Here, more specifically, he thinks only his own ideas are worth anything.

[13] all variations on the proverbs, "He eats his corn in the blade [i.e., before it is ripe]" (Tilley C658) and "Corn is not to be gathered in the blade but the ear" (C656).

[14] geason rare, uncommon.

[15] proper characteristic, inherent; proper excellent, admirable.

[16] hard in conceiving i.e., have difficulty in understanding (something).

[17] Proverb, "The things that are above us are nothing to us" (Tilley T206).

[18] Latin, "The hangman announces the sentence" (i.e., there can be no objective judgement [upon a matter]).

of affections and, as it were, but a pair of shears to go between their natures;[1] one flattereth another in his own folly, and layeth cushions under the elbow of his fellow[2] when he seeth him take a nap with fancy;[3] and as their wit wresteth[4] them to vice, so it forgeth them some feat[5] excuse to cloak their vanity.

Too much study doth intoxicate their brains, "For," say they, "although iron the more it is used the brighter it is, yet silver with much wearing doth waste to nothing;[6] though the cammock the more it is bowed the better it serveth,[7] yet the bow the more it is bent and occupied the weaker it waxeth;[8] though the camomile the more it is trodden and pressed down the more it spreadeth,[9] yet the violet the oftener it is handled and touched the sooner it withereth and decayeth.[10] Besides this, a fine wit, a sharp sense, a quick understanding, is able to attain to more in a moment or a very little space than a dull and blockish head in a month. The scythe cutteth far better and smoother than the saw; the wax yieldeth better and sooner to the seal than the steel to the stamp; the smooth and plain beech is easier to be carved than the knotty box.[11] For neither is there anything but that hath his contraries."

Such is the nature of these novices that think to have learning without labour and treasure without travail—either not understanding, or else not remembering, that the finest edge is made with the blunt whetstone[12] and the fairest jewel fashioned with the hard hammer.[13] I go not about, gentlemen, to inveigh against wit, for then I were witless, but frankly to confess mine own little wit. I have ever thought so superstitiously[14] of wit that I fear I have committed idolatry against wisdom; and if nature had dealt so beneficially with me to have given me any wit, I should have been readier in the defence of it to have made an apology, than any way to turn to apostasy. But this I note, that for the most part they stand so on their pantofles[15] that they be secure of perils, obstinate in their own opinions, impatient of labour, apt to conceive wrong, credulous to believe the worst, ready to shake off their old acquaintance without cause, and to condemn them without colour.[16] All which humours are by so much the more easier to be purged by how much the less they have festered the sinews.[17] But return we again to Euphues.

Euphues having sojourned by the space of two months in Naples, whether he were moved by the courtesy of a young gentleman named Philautus[18] or enforced by destiny, whether his pregnant wit or his pleasant conceits wrought the greater liking in the mind of Euphues, I know not for certainty; but Euphues showed such entire love towards him, that he seemed to make small account of any others, determining to enter into such an inviolable league of friendship with him as neither time

---

[1] Proverb, "There went but a pair of shears between them" (Tilley P36), meaning they are close to identical in nature (i.e., they're cut from the same cloth). See the related proverbs, E81 and H24.

[2] Proverb, "To sow (lay) pillows (cushions) under the elbows" (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 484), meaning to give a false sense of security.

[3] take a nap with fancy i.e., to be immersed in or dazed with fanciful ideas.

[4] wresteth twists, turns.

[5] feat apt, smart, adroit.

[6] Proverb, "Iron (Brass) with use grows bright" (Tilley I93). See the related proverb, I91; proverb, "Iron (Gold) with often handling is worn to nothing" (I92).

[7] Proverb, "as crooked as a cammock [a crooked staff, a crook, or a curved stick]" (Tilley C33).

[8] Proverb, "A bow long bent at last waxes (i.e., grows) weak" (Tilley B561). See the related proverb, "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy" (W842). "Occupied" means "used" or "made use of."

[9] Proverb, "The more camomile is trodden down the more it spreads" (Tilley C34). See the related proverb, P37.

[10] Proverb (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., Appendix A, no. 215).

[11] box wood of the box-tree, an extremely hard wood, and thus favoured by engravers and carvers.

[12] Proverb, "The blunt whetstone makes a sharp edge" (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 681); "A whetstone cannot itself cut but yet it makes tools cut" (Tilley W299).

[13] Proverb (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., Appendix A, no. 217).

[14] superstitiously in an extravagantly devoted way.

[15] Proverb, "to stand on one's pantofles [i.e., an overshoe with a cork sole worn to raise the feet from the wet or mud]" (Tilley P43). See the related proverb, P335. It means to stand upon one's dignity.

[16] without colour without even a show of justice.

[17] Cf. the proverbs, "A green [i.e., new] wound is soon healed" (Tilley W927) and "It is ill healing an old sore" (H283).

[18] Philautus Greek, "self-love."

by piecemeal should impair, neither fancy[1] utterly dissolve, nor any suspicion infringe.

"I have read," sayeth he, "and well I believe it, that a friend is in prosperity a pleasure, a solace in adversity, in grief a comfort, in joy a merry companion,[2] at all times another I, in all places the express image of mine own person[3]—insomuch that I cannot tell whether the immortal gods have bestowed any gift upon mortal men either more noble or more necessary than friendship. Is there anything in the world to be reputed—I will not say compared—to friendship? Can any treasure in this transitory pilgrimage be of more value than a friend, in whose bosom thou mayest sleep secure without fear, whom thou mayest make partner of all thy secrets without suspicion of fraud, and partaker of all thy misfortune without mistrust of fleeting,[4] who will account thy bale his bane,[5] thy mishap his misery, the pricking of thy finger the piercing of his heart?[6] But whither am I carried? Have I not also learned that one should eat a bushel of salt with him whom he meaneth to make his friend,[7] that trial maketh trust,[8] that there is falsehood in fellowship?[9] And what then? Doth not the sympathy of manners make the conjunction of minds?[10] Is it not a byword, 'Like will to like'?[11] Not so common as commendable it is to see young gentlemen choose them such friends with whom they may seem, being absent, to be present; being asunder, to be conversant;[12] being dead, to be alive. I will, therefore, have Philautus for my fere,[13] and by so much the more I make myself sure to have Philautus, by how much the more I view in him the lively image of Euphues."

Although there be none so ignorant that doth not know, neither any so impudent that will not confess friendship to be the jewel of human joy, yet whosoever shall see this amity grounded upon a little affection will soon conjecture that it shall be dissolved upon a light occasion, as in the sequel of Euphues and Philautus you shall see, whose hot love waxed soon cold.[14] For as the best wine doth make the sharpest vinegar,[15] so the deepest love turneth to the deadliest hate.[16] Who deserved the most blame, in mine opinion it is doubtful, and so difficult that I dare not presume to give verdict. For love being the cause for which so many mischiefs have been attempted, I am not yet per-

---

[1] fancy romantic love.

[2] Opposing proverbial expressions are glanced at here: "Prosperity gets friends but adversity tries them" (Tilley P611) and "In time of prosperity friends will be plenty, in time of adversity not one among twenty" (T301).

[3] Proverb, "A friend is one's second self" (Tilley F696). See the related proverbs, F701 and H49. Both Cicero's dialogue Laelius: De Amicitia ("On Friendship" 7.23) and Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics (9.4.1166A30-31) make this claim. Much of Euphues' speech in praise of friendship derives from Laelius: De Amicitia.

[4] without mistrust of fleeting i.e., without having to fear that one's friend will prove inconstant or fickle in his friendship.

[5] bale misery, suffering, misfortune; bane curse, ruin.

[6] Much proverbial wisdom echoes these sentiments: "A true friend a great treasure" (Tilley F719); "A friend's frown is better than a fool's smiles [a foe's kiss]" (F727); "Keep well thy friends when thou hast gotten them" (F752). However, as Euphues goes on to note, there were also popular sayings warning against placing too much trust in friends, especially new ones: "Never trust much to a new friend or an old enemy" (F712); "Trust no friend with that you need fear him if he were your enemy" (F721); "Friends agree best at a distance" (F734); "From my friends God defend me, from my enemies I can keep myself" (F739). Related proverbs appear in the notes below.

[7] Proverb, "Before you make a friend eat a bushel of salt with him" (Tilley F685); given that it would take a very long time to eat a bushel of salt in any reasonable fashion, the proverb thus recommends taking an equally long time before taking a person on as a friend. See the related proverb, "He that has many friends eats too much salt with his meat" (F744).

[8] Proverb, "Try (Try your friend) before you trust" (Tilley T595) and "Prove your friend ere you have need" (F718).

[9] Proverb, "There is falsehood (flattery) in fellowship" (Tilley F41); for related proverbs, see F349 ("Flattery gets friends") and T549 ("In trust is treason").

[10] Proverb, "Sympathy (similitude) of manners makes the conjunction of minds" (S1056), a variation on the proverb below.

[11] Proverb, "Like will to like" (Tilley L286). See the related proverbs, C135-36, L284, L287.

[12] conversant in communication.

[13] fere comrade.

[14] Proverb, "Hot love is soon cold" (L483). See the related proverbs, E222, H732, L482, and L559; waxed grew.

[15] Proverb, "The sweetest wine makes the sharpest vinegar" (Tilley W470). See the related proverb, H382.

[16] Proverb, "The greatest hate proceeds from the greatest love" (Tilley H210); "No hate like to brothers' if they fall at debate" (H211). But cf. "Faithful love will never turn to hate" (L477) and "A perfect love does last eternally" (L539).

suaded whether[1] of them was most to be blamed, but certainly neither of them was blameless. I appeal to your judgment, gentlemen, not that I think any of you of the like disposition able to decide the question, but, being of deeper discretion than I am, are more fit to debate the quarrel. Though the discourse of their friendship and falling out be somewhat long, yet, being somewhat strange, I hope the delightfulness of the one will attenuate the tediousness of the other.

Euphues had continual access to the place of Philautus and no little familiarity with him; and finding him at convenient leisure, in these short terms unfolded his mind unto him:

"Gentleman and friend, the trial I have had of thy manners cutteth off divers terms which to another I would have used in the like matter. And sithence[2] a long discourse argueth folly,[3] and delicate words incur the suspicion of flattery,[4] I am determined to use neither of them, knowing either of them to breed offence. Weighing with myself the force of friendship by the effects, I studied ever since my first coming to Naples to enter league with such a one as might direct my steps, being a stranger, and resemble my manners, being a scholar; the which two qualities as I find in you able to satisfy my desire, so I hope I shall find a heart in you willing to accomplish my request. Which if I may obtain assure yourself that Damon to his Pythias, Pylades to his Orestes, Titus to his Gysippus, Theseus to his Pirithous, Scipio to his Laelius,[5] was never found more faithful than Euphues will be to Philautus."

Philautus by how much the less he looked for this discourse, by so much the more he liked it, for he saw all qualities both of body and mind in Euphues; unto whom he replied as followeth:

"Friend Euphues—for so your talk warranteth me to term you—I dare neither use a long process, neither a loving speech, lest unwittingly I should cause you to convince me[6] of those things which you have already condemned. And verily I am bold to presume upon your courtesy since you yourself have used so little curiosity,[7] persuading myself that my short answer will work as great an effect in you as your few words did in me. And seeing we resemble (as you say) each other in qualities, it cannot be that the one should differ from the other in courtesy. Seeing the sincere affection of the mind cannot be expressed by the mouth and that no art can unfold the entire love of the heart,[8] I am earnestly to beseech you not to measure the firmness of my faith by the fewness of my words, but rather think that the overflowing waves of goodwill leave no passage for many words. Trial shall prove trust.[9] Here is my hand, my heart, my lands, and my life at thy commandment. Thou mayest well perceive that I did believe thee that so soon I did love thee, and I hope thou wilt the rather love me in that I did believe thee."

Either Euphues and Philautus stood in need of friendship or were ordained to be friends. Upon so short warning to make so soon a conclusion might 1 whether which of the two.

---

2 sithence since.

3 Proverb, "Few words show men wise" (Tilley W799); "Few words are best" (W798).

4 Proverb, "Full of courtesy, full of craft" (Tilley C732); proverb, "Few words among friends are best" (W796); cf. "In fairest speech is feigning [i.e., lying, deception] rifest" (Pettie, Petite Pallace, I, 116).

5 For Damon and Pythias, see p. 466, note 2. Pylades and Orestes Pylades proved the extent of his friendship for Orestes, son of Agamemnon, by helping him to avenge his murdered father; Titus and Gysippus Gysippus, reduced to poverty and exile, confesses to a murder he has not committed in order to achieve the release of death. Titus, hearing that his friend has been charged with murder, confesses to the crime (even though he also is not guilty) in order to save Gysippus. As they argue with each other in front of the magistrate, the real criminal, affected by their mutual devotion, confesses to the crime. See Boccaccio, Decameron (Tenth Day, Eighth Story); there are interesting parallels between this tale and the plot of Euphues; Theseus and Pirithous So desirous was Pirithous, king of Lapithae, to meet the great Theseus and test his valour that he invaded Theseus' lands. Upon their meeting, the war was forestalled, as an immediate friendship was struck up between the two men; their friendship, like that of Damon and Pythias, was so deep and inviolable that it became proverbial. For Scipio and Laelius, see p. 466, note 4. In Renaissance England, all were well-known exemplars of true friendship.

6 convince me convict, find me guilty.

7 curiosity elaboration.

8 Proverb, "They that love most speak least" (Tilley, Eliz. Prov. no. 419). But cf. the proverb, "Love makes men orators" (Tilley L522).

9 See p. 475, note 8.

seem (in mine opinion) if it continued, miraculous; if shaken off, ridiculous. But after many embracings and protestations one to another, they walked to dinner, where they wanted neither meat,[1] neither music, neither any other pastime; and having banqueted, to digest their sweet confections, they danced all that afternoon.[2] They used only one board,[3] but one bed, one book—if so be it they thought not one too many. Their friendship augmented every day, insomuch that the one could not refrain the company of the other one minute. All things went in common between them,[4] which all men accounted commendable.

Philautus being a town-born child, both for his own countenance and the great countenance[5] which his father had while he lived, crept into credit with[6] Don Ferardo, one of the chief governors of the city; who although he had a courtly crew of gentlewomen sojourning in his palace, yet his daughter, heir to his whole revenues, stained the beauty of them all: whose modest bashfulness caused the other[7] to look wan for envy; whose lily cheeks, dyed with a vermilion red, made the rest to blush for shame. For as the finest ruby staineth the colour of the rest that be in place, or as the sun dimmeth the moon that she cannot be discerned, so this gallant girl, more fair than fortunate, and yet more fortunate than faithful, eclipsed the beauty of them all and changed their colours. Unto her had Philautus access, who won her by right of love and should have worn her by right of law had not Euphues by strange destiny broken the bonds of marriage and forbidden the banns[8] of matrimony. [...]

[...]

[Philautus takes Euphues to dinner at Don Ferardo's; there Euphues falls in love at first sight with Philautus's beloved, Lucilla, and she with him. Euphues determines, after some agonizing inner debate, that all's fair in love and war; and he decides to pursue Lucilla. To Philautus, he pretends that he is in love with Lucilla's gentlewoman attendant, Livia, so that he can have some excuse for visiting the household. A short time later, Euphues and Philautus go to visit Lucilla and her gentlewomen, including Livia, but Philautus is called away on a journey by Lucilla's father, Don Ferardo. Left alone, Euphues and Lucilla admit to each other their mutual love. As a result, when her father and Philautus return, having concluded between themselves that marriage should take place at once, Lucilla refuses to marry Philautus. Don Ferardo assumes Philautus has a rival, and tries to discover his name by assuring Lucilla that, as her father, he will do anything to ensure her happiness.]

Lucilla, perceiving the drift of the old fox her father, weighed with herself what was the best to be done. At the last, not weighing her father's ill will but encouraged by her love, shaped him an answer which pleased Ferardo but a little and pinched Philautus on the parson's side,[9] on this manner:

"Dear father Ferardo, although I see the bait you lay to catch me, yet I am content to swallow the hook.[10] Neither are you more desirous to take me napping,[11] than I willing to confess my meaning. So it is that love hath as well inveigled me as others, which make it as strange as I.[12] Neither do I love him so meanly that I should be

[1] wanted lacked; meat food, provisions.

[2] banqueted ... afternoon A banquet was a course, or sometimes a separate meal, consisting of sweetmeats, fruits, and other delicacies; hence, the "sweet confections."

[3] board dining table.

[4] Proverb, "Among friends all things are common" (Tilley F729). See also M980.

[5] countenance social position, standing, dignity.

[6] crept into credit with gradually gained the favourable estimation and trust of.

[7] other others; the other group of women.

[8] banns public proclamation [of a couple's intention to marry].

[9] Proverb, "Pinch on the parson's side" (Tilley P67), meaning to deprive him of what is rightfully due to him (literally, to refuse to pay to the parish priest his rightful tithes).

[10] Proverb, "The bait hides the hook" (Tilley B50). See the related proverb, S585.

[11] Proverb, "to take one napping" (Tilley N36-37).

[12] make it as strange as I i.e., others have rejected it [love] just as I [have].

ashamed of his name, neither is his personage so mean that I should love him shamefully. It is Euphues, that lately arrived here at Naples, that hath battered the bulwark of my breast and shall shortly enter as conqueror into my bosom. What his wealth is I neither know it nor weigh it; what his wit is all Naples doth know it and wonder at it. Neither have I been curious to inquire of his progenitors, for that I know so noble a mind could take no original but from a noble man. For as no bird can look against the sun but those that be bred of the eagle,[1] neither any hawk soar so high as the brood of the hobby,[2] so no wight[3] can have such excellent qualities except he descend of a noble race, neither be of so high capacity unless he issue of a high progeny.[4] And I hope Philautus will not be my foe, seeing I have chosen his dear friend; neither you, father, be displeased in that Philautus is displaced. You need not muse that I should so suddenly be entangled. Love gives no reason of choice, neither will it suffer any repulse.[5] Myrrha was enamoured of her natural father, Byblis of her brother, Phaedra[6] of her son-in-law. If nature can no way resist the fury of affection, how should it be stayed by wisdom?'[7]

Ferardo, interrupting her in the middle of her discourse, although he were moved with inward grudge, yet he wisely repressed his anger, knowing that sharp words would but sharpen her froward[8] will, and thus answered her briefly:

"Lucilla, as I am not presently to grant my good will,[9] so mean I not to reprehend thy choice. Yet wisdom willeth me to pause until I have called what may happen to my remembrance, and warneth thee to be circumspect lest thy rash conceit bring a sharp repentance. As for you, Philautus, I would not have you despair, seeing a woman doth oftentimes change her desire."[10]

Unto whom Philautus in few words made answer: "Certainly, Ferardo, I take the less grief in that I see her so greedy after Euphues. And by so much the more I am content to leave my suit, by how much the more she seemeth to disdain my service. But as for hope, because I would not by any means taste one dram thereof, I will abjure all places of her abode and loathe her company, whose countenance I have so much loved. As for Euphues—."

And there, staying his speech, he flung out of the doors, and repairing to his lodging uttered these words:

"Ah, most dissembling wretch Euphues! O counterfeit companion! Couldst thou under the show of a steadfast friend cloak the malice of a mortal foe?[11] Under the colour of simplicity shroud the image of deceit? Is thy Livia turned to my Lucilla, thy love to my lover, thy devotion to my saint? Is this the courtesy of Athens, the cavil-

---

[1] Proverb, "Only the eagle can gaze at the sun" (Tilley E3), a commonplace of Renaissance natural history.

[2] hobby a small species of falcon, used to hunt larks and other small birds, known for its ability to soar high and fast.

[3] wight person, individual.

[4] Proverb, "He is proper (noble) that has proper (noble) conditions" (Tilley C586); "A gentleman will do like a gentleman" (G67). But cf., "Nature passes nurture" (N47) and "Nurture is above (passes) nature" (N357).

[5] Proverb, "Love is without reason" (Tilley L517). See the related proverbs, L508, L558, W592. See also p. 481, note 15.

[6] Myrrha She deceived her father Cinyras, king of Cyprus, into unwittingly having intercourse with her. When he discovered the deception and tried to kill her, she fled into Arabia; after giving birth to Adonis, she was transformed by the gods into the myrrh tree; Byblis Having fallen in love with her brother, Caunus, Byblis revealed her passion to him. Rejected, she followed him when he fled their homeland; frenzied by grief, she was transformed into a fountain; Phaedra Daughter of Minos and Pasiphae, Phaedra married Theseus and fell in love with Theseus' son by the amazon Hippolyte, Hippolytus. During one of Theseus' absences, she revealed her passion to her step-son only to be rejected by him. In revenge, Phaedra told Theseus on his return that Hippolytus had tried to seduce her. Banished by his father, Hippolytus was trampled to death by his own horses in response to Theseus' prayer that Neptune would punish his son. Phaedra then confessed her crime and hanged herself.

[7] Proverb, "It is impossible to love and be wise" (Tilley L558).

[8] froward perverse, unmanageable, obstinate.

[9] I.e., as I am not going to immediately grant my approval.

[10] A woman's lack of constancy had many proverbial expressions: "A woman's mind and winter wind (winter weather and women's thoughts) change oft" (Tilley W673); "A woman's mind (a woman) is always mutable" (W674); "Women are as wavering (changeable, inconstant) as the wind" (W698); "A woman is a weathercock" (W653).

[11] This comment glances at the proverb, "It is better to have an open foe than a dissembling friend" (Tilley F410).

ing of scholars, the craft of Grecians? Couldst thou not remember, Philautus, that Greece is never without some wily Ulysses, never void of some Sinon,[1] never to seek of some deceitful shifter? Is it not commonly said of Grecians that craft cometh to them by kind, that they learn to deceive in their cradle?[2] Why then did his pretended courtesy bewitch thee with such credulity? Shall my goodwill be the cause of his ill will? Because I was content to be his friend, thought he me meet[3] to be made his fool? I see now that as the fish scolopidus in the flood Araris at the waxing of the moon is as white as the driven snow and at the waning as black as the burnt coal,[4] so Euphues which at the first increasing of our familiarity was very zealous is now at the last cast become most faithless.

"But why rather exclaim I not against Lucilla, whose wanton looks caused Euphues to violate his plighted[5] faith? Ah, wretched wench, canst thou be so light of love as to change with every wind? So inconstant as to prefer a new lover before thine old friend? Ah, well I wot[6] that a new broom sweepeth clean, and a new garment maketh thee leave off the old though it be fitter,[7] and new wine causeth thee to forsake the old though it be better;[8] much like to the men in the island Scyros which pull up the old tree when they see the young begin to spring,[9] and not unlike unto the widow of Lesbos which changed all her old gold for new glass.[10] Have I served thee three years faithfully, and am I served so unkindly? Shall the fruit of my desire be turned to disdain?

"But unless Euphues had inveigled thee, thou hadst yet been constant; yea, but if Euphues had not seen thee willing to be won, he would never have wooed thee. But had not Euphues enticed thee with fair words, thou wouldst never have loved him; but hadst thou not given him fair looks, he would never have liked thee. Aye, but Euphues gave the onset; aye, but Lucilla gave the occasion. Aye, but Euphues first broke his mind;[11] aye, but Lucilla first bewrayed[12] her meaning. Tush, why go I about to excuse any of them, seeing I have just cause to accuse them both? Neither ought I to dispute which of them hath proffered me the greatest villainy, sith that[13] either of them hath committed perjury. Yet although they have found me dull in perceiving their falsehood, they shall not find me slack in revenging their folly. As for Lucilla, seeing I mean altogether to forget her, I mean also to forgive her,[14] lest in seeking means to be revenged mine old desire be renewed."

Philautus, having thus discoursed with himself, began to write to Euphues as followeth:

Although hitherto, Euphues, I have shrined thee in my heart for a trusty friend, I will shun thee hereafter as a truthless foe; and although I cannot see in thee less wit than I was wont, yet do I find less honesty. I perceive at the last, although (being deceived) it be too late, that musk, though it be sweet in the smell, is sour in the smack;[15] that the leaf

---

[1] Ulysses king of Ithaca, protagonist of Homer's Odyssey, whose craft and subtlety was well-known; most famously, he suggested the stratagem of the Trojan horse; Sinon Son of Sisyphus, Sinon accompanied the Greeks to Troy and there was instrumental in persuading the Trojans to take the Trojan horse within the city walls; he was a by-word for treachery and deceit in the Renaissance.

[2] Proverb, "Grecian faith" (Tilley F31). See p. 466, note 7; by kind i.e., as part of their natural character.

[3] meet fit, suitable.

[4] perhaps the scolopendra, a fabled sea-fish which, when caught with a hook, was thought first to vomit up its guts to expel the hook, and then swallow its guts down again. Pliny does not mention its chameleon properties (Pliny, Natural History, 1.262g, 2.300k).

[5] plighted promised, vowed.

[6] wot know.

[7] Proverb, "A new broom (besom) sweeps clean" (Tilley B682), meaning new servants are often very diligent (or new officers very severe) at first but then lapse into slothfulness; proverb, "There is no more hold of a new friend than of a new fashion" (H509). See the related proverb, F712.

[8] Proverb, "Old friends and old wine are best" (Tilley F755).

[9] Achilles initially retreated to the island of Scyros (Skyros) to avoid the Trojan war, but we have not been able to identify the source of the custom mentioned here.

[10] This allusion remains obscure, although the injunction not to surrender foolishly that which is old but valuable for that which is new but cheap is surely proverbial.

[11] broke his mind revealed what was in his mind.

[12] bewrayed revealed, disclosed.

[13] sith that seeing that.

[14] Proverb, "Forgive and forget" (Tilley F597).

[15] smack taste, flavour.

of the cedar tree, though it be fair to be seen, yet the syrup depriveth sight; that friendship, though it be plighted by shaking the hand, yet it is shaken off by fraud of the heart. But thou hast not much to boast of, for as thou hast won a fickle lady, so hast thou lost a faithful friend. How canst thou be secure of her constancy, when thou hast had such trial of her lightness? How canst thou assure thyself that she will be faithful to thee, which hath been faithless to me?

Ah, Euphues, let not my credulity be an occasion hereafter for thee to practice the like cruelty. Remember this: that yet there hath never been any faithless to his friend that hath not also been fruitless to his God. But I weigh the treachery the less in that it cometh from a Grecian in whom is no truth.[1] Though I be too weak to wrestle for a revenge, yet God, who permitteth no guile to be guiltless, will shortly requite this injury; though Philautus have no policy to undermine thee, yet thine own practices will be sufficient to overthrow thee.

Couldst thou, Euphues, for the love of a fruitless pleasure violate the league of faithful friendship? Didst thou weigh more the enticing looks of a lewd wench than the entire love of a loyal friend? If thou didst determine with thyself at the first to be false, why didst thou swear to be true? If to be true, why art thou false? If thou wast[2] minded both falsely and forgedly to deceive me, why didst thou flatter and dissemble with me at the first? If to love me, why didst thou flinch at the last? If the sacred bands of amity did delight thee, why didst thou break them? If dislike thee,[3] why didst thou praise them?

Dost thou not know that a perfect friend should be like the glazeworm which shineth most bright in the dark,[4] or like the pure frankincense which smelleth most sweet when it is in the fire;[5] or at the least not unlike to the damask rose which is sweeter in the still[6] than on the stalk? But thou, Euphues, dost rather resemble the swallow which in the summer creepeth under the eaves of every house and in the winter leaveth nothing but dirt behind her;[7] or the humble-bee which having sucked honey out of the fair flower doth leave it and loathe it;[8] or the spider which in the finest web doth hang the fairest fly.

Dost thou think, Euphues, that thy craft in betraying me shall any whit cool my courage in revenging thy villainy? Or that a gentleman of Naples will put up such an injury at the hands of a scholar? And if I do, it is not for want of strength to maintain my just quarrel, but of will which thinketh scorn to get so vain a conquest. I know that Menelaus for his ten years' war endured ten years' woe, that after all his strife he won but a strumpet, that for all his travail he reduced—I cannot say reclaimed—but a straggler;[9] which was as much, in my judgment, as to strive for a broken glass which is good for nothing.[10] I wish thee rather Menelaus' care[11] than myself his conquest; that thou, being deluded by Lucilla, mayest rather know what it is to be deceived, than I, having conquered thee, should prove what it were to bring back a dissembler. Seeing, therefore, there can no greater revenge light upon thee than that as thou hast reaped where another hath sown, so another may thresh that which thou hast reaped,[12] I will pray that thou mayest be measured unto with the like measure that thou hast meten unto others;[13] that as thou hast thought it no conscience to betray me, so others may deem it no dishonesty to deceive thee; that as Lucilla made it a light matter to forswear her old friend Philautus, so she may make it a mock to forsake her new fere[14] Euphues. Which if it come to pass, as it is like by my compass, then shalt thou see the troubles and feel the torments which thou hast already thrown into the hearts and eyes of others.

---

1 See p. 462, note 14; p. 466, notes 6-7.

2 wast were.

3 If dislike thee i.e., if "the sacred bands of amity" displeased thee.

4 Proverb, "You will make me believe that glowworms are lanterns" (Tilley G143).

5 Proverb, "Frankincense is burned before it smells" (Tilley F665).

6 in the still i.e., in the apparatus used for distillation.

7 Proverb, "Swallows, like false friends, fly away upon the approach of winter" (Tilley 1026). See the related proverbs, P611 and T301.

8 Proverb, "Too much honey cloys the stomach" (Tilley H560); humble-bee bumble bee.

9 for all … straggler i.e., in exchange for all his trouble he brought back again (I cannot say reformed) just a camp-follower (a whore); there is a play on "reduced" which can mean literally to bring (someone) back, and "reclaimed" which can mean fig., to bring back from a wrong course of action.

10 Proverb, "Glasses and lasses are brittle ware" (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 284).

11 care sorrow, suffering.

12 Proverb, "One sows, another reaps" (Tilley S691) and "One reaps, another threshes" (Tilley, Eliz. Prov. no. 511, 511A).

13 Proverb, "With what measure you mete it shall be measured unto you" (Tilley M801; Matthew 8:2); proverb, "measure for measure" (M800).

14 fere companion.

Thus hoping shortly to see thee as hopeless as myself is hapless,[1] I wish my wish were as effectually ended as it is heartily looked for. And so I leave thee.

Thine once,

Philautus.

Philautus, dispatching a messenger with this letter speedily to Euphues, went into the fields to walk there, either to digest his choler[2] or chew upon his melancholy.

But Euphues, having read the contents, was well content, setting his talk at naught and answering his taunts in these gibing[3] terms:

I remember, Philautus, how valiantly Ajax boasted in the feats of arms, yet Ulysses bore away the armour;[4] and it may be that though thou crake[5] of thine own courage, thou mayest easily lose the conquest. Dost thou think Euphues a dastard[6] that he is not able to withstand thy courage, or such a dullard that he cannot descry[7] thy craft? Alas, good soul, it fareth with thee as with the hen, which when the puttock[8] hath caught her chicken beginneth to cackle; and thou, having lost thy lover, beginnest to prattle.

Tush, Philautus, I am in this point of Euripides his mind, who thinks it lawful for the desire of a kingdom to transgress the bonds of honesty, and for the love of a lady to violate and break the bonds of amity.[9] The friendship between man and man as it is common, so is it of course;[10] between man and woman as it is seldom, so is it sincere:[11] the one proceedeth of the similitude of manners, the other of the sincerity of the heart. If thou hadst learned the first point of hawking, thou wouldst have learned to have held fast;[12] or the first note of descant, thou wouldst have kept thy sol-fa to thyself.[13]

But thou canst blame me no more of folly in leaving thee to love Lucilla than thou mayest reprove him of foolishness that having a sparrow in his hand letteth her go to catch the pheasant, or him of unskillfulness that seeing the heron leaveth to level his shot at the stock dove,[14] or that woman of coyness that having a dead rose in her bosom throweth it away to gather the fresh violet. Love knoweth no laws.[15] Did not Jupiter transform himself into the shape of Amphitryon to embrace Alcmene, into the form of a swan to enjoy Leda, into a bull to beguile Io, into a shower of gold to win Danae? Did not Neptune change himself into a heifer, a ram, a flood, a dolphin, only for the love of those he lusted after? Did not Apollo convert himself into a shepherd, into a bird, into a lion, for the desire he had to heal his disease?[16] If the gods thought no scorn to become beasts to obtain their best beloved, shall Euphues be so nice in

---

[1] hapless unfortunate.

[2] choler anger.

[3] gibing insulting.

[4] After the death of Achilles, both Ulysses and Ajax claimed the dead hero's arms. Ulysses was granted them (largely because of his superior eloquence) and in response to this slight Ajax killed himself with his own sword.

[5] crake boast, brag.

[6] dastard sot, coward.

[7] descry discern, perceive.

[8] puttock kite, a bird of prey.

[9] In Euripides' The Phoenician Women, Eteocles concludes a speech about his desire for absolute power with the words: "if one must do a wrong, it's best to do it/pursuing power—otherwise, let's have virtue." See E. Wyckoff, trans., The Complete Greek Tragedies, Vol. IV: Euripides, ed. D. Grene and R. Lattimore (Chicago, 1959), ll. 524-25; proverb, "When love puts in friendship is gone" (Tilley L549). See the related proverb, L505.

[10] of course customary, routine.

[11] Proverb, "Friendship between man and man is less sincere than friendship between man and woman." According to Tilley, a rare proverbial expression, occurring here in Euphues, in George Pettie's 1576 Petite Palace of Pettie His Pleasure (1.2), and in its converse form in Lyly's play Endymion (3.4.114), but nowhere else. Quoted from Endymion in Wit's Commonwealth (Part I), "[The saying] is attributed there to Plato" (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 276).

[12] Proverb, "The first point of hawking is hold fast [i.e, to the bird]" (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 329).

[13] The descant is the counterpoint sung to a melody in order to create harmony, while "sol-fa" refers to those syllables to which the musical scale is usually sung. OED notes that Lyly uses "sol-fa" here fig., meaning "complaint." Perhaps, Euphues means that Philautus should be silent, instead of marring the main melody of Euphues' love for Lucilla with his descant of complaints. Cf. proverb, "To make one sing sol-fa," meaning "to rattle [a person] up soundly, to give [someone] a severe check" (Tilley S607).

[14] leaveth to level his shot at the stock dove i.e., ceases to aim his weapon at the wild pigeon.

[15] Proverb, "Love is lawless" (Tilley L508). See p. 478, note 5.

[16] All of these famous transformations of the gods in pursuit of mortal women are inscribed on the tapestry which Arachne weaves in her contest with Minerva, deliberately contrasting the goddess' depiction of the glory of the gods with her own representation of their lust and folly.

changing his copy[1] to gain his lady? No, no; he that cannot dissemble in love is not worthy to live.[2] I am of this mind: that both might and malice, deceit and treachery, all perjury, any impiety, may lawfully be committed in love, which is lawless.

In that thou arguest Lucilla of lightness, thy will hangs in the light of thy wit.[3] Dost thou not know that the weak stomach, if it be cloyed with one diet, doth soon surfeit?[4] That the clown's[5] garlic cannot ease the courtier's disease so well as the pure treacle? That far fet and dear bought is good for ladies?[6] That Euphues being a more dainty morsel than Philautus ought better to be accepted?

Tush, Philautus, set thy heart at rest, for thy hap[7] willeth thee to give over all hope both of my friendship and her love. As for revenge, thou art not so able to lend a blow as I to ward it, neither more venturous to challenge the combat than I valiant to answer the quarrel. As Lucilla was caught by fraud, so shall she be kept by force;[8] and as thou wast too simple to espy my craft, so I think thou wilt be too weak to withstand my courage. But if thy revenge stand only upon thy wish, thou shalt never live to see my woe or to have thy will.

And so farewell.

Euphues

This letter being dispatched, Euphues sent it and Philautus read it; who, disdaining those proud terms, disdained also to answer them, being ready to ride with Ferardo.

Euphues, having for a space absented himself from the house of Ferardo because he was at home, longed sore[9] to see Lucilla; which now opportunity offered unto him, Ferardo being gone again to Venice with Philautus.

But in this his absence one Curio, a gentleman of Naples of little wealth and less wit, haunted Lucilla her company, and so enchanted her that Euphues was also cast off with Philautus. Which thing being unknown to Euphues caused him the sooner to make his repair[10] to the presence of his lady, whom he finding in her muses[11] began pleasantly to salute[12] in this manner:

"Mistress Lucilla, although my long absence might breed your just anger—for that lovers desire nothing so much as often meeting—yet I hope my presence will dissolve your choler—for that lovers are soon pleased when of their wishes they be fully possessed. My absence is the rather to be excused in that your father hath been always at home, whose frowns seemed to threaten my ill fortune; and my presence at this present the better to be accepted in that I have made such speedy repair to your presence."

Unto whom Lucilla answered with this gleek:[13] "Truly, Euphues, you have missed the cushion,[14] for I was neither angry with your long absence, neither am I well pleased at your presence; the one gave me rather a good hope hereafter never to see you, the other giveth me a greater occasion to abhor you."

Euphues, being nipped on the head,[15] with a pale countenance, as though his soul had forsaken his body, replied as followeth: "If this sudden change, Lucilla, proceed of any desert of mine, I am here not only to answer the fact but also to make amends for my fault; if of any new motion or mind to forsake your new friend, I am rather to

---

[1] so nice in changing his copy i.e., overly fastidious in regard to changing his behaviour or course of action.

[2] Proverb, "He that cannot dissemble [i.e., cloak or disguise his true intentions] knows not how to live (rule)" (Tilley D386).

[3] I.e., your accusing Lucilla of fickleness (also, wantonness, incontinence) shows that your emotions are obstructing your ability to reason.

[4] cloyed with one diet over-loaded with one type of food; surfeit experience nausea.

[5] clown's peasant's. Garlic was a homely, rural remedy for a number of ailments, while treacle (a medicinal compound) was generally prepared and sold by apothecaries, and was thus much more expensive.

[6] Proverb, "Far-fetched (far-sought) and dear bought are dainties (is good, fit, meet) for ladies" (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 213).

[7] hap fortune, chance.

[8] Proverb, "Love cannot be compelled (forced)" (Tilley L499). See the related proverb, K46.

[9] sore eagerly, very much.

[10] make his repair make his way.

[11] in her muses in a state of abstraction or meditation.

[12] salute greet.

[13] gleek gibe, insult.

